COMPLETE CONTENTS

CONTENTS OF VOLUME ONE OF THE INTRODUCTION

Chapter One: The Myth of the Goddess

Chapter Two: The Empowering Command

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME TWO OF THE INTRODUCTION

Chapter Five: The Early Development of Kaulism and the Emergence of the Kubjikā Tantras

Tables

Figures

CONTENTS OF VOLUME THREE OF THE INTRODUCTION

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME ONE OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER ONE: Śrīnātha's Inquiry

CHAPTER TWO: The Response to the Inquiry

CHAPTER THREE: Dakṣa's Curse and Grace

CHAPTER FOUR: Concerning the Mālinīstavarāja

CHAPTER FIVE: Śrīnātha's Consecration with the Command (ājñābhiṣeka)

CHAPTER SIX: The Pervasion of Śrīnātha's Sacred Seat of the Command (ājñāpīṭha)

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME ONE

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME TWO OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER NINE: The Consciousness of the Vidyā according to its Divisions as Full and the Rest.

CHAPTER TEN: A Description of the Glory of the Vidyā

CHAPTER ELEVEN: The Way to Offer Libation (argha) and Repeat the Vidyā

CHAPTER TWELVE: The Glory of the Vidyā

CHAPTER THIRTEEN: Concerning the Destruction of Impurity

Diagrams

Figures

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME THREE OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE: The Fifty (Verses) concerning Kula

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX: The Root Sūtra and the Hymn to Māyā

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN: The Maṇḍala of the Transmission (kramamaṇḍala) and the Maṇḍala of the Teachers (gurumaṇḍala)

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT: The Authority of the Triple Transmission

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME THREE

Diagrams

Figures
The Fifty Mālini Śaktis

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME FOUR OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE: The Initiation by Piercing (vedhadīkṣā)

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO: The Characteristic Signs of Teachers and Disciples

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE: Concerning the Initiation with Seed

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR: The Teaching Concerning the Offering to the Fire

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE: The Emanation of the Triple Division and its Authority

CHAPTER FORTY: Concerning the Venerable Knowledge

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE: The Fitness to Practice Yoga

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO: The Sūtra of the Sequence of Emanation

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE: The Sūtra of the Descent (of the Teachers) in the Four Ages

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR: The Emanation of the Śrīkrama

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE: The Casket of the Transmissions

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX: The Glory of Emission (vikṣepādhikāramāhātmya)

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN: The Description of the Practice of the Rule

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME FOUR

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME FIVE OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT: The Kramasūtra

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE: The Sūtra of the Visualization of the (Goddess's) Form for the Inner Sacrifice

CHAPTER FIFTY: The Sūtra of the Śrīkrama

CHAPTER FIFTY-SIX: The Sūtra of the Sixteen Siddhas

CHAPTER FIFTY-SEVEN: The Plane of the Divine Current which is the Transmission beginning with the Transmental

CHAPTER FIFTY-EIGHT: The Explanation of the Root Sūtra

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE: The Plane of the Four Sacred Seats in the Ocean of the Foundation of the Maṇḍala (khaṭikārṇava)

CHAPTER SIXTY: The Transformations of the Plane of the Sacred Seats

CHAPTER SIXTY-ONE: The Planes of the Siddhas and the Goddesses

CHAPTER SIXTY-TWO: The Planes (of Realisation) of the Five Jewels

CHAPTER SIXTY-THREE: the Plane of the Hexad of the Command

CHAPTER SIXTY-FOUR: The Plane of the Pentad and the Triad

CHAPTER SIXTY-NINE: Conclusion

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME FIVE

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME SIX

The Goddess Kubjikā

Myth, History, Doctrine and Practice.

The Section concerning the Virgin Goddess of
The Tantra of the Churning Bhairava

The Kumārikākhaṇḍa of the Manthānabhairavatantra Edition and Translation with Extensive Notes and Introduction

Mark S. G. Dyczkowski

Volume One of the Introduction to the Edition and Translation of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa of the Manthānabhairavatantra

Front page: The Goddess Kubjikā and Her Six Limbs. This form of the goddess is described in chapter 29 of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa. The Six Limbs of the goddess are described in appendix 2 of volume two part two.
The Goddess Kubjikā and Her Six Limbs
The Saṁvartāmaṇḍala

This work is dedicated to the Goddess who willed it and to my family who made it possible.

Acknowledgements

Reflecting on over 35 years of study, during most of which I have had the great good fortune to live in India, the Holy Land of the Ṛṣis, Siddhas and Yoginīs, I cannot escape the feeling that a mighty Divine Power has guided my life. Any acknowledgement of help received or inspiration must begin for me with a sense of profound gratitude to the One Infinite Being who sustains and is both the origin and final end of all things. Nowadays, in this modern secular world such declarations seem improper and contrary to the spirit of detached objectivity that serious academic research demands. Nonetheless, bound as a scholar by the moral duty to acknowledge my sources and those who have assisted me and taught me, I cannot do otherwise. Were it not for that impulse, inscrutable as it is powerful, that sent me from England, my native land, to India in 1968 and to the many people I was fortunate to meet there who taught and guided me, the volumes the reader has before him would not exist.

Amongst the many that come to mind I can only mention a few, the first of whom is the late Pt. Ambikadatta Upadhyaya at whose feet I was introduced to the Sanskrit language and the marvels of the world of Sanskrit literature. Pt. Hemendranatha Cakravarti, renowned disciple of the great Mahamahopadhyaya Gopinath Kaviraj, opened the door that allowed me to enter the glorious realms of Kashmiri Śaivism. Subsequently, the revered Kashmiri master, Swami Laksmanjoo sealed my quest with his initiation and divinely inspired teachings. Words cannot express the good fortune of a person who has had the chance to sit at the feet of a fully realised soul and study from him. While Swamiji was a great master in inner practice, in Nepal I was introduced into the vast and complex world of Newar Kaula ritual by Kedararaja Rajopadhyaya, whose ancestors were the *purohita*s and Tantric gurus of the Malla kings of Bhaktapur. Kedararaja generously gave me his time and courageously braved the possible consequences of transmitting such matters outside the circle of his initiates.

Pt. Vrajavallabha Dvivedi, former head of the Yogatantra Department at Saṁpūrṇānanda Sanskrit University, has been an abiding source of inexhaustible knowledge. Indeed his work is formidable – ranging as it does through virtually every major Tantric tradition including not only Kashmiri Śaivism, but also Śaiva Siddhānta, Vīra Śaivism, Śrīvidyā and the Kaula Tantras, Vaiṣṇava Pañcarātra, the Buddhist Anuttarayoga Tantras and even Jain Tantrism.

In other areas of study I cannot but recall with gratitude Pt. B. P. Tripathi, better known as Vāgīśa Śāstrī, former Director of the Research Department of Saṁpūrṇānanda Sanskrit University, who laboured for years to teach me Sanskrit grammar both in the traditional manner and through his own didactic method.

Although I have not studied formally with Prof. K. D. Tripathi, retired head of the Sanskrit college of Banaras Hindu University, I cannot but acknowledge that the many lectures I have heard him deliver and dialogues I have had with him over the years inspired and helped me very much to understand Pratyabhijñā, Bhartṛhari's philosophy of grammar, Abhinavagupta's aesthetics and the Śaiva Āgamas. In a similar way, I had the good fortune to listen to many lectures and attend classes by the late Premalata Sharma, formerly Dean of the Music Faculty of BHU and President of the Sangit Nataka Academy. There are many other renowned scholars in Kāśī whom I must also thank for inspiration such as Prof. Ananda Krishna and the late Vatukanatha Khiste, direct in line of Bhāskara Rāya, the scholar and Śrīvidyā devotee. A special thanks also to Bettina Bäumer whose dedication and scholarship in many fields has been an abiding source of inspiration for me throughout the 35 years of our acquaintance. Of those who do not reside in Benares I gratefully acknowledge Prof. Navajivan Rastogi whose works and lectures have helped me a great deal.

I should not forget to mention my good friends and fellow travellers, especially Dr. Shitalaprasad Upadhyaya, assistant professor in the Yogatantra Department at Saṁpūrṇānanda Sanskrit University and Prof. Rana Singh of the Geography department of Banaras Hindu University. To the latter I am especially grateful for his instruction, direct and indirect, concerning the principles of sacred geography, particularly that of Kāśī.

I should also thank the people who have assisted me over the past 20 years, by typing manuscripts and collating them laboriously with meticulous care and processing my books and editions. First amongst them is Ravindra Mishra who has worked with me from the beginning and also Birendra Pathak, Vinay Kumar Mishra, Dharmendra Shrivastava and Devavrata Patel. I am most grateful to the staff of the Indira Gandhi National Centre for the Arts who have been immensely supportive throughout the many years it took to complete this project. The most distinguished amongst them is Kapila Vatsyayana who graciously accepted my project proposal many years back, Pt. Satkari Mukhopadhyaya supervised and encouraged the work during the first years and subsequently Prof. G. C. Tripathi who has been patient and helpful in every way. I am most grateful the present Member Secretary, Prof. K. K. Cakravarti for having taken care to see the work go to the press as soon as possible and support me in every way through the process of publication. Nor can I forget to thank Dr. Shukla and Dr. Sharma who have been patiently encouraged and assisted me over the years to bring this work to a fruitful conclusion.

I always recall with gratitude my fellow foreigners. My esteemed seniors and mentors include Professor André Padoux who, especially in these last few years, has given me great moral support by his appreciation of my humble efforts. Professor Richard Gombrich has never forgotten me although many years have passed since he was my supervisor in Oxford. Others include the late David Kinsley, a sincere and most humble man who took pleasure in conversation and exchanging views. David Lorenzen has been a friend for over twenty-five years whom I have come to know better over the past ten or so since he began to make short yearly trips to Varanasi. He has always brought with him new vistas and interests along with his deep sensitivity and a self-effacing nature that hides the depth of his scholarship. Amongst my peers I would like to thank first of all the 'other David', that is, David White, who is indeed a sincere and true scholar. A dear friend, he has been unfailing in his support and has always tried his best to keep me on the path towards the distant goal of completing these volumes. A third David is David Lawrence who, aflame with the philosophy of the Pratyabhijñā, has always lit my fire with his enthusiasm and insights. Amongst those younger than me, I recall Jeffrey Lidke, whose exchanges have led to much reflection, and John Nemec, who is doing well and has much to offer. I should mention with gratitude my students who, unknown to them, have been supportive in their own way. Amongst them I would especially like to thank Alexandra Wenta for assisting me in checking references and Michael Ianuzielo for reading the proofs.

I reserve a special place in these acknowledgements for my revered teacher Prof. Sanderson of the Sanskrit Department of the Oriental Institute at the University of Oxford with whom I was fortunate to study for my doctoral dissertation on the Spanda teachings of Kashmiri Śaivism between 1975 and 1979. It was he who sowed the seeds of this work back in 1981 when he presented me as a wedding present copies of manuscripts of two texts. One was the Tantrasadbhāva and the other the Kubjikāmata. The study of Kashmiri Śaivism under Prof. Sanderson's guidance opened a door for me onto the vast and rich world of the early Śaivāgamas which fascinated and attracted me intensely. Seeing my interest Prof. Sanderson suggested that I should apply myself to the study of the Kubjikā Tantras as a way into the Śaivāgamas and the Kaula Tantras. Were it not for him and my esteemed Indian teachers, I would not have given the best years of my life to this work.

Finally, I should mention Muktabodha for whom I have been working for the past three years as academic advisor and director of the Varanasi office where e-texts of Sanskrit Tantric sources are produced for the on-line Mukatbodha digital library. Hema Patankar, Robert Kemter and Vasistha who are part of the executive staff of Muktabodha have always sustained me with their sincere appreciation of my humble attempts to contribute to the preservation and deeper understanding of Śaivism. The digital library has also provided me with a location to put up my editions and collations of unpublished Śaiva texts. In the course of time I plan to put up all the unpublished texts from which this book has drawn. The interested reader is encouraged to visit the site occasionally and download them and other e-texts that are regularly added to the collection.

Abbreviations

AP: Agnipurāṇa
AV: Atharvaveda
AS: Ambāmatasaṁhitā
ĀM: Āmnāyamañjarī
UṢ: Uttaraṣaṭka
Up.: Upaniṣad
ŪKau: Ūrmikaulārṇatantra
ĪP: Īśvarapratyabhijñākārikā
ĪPv: Īśvarapratyabhijñāvimarśinī
ĪPvv: Īśvarapratyabhijñāvivṛtivimarśinī
AitBr: Aitarīyabrāhmaṇa
AitĀ: Aitarīyāraṇyaka
KāPu: Kālikāpurāṇa
KS: Kālīkulakramasadbhāva.
KāKuKr: Kālīkulakramārcana
KāKh: Kāśīkhaṇḍa
KnT: Kubjikānityāhnikatilaka
KMT: Kubjikāmatatantra
KMTṭ: Kubjikāmatatantraṭippaṇī
KuKh: Kumārikākhaṇḍa
KuKrī: Kulakrīḍāvatāratantra
KuKauM: Kulakaulinīmata
KuCūT: Kulacūḍāmaṇitantra
KP: Kulapañcāśikā
KRP: Kularatnapañcakāvatāra
KRU: Kularatnoddyota
KT: Kulārṇavatantra
KūPu: Kūrmapurāṇa
KJN: Kaulajñānanirṇaya
KVN: Kaulāvalinirṇaya
KauśīBr: Kauśītakibrāhmaṇa
KrSūA: Kramasūtrādhikāra
KY: Kṛṣṇayāmala
KhCPS: Khacakrapañcakastotra
GuSi: Guhyasiddhi
GB: Gopathabrāhmaṇa
GŚ: Gorakṣaśataka
GS: Gorakṣasaṁhitā
CGC: Cidgaganacandrikā

CMSS: Ciñcinīmatasārasamuccaya
ChāUp: Chāndogyopaniṣad
JY: Jayadrathayāmala
JS: Jayākhyasaṁhitā
Jñādīvi: Jñānadīpavimarśinī
Ṭ: Ṭīkā
TR: Tantrarāja
TS: Tantrasadbhāva
TĀ: Tantrāloka
TĀv: Tantrālokaviveka
TaiS: Taittirīyasaṁhitā
TaitĀr: Taittirīyāraṇyaka
DDŚ: Devīdvyardhaśatikā
DP: Devīpañcaśatikā
DM: Devīmāhātmya
NṢA: Nityāṣoḍaśikārṇava
N: Nirmalamaṇi
NTS: Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā
NT: Netratantra
NTu: Netratantroddyota
NS: Nepāla saṁvat
Pt: Paṇḍit
ParāT: Parātantra
PTv: Parātriṁśikāvivaraṇa
PLSS: Pratiṣṭhālakṣaṇasārasamuccaya
PHṛ: Pratyabhijñāhṛdaya
Pā: Pāṇini
PMT: Pārameśvarīmatatantra
PāSū: Pāśupatasūtra
BY: Brahmayāmala
BrSū: Brahmasūtra
BṛS: Bṛhatsaṁhitā
BSP: Bṛhatsūcipatra
BṛUp: Bṛhadaraṇyakopaniṣad
BB: Bhaktibodha
BhPu: Bhagavatapurāṇa
BhG: Bhagavadgītā
Manu: Manusmṛti
MBT: Manthānabhairavatantra
MP (1): Mahānayaprakāśa by Śitikaṇṭha.
MP (2): Mahānayaprakāśa by Arṇasiṁha.

MP (3): Mahānayaprakāśa by unknown author.
MBh: Mahābhārata
MM: Mahārthamañjarī
MVV: Mālinīvijayavartikā
MVT: Mālinīvijayottaratantra
MāSt: Mālinīstava
MaiUp: Maitryupaniṣad
MaiSaṁ: Maitrāyaṇīsaṁhitā
MṛĀ: Mṛgendrāgama
YV: Yajurveda
YKh: Yogakhaṇḍa
YUp: Yogatattvopaniṣad
YHṛ: Yoginīhṛdaya
YHṛdī: Yoginīhṛdayadīpikā
YGT: Yonigahvaratantra
RA: Rasārṇava
RM: Rasendramaṅgala
RT: Rājataraṅginī
RY: Rudrayāmala
ṚV: Ṛgveda
LĀ: Laghvikāmnāya
LSNS: Lalitāsahasranāmastotra
LĀS: Luptāgamasaṁgraha
VŚ: Vātulanāthasūtra
VM: Vāmakeśvaramata
VB: Vijñānabhairava ViPra: Vimalaprabhāṭīkā
VS: Vaijasanīyasaṁhitā
ŚBr: Śatapathabrāhmaṇa
ŚT: Śāradātilaka
ŚāṅkhŚr: Śāṅkhāyanaśrautasūtra
ŚP: Śilpaprakāśa
ŚDṛ: Śivadṛṣṭi
ŚPu: Śivapurāṇa
ŚSū: Śivasūtra
ŚSūvi: Śivasūtravimarśinī
ŚvUp: Śvetaśvataropaniṣad.
ŚĀPM: Śaivāgamaparibhāṣāmañjarī
ŚMS (1): Śrīmatasāra (1)
ŚMS (2): Śrīmatasāra (2)
ŚMS (3): Śrīmatasāra (3)

ŚM: Śrīmatottara
ŚST: Śrīśaktisaṁgamatantra
ŚvUp: Śvetāśvataropaniṣad
ṢCN: Ṣaṭcakranirūpaṇa
ṢSS: Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṁhitā
ṢVB: Ṣaḍviṁśadbrāhmaṇa
SaṁP: Saṁvartārthaprakāśa
SKh: Siddhakhaṇḍa
SP: Siddhapañcāśikā
SYMT: Siddhayogeśvarīmatatantra
SŪ: Sūtra
SŚP: Somaśambhupaddhati
SL: Saundaryalaharī
SpKā: Spandakārikā
SpNir.: Spandanirṇaya
SpPra: Spandapradīpikā
SvT: Svacchandabhairavatantra
HV: Haravijaya
HT: Hevajratantra

ASB: Asiatic Society of Bengal
ASI: Archeological Survey of India
BSOAS: Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies
CNRS: Centre Nationale du Research Scientifique DS: Double sandhi
EC: Epigraphica Carnatica
EI: Epigraphica Indica
F: Feminine
Fl.: Folio
HOS: Harvard Oriental Series
IHQ: Indian Historical Quaterly
IIJ: Indo-Iranian Journal
IC: Irregular concord.
IM: Irregular metre.
JA: Journal Asiatique
JBBRAS: Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society
KSTS: Kashmiri Series of Texts and Studies M: Masculine.
MIA: Middle Indo-Aryan
MS: Manuscript

MSL: Man Singh Library in Jodhpur
MW: Monier-Williams
N: neuter
NAK: National Archives, Kathmandu NGMPP: Nepal German Manuscript Preservation Project nom.: nominative
RSO: Rivista di Studi Orientali sing.: singular
Skt: Sanskrit
ZDMG: Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft

COMPLETE CONTENTS

CONTENTS OF VOLUME ONE OF THE INTRODUCTION

Chapter Three: Sacred Place and Inner Space

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME TWO OF THE INTRODUCTION

Chapter Five: The Early Development of Kaulism and the Emergence of the Kubjikā Tantras

Tables

Figures

CONTENTS OF VOLUME THREE OF THE INTRODUCTION

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME ONE OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER THREE: Dakṣa's Curse and Grace

CHAPTER FOUR: Concerning the Mālinīstavarāja

CHAPTER FIVE: Śrīnātha's Consecration with the Command (ājñābhiṣeka)

CHAPTER SIX: The Pervasion of Śrīnātha's Sacred Seat of the Command (ājñāpīṭha)

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME ONE

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME TWO OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER NINE: The Consciousness of the Vidyā according to its Divisions as Full and the Rest.

CHAPTER TEN: A Description of the Glory of the Vidyā

CHAPTER ELEVEN: The Way to Offer Libation (argha) and Repeat the Vidyā

CHAPTER TWELVE: The Glory of the Vidyā

CHAPTER THIRTEEN: Concerning the Destruction of Impurity

Diagrams

Figures

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME THREE OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE: The Fifty (Verses) concerning Kula

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX: The Root Sūtra and the Hymn to Māyā

CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVEN: The Maṇḍala of the Transmission (kramamaṇḍala) and the Maṇḍala of the Teachers (gurumaṇḍala)

CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHT: The Authority of the Triple Transmission

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME THREE

Diagrams

Figures
The Fifty Mālini Śaktis

The Fifty Bhairavas of Śabdarāśi

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME FOUR OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE: The Initiation by Piercing (vedhadīkṣā)

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO: The Characteristic Signs of Teachers and Disciples

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE: Concerning the Initiation with Seed

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR: The Teaching Concerning the Offering to the Fire

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE: The Emanation of the Triple Division and its Authority

CHAPTER FORTY: Concerning the Venerable Knowledge

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE: The Fitness to Practice Yoga

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO: The Sūtra of the Sequence of Emanation

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE: The Sūtra of the Descent (of the Teachers) in the Four Ages

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR: The Emanation of the Śrīkrama

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE: The Casket of the Transmissions

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX: The Glory of Emission (vikṣepādhikāramāhātmya)

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN: The Description of the Practice of the Rule

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME FOUR

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME FIVE OF TEXT AND TRANSLATION

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT: The Kramasūtra

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE: The Sūtra of the Visualization of the (Goddess's) Form for the Inner Sacrifice

CHAPTER FIFTY: The Sūtra of the Śrīkrama

CHAPTER FIFTY-SIX: The Sūtra of the Sixteen Siddhas

CHAPTER FIFTY-SEVEN: The Plane of the Divine Current which is the Transmission beginning with the Transmental

CHAPTER FIFTY-EIGHT: The Explanation of the Root Sūtra

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE: The Plane of the Four Sacred Seats in the Ocean of the Foundation of the Maṇḍala (khaṭikārṇava)

CHAPTER SIXTY: The Transformations of the Plane of the Sacred Seats

CHAPTER SIXTY-ONE: The Planes of the Siddhas and the Goddesses

CHAPTER SIXTY-TWO: The Planes (of Realisation) of the Five Jewels

CHAPTER SIXTY-THREE: the Plane of the Hexad of the Command

CHAPTER SIXTY-FOUR: The Plane of the Pentad and the Triad

CHAPTER SIXTY-FIVE: The Category of the Self

CHAPTER SIXTY-SIX: The Octad of Kula according to the Tradition of the (goddess) Vakrā

CHAPTER SIXTY-SEVEN: The Sūtra Concerning the Sequence of Principles

CHAPTER SIXTY-EIGHT: The Sūtra of the Compendium concerning Liberation

CHAPTER SIXTY-NINE: Conclusion

CONTENTS OF THE NOTES OF VOLUME FIVE

Diagrams

Tables

CONTENTS OF VOLUME SIX

CONTENTS OF VOLUME ONE OF THE INTRODUCTION

Chapter Three: Sacred Place and Inner Space

Diagrams

Tables

Chapter One

The Myth of the Goddess

The text presented in this and the following volumes, edited and translated for the first time, is one of three sections (khaṇḍa) of the Manthānabhairavatantra called the Section of the Virgin Goddess (kumārikākhaṇḍa) (KuKh). The other two are the Yogakhaṇḍa, which is in two recensions (YKh (1) and YKh (2)), and the Siddhakhaṇḍa (SKh). The MBT is a vast sprawling work that belongs to a corpus of Tantric texts concerned with the worship of the goddess Kubjikā. Quietly forgotten for centuries, the scriptures of this goddess are, nonetheless, both surprisingly extensive and very important. Despite their obscurity, they are so rich in content as to amply qualify Kubjikā's cult as one of the foremost Tantric traditions that developed in the South Asian subcontinent. Moreover, for the same reason, it also represents a major phase in the development of Tantric literature as a whole. Formed between the 9th and 13th centuries, the cult of the goddess Kubjikā bloomed during the period in which the Tantric phase of the development of the major Sanskritic religions of South Asia attained its greatest height to then succumb to the upheavals and changes brought about by Muslim domination in the north of India.

The Kubjikāmata, the earliest popular and most authoritative Tantra of the Kubjikā cult, opens with two myths that narrate how the goddess Kubjikā, the Humpbacked One, manifested for the first time in this form in this age. Belonging to the earliest stage of development of Kubjikā's cult, these myths signal the beginning of the teachings not only in mythical but also in historical time. Let us then begin our journey from here into the world of the Kubjikā Tantras.

The first of these myths is recorded in the first two chapters of the KMT. It may be conveniently analysed in two parts. The first is the story of the goddess's relationship with the god Bhairava and the events that ultimately lead to their marriage and union. The marriage of the two is the subject of the second myth, narrated in the first part of the third chapter; we will treat them together. The first part of the first myth recounts the origin of the goddess Kubjikā. The second part is an account of Kubjikā's pilgrimage around India and how she founded the first sacred seats (pīṭha) where the teachings were propagated and other sacred sites of the Kubjikā cult. It closes with her union with the god. The two concerns are closely connected in the one common aim, which is the transmission of the empowerment through which the teachings are made manifest and applied.

The story is essentially simple; even so it resonates so effectively with subtle suggestions of deeper meanings that it has served as the core around which much of the specific and characteristic symbolism and doctrine of the later Kubjikā Tantras developed. It is retold with variants and additions in the Śrīmatottara (ŚM), which is an expansion of the KMT. The ŚM sticks fairly closely to the KMT. The actual text of this part of the ŚM is not the same as the KMT, as it often is when the ŚM draws from the KMT. Rather it is a paraphrase with a few omissions of minor details and occasional additions, in a few cases substantial. Although some of these relate to the 'interior', symbolic dimensions of the myth, these are not generally treated extensively as is the case in the Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṁhitā (ṢSS), another expansion of the KMT, where this is the main concern.

The myth is retold wholly or partially in several places in the Kubjikā Tantras. The versions serve to clarify details of the myth, to add to them and to integrate developments in the teachings. Sometimes these are considerable, as are those in the Yogakhaṇḍa of the Manthānabhairavatantra presented at the end of this chapter. Chapters three to six of our text, the Kumārikākhaṇḍa of the Manthānabhairavatantra, weave together parts of the narrative along with an analysis of the goddess's maṇḍala and its inner projection that the myth is, as we shall see, understood to covertly describe. The ṢSS presumes knowledge of the myth and so does not bother to reproduce it as the ŚM does, instead it concentrates on its contents, manipulating and internalising the details. Thus, for example, the eighteen places to which the goddess travels in India[1] are identified in the ṢSS with parts of the head and the region above it up to the End of the Twelve.[2] The ṢSS works directly on the level of the symbolic units the myth presents as 'external' events and sacred geography, conscious that they were originally intended to be a mythic presentation of the essential 'inner' complex of mystical experiences. These form, on the one hand, the stages and aspects of realisation. On the other they are the process through which the world, sacred places, the transmission of the teachings and the formation of the elements of the cult – mantra, maṇḍala and mudrā – are generated and reproduced in the developing mystical experience and ritual practice of the initiate.

Important to note here is that neither the ŚM nor the ṢSS pay any attention to the symbolic meaning of the Liṅga the goddess enters in the myth and from which she emerges at Bhairava's entreaty to grace him. They follow the KMT in this respect, which also virtually ignores this possibility even though this is a major and essential climactic event in the narrative. On the contrary, other Kubjikā texts, such as the Kularatnoddyota (KRU) and, especially, the Kumārikākhaṇḍa (KuKh) and the Yogakhaṇḍa (YKh) of the Manthānabhairavatantra, invest a great deal of space on this event and, particularly, on the Liṅga itself as being that of the goddess rather than that of the god. Moreover, this 'Devī Liṅga' becomes the core of the goddess's maṇḍala. Its form a downward-facing triangle, a common symbol for the Mother Goddess in general, the KuKh and the MBT as a whole, treat this as the primary geometric and 'inner' form of the goddess. Accordingly, after describing the maṇḍala in the first two chapters, the KuKh proceeds to describe this Triangle to then move on to the goddess's myth.

---

[1] This is described in KMT 2/22cd-123.

[2] See Schoterman 1981: 41-53 for a detailed commentary. These projections are represented graphically in Dyczkowski 2004: 173-174. Concerning the End of the Twelve above the head, see below p. 382 ff.

In this way, the KuKh mirrors the exposition in the KMT whilst accommodating subsequent doctrinal developments. The KMT opens with the Saṁvartāmaṇḍalasūtra, which in just one verse describes the goddess's maṇḍala. In the ṢSS and in the KuKh this is expanded to five verses.[1] The short version in the KMT is followed by five verses in which the Santānabhuvana – the World of the Lineage – is described.[2] They appear in an extended form in the ŚM[3] whereas they are reproduced virtually verbatim in the ṢSS that goes on to comment on them[4] and supply an inner meaning. The rest of the first chapter of the ṢSS is dedicated to a description of the first thirteen places to which the goddess travels. The remaining five places she visits are her sacred seats (pīṭha). As these are particularly important, they are treated in a separate chapter.

Although the outlines of the original myth and its main events are still discernable, unlike the ṢSS and the ŚM, the myth describing the origin of the goddess presented in chapters three to six of the KuKh is not just an expansion of what is found in the KMT. Additions have been made to the myth concerning the goddess's previous birth. Most of the points made in the dialogue that takes place between the god and the goddess in the KMT are taken up and expanded in these chapters of the KuKh. Even so, although the god insists in the KuKh that he transmitted the empowering Command to her in the past, he does not refer to the previous tradition (pūrvāmnāya) of the Siddhas (siddhasantāna), the essence of which the god reveals to the goddess in the KMT prior to her journey around India. Chapter six of the KuKh concludes with the verses that bring the second chapter of the KMT to a close and with it the goddess's colonizing tour that culminates in her union with the god. But the manner in which the main sacred sites are established is quite different. According to the KuKh, it is Bhairava who goes to the main seats to meet the goddess who resides there in various forms to unite with her and thus receive the transmission. Thus, even though the earlier version of the myth narrated in the KMT and related texts is, somewhat clumsily, juxtaposed to the one in the KuKh, the KuKh presents an essentially new version.

---

[1] See note to KuKh 1/1.
[2] KMT 1/2-7.
[3] ŚM 2/1 ff.
[4] The Sanānabhuvana is described in ṢSS 1/6-11 (= KMT 1/2-7) and explained in ṢSS 1/12-35.

In order to understand these chapters of the KuKh we must know the original version of the myth narrated in the KMT and in the ṢSS and the ŚM, where it is elaborated. To this end, I have translated in the following pages the relevant parts of the first three chapters of the KMT. In order to get a full view of the myth, parallel passages from the ŚM have also been included and other significant variants, additions or omissions in the ŚM and ṢSS[1] have been noted.

The Origin of the Goddess Kubjikā

The stage is set by a description of the Santānabhuvana – the World of the Lineage – and of the slopes of mount Himavat. There the KMT says: 'Lord Bhairava abides immobile, maintaining silence'[2] and the ŚM adds that he is 'intent on the bliss of meditation (samādhyānanda)'.[3] In this earthly paradise where it is always spring, Bhairava meets Himavat who praises him with great reverence. Bhairava responds by offering him five boons. Finally Himavat asks Bhairava to marry his daughter, the virgin (kumārikā) Kālikā and Bhairava agrees. Himavat blesses his daughter and then leaves her. At this stage, the goddess, although as yet unmarried, behaves as would a devout wife who venerates and serves her husband without question. As the KMT[4] says:

And so it was for this reason that she who is endowed with (all good) qualities was present there. She propitiated the Lord of the gods with (her) good conduct and in many (other) ways. Having approached (him) for a long time with only reverence and with many kinds of hymns and lauds, the Lord of Kula (finally) said this to Kālī:

"O Kālikā! I am pleased with you. Tell (me) whatever you desire. Be confident, ask for what is in your heart." Having thus obtained (his) true affection, free of shame and enthusiastic, she said: "O Lord! You are the Lord (nātha) – be the one for us who is worshipped by the gods."

---

[1] The reader is referred to the Schoterman (1986) for a translation and analysis of the first five chapters of the ṢSS where the myth is partially retold and internalised.

[2] KMT 1/7cd.

[3] tatrasthaṁ [kh: -staṁ] bhairavaṁ devaṁ [kh: deva] samādhyānandatatparam [kh: devamāvṛtānanda-] | ŚM 2/59b$.

All that remains of the KMT in the first chapter of the ŚM is the first verse in which the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala is described. An extensive commentary in prose follows. Prior to this a passage describes Bhairava's home, the idyllic land of the City of the Moon. This is followed by a beautiful hymn in praise of Bhairava uttered by the beings that reside there. Chapter two opens with an elaborate description of the Santānabhuvana and an explanation of the inner equivalent of its components within the body.

[4] KMT 1/28-31.

The god now goes on to remind the goddess how in the past the earlier Kaula tradition was passed through the Transmission of the Siddhas (siddhakrama) by him. He does this by showing the goddess the extent of the power of the Command that operated in the previous (pūrva) Kaula tradition. The Command, which we shall have occasion to investigate in detail in the following chapter, is the energy of the liberating grace that is transmitted initially from the deity to his or her consort and then through the lineage of teachers and which is the essence of the teachings. At this stage Bhairava instructs the goddess by transmitting it to her by virtue of which she was shown 'how everything in the purview of the earlier (Kaula) tradition (pūrvasantānagocaram) is mounted on the seat of the (the god's) Command'.[1] The ŚM adds a detail here that the KMT omits. The energy of the Command makes the goddess swoon, as normally happens when it is particularly intense.[2] According to the KMT and other sources, this happens to the god when he receives the Command from the goddess. It appears that the KMT implies by this omission that the Command transmitted by the god is not as intense as the one transmitted by the goddess. But, presumably, as this would spoil the balance and reciprocal nature of the transmission which the god is keen to establish in the subsequent dialogue with the goddess, the ŚM prefers to have the goddess swoon when she receives the Command just as the god does. Revived by the same Command, Pārvatī then praises Bhairava as the lord of all living beings and exalts that by his grace she recollects her previous worldly state (bhavāntara) and exhorts him to do the same.[3]

Now in order to convince the goddess that she, like him, 'should be the one for us who is worshipped by the gods', Bhairava goes on to explain that the transmission of the Command and the imparting of the teaching is reciprocal. Thus he says:

"O goddess, I was first impelled by you and then, again, you by me. In this Age I (am imparting the Teaching) to you and you will give it to me again."[4]

---

[1] KMT 1/33.

[2] She then became distraught and in an instant was paralysed and fell into a swoon. Then, by the grace of the true Command (samyagājñā), the Daughter of the Mountain regained consciousness.

stamitaiva [kh: staṁbhineva; g: staṁmitena] prasuptaiva [kh: prasupteva; g: prasūptena] saṁbhrāntaivābhavat [kh; saṁbhrāntevābhavet; g: vibhrāntavārabhū] kṣaṇāt ||
samyagājñāprasādena [g: samyakāśāṁ] tataḥ parvataputrikā |
labdhasaṁjñā [kh: lavdhāsaṁjñāṁ] * * * * * * * * * * * * * || ŚM 2/95cd-96abc.

[3] See below p. 124, concerning the goddess's past life.

[4] KMT 1/47.

The format in which all Tantras are set is a dialogue between two beings, who are usually the god and the goddess. Prior to the emergence of the Kubjikā Tantras, the main speaker and teacher in the earlier Bhairavatantras and Siddhāntāgamas is Śiva who answers the goddess's questions. The teacher in the later Kaula Tantras is often the goddess.[1] The later Tantras distinguish these two types of scripture by referring to the former as Āgama and the latter as Nigama. This nomenclature is totally unknown to the Kubjikā Tantras. Although they are dominantly Śākta, both logically and historically, they are in an intermediate position between these two types. This is because the Kaula devotees of the goddess Kubjikā wanted to maintain the vital link with their Śaivite origins right from the beginning of the formation of the system. Consequently, the texts repeatedly declare that the goddess, and hence the teachings she embodies and transmits, all reside in Śiva's sphere (śāmbhavamaṇḍala).

This way of understanding the manner in which the teaching is transmitted is novel but not entirely without precedents. We may compare it with two other typical views found in the Svacchandatantra. One is that scripture originates directly from the male deity who utters it. This is generally the view of the earlier male dominated Śaiva Āgamas of the Siddhānta and the early Bhairava Tantras.[2] It is expressed succinctly in the following verse:

> The scripture that is supremely hard to acquire is in the form of the resonance (dhvani) that comes from Śiva, the supreme cause who is tranquil and (whose) form is invisible.[3]

Expressed in the following verse is the other, more subtle view, which approaches the one here insofar as scripture is understood to be the product of both the male deity and his partner:

> The god Sadāśiva, established on the plane of teacher and disciple, (generated) the Tantra by himself by means of questions and answers (brought about) by the split in the (one) foundation (of the deity who questions and the one who responds).[4]

But even though the god has divided himself up into the goddess who questions and the god who responds, the male deity remains the ultimate source of

---

[1] This is not always the case. The earliest Tantra of the Kaula Śrīvidyā–Tripurā tradition is the Nityāṣoḍaśikārṇava. Although it post-dates these developments, the teacher remains the god.

[2] Concerning the various types of Śaiva Āgamas (also called Tantras) the reader is referred to Dyczkowski 1988 and Sanderson 1988.

[3] SvT 8/27.

[4] SvT 8/31, quoted in the commentary of VB 7ab.

scripture. The KMT heralds a change which is destined to mature when the goddess assumes the role of the speaker, and hence teacher, in the subsequent Kubjikā Tantras. When the god comes to visit Himavat and the latter offers his daughter to him in marriage, she is the disciple. Bhairava, pleased by her devout praise, bestows on her the vision of the earlier Kaula tradition impelled by him. But even though she has been shown everything in this way and the Tantras have been thereby revealed, she continues in her role as his disciple, asking the god to explain their meaning. She is especially interested to know what the scriptures have to say about the Command the god transmitted in the past from which there has been a fall.[1] The god explains that the realisation of the transcendental condition of Stillness (nirācāra), the supreme state, is known to the Bhairavas and Siddhas and has been transmitted through the Siddhakrama, the Transmission of the Siddhas. This, we are told, is 'the previous tradition' (pūrvāmnāya) which is, effectively, the one transmitted by Matsyendranātha who is credited, as we shall see, with being the founder of Kaula Tantrism as a whole. This is the Command the god transmitted to the goddess.

So the situation up to this point is clear and accords with what the goddess says in the KuKh is the 'normal' (anuloma) course of things.[2] The god is the senior male and teacher while the goddess is the junior female and the taught. But the door is left open. Aware that this is an earlier transmission of the Command and that, moreover, it has decayed, the god humbly declares that he not only gives it to the goddess, he must also receive it from her.

This (teaching) should not be told to anybody else if devoid of the lineage of Siddhas. O mistress of the gods, you are compelled (to act as you should). You will be established in the Rule. Just as that knowledge was given to you, O far-famed lady, your power will extend (in the land) called Kumārikā (i.e. India). As long you do not establish (your) authority in the land of Bhārata, there will be no union here with me. Thus you must observe the pledges (samaya) in every way, O wise one, otherwise my knowledge (that has been imparted) to you will be lost. You will have sons in (this) world (bhava) at the (right) time and they will be of my own nature. Then, assuming a (transcendental) state devoid of (phenomenal) qualities, abandon (your) virginity (kumāritva)!

The teaching concerning the Body of Kula (kulapiṇḍa) is the practice of the transmission of the body of the Sacred Seats (pīṭhapiṇḍakramācāra) in

---

[1] Ibid. 1/34-43.
[2] See KuKh 5/2-7 and note.

the profane (adivya) world of men and is how the goddess is established (vyavasthitā) (there).[1]

The vision of the previous Kaula tradition, which is that of the lineage of Siddhas (or, more concretely, that of Matsyendra), was imparted to the goddess by the god's Command. Thus the goddess received the preliminary empowerment into the first level of initiation that allows access to the knowledge transmitted through the earlier lineage. This initiation is called that of the Rule (samayadīkṣā), which is imparted by the first, purifying form of the Command.[2] The Rule is a pledge – which is another meaning of the word samaya – to observe the teachings and the teacher's commands. In this case Bhairava orders the goddess to travel around India to establish the energy of her Command throughout it. In this way the land of Bhārata, pervaded by the goddess's energy is made one with it and so becomes the land of the virgin goddess – Kumārikā.[3]

But first, as we shall see, the goddess must go to the Island of the Moon and assume there the form of a Liṅga. This is the goddess's state in which she is devoid of phenomenal qualities. No longer manifest in a differentiated form, here called the Body of Kula, the entire universe is merged within her in the one transcendent and unmanifest reality. Immersed in the transcendent, as the Liṅga 'shining', as the ŚM says, 'with her own radiant energy (tejas) . . . she was the maṇḍala penetrated (āviṣṭa) by Bhairava'.[4] In this way, the goddess unites inwardly with the god and so abandons her virginity. By means of this inner union the goddess will receive her second initiation and with it the second form of the Command, namely, the one that imparts authority to be a teacher. Empowered in this way, the goddess can now emerge from the Liṅga able of fulfil her pledge to establish her authority as the supreme goddess throughout the land. Although, as we shall see, the goddess promulgates in this way her teachings, embodied in a new tradition, the god admonishes her to do this lest his 'knowledge' i.e. teaching is lost. In other words, the tradition that the goddess establishes is essentially the same as the one the god established before her transformed and freshly empowered. In this way continuity is maintained with the earlier Kaula tradition and this new one centred on the goddess Kubjikā. In order to do this, the goddess will have to initiate lineages in the main sacred seats (pīṭha) by means of her spiritual sons and daughters, the accomplished adepts – Siddhas – and Yoginīs she appoints there. The spiritual sons will be, as Bhairava says, embodiments of the

---

[1] KMT 1/48-53.
[2] The second form of the Command is the one that bestows authority (adhikāra).
[3] KMT 2/118 (= KuKh 6/220cd-221ab); cf. KMT 1/49cd.
[4] candradvīpamanodyāne liṅgarūpāṁ [g: -rūpaṁ] dadarśa tām ||
jvalantīṁ [g: jvalaṁti] tejasā [kh: svena] svena [kh: tejena] bhairavāviṣṭamaṇḍalām [g: -laṁ] |
ŚM 2/122cd-123ab.

god, just as the goddess's spiritual daughters will be her embodiments. However, she will do all this mentally, not physically, and so will remain intact for the union that will follow with the god. Thus in the ŚM Bhairava says:

> First generate in the land of Bhārata the astonishing emanation of (your) mind, namely, (every kind of) sacred seat, primary and secondary, (every kind of) meeting ground (saṁdoha), (every) primary and secondary sacred field, the confluence of rivers, the cremation ground(s), crossroad(s) and forest(s), lake(s), valley(s), and cave(s). (Create) many (such) places (where) Siddhas (practice) (siddhasthāna), the many kinds of sacred bathing places (tīrtha) and the rest. And having illumined the surface of the earth with the lamp of the bliss of the (most) intense (form of) the Command, play there freely and innocently for a while. O mistress of the gods, if you will come again to me I will marry you then, offered (as custom requires) by an elder (guru).[1]

When the goddess has fulfilled her pledge and the Rule has thus been established throughout the land, she will unite with the god externally. But, even so, although Bhairava will penetrate her, she is outside the Liṅga, and so retains her virginity, which she loses only when she penetrates the Liṅga. This is because she emerges from the transcendent as the energy of the pure cosmogenic will (icchāśakti) that can never be sullied by any object of desire. One is reminded of the Śivasūtra which declares that 'the power of the will is the virgin Umā.'[2] Kashmiri Śaivites explain that Śiva is the essential, impersonal subjectivity of each individual soul. As such he is the 'enjoyer' (bhoktṛ). Thus his energy can never be an object of enjoyment and so abides perpetually intact, unsullied by Māyā. Indeed, she is kumārī – a virgin – because she destroys – mārī – Māyā and all that is bad – ku.[3]

---

[1] pīṭhopapīṭhasandohaṁ [kh: pīṭo-] kṣetropakṣetrasaṁgamam |
śmaśānaṁ [kh: -śāne] catvarāraṇyaṁ droṇakandaragahvaram [kh: ḍori-; g: droṇikuṁdara-] ||
siddhasthānāny anekāni [kh: siṁha-] tīrthāni [g: tirthāni] vividhāni ca |
vidhāya bhārate varṣe mānasīṁ [kh: mānasī; g: mānasāṁ] sṛṣṭim adbhutām [kh: -mudbhatāṁ; g: -madbhutāḥ] ||
tīvrājñānandadīpena [kh: tīvrājñānaṁda-] dyotayitvā tu bhūtalam [kh: -tale] |
krīḍasva [kh: krīḍatye; g: krīḍatvaṁ] helayā [kh: svecchayā] tatra kiñcit kālāntaraṁ mudā [g: mudāḥ] ||
yadā yāsyasi [g: dhāsyasi] deveśi [g: devesi] punar eva mamāntikam [g: himāṁtikaṁ] |
tadā tvāṁ pariṇeṣyāmi guruṇā [g: gurūṇāṁ] pratipāditām [g: -pāditaṁ] || ŚM 2/111-114.

[2] icchāśaktir umā kumārī ŚSū 1/13.

[3] See Dyczkowski 1992 (a): 39-40.

According to the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras to which this passage in the KMT alludes, this energy arises out of the transcendent, which is without parts, as the Body of Kula. Kula, in this case, means 'aggregate'. This may simply be the aggregate of parts that constitute the physical and yogic body with its gross 'doors' or outlets such as the penis, anus and Cavity of Brahmā.[1] Kuṇḍalinī – also called 'the Body of Kula' – is thereby the aggregate of energies in the body of the individual which is unified in the flux of her movement through it. As such, Kuṇḍalinī transports the individual soul up through this dynamic medium. Thus it is said that:[2]

> The Body of Kula is located in the (pneumatic) channels (of the body) (nāḍī) and its characteristic mark is the movement of the individual soul (through it).[3]

And so Bhairava says to the goddess:

> You are Power (śakti) and I am the individual soul called the vital breath (prāṇa) of living beings (prāṇin). The individual soul consists of Fire (i.e. power) and Air (breath) and is established in the Body of Kula.[4]

The Body of Kula may also be analysed in terms of other constituents. For example, in the following passage it is made of the twenty-five principles (tattva) that constitute Nature (prakṛti) even though it is essentially Śiva himself:

> Earth, Water, Fire, Air and Space – the Body of Kula (kulapiṇḍa) is said to be (formed) by the division of the five times five. Divided into twenty-five, it is established in Nature (prakṛti) and is Śiva.[5]

---

[1] brahmarandhraṁ [g: raṁdhre] tataś cordhve [kh: tataś corddhvaṁ; g: tato khadge] caturdaśam udāhṛtam [k g: udāhṛtāḥ] || sthūladvārāṇīty ete [k: -dvārāṇāmeteṣāṁ] kulapiṇḍe vyavasthitāḥ [k: -sthitiḥ; kh g: -tāḥ] |
ŚM 20/107cd-108ab.

[2] Surprisingly, while the term piṇḍa – 'body' (literally 'aggregate', 'heap' or 'ball') occurs in many places in other Kubjikā Tantras, the term kulapiṇḍa is found almost exclusively in the ŚM from which the following references are drawn.

[3] kulapiṇḍaṁ ca nāḍisthaṁ jīvasaṁcāralakṣaṇam || ŚM 1/72cd.

[4] tvaṁ ca śaktir ahaṁ jīvaḥ [kh: jīvo] prāṇinām [kh: prāṇānām] prāṇasaṁjñakaḥ |
agnivāyumayo [kh: agniṁ- -yamaṁ; g: mayaṁ] jīvaḥ [kh g: jīvaṁ] kulapiṇḍe vyavasthitaḥ [k kh g: -taṁ] || ŚM 20/143.

[5] pṛthivy āpas tathā tejo vāyur ākāśam eva ca |
pañcapañcaprabhedena kulapiṇḍaṁ [kh: -pīṁḍaṁ; g: -piṁḍa] prakīrtitam ||

And so, the Body of Kula is not only the container but also the supreme reality it contains:

> Those who are well established in the master's teaching and draw support from the master's mouth, attain the supreme reality, the Body of Kula which is very hard to attain.[1]

In this case the Body of Kula is that of the goddess. It is formed from the fifty phonemic energies that constitute the alphabet and are aspects of the energy of the cosmogenic will identified with Speech, through which all things denoted by it are generated. The ŚM explains:

> When the unmanifest becomes manifest out of (Śiva's) unmanifest nature, the supreme, imperishable power of the will emerged from his body. In this way, O fair lady, all the fifty mistresses of Kula who are the letters and which are established in the Body of Kula (kulapiṇḍa) were born.[2] This is because (the letters) beginning with the letter A and ending with the letter KṢa are born from the Body of Kula.[3] Conversely, the Body of Kula is generated from the fifty letters having differentiated (them). Born as (these) fifty principles it is enveloped by the fifty Rudras (who govern them).[4]

These fifty energies are distributed in the goddess's main sacred seats. Moreover, each letter itself corresponds to a sacred site.[5] Externally, together they form the land of the goddess, her sacred geographic body. In this form the goddess is 'established there in the profane world of men'. Accordingly, in the pañcaviṁśatibhedena prakṛtisthaṁ śivātmakam | ŚM 5/70-71ab.

---

[1] gurūpadeśasaṁniṣṭā [k: -stanniṣṭhā; kh: -tanniṣṭhā; g: -nannisthā] guruvaktrāvalambakāḥ [g: -vaktra-] |
te vindanti [k: vidanti; kh g: viṁdati] paraṁ tattvaṁ kulapiṇḍaṁ sudurlabham ||
ŚM 20/267cd-268ab.

[2] avyaktaṁ vyaktam āyātaṁ [k kh: vyaktimā-; g: -yāntaṁ] tasyāvyaktasvarūpataḥ [kh: tasya vyaktiṁ-] ||
tasya [g: tasyā] dehāt samūdbhūtā icchāśaktiḥ [g: -śakti] parāvyayā |
tena jātā varārohe pañcāśat [kh: paṁcāsāt; g: paṁcāsat] kulanāyikāḥ [kh g: -nāyakāḥ] ||
varṇarūpāś ca tāḥ [k kh g: te] sarvāḥ [k kh: sarvve; g: sarvaṁ] kulapiṇḍe vyavasthitāḥ |
ŚM 11/118cd-120ab.

[3] akārādikṣakārāntaṁ kulapiṇḍasamudbhavam || ŚM 1/43cd.

[4] pañcāśadvarṇasaṁbhūtaṁ vibhajya [g: vinaṣṭha] kulapiṇḍakam [g: -piḍakaḥ] | pañcāśattattvam utpannaṁ [kh: pañcāsat-] rudrapañcāśakāvṛtam || ŚM 20/83.

[5] See KuKh 6/212cd-219ab.

following lines the god tells the goddess to go to ~~mount Kaumāra,~~ the starting place of the pilgrimage by which she generates her sacred geography:

Then, once the God had given (her) the Rule (samayā)[1] and having impelled the Great Goddess (with the words): "Go to mount Kaumāra!" he disappeared in an instant.

The goddess is supremely astonished (as she reflects) on what has happened and what she has seen by means of the Command. (She asks) "Who are (you) sir? What am I doing?" Having reflecting for a long time and having abandoned (her) companions in order to seek the god, she went to the venerable Mountain of the Moon.[2]

There are several occasions when the god or the goddess disappears. According to the ŚM, the first time this occurs is when the god induces in the goddess the memory of the earlier transmission. In that case, he is as surprised by the goddess's disappearance as she is now by that of the god.[3] The transmission of the Command removes the goddess's residual impurities. Her consciousness thus freed of obscuration, the goddess can recall the previous Kaula tradition and has a vision of its contents. Apparently the goddess conceals herself out of bashfulness because she recalls that in the previous tradition she was united with the god.[4] In this case it seems that god conceals himself to induce the goddess to go on her tour at least to seek him. Thus, according to the ŚM, they both hid themselves and lose each other. Bhairava says:

> "Go to mount Kaumāra and make the Rule (samaya) fruitful. Once you have observed the Rule you will return again." Once he had said that, the goddess Pārvatī became invisible in that very place. She could not see the Lord (any more than he could see her and so she) set out to search for him. Seeking (him), that Great Goddess went (over) the entire (world).[5]

---

[1] Read with MSs ACEGHK samayāṁ in place of samayān of the edited text.
[2] KMT 1/54-56.
[3] ŚM 2/106.
[4] See below, p. 70 ff..
[5] kumāraparvataṁ gaccha saphalaṁ [kh: samaya; saphala] samayaṁ [kh: saphalaṁ] kuru |
samayaṁ pālayitvā tu punar evāgamiṣyasi [g: + atra sthāne paṁcakam] ||
ity uktvā pārvatī devī [kh: devas; g: devīs] tatraivāntaradhīgatā [kh g: -yate] |
sāpi nātham apaśyantī [g: -śyaṁntī] tasyānveṣṭum upāgatā [kh: tamatveṣamupāgata; g: tanveṣṭhaṁmupāgatāḥ] ||
anveṣya [g: anyeṣya] sā mahādevī samagram āgamat tadā | ŚM 2/115-117ab.

The goddess and the god conceal themselves from each other's view again after the goddess has completed tour of India. Then the god disappears back into his original transcendental abode on the summit of mount Trikūṭa – the triangular mountain with three peaks (trikūṭa) that encloses the Santānabhuvana – the Land of the Tradition. It is located at the upper extremity of the subtle body at the End of the Twelve, which is twelve finger-widths above the head. Similarly when the goddess disappears and merges into the Liṅga, she too assumes her formless, transcendental state. After merging into the transcendent, the deities reappear and wed. Thus their disappearance, no less than their appearance, mark climactic phases in the transmission of the Command that eventually leads to their union.

We may also understand the fainting spells the god and the goddess experience when the Command is transmitted in another way. When a deity disappears from the sight of the other, the deity who has disappeared has retreated to his or her original unmanifest form in the supreme state symbolically located on and beyond the plane at the End of the Twelve. The End of the Twelve is the 'place' where the transcendent makes contact with the highest limit of immanence. There the deity's maṇḍala is displayed. The maṇḍala of the earlier transmission is the Santānabhuvana and is Bhairava's residence. The maṇḍala of the subsequent and ultimate (paścima) transmission is that of the goddess. This, as we shall see in the following pages, figures in the myth as the Island of the Moon. Flowing downwards, the energy of the transcendent passing through the maṇḍala, the liturgical, microcosmic and physical universe is generated through it and thus the maṇḍala functions as the womb or source (yoni) of emanation.

When the deity faints, it resumes its supreme, transcendental state in the centre of the maṇḍala where it disappears into the transcendent. The maṇḍala is a three–dimensional figure of which the centre is the highest point. This is symbolically located at a further distance of four fingers above the body of the maṇḍala in the End of the Sixteen.[1] Thus, moving between these two polarities, one or other of the divine couple (as the case may be), is present in the world or merged into the supreme transcendent. Here it is the god who becomes unmanifest and the goddess, who is manifest, sets out to find him. Later on in the narrative, when the goddess is hidden in the Liṅga in the centre of her maṇḍala, that is, on the Island of the Moon, the god seeks her and, making himself manifest, evokes her from the Liṅga. Ultimately, this ascending and descending, appearance and disappearance, merger and emergence, concludes with the union of the two as equal partners on the common plane of the visible, 'mortal' world of myth.

These periods of separation serve a purpose. The two, like human lovers, realise the need for each other and their mutual dependence in a loving bond in which neither oppresses the other with pretensions of personal superiority. First the scale tips in one direction and then, the other until a balance is established in which the polarities are equal. The god imparts his empowering Command, which is that of the earlier tradition (pūrvāmnāya), to the goddess. Conversely, as we shall see, when the goddess emerges from the Liṅga she imparts her empowering Command, which is that of the subsequent tradition (paścimāmnāya), to the god. Once they have empowered each other and share a common state it is possible for them to unite. Consequently, the god, eager for union with the goddess, seeks to obtain her Command.

---

[1] Concerning the End of the Sixteen and its relationship to the End of the Twelve, see p. 376 ff..

Previously we were told implicitly that the goddess emerges from the god and manifests in the world in and as her sacred sites which, charged with the energy of the letters, form her body. In the following passage, found in only a few manuscripts of the KMT, the god presumes his superiority over the goddess as her original source but is taught a lesson by her absence. He is the Assembly of Sounds (śabdarāśi) or Letters (varṇarāśi), that is, the Sound Absolute (śabdabrahman) in the form of the aggregate of fifty phonemic energies arranged in the normal alphabetical order. As such he is the original basic form of the Absolute, understood in these terms as the pleroma of potential energies through which the world is generated. The goddess, called Rudra's energy in the following passage, is the feminine equivalent of the same energies arranged in the Mālinī order of the alphabet that begins with the letter Na and ends with Pha. In this state the energies are active and effective. Within the god's body Mālinī is Kuṇḍalinī, the vital force and sonic energy of the individual soul (jīva). Without her the god could not actualise the powers he possesses externally and he would, moreover, be inwardly deprived of his vital force. Later Śākta traditions, both Tantric and Purāṇic, would say that Śiva deprived of the 'i' of his 'icchā' (i.e. will) would be a 'śava', a corpse. So, although the goddess emerges out of the god, he is more dependent on her than she is on him:

In this way, in accord with the proper method, the Self-born Lord fashioned Rudra's energy whose form begins with Na and ends with Pha from the letters born from his own limbs. (Thus) the goddess who consists of all the letters and who is marked by all (the auspicious) signs, greatly powerful, came forth (utpannā) and stood before Bhairava.

The (goddess) Mālinī said, "Who are you?" (He replied:) "I am the god." (She then asked) "How have (I) come (here)?" (The god replied:) "How come you do not know me? O goddess, who has fashioned you? O beloved, in order to play the game of creation, I have generated (you)."

(The goddess, somewhat peaked, replied:) "(Well then) who has generated you? Bhairava, say something!"

"O fair lady, I am the Aggregate of Letters, the Self-born Lord of the universe. I have generated you from the seed-syllables born from my limbs. Thus you are Vīrāvalī (the Row of Heroes) who is said to be Rudra's energy."

Enraged (by this reply) Mālinī responds: "(If) I have been generated by the letters born from your body, take your own letters back here (and now)!"

Then handing (back to Bhairava) the Garland of Letters whose form consists of the principles of existence, she resumed her prior body made of the seed-syllable (AIṀ), and she who is the Kuṇḍalinī of Nectar (amṛtakuṇḍali) fell asleep.

(Then) the Lord of the gods was confused: "Where have all the letters gone?" Greatly astonished, (he) understood instantly that: "they are all fused together (lolībhūta) and have merged into the principle of the individual soul (jīva). O (great indeed) is the goddess's power!" Thus thought the lord of the universe.[1]

So on the one hand, the Tantra tells us that Bhairava must learn that he is not superior to the goddess. Indeed, it is he who depends on her, not she on him. But on the other, the god must persuade the goddess that she is not inferior to him, otherwise she will not teach him. In each other's presence they are essentially one and on the same exalted level. In the ŚM Bhairava is more solicitous than in the KMT. He reminds the goddess that he too is getting married thus implying that he shares in the suffering she feels due to the separation that normally precedes marriage. At a deeper level, however, the two are inseparable. So Bhairava says to the goddess:

> "I am nowhere devoid of you, O goddess, and you are (never) without me. This triple world with all that is mobile and immobile is pervaded by both of us. A tree is not without shade nor is the shade without the tree (that makes it). (As) in (this) example, the triple universe is pervaded and we are also mutually pervaded (by each other). O fair lady, like you I (also) am getting married today. There is a reason for this. I will tell you that."[2]

---

[1] KMT 1/71cd-80ab.

[2] na tvaṁ vinā mayā [kh: mayā vinā] devi nāhaṁ kvāpi tvayā vinā |
ubhābhyāṁ vyāptam evedaṁ trailokyaṁ sacarācaram ||
na vṛkṣarahitā cchāyā na cchāyārahito drumaḥ [kh: drūmaḥ] |
anyānyam [g: anyonyam] api dṛṣṭaṁ taṁ [kh: dṛṣṭāntaṁ; g: dṛṣṭānte] vyāptibhūtaṁ jagattrayam [kh g: jagatrayaṁ] ||
yathā tvam aham adyaiva [kh: ya tatvā; g: yattatvā] pāṇau gṛhnāmi [kh: gṛnhāmi] sundari |
tatra kāraṇam [g: kārara-] asti iti tac ca te [g: ke] kathayāmy aham || ŚM 2/108-110.

The god and the goddess lose sight of each other not because they are really separated but because for a time they forget their own or each other's true nature, as the case may be. When the goddess appears out of the god, she is confused. But instead of telling her her true identity, the god mistakenly asserts his independence. This implies an essential distinction between them. The goddess, however, stimulated by the god's ignorance, regains insight into her true nature and so the one who was confused discomfits the other who, initially self-assured, becomes confused. However, like the goddess, the god instantly regains true insight into his own nature when he sees that it is the goddess who is the power that differentiates the energies that, in the first instant, constitute his body and in the second the goddess's body when she emerges from that of the god ready to generate the universe.

The Mountain and Island of the Moon

Apart from illustrating the principle that the divine is repeatedly realised and thereby realises itself, the reason for this game of hide and seek, insight and obscuration, is ultimately to bring about the union of the god and the goddess. For them to unite and wed they must first be separated. This is essential also so that the goddess can go on the tour during which she establishes the sacred sites from where the teachings and the divine energy of her grace, the Command, can spread throughout the sacred land of Bhārata. But before that can take place the goddess must receive the second form of the Command, which empowers her with the authority to teach and transmit it. This she acquires on the Mountain of the Moon, which is on the Island of the Moon where she, therefore, goes first of all. So the myth continues:

(The Island of the Moon) is a great and beautiful garden. It has many trees and, divine, the ground is strewn with gems. It has many caves, lakes and thickets and is adorned with big lotuses. It is beautiful, very comfortable and full of many (pleasing) sounds. Always spring, the Lord of Love has taken up his residence there. It is located to the West of Meru near (Mount) Gandhamālya and, all around, its circumference (measures) 5,000 leagues (yojana). Full of many forests and hermitages, divine, it is the very beauty of the Moon and is adorned with a mountain peak. There, in the centre (of the Island), is a beautiful Stone that extends for a hundred leagues. It has doors and arches and burns brilliantly with enclosing walls (prākāra) and temple towers (śikhara).[1]

[1] KMT 1/57-62ab.

We were told at the end of the previous verse in the KMT that the goddess went to the Mountain of the Moon. However, we read there further ahead, with reference to this place, that the goddess does not wish to leave the Island of the Moon.[1] The ṢSS reproduces verbatim the lines referring to the location and dimensions of the place after declaring that it is the Island of the Moon.[2] We find the same in the equivalent passage in the ŚM.[3] Quoting the KMT elsewhere the ṢSS also says that this is the location of the Land of the Tradition. As it is also a mountain, it may also be another name for the Mountain of the Moon.[4]

Elsewhere in the ṢSS we are told that the Mountain of the Moon is near the City of the Moon (candrapura). The daughter of the king of that city went there to make offerings to the first Siddha who resided there immersed in meditation.[5] Pleased, he transmitted to her and her retinue the liberating Command. Seeking the same, sages, gods, and other went there and offered him libations of wine and became inebriated by the bliss of his Command. The god declares to the goddess that he also sports on the Mountain of the Moon surrounded by the Eight Mothers who are worshipped there with libations of wine. On this holy mountain the first Siddha initiated his nine disciples.[6] But although the names are the same, this mountain should not be confused with the one to which the goddess travels.

The Mountain of the Moon associated with the goddess has lent its name to this other mountain. Endowed with similar powers and properties, it is the abode of the First Siddha who, like the goddess, meditates there and spreads the Command from there. Similarly, the Island of the Moon to which the goddess travels bears the name of the island on which Bhairava, imparting the earlier Kaula teachings to the goddess, was overheard by Matsyendranātha who transmitted them to his disciples. This myth concerning the origin of the Kula

---

[1] KMT 2/21ab.

[2] The repository of Kula, it is (that) Kaula (reality) known as the Island of the Moon. It is located to the West of Meru near (Mount) Gandhamālya and its circumference all around is 5,000 yojanas.
candradvīpeti vikhyātaṁ kaulikaṁ kulabhājanam [k kh: -ne] ||
merupaścimadigbhāge gandhamālyasamīpataḥ |
pañcayojanasāhasraṁ samantāt parimaṇḍalam |
ṢSS 47/98cd-99 (ṢSS 47/99 = KMT 1/59cd-60ab).

[3] The Island of the Moon is to the west of the Great Meru.

candradvīpaṁ mahāmeroḥ paścimāyāṁ diśi [g: disi] sthitam [kh: sthitaḥ] || ŚM 2/117cd.

[4] Cf. ṢSS 1/27 (translation by Schoterman): [The Santānabhuvana is located] on the western side of Mt. Meru, in the western region of the earth, east of Mt. Gandhamādana – thus the adepts should know.

[5] ṢSS 43/61cd-65ab.

[6] ṢSS 43/110cd ff..

scriptures is retold in the Kularatnoddyota, one of the earliest Kubjikā Tantras. Although, it is not mentioned in the KMT, we may suppose that its redactor(s) knew it. It appears that the goddess's association with the Island of the Moon was inspired by the earlier Kaula traditions that associated it with Matsyendranātha and the origins of the Kula scriptures.

The Island of the Moon appears again just twice in the KMT. In one place it is said to be the fifth and most important of five Islands that correspond to five great cosmic ages (mahākalpa). We hear echoes of the sacred geography of the goddess's myth in the description of these Islands. The Island of the Moon is the human world and the locus of creation. Grounded in a higher metaphysical identity it is 'both manifest and unmanifest, the bliss which is the essence of emanation'.[1] In the other reference,[2] however, it fades out into a relatively minor symbolic cipher as just one of thirty-four 'Islands' where the deities of the thirty-four consonants reside. The peripheral role the Island of the Moon plays in the complex symbolism of the KMT, although frequently mentioned in later Kubjikā Tantras,[3] lends support to the view that it is has been inspired by another tradition.

---

[1] KMT 20/13. The goddess declares that Bhairava has enjoined her to practice the Dvīpāmnāya in the past. Now she wants him to tell her about it according to the teaching concerning ultimate reality (paramārthopadeśa). Bhairava responds by telling her the secret of the Descent of the Tradition concerning the Islands (dvīpāmnāyāvatāra), that is, the Five Islands. These correspond to five Ages (kalpa), as follows:

1) Mātaṇgadvīpa: in the middle of the Ocean of the Garden (udyāna). The people on it are dark blue and red. This is where the emanation of the Current (of the tradition) takes place.

2) The lord of this Island is Brahmaghna. It is scarlet and the people on it are yellow and red. This is where radiant energy (tejas) emanates.

3) This Island shines with rajas. The people on it are yellow and red. It is were the emanation of play takes place.

4) This Island is red like ruby and is washed by the waves of the waters of Udyāna Bhairava. The people on it are white and red. It is the place of the emanation of the will. There is a garden here and a great forest, adorned with Mahocchuṣma.

5) This Island is the location of the qualities of Candradvīpa (the Island of the Moon). Its light is like that of 10 million moons. It is in the middle of the pure ocean. The people on it are full of the bliss of passion (kāmānanda). It gives rise to the fourfold emanation (of the four types of creatures). It is the bliss of the four castes, the manifestation of the fruit of the four goals of life. It is the support consisting of knowledge and action. It is both manifest and unmanifest, the bliss which is the essence of emanation (KMT 20/1-13).

There are four secondary Islands, namely: Aruṇa, Vāruṇa, Narasiṁha and Lokāloka (ibid. 20/15). The universe is born from all these Islands. Out of these, the supreme one is Candradvīpa. It is in the middle and is the cause of manifestation. It is in the middle of the Ocean of the Garden, which is the supreme bliss of the emanation of the Islands (ibid. 20/16-18).

[2] KMT 21/12a, 73a.

[3] For references in the KuKh see 5/77cd, 6/211, 16/89 (AS reads Candrapurya), and 38/23. The Vṛksadvādaśikasūtra is said to come from here (KuKh 51/15cd-16ab) as does the Mūlasūtra (KuKh 58/102). See also KuKh 58/28, 60/21 and 68/19.

Even so, a great deal of meaning is discovered in it. Like the Mountain of the Moon, the Island becomes a place where later developments in the transmission originate. According to the KuKh, the current of the lineage of Siddhas, beginning with Mitra who was the first to receive the Command from the goddess, flows from here.[1] Indeed, all four of the Siddhas who founded lineages and promulgated the teachings from the main sacred seats (pīṭha) are said to have come down from there into the world.[2]

This association with the major sacred seats alerts us to a new development in the symbolism of the Island of the Moon that helps us to integrate the Island with the Mountain. In the later literature, the Island of the Moon becomes one of the many names for the core of the goddess's maṇḍala. Essentially, it consists of a triangle surrounding a Point (bindu) in the centre. Around the triangle is a hexagon, which is surrounded by an eight-petalled lotus. Outside that is another lotus of sixteen petals. In some versions of the maṇḍala another one with thirty-two petals surrounds this. The texts focus in a special way on the core of the maṇḍala, which is variously associated with the Island of the Moon. According to the KuKh the Mountain (there called the Stone – śīlā) is on the Island of the Moon.[3] The Island of the Moon is sometimes the entire maṇḍala. Sometimes, it seems, the Island of the Moon is just the hexagon[4] that surrounds the triangular core of the goddess's maṇḍala, which is identified with the goddess's Yoni. In either case, whether the Island of the Moon is the entire maṇḍala or just the hexagon, the Stone is the Triangle in the middle of the maṇḍala. This is clearly stated by the god who addresses the goddess saying:

> You observed a vow of silence there for a thousand years within the Triangle. Then you became subtle (there) within the Stone, that is, in the middle of Meru.[5]
>
> And I am that (glory) called the venerable (triangular) Yoni (bhaga), she who is the series of worlds (bhuvanāvalī) within the Stone. Possessing seven sections (skandha), she is Bhairava's deity. She moves in the middle of the Stone in an anticlockwise circle.[6]

---

[1] KuKh 69/24.
[2] KuKh 60/70.
[3] KuKh 5/77cd.
[4] KuKh 58/28.
[5] maunaṁ varṣasahasraikaṁ trikoṇānte tvayā kṛtam |
laghutvaṁ ca tadā prāptaṁ śilānte merumadhyataḥ [kh: (?)] || YKh (2) 16/5.
[6] sā cāhaṁ śrībhagākhyā ca śilānte bhuvanāvalī |
saptaskandhasamāyuktā sā ca bhairavadevatā ||
bhramate ca śilāmadhye vāmāvartaparibhramāt | YKh (2) 16/13-14ab.

The reference to the goddess's silence relates to the time she is said in the KMT to abide immersed in meditation seated on the Stone on the Island of the Moon.[1] Clearly, the Stone in this case is the Triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala identified with mount Meru, which we may suppose is the Mountain of the Moon. The following reference confirms this. We shall see that this triangular Yoni is filled with the energies of the letters of the alphabet arranged within it in an anticlockwise spiral through which the goddess as Speech moves empowering her energies. Arranged in this way, they form seven rows of letters. The Stone is similarly described as a triangle with seven sections in the KuKh.[2] The form of a water chestnut,[3] it is a triangle the sides of which are made of the letters of the alphabet.[4] Identified with the goddess, it is the matrix of phonemic energies. In short, also called the City of the Moon,[5] the pure Stone on the Island of the Moon is the triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala. On this, that is, within it, is the Point (bindu), which is the Liṅga into which the goddess enters and from which she subsequently emerges. In what is effectively a commentary on this passage, the ṢSS fills out the implied image of the Island of the Moon as a maṇḍala located in the highest levels of the subtle body. There we read:

> One should bring that (reality) that is said to be the location (sthāna) of the goddess (down) from the Transmental (manottara). (That place here) in the world is the Island of the Moon, which is present both within (the subtle body) and outside. It is written about here in the scriptures in order to awaken the teacher. The two (the god and the goddess) are present in manifest form on the Island of the Moon.
>
> The divine Maṇḍala of Saṁvarta, born of the Divine Current is here (in this world). The god there is Kubjeśvara who is accompanied by Kubjikā. O goddess, (this,) the abode of the manifest and the unmanifest, abides perpetually. It shines radiantly and so is hard to look at (even) by the gods and demons. Perpetually active (sadodita) and eternal bliss, it is the source of the yogic power (guṇa) of omniscience. Full of many (yogic) sciences (vijñāna), it is the foundation of the (eight) yogic powers (guṇa) beginning with the power to make oneself small at will. The abode of all the Siddhas and

---

[1] See KMT 1/58-66ab quoted below on p. 30 and ŚM 2/120-123ab quoted below on p. 31.
[2] KuKh 3/2-4.
[3] śilā śṛṅgāṭakākārā YKh (2) 26/40c.
[4] KuKh 3/31-32.
[5] See KuKh 3/49. The entire Island is more commonly identified with the city as in KuKh 6/211cd-212ab where the 'City of the Island of the Moon' (candradvīpapura) is clearly the City of the Moon (candrapura). See also KuKh 38/23.

divine, it is the source of all wonders. The bestower of what one desires and divine, it is the abode Kāmadeva has made (for himself). O repository of Kula, it is (that) Kaulika (reality) known as the Island of the Moon.[1]

The Island of the Moon is clearly identified in this passage with the maṇḍala of Saṁvarta. Saṁvarta (more commonly in these sources the feminine – saṁvartā) is the fire that burns within the Cosmic Ocean in which the universe floats and imparts to it the energy that sustains it. Literally called the Fire (that issues) from the Mare's Mouth (vāḍavāgni), the Doomsday Fire flares up at the end of each cosmic cycle to consume the universe and make way for the next one generated at the beginning of the next cycle by means of its energy. In the mythical universe of the Kubjikā Tantras it burns in the centre of the Island of the Moon, a place that in other contexts is called the Ocean of the Yoni – thus reconciling the two perceptions of its nature and location, the one Purāṇic that places it at the bottom of the cosmic ocean, and the other Tantric. Thus, the energy in the centre of the Circle of the Fire of the Aeons (saṁvartāmaṇḍala), the main maṇḍala of the Kubjikā Tantras, is said to consume the Ocean of Kula.[2] This

---

[1] manottarāt [kh: matottarāt] samānīyaṁ [k kh: -ya] devīsthānaṁ tu yat smṛtam |
candradvīpaṁ hi yal loke sabāhyābhantare [k kh: svavāhyebhyantare] sthitam ||
likhitam iha śāstreṣu ācāryabodhanārthakam |
*saṁsthitau vyaktarūpeṇa candradvīpe * * * ne* ||
dviyaughasaṁbhavaṁ [k kh: divyogha-] divyaṁ saṁvartasyeha maṇḍalam |
tatra kubjeśvaro devaḥ [k kh: deva] kubjikayā [k kh: -kāyī] samanvitaḥ [k kh: -tam] ||
tiṣṭhate satataṁ devi vyaktāvyaktasamāśrayam |
*sphurantaṁ [k kh: sphurantas] tena * * * durnirīkṣaṁ [k kh: -kṣa] surāsuraiḥ* ||
sadoditaṁ sadānandaṁ sarvajñaguṇasaṁbhavam |
aṇimādiguṇādhāraṁ vijñānānekasaṁkulam ||
sarvasiddhāśrayaṁ divyaṁ sarvāścaryapravartakam [k kh: sarvāścaryaṁ-] |
vāñchitārthapradaṁ divyaṁ kāmadevakṛtāśrayam ||
candradvīpeti vikhyātaṁ kaulikaṁ kulabhājane | ṢSS 47/92cd-98.

[2] According to the KuKh (13/121ab): She burns intensely with her beautiful rays in Rudra's sphere (maṇḍala).

Again (ibid. 8/77): The (reality) in the centre of the Kramamaṇḍala burns in the form of (the flame of a) lamp. That is the Liṅga, that the Tree and, according to the Rule, the master of the Krama.

Abhinavagupta knew this symbolism well from other Tantric traditions. He incorporates it into his own Trika system presenting it, as he usually does, with a sophisticated interpretation based on a phenomenology of universal divine consciousness acting in and through each act of perception:

This path is worthy of being described in this way because the yogi quickly (drāk) attains Bhairava's nature, contemplating the sequence of its configuration (prakriyākrama) (contained in the initial impulse towards perception) as explained in the Spanda teaching. Experiencing the ocean is the maṇḍala itself, which is made of the energies of the goddess who is Kula. As the fire that burns at the end of a cosmic age and consumes all the worlds, it abides hidden in the darkness of the Void produced thereby. Kubjikā creates as she destroys and so it is from here, from the energy hidden within the Void, that creation proceeds. As the goddess tells the god:

> O Hara, within this void form, one with darkness, was the mind of the bliss of the play (of transcendental Being). It was tranquillity (itself) close to Kula (the energy of the absolute) and I knew nothing at all, O Hara, by speech, hearing or sight. Nor was I aware (of anything). The joy, fiftyfold (of the fifty letters of the alphabet), which is the bliss of liberation (kaivalya) was within the Fire of the Aeons (saṁvartā). Its will is pure consciousness (cinmātra), the Unmanifest whose form is subtly manifest. Then I was overcome with wonder and (asked myself): "what is this voidness?" And realizing that it was terrible and deep, I was frightened and (my) mind slumbered. Having entered into Bhairava's sacrifice, I remained there in (my) supreme form and as an atom (of consciousness) the Lion (siṁhaka) (bore) a subtle form. O Lord, the Lion Fire (siṁhasaṁvartaka), full of darkness, became manifest (vyāvṛta).[1]

Kubjikā is thus implicitly identified with the sacrificial fire into which the worlds are offered and from which they arise again. This is the Fire of Kula that burns in the Liṅga.[2] It is the same energy, identified with the goddess who resides in the middle of the maṇḍala, the Wheel of the Skyfarers (khecarīcakra). Thus the ṢSS declares:

> She who is beyond the Cavity of Brahmā is said to be Kuṇḍalinī. That is the plane of the Doomsday Fire and there the Yogi dissolves away. One should know that that which is called the 'Belly of Power' (śaktyodara) is the container of the Doomsday Fire. The entire (cosmic) path (in this way, the yogi) should dissolve it into the deities (who preside over it). They are (then merged), as before, progressively into the wheel of the body, vital breath and intellect. (Finally) all this (merges) collectively into his own consciousness. This consciousness that is full of all things and is continuously worshipped (and practiced) is (like) the fire of universal destruction (that dries up) the ocean of transmigration. TĀ 8/5-8.

---

[1] KuKh 24/7-11.

[2] In the Age of Strife the beautiful energy of the Fire of Kula resides within the Liṅga and makes both constantly blissful. KuKh 38/13d.

> triple world is in the middle of it and it is said to be the (one) fundamental reality (pradhāna).[1]

The goddess descends from the transcendent Transmental by the flux of its energy, to which the texts refer as the Divine Current. Here on the Island of the Moon, all the teachers of the tradition, like the goddess and the founders of her lineages, receive the Command. As this is where the Doomsday Fire is located, the Island of the Moon continues to exist when all else has been consumed by it. The ṢSS goes on to comment on the passage of the KMT we are examining. There we discover why the circumference of the Island of the Moon is said to measure 5,000 leagues (yojana):

> Meru is said to be the head. It is the last (i.e. highest place) and the location of the topknot (cūlikā). O fair lady, it is four fingers (distance) from the End of the Sixteen. That is said to be the Island of the Moon, which is above the extremity of the nose of the (upper) mouth. Below it is (mount) Gandhamālya, which measures one finger span. It is called Mahānāsa and is the western Himagahvara. In terms of the size of one's own fingers it is a square (that measures) four finger spans. It is said, in brief, that the fifth one is in the middle. (The geography of the Island of the Moon measuring) five thousand leagues has (thus) been revealed by virtue of your devotion.[2]

The 5,000 leagues correspond to the width of five fingers. The Island of the Moon is four finger spans below the End of the Sixteen. It is, in other words, in the End of the Twelve, which is twelve finger-spans above the top of the head. The goddess in her undifferentiated (niṣkala) aspect is said to be in the End of the Sixteen, which the previous passage refers to as the Transmental (manottara). Descending as the Divine Current of the energy of the Transmental, she spreads

---

[1] brahmarandhrasya ūrdhve tu yā sā kuṇḍalinī smṛtā || vāḍavīyaṁ padaṁ tac ca tatra yogī ca līyate |
śaktyodaraṁ tu yat proktaṁ jñeyaṁ vāḍavodaram ||
trailokyaṁ tasya madhyasthaṁ pradhānaṁ parikīrtitam | ṢSS 25/153cd-155ab.

[2] meru śiraḥ [k kh: -śira] samuddiṣṭaṁ [k kh: samuddiṣṭaḥ] paścimaṁ cūlikāspadam | ṣoḍaśāntād varārohe aṅgulyānāṁ catuṣṭayam ||
candradvīpaṁ [k: pīṭhaṁ; kh: -pīdvaṁ] hi tat [kh: ta] proktaṁ mukhanāsāgrakopari [k kh: mukhā-] |
tasyādho gandhamālyas tu [k kh: -lyāstu] aṅgulena [k kh: – leva] pramāṇataḥ ||
mahānāseti vikhyātaṁ paścimaṁ himagahvaram |
svaṅgulāṅgulamānena [k kh: aṁgulā-] caturasraṁ caturaṅgulam ||
pañcamaṁ madhyasaṁsthaṁ tu samāsāt parikīrtitam |
pañcayojanasāhasryaṁ tava bhaktyā prakāśitam || ṢSS 47/100-103.

out her radiant energy in the form of her maṇḍala, the Island of the Moon, into the plane at the End of the Twelve.

The goddess maintains her undifferentiated form in the Point (bindu) in the centre of the maṇḍala, which here is called the Peak of the Stone, in the centre of the Island of the Moon. One finger's distance below the Island is mount Gandhamālya. It seems from the concise description in the text that it is a pyramid with a square base. The sides of the base are one finger-width wide as is the height of the pyramid. Possibly because of its shape, Gandhamālya is called Mahānāsa – the Great Nose. As Kuṇḍalinī is, amongst other things, the energy of the vital breath that enters and exits from the nose, she is sometimes called nāsikāśakti – the 'energy of the nose'.[1] Possibly, then, the 'Great Nose' is this one above the head through which the energy of the vital breath travels in a straight ascending and descending movement. It is the nose of the upper face above the crown of the head. Moving through the channel of this nose, the energy of the vital breath is no longer 'crooked' (kuṭilā) as it is when it travels through the nose of the lower face in the fettered condition. Moving up a distance of just one finger it reaches the peak of Gandhamālya and so enters the centre of the Island of the Moon where the Stone is located, on which the goddess abides in the form of a Liṅga.

Another more general point to note is that this is revealed by the goddess because of the god's devotion. Nowadays it has become common to make a distinction between Tantric practice and devotion (bhakti). They are seen to be two paths. The first consists of rituals, recitation of mantras and yogic practice. The latter is a simple, direct love for the deity and the teacher that does not require outer forms or even the practice of Yoga. This view has largely arisen by mistakenly identifying the attitude of devotion with what is loosely called the movement of devotion. The latter is a very broad and loose category that covers the theologies, sects and doctrines of the so-called Sants such as Kabir and Guru Nanak. Affected in various degree by the positive Sufi teachings of love for an ultimate and one, formless God, these teachers have preached religions of love and devotion to the one God. Other Bhakti movements, such as those of the southern Alvars and those centred on Rāma and Kṛṣṇa, though much less affected if at all, by the influence of semitic religions, are also perceived to be essentially distinct from Tantric cults because of their focus on intense loving devotion for the deity. In actual fact this dichotomy is by no means so clear-cut. The attitude of devotion, however much tinged with selfish motives (as when, for example, one is invoking a minor being for some magical purpose) is essential in varying degrees to all religions concerned with divine beings, let alone the Supreme God or Goddess.

---

[1] Cf. Dyczkowski 1992: 175 ff. in relation to ŚSū 3/45.

Confining ourselves to the Kubjikā texts, which are typical in this respect, we see that devotion is a constantly recurrent theme. The MBT proclaims:

> Devotion (is of three kinds, namely, devotion) to the Transmission, devotion to the teacher, and devotion here to the teaching itself. Devotion is power and the Transmission is transmitted by power. Speech is transmitted from the Transmission and the Command operates by Speech. Devotion is liberation that beholds the end of the Transmental.[1]

The hymns with which the sources are peppered are clear examples of the spirit of devotion with which the devotee approaches the deity and the latter's response to it. The recitation of hymns with devotion is liberating in itself. He who recites the Stavarāja with this attitude becomes one with Bhairava. It is sacred and so should not be taught to anyone who has not been initiated and does not have devotion, even if he is one's own son.[2] Devotion is essential. The goddess protects those who regularly recite the Mālinīstava with devotion every day.[3] When the goddess looks upon her devotee with loving eyes he is liberated and moves freely everywhere, his yogic power unobstructed.[4] But the goddess demands that this devotion be pure, unsullied by ulterior motives, like the devotion the god should have for her.[5] The inner energy of Kuṇḍalinī and the Vidyā that is, the goddess's mantra – function effectively only if one possesses true devotion for the goddess.[6] And so, in a world devoid of devotion, the Command is weak.[7] It is important therefore to help develop devotion in the world. To this end the deity has revealed the outer sacred sites[8] along with the inner ones.

---

[1] krame [kh: krama] bhaktir guror bhaktir bhaktir atraiva [kh, g: bhakti-; k kh: gurorbhakti-] śāsane [kh g: sāsane] |
yā bhaktiḥ [g: bhakteḥ] sā bhavec chaktiḥ [g: sābhavetsakti] śaktyā [kh: -kticchaktyā; g: saktyā] saṁkramate kramam ||
kramāt saṁkramate vācā vācayājñā [kh: vācā tu prajñā] pravartate |
yā bhaktiḥ [kh: śaktiḥ] sā bhaven muktiḥ [g: -mukti] unmanāntāvalokinī || SKh 4/36-37.
[2] KuKh 3/144-146ab.
[3] KuKh chapter four, line 113 of the Mālinīstava.
[4] KuKh chapter four, line 112 of the Mālinīstava.
[5] KuKh 5/1.
[6] KuKh 5/26.
[7] KuKh 6/166.
[8] KuKh 14/83.

The objects of devotion include not only the deity itself but also her earthly representations – Kumārī and the Yoginī,[1] the eight Mothers (also called Kuladevīs),[2] the scripture,[3] which should be written with devotion,[4] the deities in the body,[5] the Krama and the sacred seats,[6] fire and its associated rites, the elders (jyeṣṭha) of the tradition,[7] the teacher[8] and even his seat, sandals, rosary and other ritual implements.[9] There should be devotion in the disciple and the teacher should possess knowledge. The Kula scripture is thus obtained by the deity's divine Command.[10] One whose devotion does not waver gains the teacher's compassion (kāruṇya) and is given the consecration.[11] It is this compassion the god implores the goddess to have for him to come forth out of the Liṅga[12] and answer his questions and the compassion she has when she agrees to answer[13] and is necessary to achieve liberation.[14] The god (bhagavat) assumed the form of the First Siddha, Mitradeva, and descended into the world impelled by his devotion to the goddess.[15] Like the god, the host of Bhairavas also approach the goddess with devotion.[16]

Devotion is an essential prerequisite, first for the attainment of the teachings and then, through them, liberation. Knowledge should – indeed must be – revealed wherever people are intent on devotion (bhaktirata).[17] Such a place is the Deccan (dakṣiṇāpatha), a country where people do possess devotion and persevere in the observance of their vows.[18] The teachings should not be revealed to one who, devoid of devotion, is a cheat.[19] The admonition to not give the

---

[1] KuKh 5/50, 30/114, 126-128ab, 33/42.
[2] KuKh 15/49.
[3] KuKh 8/11, 30/32, 107-108, 126, 36/37, 37/25cd-26ab.
[4] KuKh 30/38.
[5] KuKh 30/32-33ab.
[6] KuKh 30/239.
[7] KuKh 37/25cd-26ab.
[8] KuKh 8/11, 17/56, 30/126.
[9] KuKh 37/15cd-17ab, 37/37.
[10] śiṣye bhaktir [k, kh: bhakti] guror jñānaṁ [k: gurojñaṁ ca; kh: gurojñaṁ] ājñālabdhaṁ kulāgamam [k: -gama] || YKh (2) 27/36cd.
[11] KuKh 37/18cd-19ab.
[12] KuKh 4/39.
[13] KuKh 39/17.
[14] KuKh 42/12.
[15] KuKh 6/129.
[16] KuKh 6/75.
[17] KuKh 5/51.
[18] KuKh 6/73. We shall discuss the importance of the Deccan (dakṣiṇāpatha) as a region where the Kubjikā Tantras developed further ahead.
[19] KuKh 17/56, 30/127-128ab, 136.

teachings to a person who lacks devotion, even if it is one's own son,[1] appears repeatedly.[2] The text finds several occasions to list the moral qualities required of a deserving aspirant. Invariably devotion is amongst the first if not the very first,[3] just as the lack of devotion is usually the first of the disqualifying defects.[4] Devotion is so important that a teacher may adopt a disciple as his own and impart the oral teachings (mukhāgama) to him[5] if he possesses true devotion for his teacher, even though he may possesses no other qualities. The scripture should only be given to one who is a true devotee.[6] He should be graced in this way only after being carefully tested by the teacher to see if his devotion is authentic. In one place we are told that he should do this for as long as twelve years.[7] Elsewhere, the period of time ranges from 12 years for a śūdra to 3 years for a Brahmin.[8] Even so, this alone qualifies the aspirant to receive the teachings, not his caste or social status. A Brahmin devoid of devotion is an outcaste caṇḍāla. Conversely, a caṇḍāla who possesses this devotion is a true Brahmin.[9] Even a learned man (paṇḍit) devoid of discrimination is no better than a fool. Conversely, an uneducated person who possesses discrimination is pure and, intent on devotion, is enlightened (vibudha).[10] Practicing devotion to the goddess is by itself sufficient to realise the purport of the scripture.[11]

Let us now return to the specific details of the text we are examining. The KMT says that the Island is 'adorned with a mountain peak'. The ṢSS explains what that is as follows:

> The mountain is said to be the body. The peak (of the mountain) is the head. Adorned with that, O goddess, (the Island of the Moon) is adorned with a mountain peak. There, in the middle, (measuring a) finger-width that Stone (extends for) one hundred leagues. It has doors above and below and is adorned with Bhṛgu (Sa) (as its) arches. The enclosing walls (prākāra) there are Cchagalin (Ba), which, (enclosed) all around, is a square.

---

[1] KuKh 3/144-146ab.
[2] E.g KuKh 30/148, 239, 32/70.
[3] E.g. KuKh 36/51.
[4] E.g. KuKh 36/50 also 44/51.
[5] KuKh 30/235.
[6] KuKh 36/51.
[7] KuKh 28/120.
[8] KuKh 33/66 = TS 9/37.
[9] KuKh 32/68cd-69.
[10] KuKh 32/70-71ab.
[11] KuKh 4/9.

> The supreme goddess, having playfully dissolved away (everything) there in (that) place, her form is that of an unmanifest Liṅga and, having withdrawn (the universe which is her) emanation, she is Śāmbhavī. (Thus) she who is bliss and bestows consciousness to all, assumed a body of bliss.
>
> O lady of good vows, outside (the End of the Sixteen), which has sixteen parts, are three peaks. There, on the right is Trikūṭa (mount Three Peak) and on the left is Kiṣkindha. The Island of the Moon is in front where the goddess has made (her) abode.[1]

Previously we were told that Meru is on the head, which is the peak of the mountain. The mountain is the body, which elsewhere is identified with the earth. Moreover, in the same reference we are told that below Meru, which is the Topknot (cūlikā), is a mountain with three peaks called Gandhamādana, which is not to be confused with Gandhamālya. Presumably the shape of the former is an inverted triangle that has Meru at the centre of its base. To the right of Meru is the mountain called Three Peaks and to the left, Kiṣkindha. These, as we shall see, are the first two places the goddess visits after going to mount Kaumāra when she leaves the Island of the Moon. If we identify mount Kaumāra with Meru in terms of the symbolism of the Kubjikā Tantras, the goddess emerges out of the End of the Twelve where the Island of the Moon is located to first travel up to the End of the Sixteen. From there, as we shall see, she travels down into parts of the head and face.[2]

Thus, the Island of the Moon in the End of the Twelve is in between two triangles. The one above faces downwards and the one below, upwards. Their peaks touch at the centre in the Stone in the centre of the Island of the Moon. These, I suppose, are the two doors to the Stone. The door below is the peak of Gandhamālya through which the goddess enters the Stone rising up from below. The upper door is the peak of mount Gandhamādana through which the goddess descends down into the Stone or, to be more precise, the Liṅga on the Stone. These two doors are represented by the phonemic energy of the letter Sa, which is governed by the Bhairava called Bhṛgu. The Stone, like the Island of the Moon, is uniformly described as a circle.[3] I suppose therefore, that the enclosing walls of

---

[1] śilā śarīram ity uktaṁ śekharaṁ mastakaṁ bhavet | tat tena śobhitaṁ devi śilāśekharaśobhitam ||
*aṅgulaṁ tatra madhye tu [k kh: madhyaṁ * t] sā śilā śatayojanā [k kh: -nāt]* |
adhordhvadvārasaṁyuktā [k kh: -yuktaṁ] bhṛgutoraṇaśobhitā ||
prākārās [kh: prākārā] tatra cchagalī samantāc caturasrakaḥ | ṢSS 47/104-106ab.

[2] See diagram in Dyczkowski 2004: 173.

[3] The ŚM says: There is a Stone there made of jewels that extends for a hundred leagues. It appears to be circular and possesses doors and arches.

the stone are the four sides of the base of Gandhamālya. Seen from above or below, this is how they would appear to be in relation to the circular Stone in the centre above.

According to the ṢSS, this is the Island of the Moon, the goddess's abode that persists when all else has been destroyed:

> The Doomsday Fire (vāḍava) is there in the middle, very brilliant (mahādyuti), its nature radiant energy (tejas). The Doomsday Fire destroys all (the universe) moving and immobile consisting of Māyā just as it does all the waters (of phenomenal existence). [. . .] O Pārvatī, I have told you this before, why do you not understood? The entire triple world along with the gods, demons, and men, is subject to decay. Only the Island of the Moon is imperishable, where the goddess is the mother Kujā. O greatly austere one, she resides with me. This is true, true!
>
> Brahmā's place is called Kalpa and Vaikuṇṭha is that of Viṣṇu. Kailāśa is Rudra's place. They are (all) destroyed when the great destruction takes place. (Only) the Island of the Moon is imperishable where the goddess is Kuleśvarī. O goddess, there are Yoginīs there and Siddhas, O fair lady, all are the will (icchārūpadharā) and the power of all of them is unfailing. Free, and the essential nature (of all things) (svarūpa), they are all the light of Kubjeśvara. Why speak so much here (about this) and think about it again and again? O fair lady, the Island of the Moon is devoid only of decay. That place is, by the power of the venerable Kubjeśvarī, the lord of the worlds. O mother of the host, it should be fashioned with thought (vikalpa). This is true, true! He who possesses that inner certainty that is brought about by (one's own) inner Self (adhyātman) and (comes) from the teacher's mouth, goes to (that) imperishable Island where the goddess is Kubjeśvarī.
>
> O beloved, (himself) imperishable and ever-blissful, he sports as he pleases and he does not perish even with the passage of billions of years, and he is never subject again to the pervasive influence of worldly existence. He is liberated and liberates (others) and (his) light is as great as that of the (goddess) Kuleśvarī.[1]

śatayojanavistīrṇā tatra ratnamayā śilā |
vibhāti maṇḍalākārā dvāratoraṇasaṁkulā || ŚM 2/119.
[1]vāḍavaṁ tatra madhye tu tejorūpaṁ mahādyutim || yathā jalāni sarvāṇi saṁhared vāḍavānalam |
tathā māyāmayaṁ sarvaṁ saṁharet sacarācaram || ṢSS 47/109cd-110.

This then is the imperishable place to which the goddess goes in search of Bhairava and where she receives the complete transmission of the Command. The KMT goes on to tell us how this took place:

After (the goddess) had wandered throughout the whole of that (Island), her mind filled with wonder, she saw that (Stone) and, having done so, ascended it, enveloping (and so concealing) (saṁvṛtya) everything that very moment. The Great Goddess abided there, full of the bliss of the Command, for more than a thousand divine years and became very powerful (mahāsāmarthyāṁ gatā). The Supreme Goddess, playfully enveloping the entire universe, (assumed) the form of a Liṅga, having concealed the entire universe in an instant. Everything was enveloped (saṁchādita) by the goddess and transcended (apakarṣita)[1] by the Yoga of the Command. All that (was thereby) flawless (nirāmaya) and there was no Śāmbhavī creation (sṛṣṭi).[2]

The goddess has travelled throughout the entire world,[3] ascending through all the levels of manifestation. But only when she reaches the Island of the Moon in the End of the Twelve at the highest point of immanence in the cosmic order and her own yogic body, is she 'filled with wonder'. The previous state of wonder with its ensuing confusion was brought about by a cosmic vision that induced her

---

[. . .] pūrvaṁ mayā tavākhyātaṁ kiṁ na buddhyasi pārvati ||
trailokyaṁ [k kh: -kya] kṣīyate sarvaṁ sadevāsuramānuṣam |
akṣayaṁ candradvīpaikaṁ yatra devī kujāmbikā ||
tiṣṭhate ca mayā sārdhaṁ satyaṁ satyaṁ mahātape |
kalpākhyaṁ brahmaṇaḥ [kh: -ṇa] sthānaṁ vaikuṇṭhaṁ [k kh: -kulaṁ] caiva vaiṣṇavam ||
kailāsaṁ rudrasaṁsthānaṁ kṣīyante ca mahākṣaye |
akṣayaṁ candradvīpaṁ tu yatra devī kuleśvarī ||
yoginyas tatrasthā [k kh: -yā] devi siddhāś ca varavarṇini |
icchārūpadharāḥ sarve sarve cāmoghaśaktayaḥ ||
svatantrāś ca svarūpāś ca sarve kubjeśvaraprabhāḥ |
kim atra bahunoktena kalpitena punaḥ punaḥ || kṣayamātravihīnaṁ tu candradvīpaṁ varānane |
śrīkubjeśvarīprabhāveṇa sthānaṁ tad bhuvaneśvaram ||
vikalpenaiva kartavyaṁ satyaṁ satyaṁ gaṇāmbike |
niścayo 'dhyātmanā yasya antaraṅgo guror [kh: gurur] mukhāt [k: mukhān] ||
sa yāti cākṣayaṁ dvīpaṁ yatra devī kubjeśvarī |
akṣayaḥ [kh: yo] satatānandaḥ [kh: śatatānaṁdo] krīḍate svecchayā priye ||
kalpakoṭiśatais tasya kṣayo nāsya [k kh: nasya] prajāyate |
*naiva [k kh: * na] saṁsārikī vyāptir bhūyas tasya pravartate* ||
mukto 'sau mocakaś caiva kuleśvarīsamaprabhaḥ [k kh: śrīkuleśvari-] | ṢSS 47/117cd-127ab.

[1] apakarṣita literally means 'diminished' or 'dragged down'.
[2] KMT 1/58-66ab.
[3] ŚM 2/117ab.

to wonder throughout the world in search of the god. This one reverses, as it were, what occurred in the previous one. She is astonished not by a universal reality – that is, the vision of the previous tradition immersed in the Command – but by a marvellous particular: the Island of the Moon, which is the 'source of all wonders'.[1] Wonder is the experience of higher states. The Śivasūtra proclaims that: 'wonder is the planes of Yoga'.[2] Even so, the previous state of wonder the goddess experienced perplexed her. She loses her sense of identity and forgets not only who she is but also the god whom she has chosen as her deity.

In this case, instead of inducing the goddess to action, the wonder she feels inspires her to contemplation and immobility. The following passage from the ŚM tells us how she sat in meditation, practicing austerities first outside the Liṅga and then the Yoga of the Command through which she unites with Bhairava within it:

> Seeing that wonderful and auspicious (śivā) stone, (the goddess), intent on that love (tatprīti), sat on it cross-legged and, unmoving, was immersed in meditation. For five hundred divine years Pārvatī practiced intense austerities with (her) mind fast (and powerful as a) waterfall. Then by (her) intense concentration she forcefully laid hold of (her) mind and then saw (her own) form as a Liṅga in the mind's garden of the Island of the Moon. Shining with her own radiant energy (tejas), she was the Circle (maṇḍala) penetrated (āviṣṭa) by Bhairava.[3]

The ṢSS and the later Tantras explain that the goddess acquired power initially in her manifest, differentiated (sakala) form in the centre of the maṇḍala in the End of the Twelve. In this aspect she can be 'perceived' and worshipped. In the later texts, she is represented in this phase as sitting in the fire that burns there observing a vow of continence. Then, tired of this, she assumes the form of a Liṅga, that is, the Point (bindu) in the centre. There, in her undifferentiated (niṣkala) form, she is penetrated by Bhairava and receives the Command. In union with the energy of the Command, through which both the teachings and the entire

---

[1] ṢSS 47/100.

[2] vismayo yogabhumikāḥ ŚSū 1/12.

[3] vicitrāṁ [g: vicitrā] ca śilāṁ [kh: silāṁ; g: śilā] dṛṣṭvā śivāṁ tatprītitatparā [kh: tatparāṁ; g: tatparāḥ] |
tasthau sā dhyānam ālambya [g: -layya] sthiraparyaṅkabandhanāt ||
divyamānena varṣāṇāṁ pārvatyā śatapañcakaṁ [kh: sata-] |
tatra taptaṁ tapas tīvraṁ [g: tapaṁ-] prapātadrutacetasā [kh: tapātadgata; g: -drūta-] ||
tataś cograsamādhānād [g: tataścātra] balenākṛṣya mānasā |
candradvīpamanodyāne liṅgarūpāṁ [g: -rūpaṁ] dadarśa tām ||
jvalantīṁ [g: jvalaṁti] tejasā [kh: svena] svena [kh: tejena] bhairavāviṣṭamaṇḍalām [g: -maṇḍalaṁ] | ŚM 2/120-123ab.

cosmic order are generated, it is all withdrawn back into the energy of the goddess. And she abides there full of bliss as the energy of bliss (ānandaśakti) that radiates from the centre of the maṇḍala.[1]

When he saw that great wonder, Kuleśvara, the God of the gods, was supremely astonished. (He thought) "How has the goddess done this difficult thing? The entire universe, mobile and immobile, and (all that is) made of words is without light. Even so, (this) Island alone, the venerable (Island of) the Moon, where the goddess resides, persists (as it was)." Abandoning (his) unmanifest form, the Lord assumed a manifest one and began to worship the Liṅga (called) Udyānabhairava. The goddess who had concealed (saṁvṛtya)[2] everything, along with its bliss, assumed a blissful form. (The goddess who is) powerful by virtue (of her) austerities does not know the Lord of the gods who is worshipping her. Then the god began to intone a hymn of divine praise that enlightens to the entire meaning (of the teachings) with a voice (full of) bliss.[3]

Now it is the god's turn to be overawed to see that there, in the absence of Śiva's emanation (śāmbhavīsṛṣṭi), everything shares in the perfection of absolute being (nirāmaya). The KRU enumerates a series of emanations (sṛṣṭi) projected out of their corresponding metaphysical principles progressively down into outer gross manifestation. They are: 1) The emanation from Śiva (śāmbhavī). 2) The emanation from the goddess. 3) The emanation from the Īśvara principle. 4) The emanation from the Vidyā principle. 5) The emanation pertaining to Puruṣa. 6) The emanation from Prakṛti. 7) The emanation from Brahmā.[4] The physical universe (brahmāṇḍa) is generated through the last four forms of emanation.[5] The first three are concerned with the emanation of the inner energies and the original, ideal components of the universe that is to be emanated further down at grosser levels. The higher form of emanation generates the principles below it. Thus,

---

[1] See below, KuKh 1/1.
[2] 'saṁvṛtya' literally means 'having enveloped' or 'covered over'.
[3] KMT 1/67-70.
[4] prathamā [kh: prathamāṁ] śāmbhavī sṛṣṭir devyāḥ [k kh g: – sṛṣṭi devyā] sṛṣṭir [k kh g: sṛṣṭi-] dvitīyakā [g: dviyakā] |
tṛtīyā īśvarāt [k kh: īśvarā] tattvād [k: tradhvāda; kh: tratvā] vidyātattvāc caturthikā ||
pañcamī pauruṣī sṛṣṭiḥ [k kh g: sṛṣṭi] ṣaṣṭhī prakṛtisaṁbhavā |
saptamī brahmasṛṣṭis tu mayā te kathitā priye || KRU 1/92-93.
[5] pūrvoditā [k kh: pūrvāditā] tu yā sṛṣṭir mayā [k kh: sṛṣṭi; g: -ṭimāyā] saptavidhā [k: sapravidhā] priye ||
ādyatrayavinirmuktā [kh: -trayācca nirmuktā; g: -ktāṁ] saiṣā [kh: saiṣā; g: śeṣā] brahmāṇḍasaṁbhavā [g: -bhavāḥ]| KRU 1/97cd-98ab.

Śiva's emanation (śāmbhavīsṛṣṭi) generates the goddess who then generates the Īśvara principle, and so on. The absence of the first and highest form of emanation therefore not only implies that there is no external manifestation and return to the pre-cosmic state, it also implies the withdrawal of the goddess into Śiva, who is the godhead and her source.

The goddess is Speech, which consists of the energies of the phonemes. By their conjunction and separation, all the words and what they denote are generated. So, without the creative, semiotic energy of the goddess, the universe of words (i.e. manifestation), is 'without light' and so recedes into the unmanifest state. Concealed in this way, the energy that sustains manifestation is withdrawn and with it the bliss which is that energy's essential nature. Thus the goddess, who is this pure energy of emanation, pulls out of her creation back into her own essential, blissful nature. The god is astonished to see this and how the Island of the Moon continues to exist unchanged, a beacon of light in the midst of unbounded darkness. And once again the wonder the deity feels leads to a transformation of his condition. In this case he abandons the unmanifest state he had assumed after directing the goddess and becomes manifest because only in that way can he worship the goddess who possesses the awesome and inexplicable power he is witnessing.

He begins by worshipping the Liṅga. Note that this is a Bhairava Liṅga because Śiva's wrathful form, Bhairava, is present within it. The Tantra implies that it is called Udyāna Bhairava because it is situated on the Island of the Moon which is a 'great and beautiful garden (udyāna)'[1] or, as the ŚM says, it is 'mind's garden'.[2] We may, perhaps, also perceive an echo of the name of the foremost of the goddess's sacred seats – Oḍḍiyāna – which amongst its many other spellings is also spelt 'Udyāna'. The association is quite natural as Oḍḍiyāna / Udyāna is the first seat (ādyapīṭha) from which the teachings were first propagated.

The texts do not tell us this but we may suppose that just as the goddess is unmanifest within the Liṅga, so too the god. He is manifest outside the Liṅga, which is where he must be in order to worship the goddess within it. Within it, he is in the form of his energy, that is, the Command which is the goddess. Within the Liṅga, Bhairava penetrates her in this form. Thus, when she emerges from the Liṅga she is said to be 'penetrated by the bliss of the Command'.[3] Note also that Bhairava openly seeks the goddess, whereas she looks for him in secret. First she seeks him in the Liṅga but ultimately finds him outside it when he finds her. Thus we have here a set of binaries that can be tabulated as follows:

---

[1] KMT 1/57.
[2] ŚM 2/122, quoted above, p. 48, note.
[3] KMT 2/6.

God	Goddess
Manifest	Unmanifest
Unempowered	Empowered
Outside the Liṅga	Inside the Liṅga
Male penetrating female	Female penetrating male Devoid of Bliss	Blissful
Union with the other	Union with one's self
Giving then receiving the Command	Receiving then giving the Command
Externally conscious	Externally unconscious
Openly seeking	Covertly seeking

The inner nature of the goddess within the Liṅga is such intense bliss that, focused on it in profound contemplation, she is unaware of anything around her. The light radiating from her joy makes her astonishingly beautiful and the energy she accumulated outside the Liṅga, infinitely powerful. Somehow sensing that she is being worshipped, but too absorbed in contemplation to distinguish the god who is engaged in adoration, she needs to be roused. This the god does by intoning the *Mālinīstava. As the ŚM says: 'When the lord of the universe saw this astonishing (thing) he was overawed with wonder and horripilating with delight, began (to sing) a hymn full (of praise)'.[1]

The first chapter of the KMT ends here. At this point in the ŚM, Bhairava intones a hymn to the goddess called the Bhairavīstotra which replaces the Mālinīstava intoned by the god in the KMT and in the KuKh. Notice how the goddess in the Liṅga is Mahāgaurī – the Great White Goddess. She is no longer the black, fierce Kālī but the benign Gopālī:[2]

> Victory! Victory (to you) O goddess (bhagavatī)! (You) who are like the solar orb of the emergence of Supreme Reality! (You who are) the star that is the circle of all the directions illumined by the halo of the light of your own body! O plane of stability! (You whose) body of enjoyment (saṁbhogadeha) is radiant white (svacchā) and unlimited in all (its) limbs! O Mahāgaurī (Great White One)!

[1] nirīkṣya [g: nirīkṣa] vismayāviṣṭo [kh: -vistho; g: – viṣṭa] hṛṣṭaromo [kh g: -ma] jagatpatiḥ ||
savismayakaraṁ dṛṣṭvā stotram ārabdhaṁ [kh: -rabdha; g: statram āradhva] nirbharam |
ŚM 2/123cd-124ab.

[2] Cf. KuKh 6/3-4ab.

O Gopālī! You whose earrings are snakes and who wears a great snake as a sacred thread! O well-mannered one! O Large-eyed (one)! O you who are the principle of the Self, intent on the contemplation of the accomplishment (siddha) that pours forth out of the root of the root (kandamūla) of that (divine form).

You who delight in the well-prepared offerings made in the course of worship offered by Kula teachers, the host of Heroes and Herukas as part of the great Kaula sport!

O you who bestows the joy of Nirvāṇa which is the knowledge and bliss that comes from detachment, which is the very opposite of the defects of attachment and the rest of one who is subject (bhogin) to the poison of the objects of sense!

Omnipresent goddess! Rudrāṇī! Raudrī! Firmly fixed one (dhruvā)! Salvation from the world of transmigration, which is terrible and hard to traverse!

Salutation (to you) whose nature is inaccessible (to the fettered)! Deformed one! Supreme one! Daughter of the Himalayas! Mother of the world! Seed of the universe!

(Salutations to you) who bestow the play of freedom and enjoyment by means of all the liturgies (krama) and rites (kriyā) performed in the blissful meetings of great ghosts, demons (vetālas), warlocks (bheruṇḍa), witches (lāmā) and planets (graha)!

Dweller in cremation grounds! You who delight in the play of dance! Experienced in wonderfully diverse behaviour! Mahālakṣmī! Subtle one! Śivā!

Victory to you who have merged the entire universe into a single vibrant state of oneness filling (thereby every) discontinuity!

(You are) beautiful with the necklace that (hangs from your) neck made of the pearls of the great phonemic energies (varṇa)!

You who are in the centre of the great wheel of the Six Yoginīs and the great group of six![1]

Present in the Sixteen Supports![2] On the plane of (suṣumnā) the Channel of the Tortoise (kūrmanāḍī)!

Aroused by the upsurge of the processes (taking place in) the wheels of the body! Whose abode is that of Brahmā, Vaikuṇṭha, Rudreśa, Sādākhya and the Siddhas!

---

[1] See below, p. 319 ff.. The Six Yoginīs, Ḍākinī and the others, are described in chapter sixty-three of the KuKh. They are projected into the 'great wheel' of the hexagon surrounding the central triangle of the maṇḍala.

[2] See note to KuKh 25/30-36ab.

You are illusion destroyed! You who bestow the delights of the liturgy (krama) of the sixty-four (Bhairavas and Yoginīs)!

Beautiful with intense radiant energy (tejas)! Mistress of the gods! Gāndhārī![1] Gāyatrī! Praised by the Siddhas!

You are the first! (You are engaged in) the game (of playfully) withdrawing the vital breath of every living being in the worlds (when the time comes for them to die).

(You are) the great power who attracts, deludes and paralyses; the mother of the Vedas; the ancient one; You are Jayā (Victory), Siddhayogeśvarī, Vajracaṇḍā, Bheruṇḍā, O you who have arisen out of the Udyāna Liṅga!

(Your) accomplished (liberated state) has no beginning (anādisiddhā). (You are the goddess) Mahāpiṅgalā who establishes the order (krama) (of the sequence of energies symbolised in the letters of the Mālinī alphabet that range) from Na to Pha.

(You are) Bhairavī whose being is (infinitely) great. (You are) the All and, (universally) pervasive, (are also) Revatī. O (you) who can bestow the means to both grace (anugraha) and curse (nigraha)![2]

---

[1] Gāndhārī was the wife of the epic king Dhṛtarāṣṭra. As her husband was blind, out of sympathy and because she was ready to share everything with her husband, she kept her eyes covered with a blindfold. Kubjikā, I suppose, is identified with her to represent her devotion and love for Bhairava, her consort. Bheruṇḍā is the sixth of Nine Nityās listed in YKh (1) that are worshipped in association with Tripurabhairavī with which Kubjikā is identified (ṣaṣṭhī bheruṇḍasaṁjñakā [k, g, gh: bharuṇḍa-] || YKh (1) 44/30d). She is the fifth of sixteen Nityās described in the Tantrarāja that attend on Tripurāsundarī. Mahālakṣmī is a form of Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī (see below p. 558). Siddhayogeśvarī is the main goddess (Parā) of the early Trika and, amongst Kubjikā's six faces, she is the eastern one (KuKh 29/47). Kubjikā is commonly identified with Raudrī, also called Rudrāṇī or Rudraśakti as well as Mahāpiṅgalā. Revatī, was originally a female demon who afflicted small children. Propitiated, she protects them.

[2] jaya [kh: missing] jaya bhagavati paramatattvodbhavādityabimbānukāri [kh: paramatatvad-] svadehaprabhāmaṇḍaloddyotoddyotitāśeṣadikcakratāre [kh: -maṇḍalodyānamudyotaśeṣādicakravāle pravāle; g: -maṇḍalodyānamudyotaśeṣaredikcakra] | (1) pratiṣṭhāpade [kh: praticchāyāndañ; g: yadā] svecchayā svacchāvicchinnasarvāṅgasaṁbhogadehe [kh: cecchāyāmvaśca vicchinnasarvvage saṁbhogadeho; g: svacha- -dehā] | (2)
mahāgauri [g: -gaurī] gopāli goṇāsakarṇāvataṁse [g: goṇāvataṁsā] mahānāgayajñopavīte [g: -nāgayattopavītaṁ] vinīte viśālākṣi [kh: visā-] tatkandamūlollasatsiddhicintāprasaktātmatattve [g: citrāpraśaktātma-; kh: -tmanātva] || (3)
*mahākaulalīlākulācāryavīrāvalīherukārabdhapūjopahāraprabandhapriye [g: -hetukāravdha-; kh: -ra * vandha]* || (4)
viṣayaviṣabhogisaṅgādidoṣaviparyāyavairāgyavijñānasānandanirvāṇasaukhyaprade [kh: mahāviṣayaviṣayabhogidoṣaṣya paryyāptavairāgyavijñānānanda; g: -vairājña-] || (5)
sarvage devi rudrāṇi raudri [kh: raudra] dhruve [kh: dhrūve] || (6)

The following chapter of the KMT, called 'concerning the virgin goddess, otherwise known as the Command', begins with the Mālinīstava.[1] The following passage describes the emergence of the goddess from the Liṅga which takes place when Bhairava implores her at the end of his hymn: "O mother of all the heroes, O Bhairavī, I Bhairava have come to take refuge. Forgive (my) sin (aparādha)! O Śivā! Forgive (my) sin!"[2]

Presumably the sin Bhairava has committed is to have treated the goddess flippantly and then abandoned her. Although the goddess is hiding from the god, we should not forget that she originally set out to find him. Thus, on the one hand she entered the Liṅga to discover him inwardly and on the other she assumed this form to attract him outwardly. Anyway, whether it is due to Bhairava's contrition or the goddess's playfulness, this final supplication induces the goddess to finally burst out of the Liṅga.

---

ghoraduṣtarasaṁsārottāre [k: -duṣpāra-; kh: -duḥpārasaṁsāramuttāre; g: gorasaṁsāramutāra] sindhupravāhavyapakrāntatapastāpamāne [kh: -pātāpamāne; g: tapotāpamāne] | (7)
namo 'gamyarūpe virūpe pare [kh: para] śailarājātmaje lokamāte jagadbījabhūte | (8)
mahābhūtavetālabheruṇḍalāmāgrahānandagoṣṭhīsamārabdhākhilakriyāśeṣakramamuktibhuktilīlā prade [g: – mālāgrahā- -samāladhvakheḍakriyāśeṣavaddha; kh: – goṣṭī-] | (9)
*śmaśānālaye [kh: śmaśāna-] lāsyalīlāvinode [kh: * * līlāvinoda] vicitraceṣṭānubhāve [kh, g: -ceṣṭhā-] mahālakṣmi [kh: -lakṣmī] śūkṣme [kh: sūkṣma] śive | (10)*
jaya samarasībhāvalolīkṛtāśeṣaviśvāntarālaprapūryamāṇe [kh: samarasā- -prapotāpamān; g: prapoyamāne] | (11)
*mahāvarṇahārāvalīhārakaṇṭhabaddhapraśobhite [g: mahāhāra- -kaṇṭhe * * * * * ] | (12)
*mahāṣaṭkaṣaḍyoginīcakramadhyasthite [kh: * * * * ṣaḍ- – sthita;] ṣoḍaśādhārage kūrmanāḍīpadāvasthite [kh: -nāḍi-] | (13)*
dehacakrakramotthānasaṁkṣobhite [kh: -cakrā] | (14)
brahmavaikuṇṭharudreśasādākhyasiddhālaye [g: -rudraśa-] | (15)
dhvastamohe catuḥṣaṣṭikramapramodaprade [kh: -pramode priyo] devarājārcite | (16)
tīvratejasuteje [kh: tīvratejo-] sureśāni [g: sura-] gāndhāri gāyatri siddhastute | (17)
sakalabhuvanajanaprāṇasaṁhāralīlā [g: bhuvaṇajaprāṇasaṁsāralīlā-] tvam ādye [k: tvāmoghe; kh: -tvamoghe] | (18)
mahāśaktir ākarṣaṇī mohanī stambhanī [g: staṁbhaṁ] vedamātā [kh, g: -te] purāṇī jayā [kh: jaya] siddhayogeśvarī vajracaṇḍā bheruṇḍā [kh: bhuruṇḍā; g: bhirūṇḍā] tvam udyānaliṅgodbhave | (19)
anādisiddhā [kh: .anādi] mahāpiṅgalā nādiphāntakramasthāpinī [k, g: -sthāyinī] | (20)
bhairavī bhūribhāvākhilā vyāpinī revatī nugrahānugrahopāyadānakṣame [k, g: -kṣaye; kh: nigrahānugraho] | (21) ŚM 2/(1) – (21).

[1] An extended version of this hymn to which seed-syllable mantras have been added appears in the analogous place in the narrative in chapter four of the KuKh after verse 4/39. See the notes there concerning the versions of this hymn and other details. Surprisingly, the ṢSS ignores this part of the myth and so the hymn is missing.

[2] These are the last two lines (42 and 43) of the version of the Mālinīstava in chapter two of the KMT. Cf. line 126 of the version of the Mālinīstava in chapter four of the KuKh.

The goddess emerges out of the Liṅga

After the great soul Bhairava had praised the Great Goddess in this way, the Supreme Goddess broke open the Liṅga and emerged (from it). She was (dark) like blue collyrium, her form bent (kubjarūpā) and her belly (large like a) wolf. Her mouth, with projecting teeth, was slightly open and her hair (was tied) up (in the) barbarian style (barbara). Of many forms, she was both beautiful and deformed. Her left hand extended, Vāmadevī (the Goddess of the Left) spoke.[1]

The ŚM describes this wonderful theophany in a similar way:

> When she heard the Bhairavīstotra, that Kuleśvarī burst apart the Liṅga by means of Bhairava's unlimited energy (tejas) and having done so, emerged out (of it). She was dark blue (śyāmā) like the petals of a blue lotus and (her hair was) tied up in the barbarian style. Extending her left hand, she was bent over (kubjarūpā) and had a big belly. The goddess with a fierce (karāla) face, (her) mind full of wonder, spoke there in (that) dwelling (vāsara), looking around in all directions.[2]

The KMT seems to say little more than that the goddess is called the 'goddess of the left' because she extends her left hand. Normally impure, this is the hand used for special Tantric rituals which, therefore, came to be called those of the 'left hand'. As the left is the feminine side, the side of power (śakti), magical, worldly and spiritual accomplishment (siddhi), such rites are generally related to goddesses or feminine beings who aid the adept to achieve these things. Perhaps only this was originally intended, that the goddess, empowered by centuries of contemplation within the Liṅga, issues forth, for the benefit of her devotees, already engaged in bestowing these boons that come from the left hand. Another source explains that the goddess is called Vāmā because she practices

---

[1] KMT 2/3-5.

[2] ākarṇya [g: ākarṇa] bhairavīstotraṁ bhairavāmitatejasā [g: tejase] ||
vinirbhidya tato liṅgaṁ nirgatā [kh: niggatā] sā kuleśvarī |
nīlotpaladalaśyāmā barbarordhvaśiroruhā ||
prasārya vāmahastaṁ [kh: -hastān] sā [kh: tā; g: tāṁ] kubjarūpā [k, kh: kujā-; g: -rūpīṁ] mahodarī [g: -darīṁ] |
karālavadanā devī vismayāviṣṭamānasā ||
provāca vāsare tatra vilokya kakubhākhilān [kh: kakubho.akhilā; g: kakubhāṁkhilāṁ] |
ŚM 2/124cd-127ab.

'vāmācāra'.[1] In this context vāmācāra – the 'practice of the left' – denotes her dynamism within the Liṅga where, rotating through it in an anticlockwise spiral, she energises her phonemic energies within it. She impels herself by the rotation within herself in the same direction, which is that of emanation, whilst in her fertile seed state, which is at once Divine Light and Sound. In YKh (2) we read:

> She moves in the middle of the Stone in an anticlockwise circle. The energy Vāmā, who is called Anantā (Endless) and the soul (jīva), is the ball of vital seed (kuṇḍagolakā). (Her) rotation is spherical, she is a spark (of consciousness) (kākinyā) and her form is Unstruck Sound (haṁsa).[2]

While the goddess is rarely called Vāmādevī, here we have the very first reference which alludes to and explains the name by which she is most commonly known, that is, Kubjikā: literally 'hump backed'. The KMT tell us that the goddess who emerges from the Liṅga is bent (kubjarūpā).[3] Various reasons are given in the sources for her being 'bent'. Some of these relate to her personal mythic identity. From this perspective, we are told a little further on in the text that she is bent with bashfulness (lajjā) when she sees Bhairava, a condition we shall analyse in due course. Further ahead, after her marriage to the god, she is again 'bent'. This time because she is engaged in union with him until she complains that she is tired of being in that position and wishes to disengage to straighten herself. In both cases, her 'bent' form has to do with her relationship with the god, whether in immanent or actual union.

Her bent condition relates also to her metaphysical identity as Kuṇḍalinī. Commonly represented as a coiled, sleeping serpent symbolizing latent potency, Kuṇḍalinī is regularly referred to in all Śaiva Tantric traditions as having a 'crooked shape' (kuṭilākārā). The Siddhāntāgamas, generally centred on the worship of the mild, white Sadāśiva ('Ever-auspicious') in the form of a Liṅga, represent his female energy within it in this way. She is also said to be there in the 'form of a sprout' (aṅkurākārarūpiṇī), which is another common way of describing Kuṇḍalinī in all the other major Śaiva schools.[4] Like the sprout that emerges from a seed, she issues forth from the pregnant potency of the womb-like

---

[1] vāmācāreṇa vāmākhyā YKh (2) 16/10c.

[2] bhramate ca śilāmadhye vāmāvartaparibhramāt |
vāmāśaktir anantākhyā [k, kh: -ratantākhyā] jīvākhyā kuṇḍagolakā ||
vibhramā golakākārā kākinyā haṁsavigrahā | YKh (2) 16/14-15ab.

The Goddess in the form of the Point in the centre of the maṇḍala is also described as a 'spark' in KuKh 31/57.

[3] KMT 2/3-5.

[4] KuKh 35/78cd-80; cf SŚP 3/47cd, quoted below chapter 2, p. 277 ff..

Liṅga bent at first to then straighten out into the fullness of manifestation. This image of the awakening of Kuṇḍalinī was maintained in the later Kaula schools where she is regularly depicted as coiled around the Liṅga in the Root Foundation (mūlādhāra). In this case, however, the Liṅga is the Point in the centre of the maṇḍala at the End of the Twelve, at the opposite extreme of the subtle body. Her emergence from the Liṅga heralds the birth of the transmission (krama) concretely as the teachings as well as the lineages through which it is transmitted. When the goddess emerges from the Liṅga it explodes, emitting Divine Light and Sound marking the first moment of the outpouring of Śiva's emanation (śāmbhavīsṛṣṭi), which was withdrawn when she entered it. Thus she flows down into manifestation, rather than up. Or better, she radiates all around, shining darkly as does the Moon in the darkness of the Night of Māyā. The SKh explains:

> Kālī fused together her own Yogas and assumed the form of the venerable Udyāna Liṅga, which is her own pure body. Then, awakened by Śaṁkara's hymn, she again came forth with great force from the Liṅga, having illumined the many directions with the profusion of (her) lunar rays. I constantly salute that (goddess) Khañjī (who did this). She who is Raudrī, hard to attain and, very tranquil, is endowed with the three modalities (of the Yoni).[1]

Kubjikā is not coiled around the Liṅga, as Kuṇḍalinī is represented in the later Tantras, she is 'bent over' within the Liṅga in the body of the deity. As such it contains the entire universe and, within it, the goddess pervades it. Analogously, Kubjikā is present in the physical body, the microcosm. The limbs, senses, physiological processes, and even the changing moods, emotions, negative and positive sentiments, worshipped as the deities of the transmission (krama) are the energies of the goddess in the body. She is present there in a contracted form 'bent over' in the circulating flux of the vital breath perceived there as its vivifying Sound. She is that Sound that reverberates in the Void of the transdimensionally minute 'atom' of consciousness that is the individual soul. The ṢSS says as much concisely:

---

[1] piṇḍīkṛtvā [g: piṁḍīkṛkṛtvāt] svayogān [kh: svayāgān; g: stayogā] nijavapur amalaṁ śrīmadudyānaliṅgaṁ [kh g: -uḍyāna-]
rūpaṁ saṁprāpya kālī śaśikaranikarodbhāvitānekadikkā [g: sasikaranikarodbhāvitānekadivyā] | niṣkrāntā [g: niḥkrāṁtā] liṅgato yā [kh: ddo yā] punar api tarasā [kh: tunasā; g: tavasā] śaṁkarastotrabodhād [kh: -bodhā; g: saṁkarastotravodhā] durgāṁ [g: dugrā] raudrīṁ [g: raundrīṁ] suśāntāṁ [g: susāṁtāṁ] trividhagatiyutāṁ tāṁ sadā [g: samādā] naumi khañjīṁ [kh: khañjī] || SKh 29/19.

This verse comes at the end of the Mālinīstava of the SKh.

> She who, having contracted (herself), enters (into the body) (and is bent over) is (the goddess whose name begins with) Ku (kukārā). It is for this reason that she is said to be (Kubjikā, the Bent One). She is present in all living beings within the process of the union of the vital breath (prāṇayogakrama) (which serves to vitalize the body) of embodied beings. O mistress of the god of the gods, she is Sound and resides in the Void (of consciousness) (kha).[1]

Within the Liṅga the goddess is curled around herself receiving the empowerment of the Command, which, as the pure energy of the deity, is her own essential nature. Like the alchemical Uroboros – the snake that feeds on its own tail – the goddess draws energy from her own seed state. This metaphysical notion of deity as self-subsisting and self-empowering on the one hand and generating the universe on the other leads to the startling image of the goddess 'churning her own 'navel' with her tongue' and thereby generating the universe.[2] According to the KRU, Mitra, the first accomplished adept – Siddha – to propagate the teachings was generated by the goddess from within the Liṅga in the same way.

One of the many dimensions of the symbolism of the goddess in the Liṅga and her emergence from it that developed in the course of time, involved the metaphysical paradox implied here of the identity of the container and the contained. This is expressed, as we shall see in the following chapter, in the relationship between the Point (bindu) in the centre of the goddess's maṇḍala and its triangular core. The goddess is both the Point, which in mythical terms is the Liṅga, and the triangle that emerges from it. Her bent form represents the latter. Thus the KuKh says that this triangle is the face of the goddess who emerges from the Liṅga.[3] In some places she is called Triangle – Trikoṇā.[4] Accordingly, she is also commonly called Vakrā, which literally means 'crooked', or Vakrikā – 'little Vakrā'. These names implicitly refer to the Triangle, which is her sacred geometric form as the Yoni, the womb of emanation.

---

[1] ākuñcya praviśed yā tu kukārā tena sā smṛtā [k kh –tāḥ] ||
prāṇayogakrame sā tu dehināṁ sarvajantuṣu |
sthitā sā devadeveśi nādarūpā kha-m-āśritā || ṢSS 47/43cd-44.

[2] O goddess, by first churning her own navel with her tongue the universe was born from her womb by means of (her) divine Yoni. O great goddess, from then on she was known as the goddess Kujā.

svanābhimathanād devi svakīyarasanā purā ||
brahmāṇḍaṁ garbhatas tasyā jātaṁ divyena yoninā |
tadārabhya maheśāni kujā devīti viśrutā || Parātantra 3/2cd-3ab.

[3] KuKh 5/29.

[4] KuKh 30/59.

Note, finally, that other derivations of the Kubjikā's name do not relate to her bent or crooked shape. If, as Kuiper[1] suggests, the word kubja is of Munda origin, the following Sanskrit derivations of her name are no less fanciful than those we have examined. One explains it as a compound with the meaning 'she who is born (jā) from earth (ku) and water (ab)'.[2] Another derivation of the name Kubjikā is found in the Kubjikānityāhnikatilaka where we read that: 'the letter Ku is the seed-syllable of the Earth which is on a lotus (abjikā).'[3] In other words Kubjikā is the goddess who, as the divine embodiment of the Earth, sits on a lotus. This etymology appears to be an attempt to integrate the name Kubjikā with Kujā, which is another common name of the goddess.[4] This name is derived from '(she who is) born' – 'jā' – from the 'earth' – 'ku'.[5] But although this is possibly a correct etymology, it does not provide us with any insight into the name or the nature of the goddess who is rarely, if at all, specifically associated with the earth in the sources.

Let us now return to the narrative. When Kubjikā emerged from the Liṅga:

Penetrated (samāviṣṭā) by the bliss of the Command and aroused by the joy of the hymn (addressed to her), the great being said: "I do not know who is praising me here. To whom should I give a boon? My gaze (dṛṣṭipāta) is hard to behold like a venomous snake (āśīviṣa). How have (you been able to) bear it? Then ask for whatever you please!"[6]

The version in the ŚM reports the goddess as saying:

> "Distracted and greatly aroused by the delight of the hymn, I do not know who is praising me. Who am I? To whom should I bestow boons? Like the venomous look of an angry snake (kruddhāhiviṣadṛṣṭivat) my look is hard to behold. I will grant a boon to whoever can endure it." Then (seeing that it was Bhairava, her) face filled with joy, she was ready to grant (him) a boon.[7]

---

[1] Kuiper 1948: 42ff.

[2] Schoterman (1988: 11) based on the Saṁvartāmaṇḍalasūtravyākhyā (fol. 1b).

[3] kukāraḥ pārthivo [gh: pāthivo] bījo abjikoparisaṁsthitaḥ | KnT 1/3ab.

[4] This is the form of the goddess's name, for example, throughout the Hymn of Twelve Verses in chapter five of our text i.e. KuKh 5/72cd-84ab. Just as Kubjī and Kubjinī are common variants of the name Kubjikā we also commonly find Kujeśvarī or Kujeśī for Kujā.

[5] See BB quoted in notes to line two of the Mālinīstava in chapter 4 of the KuKh.

[6] KMT 2/6-8.

[7] parityaktasamādhānā stotrānandātivihvalā ||
na vedmi [kh: vetti; g: venvi] ko mama stotā [kh: stauti] kāhaṁ [kh g: kohaṁ] kasmai varapradā |

According to the version in the SKh, after the goddess expresses her surprise that the god can bear the power of her gaze she pledges that: "I am giving you a divine eye by virtue of which you will be able to see (me)."[1] The KuKh, describes this powerful theophany as follows:

> O Śambhu, the Liṅga has been burst apart and I who possess a beautiful lustre have emerged (from it) in a crooked form, horrific and (my) face the Triangle. I am dark blue and red. I have three eyes and (my) light is like the Fire of Time. The gaze I possess (is like that of a) lion and so (I am called) 'she who has the lion's gaze' (siṁhāvalokinī).[2]

Although in the parallel passage in the KMT and the ŚM the goddess is said to be dark like 'blue collyrium', elsewhere she is repeatedly said to be both dark blue and red, as in our text.[3] The dark red and blue colour can be associated with blood. Commonly the colour of fierce Tantric deities, it symbolizes their power that is especially intense because it draws from negative forces that have been reformed for higher spiritual purposes. The Vedic goddess Kṛtyā, the embodiment of sorcery, is said to be this colour, reflecting that of the cloth that has been soiled by the bride on the night of the consummation of her marriage.[4]

---

duṣprekṣyo [kh: duḥprekṣyo; g: duḥprekṣaṁ] dṛṣṭipāto [g: -yāto] me kruddhāhiviṣadṛṣṭivat [kh: krūddhāśī; g: krūddhāśīṁ] || yena kenāpi soḍho 'yaṁ varaṁ tasmai dadāmy aham | ŚM 2/127cd-129ab.

[1] divyaṁ dadāmi te cakṣur yena tvāṁ darśako [g: daṁsako] bhavet | SKh 29/18cd. See note to KuKh 4/47cd-48ab.

[2] KuKh 5/29-30.

[3] For example in KuKh 68/2 where the goddess, there called Ciñcinī and Mātaṅgī, is said to be of this colour and very fierce. Her visualized form is described there in the following verses.

[4] In order to counter the sorcery (kṛtyā) of someone who wishes evil for the bride, a purifying bath is prescribed as part of the Vedic marriage rites (AV 14/2/65). The couple recite the following verse while looking at the red and blue evening sky in order to propitiate the goddess Kṛtyā:

> Her hue is blue and red: the fiend (kṛtyā) who clingeth close is driven off. Well thrive the kinsmen of this bride: the husband is bound first in bonds. ṚV 10/85/28 = AV 14/1/26 (trans. by Griffith)

Lal (1980: 45-46) explains: On the morning after the garbhādhāna ceremony, which is performed on the fourth day after marriage, the cloth worn by the bride, which has been soiled by the nuptial consummation, is given over to the priest. Indeed, the red and blue blood spots on the cloth are regarded as representing Kṛtyā and hence as inauspicious. The garment, which is called śāmulya, is supposed to be extremely ominous if retained in the house. It becomes a walking Kṛtyā and associates herself with the husband thereby bringing all disasters upon him (ṚV 10/85/29 and AV 14/1/25).

The black (= dark blue) colour of the goddess is explained in the Kubjikā Tantras by her close connection to Kālī. Called Kālikā in the KMT and Bhadrakālī[1] in the KuKh, this is the identity of the goddess before she entered the Liṅga. Inside the Liṅga the goddess looses her dark colour and becomes the White Goddess (Gaurī). There she receives Śambhu's empowering Command (śāmbhavājñā) by her Kaula practice, which is grounded in her blissful, spiritually aroused state.[2] Thus, when she emerges again from the Liṅga and so resumes her fierce condition she is not the same. She is not the same black Kālī who entered the Liṅga. This change is represented in the KuKh by the addition of a red component, representing the transformation that has taken place during her initiatory withdrawal. Another example of this change is recorded in YKh (1) where it is said of Kālī, the goddess of the Northern Tradition (uttarāmnāya):

> (She) is the great, venerable and eternal power that moves within the energy of consciousness. When angry, she brings about destruction. When content, she is the means to gain success (siddhi). Devoted to the practice of heroes (vīracaryā), she is Kulālikā (i.e. Kubjikā) in the Western (tradition). Thus, that goddess is red (and passionate) (raktā) and is initiated into the Western Transmission (of the goddess Kubjikā).[3]

Another reason why Kubjikā in this aspect is dark blue and red has to do with her relation to the god Rudra. In the hymn in the ŚM Bhairava intones to her, that induces her to appear out of the Liṅga, he addresses her as Rudrāṇī and Raudrī.[4] Moreover, throughout the Kubjikā Tantras she appears as Rudraśakti.[5] In the Vedas, Rudra is said to be 'blue and red' (nīlalohita). His throat is blue. His belly is black and his back red[6] – colours that probably relate to those of the sky at sunset. The ŚM refers to the goddess as Mahāpiṅgalā (the Great Tawny One) who establishes the order of the letters of the Mālinī alphabet. In this respect also, she is like Rudra who is also said to be a ruddy brown.[7] This is because Rudra is the

---

[1] See KuKh 3/160ff.

[2] See, for example, KuKh 6/3-4ab.

[3] mahāśrīśāśvatā [k, kh, gh: -svatā] śaktiḥ [missing in all MSs] cicchaktyantaracāriṇī [k, gh: ciśaṁktyatara-; kh: -taracāriṇī] ||
*saṁhārakāriṇī [k, gh: -ṇīṁ] kruddhā saṁ tuṣṭā siddhisādhikā [k, kh, gh: siddhisā * ] |
vīracaryāratā sā tu paścime sā kulālikā ||
tena raktā tu sā devī paścimakramadīkṣitā [k, kh: paścime-] | YKh (1) 4/269cd-271ab.

[4] sarvage devi rudrāṇi raudri [kh: raudra] dhruve [kh: dhrūve] || ŚM 2/(4).

[5] Kubjikā's identity as Rudraśakti is due to her close relationship with the goddess of the Trika Tantras who is regularly portrayed as Rudraśakti.

[6] ṚV 2/33/5.

[7] ṚV 1/114/1,5.

Fire just as the goddess is Saṁvartā, the energy of Fire. Drawing from Vedic, Epic and Purāṇic literature, what Kramrisch[1] says of Rudra applies equally to the goddess:

'Of ruddy brown complexion he shines in many colours'[2] like Fire (Agni). Indeed Rudra is Agni and Agni is Rudra.[3] They are one in nature, though not in intensity. Rudra is the terrible, frightening, quintessential Agni. He is the fury of Fire.[4] Like fire, but fiercer and more luminous, wild tremendous Rudra is fire, lightning and the sun. Fire is the power of illumination and is concentrated in him. He burns; he is atrocious, and full of heat; like fire he devours flesh, blood and marrow.[5] The Wild God – the essence of fire – is in the fire, in the waters, in the plants; he has entered all beings.[6]

The dark blue or black colour symbolizes the goddess's tāmasika aspect, which she has in common with Kālī, her form prior to her entry into the Liṅga. This colour is also consonant with her nature as Mahāmāyā.[7] Just as the black colour symbolizes her destructive aspect, the red colour symbolizes her creative, erotic aspect.[8] According to the KuKh,[9] she laid aside her black colour and, presumably, also the red when she was practising austerities and celibacy in the Kadamba Cave on the Mountain of the Moon. She was then white, the colour of spiritual sattva. Empowered first by the transcendence of these two aspects, she then resumes them and emerges from the Liṅga in the Cave to spread the teachings and the liberating energy of the Command.

When the goddess appears from the Liṅga, the god tells her that he has suffered a loss in his own power due to her intense austerity. Even so, he is still powerful enough to bear her energy and for her to feel shame about her own presumption of excellence. Moreover, she is now penetrated (samāviṣṭā) by the bliss of the new, refreshed Command she has attained directly through her centuries of meditation in the Liṅga. And so it is she who now grants the god a boon.[10] The Command of the old transmission, which is that of the god, is weak

[1] Kramrisch 1981: 15.
[2] ṚV 2/33/8-9.
[3] TaiS 2/2/10/4; 3/5/5/2; 5/5/7/4; cf. MBh 13/146/1-2.
[4] TaiS 2/2/2/3.
[5] MBh 13/146/4,7.
[6] TaiS 5/5/9/3; cf. AV 7/87/1.
[7] See, for example, KuKh 5/73cd-74ab, 9/28 and 13/61cd-62.
[8] See Dyczkowski 2004: 175 ff. concerning the ambivalence of Kubjikā's erotic nature.
[9] KuKh 6/3-5.
[10] KMT 2/6-8. There is an irregularity in the numbering of the printed edited text here. The diction 'śrībhairava uvāca' has been counted as if it were a separate line of a verse. The same error occurs after KMT 2/11.

compared to this new Command of the goddess, but even so, it is still powerful enough to allow the god to receive the new one from her. So the god implores her:

"O Great Goddess! Be gracious! Give me the grace of the Command (ājñānugraha). O Mother Kujā, by your fierce austerity, I have suffered a loss (hāni). O goddess, I have (already) said this (to you before)."

When the Great Goddess heard this, overcome with shame (salajjā) and with a tearful look (she asked): "What have you achieved that I (should be made to feel so) embarrassed (lajjāpitā)?"[1]

Here the KuKh departs from the KMT. One could hazard to say that it is more consistent with the basic principle upon which the transmission is based. In its most excellent form, the transmission of the Command is sudden and direct. It is imparted in a moment by means of the highest, most sublime and powerful form of initiation, the vision of the goddess in which it is not only her that is seen but, above all, she who sees the neophyte who, like the god himself, is ready to receive it. Thus as soon as she emerges from the Liṅga, instead of imploring her for instruction, the god exclaims that he is experiencing the signs that he is undergoing the initiation the goddess imparts by her powerful and gracious gaze:

> (The goddess said). "When I saw you who are Bhairava's bliss, I became bent over with bashfulness (lajjāsaṁkucitā); thus I became Vakrikā (the Little Crooked One) adorned with the rays of (my) eight limbs. I then became Vakrā (the Crooked One), (endowed with) a divine body and very strong. You were pierced merely by being seen (by me). It is I who have brought about this reality (tathya)".
>
> (The god replied) "I have been pierced by you who are power (śakti). I am in distress because of (your) gaze. Deprived of consciousness by sleep and inebriation (ghūrmi), I have not seen your body. Stolen away by another mind, I neither see nor hear (anything). Then, O goddess, I was pierced by you with (your) gaze."[2]

The god is looking for the goddess impelled solely by the desire to develop spiritually. He does not just want to unite with her, although this will ultimately take place to serve both as the sign and means of his spiritual fulfilment, according to the version in the KuKh, and hers according to the KMT. Previously, when the goddess was Kālikā and was presented to Bhairava as his future spouse she was, as young women are in such circumstances, shy and bashful. But once she has sincerely served the god for a time he realises that she is truly devoted to him and offers to give her whatever she desires. At that point, seeing that he is sincere and really loves her, she became 'free of shame and enthusiastic'.[1] Now, conversely, the goddess feels shame because the god's spiritual power is clear evidence of his spiritual purity and right intention. One is reminded of the great Kashmiri saint Lal Ded. She was so pure that no lustful thoughts ever came to her mind and so would walk naked in the streets without shame, until one day she met another great saint. Jayalal Kaul quotes the Asrār-ul Abrār that records the incident as follows:

---

[1] KMT 2/9-11ab.
[2] KuKh 5/31-34.

She was sitting nude at a wayside. People passed that way but she continued sitting nude and did not heed them at all till one of them came near her. When he came near, she at once veiled herself with herself and covered her limbs by pressing her knees against her abdomen. When he saw this, he accosted her: "O, you who are mad (sic) in love with God, what's this? You sat nude while a large crowd passed by, unmindful of them and unabashed as if none of them were a living human being. But now I came and you hastened to draw in your limbs." She said to him: "For all those who passed by me why should I, a mad one with matted hair, unkempt and dust-laden, care for them? Now you came, 'a man', and saw me nude. I felt it obligatory to cover my limbs out of modesty".[2]

The bashfulness the goddess feels is like that of a woman who sees a man she secretly loves very much. She looks at him and he bears it – that is, he looks back into her eyes. She feels ashamed, as the goddess says, because she has pierced him with her gaze and brought about the reality that is their love. Thus she fulfils the wish Bhairava had expressed before when she was in the Liṅga and said: "And so look upon me with love so that I may be graced."[3] She is ashamed because she wantonly looked at Bhairava with passion. Bhairava is smitten with love for her and she feels shame because it is unseemly for the woman to make a man fall in love with her. Moreover, it seems from what Bhairava implies in the KuKh that she appears out of the Liṅga naked. But Bhairava protests that he is so overwhelmed by her (alluring) look that he fell into a swoon and so did not see her body. Much of this is also implied in the version in the KMT although it is stated less overtly there than in the KuKh. This is, however, fairly clear in the ŚM where we read:

---

[1] KMT 1/31b, quoted above, p. 4.
[2] Jayalal Kaul 1973: 21-22.
[3] KuKh 5/14.

> The goddess who had (just) emerged from the Liṅga and heard the gods words, assumed a sweet (loving) (mādhurya) form (mūrti) and was bent over (kubjikā) with shyness (lajjā). Then she thought (to herself): "How is it that the teacher and lord of the gods, demons and the three worlds desires grace (from me)?" Then Śivā spoke (to Bhairava).[1]

Bhairava's gaze is no less powerful than that of the goddess and his responses are strangely analogous. In the second myth narrated in the KMT, the gods conspire to get Bhairava married to the goddess. When she is presented to him and he sees her, his sexually aroused state causes him to feel shame. Disturbed, he looks around to see Kāmadeva, the god of love, whom he burns to ashes with the fury of his gaze.[2] In this case, when the goddess bursts out of the Liṅga, she is also fierce, angered by the arousal she feels. When she sees the god, she feels shame because of her own arousal. But although Bhairava is, like the god of love, passion itself (rati),[3] despite his momentary weakness he is powerful enough, to bear the goddess's gaze. Although he is violently shaken by it and even falls unconscious, he is not burnt to ashes like Kāmadeva. Instead he receives initiation by means of the intense power of the goddess's gaze because, as we read in the KuKh:

> Whosoever she looks at also goes to the supreme abode and, once the supreme has been reached, O god, he then certainly attains accomplishment.[4]

Called the Gaze of the Lion (siṁhāvalokana) in the later Kubjikā Tantras, it is the most intense form of the Command (tīvrājñā) and the radiant energy (tejas) of the Siddhas. Transmitted by the deity through the teacher, it gathers together the energies of the one to whom it is directed. It removes the impurities that break up the unity of the energies and so brings about a condition of oneness (sāmarasya) through which the Transmission (krama) is imparted.[5] The Gaze of the Lion serves in the same way to purify outer reality as well. The goddess's gaze sanctifies and empowers not only deities and living beings; places are also

---

[1] iti liṅgodbhavā devī śrutvā devasya bhāṣitam [g: bhāṣataḥ] ||
bibhrāṇā [g: vibhrāśā] mūrtimādhuryaṁ [kh g: -ryya] lajjayā kubjikābhavat |
surāsuragurusvāmī [kh g: -svāmi] trayāṇāṁ jagatām api ||
icchaty anugrahaṁ kasmād iti dhyātvāvadac chivā [g: -vadastivā] | ŚM 2/135cd-137ab.
[2] See KMT 3/14cd-20. Quoted below on p. 66.
[3] See KuKh 6/82-83.
[4] KuKh 7/37cd-38ab.
[5] KuKh 38/22.

transformed into sacred sites by her looking at them in this way.[1] Her gaze purifies amulets and the scriptures.[2] For the same reason, no doubt, the goddess views the maṇḍala with the fierce and powerful gaze of a lion.[3] Empowered by the goddess, the initiate can transmit this same purifying energy. He shares in the deity's power, which he can use to initiate others and successfully complete the rituals and yogic practice he undertakes. Gazing in the ten directions he purifies them, creating the sacred space within which they can be performed. Protected in this sacred space from outer, negative forces he performs magical acts and attains magical power (siddhi).[4]

The adept who has achieved perfection in the recitation of mantra gains the power to induce trance in others by his gaze.[5] The First Siddha, a Māyic form of the god, was such a man that whatever and whoever he gazed at reached the supreme plane of existence.[6] Sinners attained perfection (siddhi) just by seeing him, touching him or speaking with him.[7] Similarly, the well-tested disciple receives initiation from the teacher by his powerful and compassionate gaze.[8] Like Bhairava in this passage, the disciple's body shakes and he experiences the pervasive presence of the deity.[9] In this way the disciple is purified by the penetration (āveśa) of the deity and its power.

Monier-Williams suggests the following meanings for the word āveśa-: 'entering, entrance, taking possession of, absorption of the faculties in one wish or idea, intentness, devotedness to an object, demonical frenzy, possession, anger, wrath, pride, arrogance, indistinctness of idea, apoplectic or epileptic giddiness'. We can see from the range of meanings that the dominant notions associated with this word are strong emotive states, mental aberration and concentration combined with 'entering into', 'penetration' and, by extension, 'possession'. The last of these meanings in English generally carries with it negative connotations. 'Possession' in English normally means the entry into people of demonic beings who lay hold, control and derange them. But possession may also be a good thing if positive spiritual forces possess the person. Quakers, for example, value possession as the 'spirit of prophecy', and the signs of this form of possession are outwardly similar to that due to demonic beings. The most noticeable and common sign is a bodily tremor or even violent shaking – hence the name 'Quaker' for the members of this

---

[1] KMT 2/117 = KuKh 6/219cd-220ab.
[2] KuKh 5/52.
[3] KuKh 5/71.
[4] KuKh 39/158-159ab.
[5] KuKh 8/76.
[6] KuKh 30/199.
[7] KuKh 30/200cd-201ab.
[8] KuKh 32/64cd-66ab.
[9] KuKh 33/28.

Christian sect. Negative connotations are also associated with the word in Sanskrit, as we can see from the range of meanings supplied by Monier-Williams. Evil planetary influence may take possession of a person (this is called grahāveśa), ghosts (bhūtāveśa), demons (piśācāveśa) and a wide range of other malevolent beings. But, the existence of positive, desirable forms of possession or 'penetration' were acknowledged in India from Vedic times.[1] One name for a Vedic Brahmin was vipra, which literally means 'one who shakes',[2] because, like the Quakers, he too was penetrated and 'possessed' by positive spiritual powers which made his body shake.

Centuries later the Tantric traditions, especially those of the Bhairava Tantras and, subsequently, those of the Kaula Tantras, paid attention to the positive, spiritual dimensions of possession. At the lower, more elementary levels, possession by the goddess bestows magical and yogic powers. The KMT, for example, declares that a virgin girl who is possessed (āveśapūrvikā) by Kālikā, one of the attendants (dūtī) and aspects of the goddess, is capable of telling those who inquire from her everything about the past and future, what is auspicious and what is not.[3] Possession came to be seen as a basic manner of understanding the most elevated forms of religious experience, including even that of the ultimate, liberating realisation. This is how it appears in the exegetical and independent works of monistic Kashmiri Śaivites. Thus Abhinava defined it as follows:

> Penetration (āveśa) is (the emergence of one's own) supreme nature due to the submergence (of the lower) fettered (asvatantra) (subject) brought about by Śiva who precedes (all things) and is at one with (his own power).[4]

---

[1] Smith (1993: 4) explains: The verb ā-viś occurs frequently in the Ṛgveda in the sense of entry, though never in the ordinary sense, as a person through a door. Often it is used for Soma entering, or we might risk saying, possessing, a person (ṚV 1/91/11, 8/48/15, 9/8/7, 9/25/2, etc.), certainly indicating a ritual context. However, it also expresses the sense of a deity entering a house (10/85/43), an expression of personal intimacy (10/10/3, 10/85/29), of rivers entering the ocean (3/46/4, 6/36/3), of sickness entering a dwelling (6/74/2), of Agni entering the heaven and earth (3/3/4) or mortal (5/25/4), and finally, in a rather cryptic passage, of the protector of the universe entering into the speaker (1/164/21). The word occurs frequently in the Yajurveda texts, often with the meaning of divine powers entering the sacrifice or the sacrificer. (. . .) In the Vedas ā-viś has the sense of pervasion, immersion, and participation, a conceptual neighbour to possession (. . . .)

Here we note only the positive connotations although we also find, as we would expect, negative ones also.

[2] Cf. Gombrich 1988: 37.

[3] KMT 7/54.

[4] TĀ 1/173cd-174ab.

This sophisticated understanding of possession is hardly found in the sources to which the Kashmiri exegetes refer. These focus instead on a notion well known to the Kubjikā Tantras and more in consonance with the immediate meaning of the word. Thus, according to the MVT, which Abhinavagupta respects as his prime authority in this regard, possession is penetration by Śiva's energy. This energy is called there, as it is in the Śaivāgamas in general and the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras in particular, Rudraśakti. Penetrated by this spiritual energy, the adept is ultimately elevated to the liberated condition which is said to be in the MVT, as it is in the Kubjikā Tantras, the Śāmbhava state. Total and complete penetration may in very rare cases take place at once; otherwise it occurs in stages. The MVT, for example, refers to as many as fifty ascending levels of penetration of Rudra's energy.[1] Central to Kashmiri Śaiva soteriology, however, are three forms of penetration by this purifying energy. Although defined in the MVT, they do not appear anywhere else there. Even so Abhinavagupta elaborates them in his own extensive and profound way so as to include all forms of spiritual practice.

The energizing penetration by the deity into the initiate, which is accompanied by bodily tremors and other outer signs of possession,[2] is one of the cardinal features of all Kaula cults and their precursors, especially those of the Bhairava Tantras. The teacher looks for these outer signs in his disciple when he gives him initiation to check that this is taking place. Accompanying the outer signs is the inner, transformative experience that our text defines as 'the arising of the bliss of consciousness'.[3] From this perspective, āveśa is both the means and the goal of initiation and, ultimately, of all spiritual discipline. Accordingly, the KMT describes a series of six *āveśa*s that are set in relation to the Sixfold Path of the cosmic order projected into the body along which the individual soul travels to liberation.[4] They mark its progressive rise through the principles of existence up to the Transmental attained through Śāmbhavāveśa, the sixth one.[5] In the course of the initiation that renders him fit to worship the deity,[6] the adept is purified of his sins and spiritual impurities by this penetration.[7] It is brought about by the goddess herself who is the Transmental (unmanā),[8] that is, by her Command[9] of

---

[1] This is explained in TĀ 1/186cd-196.
[2] KuKh 36/32.
[3] KuKh 26/17.
[4] See note 57 to KuKh 2/29-30ab.
[5] KMT 10/76-80.
[6] KuKh 13/140ab.
[7] KuKh 13/100-101ab, 130.
[8] KuKh 7/41cd-42ab.
[9] KuKh 18/97.

which it is a sign.[1] And so although the goddess is benign (aghorā), she appears to be fierce (ghorā),[2] because of the awesome power of the infusion of energy that her devotee experiences in this way.

The devotee may receive this grace in a number of ways. It may come by just recalling the western path (paścimamārga), that is, the Triangle that is the abode of all the Siddhas.[3] He receives the same grace by reciting the Mālinīstava in the goddess's honour.[4] A particularly intense form of penetration takes place when he hears the scripture.[5] The goddess penetrates the body by the repetition of mantras[6] and seed-syllables.[7] The KMT, for example, says of the mantra that lines the sides of the triangle – the Twelve Verses – that 'its utterance (uccāra) and the penetration (āveśa) (that accompanies it) occur at each place (within the body)'.[8] It also happens by depositing the parts of the goddess's Vidyā,[9] Mālinī,[10] the Aggregate of Letters,[11] and the Siddhas of the three lineages[12] onto the body. The penetration of the Command is particularly intense if the Vidyā of the goddess is recited while controling the movement of the breath.[13] In these and other ways the adept who experiences the penetrating possession of the Vidyā, the divine sonic form of the goddess, acquires all the benefits, both worldly and spiritual, that she bestows.[14] Indeed, penetrated by the Command, the yogi performs prodigious feats.[15]

Like the practice of mantra, Yoga also brings this about.[16] Thus meditation on the Wheels (cakra) in the body is also said to induce it.[17] The yogi, immersed in contemplation (samādhi), looking up into the infinite expanse of the transcendent (parākāśa), experiences the penetration that is marked by the expansion of the bliss of consciousness and realises that that is his own essential nature.[18] Exhaling, he leads the energy of Kuṇḍalinī upwards and, recalling the

---

[1] KuKh 13/105-106ab.
[2] KuKh 10/51.
[3] KuKh 4/12cd-13.
[4] KuKh 4/43-44ab.
[5] KuKh 30/116.
[6] KuKh 48/55.
[7] KuKh 8/98, 103, 54/10.
[8] KMT 18/53ab uccāraṁ tasya cāveśaṁ sthāne sthāne pravartate |
[9] KuKh 11/37.
[10] KuKh 18/97.
[11] KuKh 19/72.
[12] KuKh 24/101.
[13] KuKh 11/61-64ab.
[14] KuKh 12/5-6 ff..
[15] KuKh 22/16.
[16] KuKh 13/66-67.
[17] See, for example, KuKh 36/31ff. (for Ādhāracakra) and 36/71 (for Anāhatacakra).
[18] KuKh 26/17-18.

Divine Triangle, which is the goddess's face at the apex of Kuṇḍalinī's ascent, he penetrates into her and she into him.[1] Penetration into the centre of the triangle above the head, which is the final resting place and ultimate seat of OṀ, brings about immediate possession because this is where the Command abides in its purist form.[2]

The KMT goes on to report the dialogue that takes place between the goddess who has just emerged from the Liṅga and the god who now tries to persuade her again to give him the teaching. This too is a cause of her embarrassment.[3] The god responds, consoling her:

"First I told you (what is) in the field of the Rule of the Command and (then I told you that, as) my equal, once you have graced (the world, you should) then be the mother of the host (gaṇa). To whom does this lineage of Siddhas belong that has come through the transmission from teacher to disciple (pāramparyakramāgata)? (In reality it belongs to both of us because) from me it (went) again to you and from you once more to me."[4]

If the god taught the goddess in the past, it was not because he was superior to her but because it was his turn to teach. Now he pleads with her for the teachings, trying to persuade her to impart them by making her understand this. In this situation of humble give and take, not only does the god not present himself to the goddess as the better partner, but she also keeps trying, especially in the KuKh, but also to some degree in the KMT and the ŚM, to make him understand that he is the deity.[5] Of course, neither the god nor the goddess can be less than perfect and pure in every way. Even so, for the sake of instruction and so that the original transmission of the Command between them may take place and initiate the transmission down through the lineages of teachers, the divine disciple must play the part of one who is short of realisation. Bhairava's initial transmission of the Command to the goddess was said to have removed her impurity, even though, of course, she cannot really be ever impure. The KuKh is more subtle. There the god who presents himself to the goddess is said to 'wear the garment of Māyā'.[6] The goddess repeatedly tries to remind him that this Māyā is just his ignorance of his true nature – not a real impurity. She tries at first to make him realise that he is perfect just as he is and so does not really need her to receive the enlightening Command. But this fails. Words of wisdom are not enough, even for

[1] KuKh 34/74cd-76.
[2] KuKh 3/53.
[3] KMT 2/11cd-19.
[4] KMT 2/11cd-13; cf. KMT 1/47 and 2/17-18 quoted above and below, respectively.
[5] For example, KuKh 3/65cd-68.
[6] KuKh 3/25-28.

a god. To set an example and to open a way for his mortal counterparts, he must receive the Command from the goddess to achieve the realisation of his supreme status and authority (adhikāra). The narrative continues:

Once she had thus heard what Bhairava had said, the goddess averted her face from him and, overcome with shame, immediately and with force (rabhasā) she became manifest in a hunchbacked form (kubjikārūpā). (The god then asked her): "O goddess, why do you feel shame? I gave you the Command before. Now quickly give it to me. Do not doubt! Do not delay!"

The venerable Kubjikā said: "If that has happened (with such) force, it is due to the foolishness of ignorance. Or is it because of (your) intention to force (me to do it) (nigrahabuddhi)? O Kujeśvara, (is this) proper?"

The venerable Bhairava said: "O goddess! You who grace everybody! Why do you not understand (this) within yourself? There is nothing devoid of me. Nor is there (anything) anywhere devoid of you because (our divine) attributes are mutually conjoined as cause and effect. O mistress of the gods, you are my teacher and I am certainly yours. This Command belongs to the Rudras, Bhairavas and Heroes and not to (just) anyone. If you do not consider (me) to be (your) disciple then give (me the Command) because (of our) friendship."[1]

In the ŚM, Bhairava says:

> "O goddess, you are the mother of the universe. I am the god, the father of the universe. Nothing is devoid of you or I in the triple universe. The (most) intense Command on this path of the lineage of Siddhas is now within you. O goddess, by virtue of (your) intense austerity, you have taken my Command away from me. O goddess, in order that you may grace the world in every age I give you the Command and, pleased (by this,) give it to me (also) in this (age). This, the Command of the Heroes, Bhairavas and Rudras has not been revealed. (But even so) O Pārvatī, it can easily be obtained from my mouth and yours. Be gracious and compassionate. Give (me) the Command (as you have done) before. I will (then) give it (to you) again. Do not feel shame; be (my) teacher."[2]

---

[1] KMT 2/14-19.

[2] devi tvaṁ viśvamātāsi [kh: vīra-] devo 'haṁ [g: devāhaṁ] jagataḥ pitā ||
na tvayā rahitaṁ kiñcin [kh: kiñcit] na mayāpi jagattraye [kh g: jagatrayaṁ] |
siddhasantānamārge 'smin ājñā tīvrādhunā tvayi ||
tīvreṇa tapasā devi [g: devī] mamājñāpahṛtā [kh: mayā-; g: -jñāya-] tvayā |

Rudras, Bhairavas and Heroes are three interchangeable names for the male beings who preside over the phonemic energies of the letters. The Command belongs to them in the sense that they are the custodians of these energies that collectively are aspects of the Command.[1] Bhairava says that it is his Command, and it is by means of Bhairava's 'unlimited energy (tejas)' that the goddess bursts out of the Liṅga.[2] Even so, the Command is the essential nature of the goddess who contains the energies of the phonemes. So the god is saying to her that she should not be reticent. Even if she does impart the Command to him, it is nonetheless always his Command and so he does not lose his fundamental status as a teacher. It is merely renewed in accord with the natural course of the transmission.

In the KuKh, the god refers to the reciprocal relationship between himself and the goddess as both teacher and taught before the goddess emerges from the Liṅga. He does this in order to encourage her to come out of it to impart the consecration and teach him.[3] He tries to convince her that if she does not consider him to be her disciple, then she should think of him as a friend and give him the Command.[4] He seeks the oneness of the passionate friendship of Śiva and Śakti.[5] Both the means and the goal of knowledge, it is hard to know the power that is the best of friends.[6] Even so, the goddess promises that all this will take place. And when it does the god gratefully acknowledges that everything was revealed to him by virtue of the goddess's compassionate friendship towards him.[7] For her part, the goddess always addresses the god as her friend, never as her husband, disciple or son, even though she is frequently said to be his mother.[8]

In the version in the KMT, Bhairava again reminds the goddess of this reciprocal relationship after she emerges from the Liṅga because she is embarrassed, as women are, both by the awareness that union will follow, and

---

kalpe kalpe tvayā devi [g: devī] lokānugrahakāraṇāt ||
tubhyam ājñāṁ [kh, g: -jñā] dadāmy [kh: dadāny] asmin tvaṁ prasannā dadāsi me |
vīrabhairavarudrāṇām ājñaiṣā [g: ājñayā] na prakāśitā [kh: -sitā] ||
sulābheyaṁ tvadvaktrānte [kh: tvadvaktrāṇāṁ] madvaktrānte [kh: -vaktrāṇāṁ] ca pārvati |
prasīda kuru kāruṇyaṁ ājñāṁ [g: ājñā] dehi yathā purā [g: purāḥ] ||
punar eva tu [kh, g: asmi] dāsyāmi mā lajjasva [kh: lajjāsva; g: laṁjāsva] gurur [kh: guruṁr] bhava | ŚM 2/130cd-135ab.

[1] KuKh 6/21.
[2] ŚM 2/124cd-127ab quoted above, p. 38.
[3] See KuKh 3/22-24 and 5/8-14.
[4] KuKh 3/21 and 4/50cd-51ab.
[5] KuKh 38/13.
[6] KuKh 3/21.
[7] KuKh 69/1-2ab; cf. ibid. 4/50cd-51ab, 5/37, 44.
[8] See, for example, KuKh 4/3, 5/13 and 26/79.

also because she must be the god's teacher for him to receive the consecration from her. In the KuKh the god points these things out to the goddess while she is still in the Liṅga presumably because once she has emerged from it, she is bound to initiate the god and impart the teaching if he passes the necessary test, as he is certain to do. In the KMT this is essentially a trial of the god's capacity to bear the intense energy of the Command, as every aspiring initiate must. In the KuKh another dimension is added to this test. The goddess insists that the god should be free of lust for her. The KMT makes no reference to this possible impediment to a pure and true union. In the KuKh, on the other hand, the goddess repeatedly accuses the god of approaching her not for the Command but rather for base sex. Moreover, she accuses him of intentionally being a temptation for her.[1] Of course, the god strongly denies that this is his intention.[2] He sincerely declares that all he desires is knowledge[3] and the Tantra also says that he comes 'desiring grace'.[4] The god protests several times that he desires knowledge from the goddess, not sex.[5] This is one of the reasons he repeatedly addresses her as 'mother'[6] and even as 'grandmother'.[7] He carefully distinguishes between the sexual relationship they have had as husband and wife and the one in which he is the disciple and she the mother of the world and the god.[8] Even so the goddess repeatedly accuses him of being lustful.[9] She does, however, accept that he feels affection towards her, just as she feels towards him. Affection and friendship,[10] not lust, is what there is between them.[11] The god repeatedly expresses his devotion towards the goddess but rather than accept him as her devotee or disciple, she is moved to impart the teachings to him out of the love and affection she feels for him.[12] At first, however, this very affection is an impediment. The intimate affection she feels for him does not allow her to assume the higher status of a teacher in relation to him.[13] But in order to achieve any spiritual goal it is essential, even for the deity, to have a teacher. This means that he must become the goddess's disciple and, humbly attentive,[14] be her servant.[1] But the goddess does not want the god to

[1] KuKh 3/67cd-68.
[2] KuKh 4/3.
[3] KuKh 3/22-24.
[4] KuKh 3/165cd-167.
[5] KuKh 4/2-3.
[6] KuKh 3/64cd-65ab, 4/2 and 5/12.
[7] KuKh 3/20.
[8] KuKh 5/8-11ab, cf. 4/2.
[9] KuKh 3/67cd-68.
[10] KuKh 4/49.
[11] KuKh 3/23.
[12] Ibid.
[13] KuKh 5/2.
[14] KuKh 4/4.

humiliate himself in this way. She accepts him as a disciple not as her servant, but as a friend. In this way she can establish a relationship with him that is one between equals and is free of gender distinctions.[2] Finally, after she has empowered the god, the goddess instates him as her master (svāmin), freely returning the status she previously received from him.[3]

But, although the purity of their relationship is repeatedly emphasised by both parties, the god does finally ask the goddess to 'play' with him.[4] They must unite because this is the way the Command is transmitted. So the problem here is not what is done but the intent that is behind it. The god protests sincerely that he does not want mere sex. Indeed, in the Ṭīkā we are told that the god says that his power had been lost out of his foolish desire for sex.[5] Now his attitude is different. He has true devotion for the goddess and his sole intention is to regain the power he has lost. He can achieve this only through insight into his true nature, which can take place only by receiving the goddess's Command. This is what he truly wants. He understands clearly, as he himself says, that what one gains dishonestly is of no use. If he tries to cheat the goddess and unite with her under false pretences, it will be of no benefit to him. Moreover, he will have transgressed against the purity that is the basic nature of the Command and must be of the one who receives it. The goddess reminds the god that 'if the disciple possesses devotion and the teacher knowledge and both possess (an illumined) consciousness, then (a true) initiation takes place. Otherwise it is a deceitful one'.[6] The goddess does not want to unite with the god to gratify his passion. The purpose of the union is a spiritual one. It is the means by which the teachings are transmitted and with them the ultimate experience of liberating bliss. Their union could fulfil no other purpose. The god can create and destroy the entire universe. He can do everything alone without the goddess, except receive the liberating seed of the Command. This he freely admits in the concluding chapter of our text where he says:

> O Mistress of the gods, according to this teaching you are my teacher. Neither Rudra, Bhairava, the Heroes or anyone (else) possess the Command. (All this has been) revealed (to me) by virtue of your compassionate friendship towards me.[7]

---

[1] KuKh 5/3, 5/37.
[2] KuKh 4/50cd-51ab, 5/37, 4/4.
[3] KuKh 4/51. cf. note to ibid. 4/38.
[4] KuKh 4/26cd-28ab.
[5] Ṭ MS K fl. 67a.
[6] KuKh 5/7.
[7] KuKh 69/1-2ab.

Then we are told that the god was 'permitted to marry' the goddess and he, in the form of Śrīkaṇṭha, received the Transmission (krama) from her. So everything is set straight. It is not the god who condescends to marry the goddess, as it appeared in the beginning when they first met in her father's home. Ultimately, in fact, it is she who permits him to marry her. As we shall see in chapter six of our text, the goddess does unite with Bhairava who comes to her in each of the sacred seats. This does not take place for the god's or the goddess's pleasure, although this pleasure – ānanda – is essential for the union to be fruitful. The union is essential to generate the lineages that propagate the transmission. Thus, in this perspective, there is no conflict between desire for spiritual knowledge and union with the goddess. The god hints at this process.[1] When they are united as husband and wife they are pure disembodied beings. But when they separate after their union they assume corporeal form. The god says that this is not wrong because it is essential for the creation of the world and accounts for why it is full of passion.[2]

Once (Bhairava) had spoken thus, then the goddess (said): "All this will come to pass! O god, this, the final (teaching) (paścimedam) has (already) been created and it is free of the earlier portion (of the teaching) (pūrvabhāga).[3]

The 'previous tradition' (pūrvasantāna) is that of the Siddhas. This new and final teaching is also transmitted through lineages of Siddhas. Thus it is, like the previous one, a Path of the Siddhas (siddhamārga). The 'earlier portion' is the previous Kaula tradition established by Matsyendranātha. The god revealed this, the 'tradition of the Siddhas' (siddhasantāna) previously to the goddess. Now the goddess assures the god that she has already generated the new, subsequent (paścima) and final (paścima) transmission. The goddess's teaching is Kaula but even so is independent of Matsyendra's Kaula tradition. In fact the 'previous tradition' is variously represented and incorporated into the Kubjikā Tantras and Matsyendranātha is credited, as he is in other contemporary Kaula traditions such as the Kālīkula and the Kashmiri Trikakula, with being the Siddha who originally revealed the Kula modality of Tantrism. Nonetheless, the Kubjikā tradition is concerned to establish itself as a truly independent Kaula school, which is a quite legitimate claim.

Once all this has taken place, the goddess reassures the god that he should not worry because the teaching already exists, although it is not yet manifest in the world. In this version the goddess only promises that she will transmit the

---

[1] See KuKh 5/8-11ab.
[2] See KuKh 3/20-24, 4/1-12ab, 4/16cd-31ab, 47cd-51, 5/1-14, 37, 44.
[3] KMT 2/20.

Command the god desires so much to receive. There is no explicit reference to her actually transmitting it to him. The version in the KuKh, as we have seen, differs in this respect. It even goes into some detail concerning the nature and manner the Command is transmitted on that occasion. The ŚM makes up for the omission by adding details to the mythical narrative instead. There we read:

> The venerable Kubjikā said: "Whom should I also praise here? (Tell me) you are my authority. Does not he who is the teacher of (all) teachers save me (also)?" Then once the god had heard Pārvatī's words with regards to the activity of the Siddha Path he replied to the goddess, the beloved of (his) heart.
>
> Bhairava said: "O goddess, do not disdain (my) distress (viplava). Bestow upon me the Command of grace (prasādājñā). If you do not consider (that you possess the) status of a teacher (in my regards then at least) do your own (work) out of friendship." When the (goddess) had understood the veneration (sadbhāva) the God of the gods had (for her), as it was in reality, the mistress of the gods smiled and said: "Be it so, how (could it be) otherwise?"
>
> The venerable goddess said: "O sinless one, I will give you the Command on the very beautiful Island of the Moon. On this path (traced by) the lineage of Siddhas, you will be Mitranātha. I do not wish to leave the divine plane of the Island of the Moon, (but I will do so as) I am your beloved of the path of the Western Tradition. I received this Rule (samaya) previously by your permission (anujñā) and I will guard it and go to mount Kaumāra".
>
> When the Great Goddess had given to the God of gods the Command, she who is the mother was recollected in this way (by the god) within the Wheel in order to come from the Wheel of the Skyfaring Goddesses (khecarīcakra)[1] and the Island of the Moon. Then the goddess, setting out on the path with the aforementioned body, (assumed) a mild (komala) form and, having become propitious towards Śambhu, her mind was pierced with the flood of the nectar of the Command.[2]

---

[1] See below, p. 86.

[2] prastavyaḥ ko [k: -vyā kā; kh, g: praṣṭavyā kā] mayāpy atra pramāṇaṁ me bhavān iti ||
sa pratārayate kiṁ māṁ gurūṇām api yo guruḥ [g: guru] |
śrutvā [g: stutvā] vākyāni [g: vākyāṇi] pārvatyāḥ siddhamārgakriyāṁ prati || pratyuvāca tadā devo [kh g: devaṁ] devīṁ [kh, g: devī] hṛdayavallabhām [g: -vallabhā] |
śrībhairava uvāca
māvajña [k, kh, g: māvajñā] viplavaṁ devi prasādājñāṁ prayaccha mām ||
manyase na gurutvaṁ hi mitratvena nijaṁ kuru | (cf. KMT 2/19cd)

The frame of the narrative of the KMT is loosely maintained in the KuKh by incorporating the concluding verses of the second chapter of the KMT, which refer to the hierogamy that can take place once the god has been empowered by the goddess and she has completed her tour.[1] If the god did not receive the Command when the goddess emerged from the Liṅga one can presume that she transmitted it to him on that occasion. All the KMT says about this is that after her tour, the goddess 'having fashioned the Command again gave it to the great lord of Oḍra'. This rather half-hearted reference is incongruous as the KMT continues in the following chapter to describe how the two got married. Moreover, it may be read another way to mean that once the god had been made the 'great lord of Oḍra' he gave the Command again to the goddess.[2] Then, once the goddess awakened the Command, first by the tour and then by uniting with the god, she 'returned there in accord with her previous form (pūrvarūpānuyāyinī)'.[3] But this was her condition as the young virgin Kālikā betrothed to Bhairava!

So once union through which this transmission takes place is over, the whole series of events is repeated again in a perpetual cycle.[4] Reading the text in this way, the incongruity is reinforced. There is no getting away from the fact that, apart from this ambiguous reference, no mention is made of the transference of sadbhāvaṁ devadevasya vijñāya paramārthataḥ ||

---

vihasyovāca deveśī [g: deveśi] evam astu [g: paramastu] kim anyathā | śrīdevy uvāca
candradvīpe [g: -dvīpa] mahāramye [g: -ramyaṁ] ājñāṁ dāsyāmi te 'nagha [kh: naghe] ||
siddhasantānamārge 'smin mitranātho bhaviṣyasi | candradvīpapadaṁ [g: -pada] divyaṁ [kh: dvipaṁ; g: dvipyaṁ] na me tyaktuṁ manotsahaḥ [kh g: – he] || paścimāmnāyamārgasya bhavāmi bhavataḥ [kh: bhavata] priyā [g: priye] |
pūrve [kh: pūrvvaṁ] yaḥ samayo [kh: samayā] deva gṛhītas tvadanujñayā [kh: gṛhitas-] ||
tam ahaṁ pālayiṣyāmi yāmi kaumāraparvatam |
datvājñāṁ [kh: tvadājñāṁ] devadevasya candradvīpād [g: -dvīpān] maheśvarī ||
*āgantuṁ [kh g: āgaṁtu] khecarīcakrāt [kh: -cakrāṭ] smṛtā [kh: smṛtvā] cakre [kh: ca ] tathāmbikā |
mārgaprayāṇe [g: -pramāṇe] kathitāṅgayoge [kh: kathinā- yogye; g: kathinā- -yoge] devī tataḥ komalavigrahā sā [g: -sāḥ] ||
kṛtaprapannā [g: kṛtaḥ-] prababhūva [g: pravabhūya] śaṁbhor ājñāmṛtasyandamanāptavedhā [kh: – manāptaravedā; g: -spandamanāndhedā] | ŚM 2/137cd-146ab.

[1] KMT 2/121 = KuKh 6/223cd-224ab.

[2] śrīmadoḍramaheśānaṁ kṛtvā cājñāṁ punar dadet KMT 2/121cd. As masculine proper names are commonly treated as neuter, the 'great lord of Oḍra' may be the subject not the object. The meaning then would be that he gave the Command to the goddess. A variant in the second half of this line in the KuKh (6/224) eliminates this possible ambiguity, at least as far as the KuKh is concerned. This reads: cājñāṁ dadet tu sā – i.e. and she gave (him) the Command. See below, chapter 3, p. 572.

[3] KMT 2/120.

[4] See note to KuKh 6/224cd-225ab.

the Command in the KMT even though the god supplicates the goddess insistently that she give it to him. Moreover, the goddess in the KMT says that upon receiving the Command, Bhairava should propagate the teachings:

O god, I do not wish to leave the beautiful Island of the Moon. You should thus attend (to this), the last (paścima) of all the paths. Give it to all the Siddhas.[1]

Nonetheless, in the following chapter of the KMT the two get married as if nothing had happened in the previous one. Indeed, both the god and goddess are so totally oblivious of what has happened in the previous chapter that the god asks her who she is. Anyway, once they get married and the couple have had sex for a long time, the goddess asks the god to stop because she is tired. The god says he is pleased with the goddess and says he is ready to give her whatever she wants and begins to instruct her. Significantly, the very first thing he tells her concerns the nature of a true teacher. Every teacher is a manifestation of himself – each one is a drop of his vital seed (vīrya), that is, the Command. But he hastens to add that although it comes from him it is the Command of the supreme goddess. So once he has again established that he is the teacher, he assumes the role of the main speaker for the rest of the KMT, although the goddess does also teach in some places.[2] The situation in the explanatory Tantras, the ŚM and ṢSS, is the same – the speaker and teacher is Bhairava. There it is his role to explain and teach the KMT, which the goddess declares herself incapable of doing in the ŚM at the beginning of which she says:

> Very sacred, (the Śrīmata which is) the essence of the Tantras has been uttered by you in divine speech. I am not very intelligent, O lord; I cannot understand or utter (it). O god, this Śrīmata, the Matottara, has been hidden by you.[3]

Clearly, the god is the teacher in the ŚM rather than the goddess and so the problems that arise when the goddess is the teacher are not pertinent. The situation in the ṢSS is the same. It is the god who teaches and explains the meaning of the KMT to the goddess. Accordingly, there is hardly more than one allusion there to their conversation concerning who should be the teacher.[4] Actually, the problem is

---

[1] KMT 2/21-22ab.

[2] The goddess is the sole speaker in chapter seven and the teacher in chapters eleven to thirteen of the KMT.

[3] tantrasāraṁ mahādivyaṁ divyabhāṣoditaṁ [g: bhāṣeditaṁ] tvayā ||
alpaprajñā tv ahaṁ nātha jñātuṁ vaktuṁ na śakyate |
gopitaṁ [g: gopita] tu tvayā deva śrīmatedaṁ matottaram [kh: matottamaṁ] || ŚM 1/64cd-65.

[4] Formerly when the god and the goddess where conversing with one another, a decision was reached in the course of the dialogue concerning the relationship between teacher and disciple.

not resolved because in the KMT this exchange takes place well before the goddess enters the Liṅga, whereas in the ṢSS it follows the tour. Even so, the ṢSS leaves the matter there, although much further ahead in the ṢSS the god repeats what he has said to the goddess in an isolated statement in the KMT:

> You (have told) me (this) and I (have told it) to you. I (have been instructed) by you and you by me (in turn) again. O fair-hipped one, it has been told to you and from you it bestows liberation to others.[1] But even so, the god says: This (teaching) which is hard to attain arises for (the one) amongst men who is up to (his) last birth and has worshipped me with devotion for thousands of years.[2]

The ŚM chooses instead to paraphrase a part of the dialogue in the KMT that takes place between the god and the goddess after she appears out of the Liṅga promising that she will give the god the Command on the Island of the Moon, and so he will become Mitranātha, the first teacher in the Age of Strife (kaliyuga).[3] For the rest of the ŚM the god is the teacher whom the goddess questions and from whom she receives the teachings. The situation in the MBT is as we would expect. There the goddess is the teacher. Consequently, the dialogue between the god and the goddess concerning her status as the teacher is longer and more complex in the KuKh than it is in the KMT. This matter is not taken up in the other sections (khaṇḍa) of the MBT. One gets the impression that the KuKh, aligning itself in this way with the KMT, attempts to present itself as the first and hence oldest section of the MBT, although it is certainly not. It is also an opportunity to narrate the myth again in bits and pieces in chapters three to six, supplementing and modifying it to prepare Bhairava's devotees to accept the eminence of the goddess. Although the excellence of the goddess is already clearly established in the KMT, there her status was not yet fully acknowledged. Although the KMT (which literally means 'the Tantra which is the teaching of the goddess Kubjikā) is the goddess's teaching, Bhairava is still the main speaker as in the preceding traditions. Here, in the MBT, the goddess comes completely into her own.

The (god) said at that time: "Go to the land of Bhārata in order to (establish your) authority in every way." ṢSS 4/2-3.

[1] tvayā mahyaṁ mayā tubhyaṁ tvayāhaṁ tvaṁ mayā punaḥ |
kathitaṁ tava suśroṇi tvatto hy anyeṣu [k: hy anteṣu KMT: tvatsaṅgānyeṣu] mokṣadam ||
ṢSS 19/103 = KMT 13/89cd-90ab.

[2] yena varṣasahasrāṇi bhaktyā cārādhito hy aham |
janmany apaścime puṁsāṁ prāpyatedaṁ sudurlabham || ṢSS 19/105 = KMT 13/90cd-91ab.

[3] ŚM 2/147cd-148ab; cf. KuKh 4/50cd-51ab, 5/37, 44.

In short, we can say that the contradictions and anomalies in the myth of the KMT, which are corrected in various ways by later versions, are due in part to the evolution of doctrine in the KMT accommodated by the addition of passages and adaptation of others in the course of the redaction of the text. It is also the consequence of an only partly successful attempt to integrate different narratives, a sign that the KMT was probably redacted in stages over a period of time and, perhaps, in more than one place. These narratives are as follows:

1) Bhairava's marriage to the goddess. There are two versions of this. The first is spread over the first two chapters and begins with Bhairava's acceptance of the goddess's hand, offered to him by Himavat. In this version the daughter of Himavat is referred to as Kālikā. The second version is found at the beginning of chapter three and is, essentially, a reworking of the well-known story of the marriage of Śiva and Pārvatī. In that version the goddess is never referred to as Kālī.
2) The goddess's tour that culminates in Bhairava's union with the goddess and so concludes the first version of their marriage.
3) The goddess's entry into the Liṅga on the Island of the Moon and her emergence as Kubjikā. If this long section[1] is removed we find that the preceding and succeeding parts of the first account fit neatly together. The first part ends with the god's disappearance after he has admonished the goddess to tour India beginning with mount Kumāra.[2] The second part begins with the goddess's journey to that mountain.[3]
4) The fourth narrative is woven into the third. It is the dialogue between the god and the goddess that serves to establish the goddess's authority and, according to the KMT, permits her to transmit the Command to the god who, thereby empowered, becomes the first Siddha to propagate the teachings. Thus, the

---

[1] KMT 1/56cd-2/22ab.
[2] KMT 1/56ab.
[3] KMT 2/22cd. This insertion may account for an inconsistency in the narrative we have noted above. The first line of the section relating to the goddess's entry into the Liṅga begins with the statement that she went to Śrīcandraparvata – the venerable Mountain of the Moon (ibid.1/56cd), although in the rest of the narrative it is the Island of the Moon (dvīpaṁ śrīcandradevikālayam ibid. 1/68ab, candradvīpaṁ manoramyaṁ ibid. 2/21ab). It is possible that in order to weld this insertion into the previous account the line that introduces it – anveṣaṇārthaṁ devasya gatā śrīcandraparvatam (she went to the venerable Mountain of the Moon in order to search for the god) – is a modified version of a line which originally read (. . .) gatā kaumāraparvatam (. . . she went to Mount Kaumara). This would make more sense. The god had told her to go to Mount Kaumāra, not to the Mountain / Island of the Moon. It makes sense that she should go there to look for him. The first line after the presumed insertion fits well with this hypothetical reading. There the goddess says: gacchāmy ahaṁ punas tatra bhārate kulaparvatam (I am going there again to the Kula mountain in India). This Kula mountain is, evidently, mount Kaumāra.

goddess's tour does not serve to propagate the teachings directly. Indeed, there is no explicit mention that it does. She must simply go to these places and transform them into her sacred sites. She does not remain there. Instead she appoints the local goddess there and her consort as guardians. No mention is made, as it is elsewhere, of the relation of these places to the propagation of the teachings, nor are the Siddhas there those that are commonly said in the Kubjikā Tantras to be the founders of the lineages through which the teachings are spread.

However, references to these developments are already found in the KMT and its most closely related Tantras. By the time we reach the MBT, the doctrines relating to the sacred seats and the propagation of the teachings from there reached their full development, as did another theme of the myth, namely, the goddess's relationship to the Liṅga, which the KMT and its explanatory Tantras hardly care to develop. Thus, according to the KuKh, the emergence of the goddess from the Liṅga is presented unambiguously as the occasion for the transmission of the Command. The KuKh may well be making explicit what was originally only implicitly intended. At any rate the matter is treated at length, as this central theme deserves to be. Moreover, according to the KuKh, the goddess herself is present in the sacred seats and Bhairava is the Siddha in each one who founds the goddess's lineage associated with that seat. Finally, when the two meet, they unite. Thus the marriage described in chapter three of the KMT is redundant and so is omitted altogether.

Bhairava marries the Goddess

The marriage of the goddess with the god[1] is, essentially, a brief adaptation of the well-known story of Śiva's marriage to Pārvatī. Ignoring all that has happened in the previous two chapters, in accord with the earlier model, ostensibly the reason for the marriage is the birth of their son Skanda who is destined to overcome a powerful demon, although the actual birth of Skanda and his fight with the demon is totally ignored. Goudriaan has also translated the following passage up to verse 33.[2] He introduces his translation with a brief overview of the classic narration of Śiva's wedding found in the Pārvatīkhaṇḍa of the Ś*ivapurāṇa*.[3] Note that in the common version of the myth, of which the account in the Śivapurāṇa is typical, the demon that threatens the earth that only Śiva's son can overcome, is Tāraka. The demon Krauñca appears in the Purāṇic

---

[1] The marriage is described in verse 1 to 40 of chapter three of the KMT, which is called the Union of Passion that Propagates the Division of (the Act of) Churning (manthānabhedapracārarati-saṅgamaḥ).
[2] Goudriaan 2001: 190-194.
[3] ŚPu 2/3/1-20.

version as Tāraka's general.[1] Moreover, he is born from the sweat of Śiva's brow, not that of the goddess[2] as happens in the version in the KMT which is as follows.

The venerable Kubjikā said: "O Bhairava, tell me how marriage with you takes place. O Great God! What is the reason (for it) (nimitta) and whose purpose (does it serve)?" The venerable Bhairava said: "O goddess! O fair lady! (Previously) you went to (your) father's temple (pitṛmandira) (in the Himalayas) and, in order to kill (the demon) Krauñca, we were worshipped (there) by the gods. I will tell you all about how that (demon) Krauñca came into being.

(When you were) travelling swiftly from place to place, (a drop of your) sweat fell somewhere. The demon called Krauñca, arrogant due to (his) strength, was born there. The entire host of gods who reside in the seven worlds, oppressed by that mighty one, went to the abode of Brahmā. O goddess, along with them Brahmā also went to see Viṣṇu. Together with Viṣṇu they considered: "what shall we who are (thus) oppressed by the mighty demon Krauñca do? O Lord, tell (us) the remedy for that." "O Lord of Garuḍa," (said Brahmā). "I have come in order to (find a way) to destroy (him)."

Hari then said: "Apart from the son of the god and the goddess, none shall be able to kill him. Therefore reflect on how his birth can take place and having done so (find out) where Kujeśvara resides". (Brahmā) the Grandfather (of the gods) said smiling: "(Lord Śiva) has abandoned the body of the goddess and so is the guardian (of the worlds). Now may whosoever is capable make offerings once the fire (of passion) has been aroused. Where is such a one (to be found who is willing to be) burnt by the fire (of the god's) wrath when the job is done? We have fallen due to (our) great pride. We gods are destroyed!" Perceived by Hari (to be troubled) in this way (although) generated by Brahmā, they all then said: "Now what is the remedy? The daughter of mount Himavat resides (there). She is single (ekā) and, well cultivated, is devoted to the (sacred) feet of the lord of the universe. And the lord of the universe (himself) is (also) there." Having said this to the Spring and Kāmadeva, these two who, endowed with (many fine) qualities, attracted the minds of the god and the goddess, were impelled by the gods (to do their job).[3]

[1] ŚPu 2/3/14 and 16.
[2] ŚPu 2/3/10.
[3] KMT 3/1-14ab.

The version in the ŚM reads:

> When the goddess had thus established her fame in the country called Bhārata she then exerted herself again to fashion the rest. The mistress of the gods moved quickly from sacred field to seat, from forest to forest. As she moved from place to place (her) sweat, born of (her) exertion, fell on the ground. From that a great and fierce demon (mahāsura) was born called Krauñca.
>
> The three worlds suffered due to that very violent (pratāpa) being. Then all the gods along with Indra having approached Brahmā asked him how Krauñca could be killed and (said): "O Lord, destroy (this) sin." Brahmā replied to those gods: "This great demon is hard to overcome. O Śrīkaṇṭha, O Vaikuṇṭha, neither am I able to restrain (him). I tell (you) the truth: Pārvatī will give birth to a son from Śiva (Bhava). She should kill this demon as he too is born from her."
>
> Now that the (right) time has come; Parvatī is close to Hara, out of love intent, on serving lord Śiva. Place both Kāmadeva and Spring there in the forest in such a way that union takes place (between the two) so as to restrain your enemy".[1]

---

[1] evaṁ kṛtvā nijāṁ [g: nijā] kīrtiṁ [g: kīrti] varṣe bhāratasaṁjñake [g: -kaṁ] |
udyamaṁ ca punaś cakre śeṣaṁ kartuṁ samudyatā [g: samutsukaṁ] ||
bhramaty āśu [k: āsuḥ; kh: prabhramatyāḥ; g: āśuḥ] sureśānyā [kh g: -nyāḥ] pīṭhaṁ kṣetrād [kh: pīṭhākṣetrād; g: pīṭhākṣetrā] vanād vanam |
prakramantyāḥ [g: prakramantyā] papātorvyāṁ [g: yapātovyāṁ] prasvedaḥ [kh: prasveda] śramasaṁbhavaḥ [kh g: -bhavaṁ] ||
tato jātaḥ pracaṇḍātmā krauñcanāma [kh: krauñcanāma; g: kroñcanāma] mahāsuraḥ [kh: -ra] |
tena tīvrapratāpena [kh g: -peṇa] pīḍitaṁ bhuvanatrayam ||
tato brahmāṇam āsādya [k, kh: brahmāsam ā-; g: brahmaṁsa-] sarve [kh: sarvva; g: sarvai] devāḥ [g: devā] savāsavāḥ |
papraccha [kh: papracchaḥ] krauñcanāśāya tataḥ [kh: tasyo] pāpaṁ hana prabho [kh: prabhāḥ; g: prabhā] ||
brahmā provāca tān [g: missing] devān [g: devānāṁ] durgharṣo 'yaṁ [kh: urddharṣoyaṁ] mahāsuraḥ [g: -rāḥ] |
na śrīkaṇṭho [kh: śrīkaṇṭhā; k g: srīkaṇṭhe] na vaikuṇṭho [k kh g: vaikuṇṭhe] nāhaṁ [g: na vai] śāktaś ca [g: śaktyāśca] nigrahe [g: vigrahe] ||
satyaṁ vacmi [kh: vedmi] bhavāt [kh: bhavān] putraṁ pārvatī [kh: pārvvatī; g: pārvatyā] janayiṣyati |
tayāsāv asuro [k: tasyā-; kh: tasyāsācāsuro; g: tasyā-] vadhyo [g: vatyo] yasmāt [g: yasmā] so 'pi [kh: sāṁpi; g: śobhi] tadudbhavaḥ [g: tadūṁbhavaḥ] ||
saṁprāpte [g: + śa] samaye tatra [k: teṣāṁ] pārvatī harasannidhau |
vartate sāṁprataṁ prītyā paricaryāparāyaṇā ||
tatra kāmo [g: kāmā] vasantaś ca ubhau prasthāpyatāṁ [k: prasthāpitāṁ] vane |
saṁyogo ghaṭate [g: ghātate] yena bhavatāṁ śatrunigrahe [g: śavigrahe] || ŚM 3/141-148.

The Burning of Kāmadeva

In this way they (the gods) arranged everything: flowers, (newborn) sprouts and the like. Seeing that spring had come with sounds of cuckoos and full of bees, (Spring) said this at that time with a sweet voice: "Kāma is piercing Bhairava! See with eyes full of the bliss of playful passion (madālasa) the thigh of (this young) virgin! Grasping (her) hand with enthusiasm as (she) embraced (him) round (his) neck, (the god) looked around (in every) direction. Doing so he was embarrassed and angry and burning with the great fire that destroys the triple world, Kāma fell (to the ground) in a moment struck by the look (the god shot at) Kāma.

When the bliss of Kāma (Passion) that obstructs (austerity) was burnt, Prītiratī (the Intercourse of Love, his wife) seeing (this thing so) hard to bear, weeping, said: "My husband Anaṅga is no more!" Once that passion is controlled by (Bhairava), the one who bears the three-eyed form, restraint, grace and Bhairava's will prevail.[1]

The ŚM narrates:

> Having decided (to do this), those gods did as Brahmā suggested; (and so) having taken (this) order from them, Kāma reached Hara's hermitage. Kāma, along with Spring, Passion (Rati) and Love (prīti), entered the forest where the Lord himself was. There were great Putrāṅga, Karṇikāra, Kadamba, Aśoka, mango, Arjuna and Campaka trees (there). (All of them) blossomed profusely due to Kāma's arrival. These new flowers stimulated the god Hara. Gathering many (of them), the goddess come close to Hara. Kāma also reached (the same place) at that moment and, seeing that the lord was blissful (with love), playfully shoot the arrow named delusion.
>
> The Three-eyed One noticing that his mind had wavered (savikāra) he, the God of the gods, embarrassed and angry, looked around in (every) direction. (Then), burnt by the great fire that destroys the triple world, Kāma fell instantly, struck down by (Śiva's) angry look. Bhairava saw the one who bore the bow and arrow and, angry with Madana, turned him completely to ashes with the fire from (his) third eye. A great hue and cry arouse from the gods in the sky and from Rati due to (this) senseless destruction. That moment Śiva disappeared. Himācala got the news in detail from the forest deities.

[1] KMT 3/14cd-20.

> Then, when he reached the hermitage of the Three-eyed One, taking (his) daughter (with him, returned) to his home.[1]

The version in the KMT continues:

Then, when they reached (Bhairava), all the hosts of gods headed by Brahmā and Viṣṇu, the Ṛṣis and Siddhas along with the Guhyakas, pleased Kujeśvara with divine hymns and lauds; (then) Hari and Brahmā said this: "O god, devoid of your (sacred) presence (pāda – lit. 'feet') we are worried. O Supreme God, attacked by Krauñca who is ferociously powerful, (even we) the gods of the gods are oppressed. O Lord, out of compassion, be gracious. We petition (you) to grant us freedom from fear. O Lord, marry the goddess who is tormented by suffering and fatigue."

The Wedding Ceremony

The venerable Bhairava said: "Where does she reside and to whom does she belong? Who is (her) mother? Who is (her) grandfather? Who will

---

[1] iti niścitya [k: sañcintya] devās te [k: manasā; g: devāsta] brahmoktaṁ cakrire vacaḥ [g: vaca] ǀ gṛhītasamayas tebhyaḥ [k: gṛhītaṁ samayajñebhyaḥ; g: samayes tanyeḥ] kāmaḥ [k kh g: kāmaṁ] prāptaharāśramaḥ [kh g: prāptaṁ-; k: -śrayam; kh g: -maṁ] ǀǀ vasantena sahāyena ratiprītisahāyavān ǀ praviveśa vanaṁ kāmaḥ [g: kāmaṁ] sthito [kh: sthitā] yatreśvaraḥ [g: -svaraḥ] svayam ǀǀ putrāṅgāḥ karṇikārāś ca kadambāśokapāṭalāḥ ǀ sahakārārjunās [g: -kārjunas] tatra campakāś ca mahādrumāḥ [g: -drūmāḥ] ǀǀ kandarpasaṁgamāt [k kh g: -saṁgamās] tatra dadhire puṣpasaṁpadaḥ [kh: -padāḥ; g: -padaṁ] ǀ devam utkarṣayāmāsa puṣpair ebhir [kh: -rebhiḥ; g: – rebhi] haraṁ navaiḥ ǀǀ samādāya prabhūtāni [kh g: prasūtāni] devī prāptā [k, g: prāha] harāntikam ǀ kāmo 'pi tatkṣaṇāt prāpya dṛṣṭvā sānandam īśvaram ǀǀ bāṇaṁ saṁmohanaṁ nāma preṣayāmāsa līlayā ǀǀ savikāraṁ tatas tryakṣaḥ [k: -kṣyaḥ] saṁlakṣya [kh: saṁkalpā; g: saṁkalpya] ca [g: va] nijaṁ manaḥ ǀ diśo 'valokayāmāsa [kh: diśāmāloka-; g: diśā-] devadevas trilocanaḥ [g: -na] ǀǀ lajjāyamānena sakopena trailokyasaṁhāramahānalena ǀ sandīpito 'sau patitaḥ [kh, g: patita] kṣaṇena kāmo hataḥ [kh, g: hata] krodhanirīkṣaṇena ǀǀ iṣucāpadharaṁ dṛṣṭvā sakopaṁ madanaṁ prati [kh, g: pati] ǀ tṛtīyanayanotthena tejasā jātavedasam [kh: -sāṁ; g: -sī] ǀǀ bhasmāvaśeṣatāṁ kāmaṁ [g: kāmaḥ] prāpayāmāsa bhairavaḥ ǀ hāhākolāhalo [kh, g: -laṁ] jāto [kh, g: jātaṁ] devānāṁ gaganāntare [g: gagaṇāṁvare] ǀǀ rateś ca [k: rate va; g: rates va] vyarthanāśāya [g: vyarthaṁ-] tatkṣaṇāntarhitaḥ śivaḥ ǀ *himācalas tām upalabhya [g: -tāmupalaye] vārtāṁ savistarām [k: savista ; kh: savistarās; g: savistaro] tadvanadevatābhyaḥ ǀǀ tryakṣāśramaṁ [g: tryakṣarāśrama] prāpya sutāṁ [g: śutāṁ] gṛhītvā jagāma [g: jama] tatrāvasare [g: -śare] svagehe ǀ ŚM 3/149-159.

give (her) to me? To whom should (I make my) request? What should we do, we who are without family?" Brahmā said: "I am the one to whom one makes the request (for the maiden). We are those who make it. The one who offers the sacrifice (of the marriage rites) is called Himavat and the sacrificial priest is the Supreme God." Once the Aged One had spoken thus to the Ṛṣis lead by Vasiṣṭha, (he continued): "The messenger should (go) quickly and say this (to Himavat), namely: offer (your daughter) in marriage!"

All who had gone (there) agreed and acknowledged the order by (a nod of) the head. Then with costly preparations and all auspicious things, the auspicious occasion full of bliss, the marriage, took place. From then on all this is the very fulfilment of desire.[1]

The version in the ŚM reads:

> After (all this had taken place), Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Indra informed the god (about what had happened), having first praised the Three-eyed One. "Be victorious, O god! Lord of the universe! Teacher of the gods and demons! O Hara! Save (us)! Save (us), O Lord of the three worlds in order to make the triple world (once again) auspicious. O you who are worshipped as the refuge of the triple world, recollect, O god, the previous age (kalpa). O lord, you yourself have reflected on this (marriage) and are (now) thinking about it again. There is a great demon called Krauñca born from the sweat of the Daughter of the Mountains. He can be killed only by (her and) your son (tvatsuta), so take (her) hand in marriage."
>
> Having heard the words of Brahmā and the rest, he agreed (saying): "So be it!" (And so) the god took the hands (of the) Daughter of the Himalaya with (great) respect. Then the gods along with Brahmā, having (thus) attained (their) goal, returned to heaven.
>
> After he had thus accepted the god of love along with the (many forms of) love that are (his) adornments, he was blissful and sported with Pārvatī out of love (for her). Then Śambhu, who was in love (with the goddess), said to the one born in the clan of the mountains: "O goddess, I am pleased by (your) veneration (sadbhāva) (for me). O lady of good vows, ask (of me any) boon.[2]

---

[1] KMT 3/21-29.

[2] anantaraṁ samāgatya brahmācyutapurandarāḥ |
*devaṁ vijñāpayāmāsa [kh g: vijñā yā-] stutiṁ [g: stuti] kṛtvā trilocanam ||
jaya deva jagannātha surāsuraguro [g: -ruṁ] hara [g: haraṁ] |
trāhi trāhi trilokeśa trailokyamaṅgalāya [g: trailokyā-] ca ||

The Union of the God and the Goddess

In the ŚM the goddess now begins by asking a series of questions. The rest of the Tantra continues in this way. The ŚM omits all that follows in the KMT up to beginning of chapter five.[1] The corresponding account in the KMT continues with details of the actual union of the god with the goddess. Although omitted in the ŚM, this is the central event in this myth, as is the emergence of the goddess from the Liṅga in the previous one. These are the moments in which the goddess manifests in her most specific 'crooked' or 'bent over' form. Emerging from the Liṅga, she is coming out of internal union with Bhairava's (and her own) energy (tejas) and is ready for outer union. In that context she is bent with 'shame'. Here the vision of the 'bent goddess' is attended by a reversal of the previous theophany. There she was powerful, solitary and new. Here she is weak, fully mature, in union and 'shameless':

Bhairava was intent on churning (his energy) (mathana), while the womb (yoni) of the universe was constantly active (sadoditā). He was then centred on the act of churning in order to bring about the emanation of the smara [kh: smare] deva purākalpaṁ trailokyaśaraṇārdite [kh: -bhasurārddite] |

---

tvayaivāsya kṛtā cintā punaś cintayase prabho ||
adrijāsvedasaṁbhūtaḥ [g: -bhūteḥ] krauñcanāmo [k, g: -nāmā; kh: -nāma;] mahāsuraḥ |
tvatsutasyaiva vaddhyo 'sau tasmāt pāṇau gṛhāṇatām ||
brahmādīnāṁ vacaḥ [g: vaca] śrutvā tatheti pratyapadyata [k: pratipadyata; kh: prativadyasaḥ; g: pratipadyate] |
himādritanayāṁ devaḥ pāṇau jagrāha [g: ya-] sādaram ||
sabrahmāṇas tato [kh: sabrahmakās tato] devāḥ kṛtārthāḥ [kh g: -rthā] prāgamad [kh: prāgamat] divam |
aṅgīkṛtas [g: -kṛtaṁ] tato 'naṅga [k kh: naṅgair] anaṅgākārabhūṣaṇaiḥ [g: ranaṁgākārabhūṣaṇeḥ] ||
pārvatyā sahasānandas tadā reme 'nurāgataḥ [g: svadāreyenurāgataṁ] |
anurañjitas tadā [k: anurañjitavān; g: antarajyaṁ tataḥ] śaṁbhuḥ [g: śaṁbhu] provāca girigotrajām ||
devi [g: devī] tuṣṭo 'smi sadbhāvāt varaṁ prārthaya suvrate | ŚM 4/1-8ab.

[1] Instead the ŚM continues with a long discussion of the nature of Akula, Kula and Kaula and the twenty-five metaphysical principles. The latter, are also discussed in chapter thirteen of the KuKh. This is followed by a section summarizing the contents of the sacred seats, which is said to be their 'pervasion'. This is followed by a long section on the eight Mothers (mātṛkā), their form, Wheel and worship, including the fire sacrifice dedicated to them and the seven flames of fire. It extends from the middle of chapter three up to the end of chapter four. Chapter five of the ŚM begins with a brief section on the characteristics and location of the Mothers in the body. Then from here the ŚM takes up an exposition of a long mantra called Trikhaṇḍā and so returns to the KMT which deals with this Vidyā in chapter five. Note that in this way the ŚM has omitted a large amount of the Tantrasadbhāva, chapters 3, 6 and 8 of which are chapters 4 to 6 of the KMT. This is probably because it is originally an expansion of an earlier version of the KMT that did not incorporate it.

triple world. In love with (the goddess) Kubjī, the Lord of Kula was in a state at intense passion because of the pleasures of (their love) games, (and) was intent on the practice of the bliss of the nectar of Kula. The (goddess) Kujeśī, bowing (before him) asked him this: "You have melted my limbs with the Yoga of Love (praṇaya). O Bhairava, I am greatly pained because of the crooked form (kubja) (I have assumed in order to make love)."[1]

This passage which describes the 'churning' of the goddess, that is, her union with the god, is analysed further ahead where the dynamic interaction of the goddess and the Churning Bhairava is discussed. Here we may note that in this way, the god and the goddess are finally united and both receive the Command, the goddess from the god within the Liṅga and the god from the goddess outside it. Thus both have the authority (adhikāra) to propagate the teachings and spread the same enlightening empowerment of the Command. Accordingly, the Tantra now moves on to discuss the conditions and manner in which this transmission takes place. The first requirement is a true teacher, that is, one who has undergone the same process and is fully initiated, and so the qualities of such a teacher are described next and the manner in which Bhairava assumes the form of the Five Siddhas who are the first teachers.[2] The rest of the chapter is concerned with the disciple's code of conduct, the Command, the descent of power (śaktipāta) and the rise of Kuṇḍalinī, which piercing through his inner centres, initiates him.[3] Something is also said about the tradition to be known and finally penance is perscribed for disrespecting the teacher.[4]

The Goddess's Pilgrimage

We now move on to the next major theme of the goddess's myth – her pilgrimage around the land of Bhārata. When the goddess emerges out of the Liṅga, she reluctantly leaves the beautiful Island of the Moon she loves. She sets out on the pilgrimage Bhairava has ordained for her to spread the Command and to finally unite with him. She will go to ten places,[5] all of which are already

---

[1] KMT 3/30-32.
[2] In KMT 3/41-47ab and KMT 3/94-100ab, respectively.
[3] These are taught in KMT 3/47cd-88, 3/89-93, and 105-111, respectively.
[4] In KMT 3/112-119 and 3/126-134, respectively.
[5] See Schoterman 1981: 148-149 for a summary of the equivalent in the ṢSS and comparative table of KMT 2/24-116, ṢSS 1/36-37 and 4/5, 26-132. The ṢSS (1/36-37) lists thirteen places (sthāna) namely: Himavat, Meru, Candrādi (i.e. Candradvīpa or Candraparvata), Gandhamādana, Śrīgiri, Trikūṭa, Daradaṇḍī, Olamba, Karālākhya (MS A: karālaṁvaṁ MSs BC: karālāsyaṁ), Sahya, the Ucchuṣma forest, the lakes Hrada and `Nīlahrada. The first four do not form part of the goddess's tour. Kiṣkinda which is mentioned in the following account is not listed. Olamba sacred sites where goddesses reside. The goddess goes to each place and, looking at them with her empowering gaze, the beings who reside there become aspects of herself and the god. Then the goddess installs them there again as the protectors of the place, which is similarly transformed into the goddess's sacred site.

The six major sites are given new names of which the KMT supplies didactic etymologies that relate to their origin or nature. Out of these ten places, the last five are especially important as they are transformed into the sacred seats in which the main spiritual lineages of her tradition are established. The genealogical analogy demands the presence in these sites of both the female and male partners, which is not necessary in the other places. The Great Goddess must therefore first convert the local goddess of the place and then furnish her with a consort so that she can generate spiritual offspring. This transformation and elevation of the local goddess to an aspect of the Great Goddess who visits and graces her is paralleled by the transformation of the site. Unfortunately, the original 'untransformed' sites cannot, at present at least, be identified except for the Sahya forest on the mountains near modern Pune of that name. This place, along with the others, was probably part of an earlier, possibly regional sacred geography. It is possible that after the goddess has gone to major sites around India she concentrates on those that are closer to her place of origin. By projecting into them the great seats located around India that are especially important as major Tantric sites, she transforms a minor, local sacred geography into a major pan-Indian one. The ṢSS subsequently internalises all these places by projecting them onto parts of the face and the area above it to the End of the Twelve above the head.[1]

The goddess initially visits five places. The four that can be identified are all in central and South India. The first is mount Kaumāra that is identified with Śrīśaila in Andhra. Then she went to Trikūṭa, which is probably a mountain in the Koṅkaṇa region. The next place is Kiṣkindha, famous in the Rāmāyaṇa for the forest in which Rāma meets Hanumān and the monkey tribe who help him in his quest for Sitā. It is commonly identified with the region around modern Hampi, which roughly corresponds to the medieval kingdom of Vijayanagara. After going to a cave called Daradaṇḍī whose location is uncertain, the goddess finally went to Kanyākumārī that is, Cape Comorin on the shores of the southernmost tip of India. Thus she begins her tour in central India and travels in a roundabout way down to the extreme south. It is as if the Tantra is anticipating the future corresponds to the Western Himagahvara where the forest called Olambikā is located (KMT 2/36-38). This place is transformed by the goddess into Oḍḍiyāna. Karāla is transformed into Jālandhara (KMT 2/50-63ab) and mount Sahya into Pūrṇagiri. The Ucchuṣma forest and the lakes Hrada and Nīlahrada are in the place that is transformed into Kāmarūpa. See Schoterman 1981: 53-54.

[1] See Dyczkowski 2004: 173 for a visual representation of their location on the face.

expansion of the Kubjikā cult into the Deccan, which, as we shall see, took place in the second phase of its development. The first of these five places is so important that it is treated as elaborately as if it were one of the major seats of the goddess. She does little more than grace the remaining four places with her presence and the emanation of her energy, the grace of her Command. In the first and last of these places, she also leaves behind a sacred shadow of herself.

Mount Kaumāra – Śrīśaila

"I am (now) going again there to the Kula mountain in India that has been praised by those who know it as Śrīparvata from ages without beginning. (Also) called (mount) Kumāra, it is adorned with an umbrella for shade."

Once (the goddess) had said this, she immediately reached the venerable mount Kaumāra. The goddess who is the shade (chāyātmikā of the umbrella[1]) (resided) there (and although) unmanifest was (then in a clearly) manifest form. (The goddess) spent the time required (there) surveying the quarters. The northern (quarter) is all a great forest full of Liṅgas. Its circumference extends all around for 80 leagues (yojana). It has four doors and, covered with countless sacred bathing places (tīrtha) and (inhabited by) many Siddhas, it is incomparably beautiful. Populated by the hosts that belong to the attribute of darkness (tamas), it was filled with many wonders. All of a sudden Śrī was present, (brought there) by the goddess's (gracious) gaze (dṛṣṭinipāta), and so it is called Śrīśaila (Śrī's Mountain) established with the goddess's name.

(The goddess then) drew a line (on the ground) of that, her own place, with her toe. A river arose there that is the boundary of both. She fixed (the goddess) Chāyā there and gave (her) the Śāmbhavī (Command, saying): "Whoever enters here will be my equal. Free, he will be the creator and destroyer, the illuminator of those whose knowledge has fallen (from the truth). From (my) Command (he will realise the divine) attribute of lordship in the triple world and in (all) that moves and is immobile."[2]

[1] The goddess of this place is called Chāyā – 'Shade' (KMT 2/29) as befits her nature.
[2] KMT 2/21-31.

According to the ŚM:

> Kaumāra, the best of mountains, is covered with many kinds of trees and, flowing with streams (that come from its) caves, it has many kinds of birds. Its high peak is hard to reach due to the vast cliffs (that surround it). There the goddess resided on beautiful mount Kumāra. She stayed there for a while and then Śivā, who bore the form of (a divine) shadow, looked towards the north. She rode a vehicle in the sky and aroused wonder in the heart (of those who saw her). Suddenly, (the goddess) Śrī, who possesses many (good) characteristics, appeared there. That very moment, everything (in) the forest became a Liṅga. The grove where (ascetics) performed penance possessed countless sacred bathing places. Then the goddess fashioned Śrīśaila out of that mountain. And there she fashioned a river by means of a line (made) with one of (her) toes. Establishing (there) the immobile (goddess) Chāyā (Shade), the beautiful (goddess) said to her; "those men who will come near you from today onwards on this mountain will have the Divine Command. Fortunate Kula yogis will come (here) to Śrīśaila."[1]

Like Kailāśa and Meru, Śrīśaila, also known as Śrīparvata, is projected into the End of the Twelve, to crown the sacred body. Śrīśaila is the mountain of Śrī – good fortune, sovereign power, spiritual and material wealth. Śrīśaila is a

---

[1] vicitradrumasaṁcchannaṁ [g: -drūma] sravatkandaranirjharam |
nānāvihaṅgasaṁyuktaṁ [kh: -saṁghuṣṭaṁ] kaumāram acalottamam ||
tuṅgaśṛṅgaśikhāprāntaṁ [kh: -prāptaṁ] guruprakāradurgamam [g: gurukrāntāra-] |
kumāraparvataṁ ramyaṁ tatra devī samāvasat [g: samāsanaṁ] ||
sthitvā kālāntaraṁ kiñcit tatra sā yāvad uttarām [kh: yāṁvaduttarāṁ; g: -raṁ] |
diśām ālokayāmāsa [kh: diśa-] cchāyārūpadharā [g: ichyārūpavarā] śivā [kh: śivāḥ] ||
vimānagāminī [g: -gnāminī] vyomni kurvantī [kh: kurvvanti; g: kurvvanna] vismayaṁ [g: pismayaṁ] hṛdi |
akasmāt tāvad udbhūtā tatra śrīr [g: śrī] bahulakṣaṇā [kh: -ṇa; g: -ṇāt] ||
tatkṣaṇād abhavat [kh: bhavavat; g: -kṣaṇāt tadbhavat] sarvaṁ [kh: sarvva] kānanaṁ liṅgarūpiṇam |
tīrthakoṭisahasrais tu [kh, g: -sahasrāṇi] tapovanasamākulam [g: tapodhana-] ||
tato devī [kh: devi] gires tasya [g: giristhasya] śrīśailaṁ [g: -la] samakalpayat [kh: samakalpayet; g: mapyakalpayat] |
tatrāṅguṣṭhena caikena [kh: devasyā; g: caikasya] rekhayā [kh: rekhāyāṁ; g: reṣayā] nirmame [kh: nirggame] nadīm [kh, g: nadī] ||
vidhāya niścalāṁ cchāyāṁ tām evaṁ [kh: tām eva] prāha sundarī |
adyaprabhṛti ye kecid āgamiṣyanti [g: kecit-] te 'ntikam [kh: tantikaṁ] ||
*atra śaile [kh: śile] nṛṇāṁ teṣāṁ divyājñā [g: divyasiddhi] saṁbhaviṣyati [g: * bhaviṣyati]* |
dhanyāḥ [kh g: dhānyā] samāgamiṣyanti [g: -ṣyaṁtiṁ] śrīśailaṁ kulayoginaḥ || ŚM 3/1-8.

hill, explains Day: 'situated in the Karnal country in the Balaghaut Ceded districts and on the south side of the Kṛṣṇā river, at the north-western extremity of the Karnul territory, about 102 miles west, south-west of Dharanikoṭa and 82 miles east, north-east of Karnul and 50 miles from the Kṛṣṇa station of the G.I.P. Railway. . . . [It is] an isolated hill about 1570 feet high surrounded on three sides by the river Kṛṣṇā and on the fourth partly by the Bhimanakollam torrent.'[1] Day goes on to refer to the Liṅga of Light, which our text[2] also mentions, and the goddess: 'it contains the temple of Mallikārjuna, one of the twelve great Liṅgas of Mahādeva and Brahmarambhā (sic. Bhramarāmbā) Devī. From the name of the goddess, the mountain was called Brahmarambhāgiri (sic. Bhramarāmbāgiri) or briefly Brahmaragiri (sic. Bhramaragiri).' Under the early Cālukyas (c. 7th century CE) many beautiful Śaiva shrines where built in Satyavolu in the Kurnool district of Andhra, where Śrīsaila is located. Of these, the shrines of the Liṅgas Bhīmaliṅgeśvara and Rāmaliṅgeśvara are mentioned in early inscriptions.[3] Perhaps these were amongst the Liṅgas in the forest to the north of Śrīśaila to which the KMT refers. Similarly, the bathing places mentioned in the KMT associated with Śrīparvata are famous in the Epics and the Purāṇas. According to the Mahābhārata those who go to this mountain and worship Śiva after bathing in the rivers of the forest there get the same reward they would receive by performing a great Vedic sacrifice.[4]

The veneration the Śāktas had for this sacred mountain is evident by its presence in most of the major sources, both early and late. But above all, it is an important Śaiva centre venerated by various Śaiva groups for centuries. The Rājataraṅginī[5] refers to Śrīparvata as a centre of Pāśupatas. The presence of these mildly antinomian Brahminical Śaiva ascetics combined with that of other Śaiva groups including, it seems, the extremist Kāpālikas. Precursors of the Kaulas, they were infamous for their intensely antinomian behaviour. Observing the Great Vow (mahāvrata) that included carrying and eating from a skull (kapāla), '(...) they profess to have their knowing power sharpened by drinking wine and eating a certain kind of food (probably a disgusting substance) and always embraced by the power (Śakti) of Kapālin i.e. Bhairava.'[6] Their existence is attested from at least the beginning of the seventh century. This was when the Mattavilāsa, attributed to the Pallava king Mahendravarman I (c. 600–35 AD) was written in Kanchi, Tamil Nadu, satirizing the Kāpālika's outrageous behaviour.[7] An early

---

[1] Day (1927) 1990: 193.
[2] KuKh 16/75cd-76ab.
[3] Nandi 1973: 7.
[4] MBh vanaparvan, 85/18. Quoted by Mani 1984: 737.
[5] RT 3/267.
[6] Bhandarkar 1965: 128.
[7] Translated by Lorenzen in White 2001: 81-96.

Cālukya inscription dated 639 AḌ. refers to the worship of Śiva as Kapāleśvara and to the maintenance of ascetics who observed the Great Vow (mahāvratin). Bhandarkar notes: 'In the copper-plate charter of Nāgavardhana, the nephew of Pulakeśin II of Mahārāṣṭra, who ascended the throne in 610 AD and was living in 639 AD, a grant is recorded of a village near Igatpuri in Nāsik district for the worship of Kāpāleśvara i.e. the lord of the wearer of skulls, and for the maintenance of the Mahāvratins residing in the temple.'[1] In the late seventh century when Bhavabhūti (born about 680 CE) wrote the Mālatīmādhava, Śrīparvata was especially linked, at least in the popular imagination, with these proto-Kaulas. Sircar summarizes the salient points for us: 'Bhavabhūti's Mālatīmādhava speaks of a woman styled Yoginī, who performed the Kāpālikavrata at the Śrīparvata and illustrates the vrata by the horrible activities of Aghoraghaṇṭa and his female disciple Kapālakuṇḍalā, who are represented as coming from the Śrīparvata and staying near the mahāśmaśāna (at Padmāvatī in the Gwalior State) containing a temple of Cāmuṇḍā to whom they were going to offer the girl Mālatī in sacrifice'.[2]

If our text reflects in some way 'outer' reality, the Kāpālikas have given way to the Siddhas. Indeed, this was the case with Buddhist Siddhas amongst whom the famous Kanhapāda (Skt. Kṛṣṇapāda) of the Sahajīya school, who lived in the eleventh century in Bengal, calls himself a Kāpalin.[3] By the time the KMT was redacted Śrīśaila had become a major focal point for Kaulas, and the prestige of this mountain had a powerful influence on the votaries of the Kubjikā cult. We may perhaps perceive the echoes of its association with Kāpālikas in the goddess's statement that the initiate into her cult who goes there will illumine 'those whose knowledge has fallen (from the truth)' by reforming and initiating them'. According to the ŚM it is one of four sacred mountains, along with Māhendra, Arbuda and Kailāśa, which are considered to be the secondary seats (upapīṭha) generated by the goddess's gaze.[4] The CMSS substitutes Arbuda with

[1] Bhandarkar 1965: 117-118.

[2] Sircar 1973: 10n. See acts I and IX of Mālatīmādhava. Warder (1983: 273-4) summarizes the plot of this famous play as follows: The Kāpālika Aghoraghaṇṭa wishes to propitiate the Great Goddess Gaurī, Śiva's consort, by sacrificing to her the most beautiful girl he can find, at her Karālā temple in a cemetery in Padmāvatī. He abducts Mālatī for the purpose, but Mādhava, performing a tantric rite in the same cemetery, hears her cries and rescues her, killing Aghoraghaṇṭa. . . . But Kapālakuṇḍalā, a female pupil of Aghoraghaṇṭa who was present, seeks to avenge her teacher by abducting Mālatī when an opportunity arises later. . . . Kapālakuṇḍalā carries Mālatī off to Śrīparvata . . . with the intention of inflicting a painful death on her there. Sudāminī is at Śrīparvata, however, where she has completed her mastery of the [magical] sciences. Her powers enable her to know what is happening and she intercepts Kapālakuṇḍalā and rescues Mālatī, bringing the heroine back (through the air) to Padmāvatī.

[3] See Dasgupta 1962: 90 and Dyczkowski 1989: 26 ff.

[4] śrīśailaṁ [g: śrīcaile] caiva māhendraṁ kailāśam [kh: kailāsaṁ] arbudaṁ tathā |

the Island of the Moon (Candradvīpa) and calls them Śivapīthas.[1] Moreover, it locates the residences of the six disciples of Matsyandra who founded Kaula lineages in relation to Śrīśaila.[2]

Here the goddess left her 'shade' to replace her in her absence, reminding us of another goddess called Shade – Chāyā – who appears in the Purāṇas. Chāyā was a substitute for the goddess Saṁjñā (Name), daughter of the god Viśvakarma (All Action). Saṁjñā was the wife of Sūrya, the god Sun. The heat of Sūrya became unbearable for her and so she created a substitute in her exact form and, leaving her to look after Sūrya, she left him and went to her father. Sūrya, unaware of what had happened, had three children with Chāyā. But when he did eventually find out that Chāyā was not his real wife he divorced her and took back Saṁjñā.[3] Although the texts do not tell us explicitly, we may presume that the goddess embodies the shade of the sacred parasol on mount Kumāra. Just as the umbrellas that shade kings and other dignitaries from the sun are signs of their eminence, the same is the case with deities and sacred objects. In this case the umbrella signals the sanctity of the mountain and its shade is itself sacred. Indeed, it is identified in the sources with Śiva.[4] Like the mountains Kailāśa, Meru and, as we shall see, Trikūṭa, Śriśaila according to the ṢSS[5] is projected into the End of the Twelve:

> The subtle condition arises progressively by following the gross path. The gross is said to be the Transmission (krama), while the subtle is within the End of the Twelve. It is where mount Śrīśaila is located, that is, above the Cavity of Brahmā. O far-famed one, this is called the Division (bheda), Cavity (randhra) or Hole (cchidra).[6]

---

upapīṭhāni deveśī [g: deveśi] kṛtvaitāny [kh: -tān; g: kṛtvenāny] avalokanāt [g: evilokayan] ||
ŚM 3/124. See below, chapter 3, p. 563.

[1] śrīśailaṁ śrīmahendraṁ ca candradvīpaṁ varānane ||
kailāsaṁ ca catur devi śivapīṭham udāhṛtam [gh: -dāhyataṁ] | CMSS 5/41cd-42ab.

[2] See chart in Dyczkowski 1988: 70.

[3] See chapter 9 of the Harivaṁśa and chapter 2, part 3 of the Viṣṇupurāṇa and Mani 1984: 182.

[4] In KuKh 57/86cd the goddess says: I am that Crooked Form, while the parasol for the shade is Śiva.

[5] ṢSS 1/36.

[6] sthūlamārgeṇa [k kh: sthūlaṁ-] sūkṣmatvaṁ kramād etat pravartate [KMT: eva prajāyate] ||
sthūlaṁ ca kramam ity uktaṁ sūkṣmaṁ vai dvādaśāntagam | [this and the following line are missing in the KMT] brahmarandhrasya ūrdhve tu śrīśailaṁ yatra parvatam [k kh: -te] || bhedo randhras tathā cchidraṁ ekā saṁjñā yaśasvini [k kh: -nī] | ṢSS 19/62cd-64ab = KMT 13/67cd, 68ab.

This is where the goddess's inner journey begins. According to the later Kubjikā Tantras, the Liṅga from which the goddess comes forth is located in the centre of the triangular Yoni in the End of the Twelve. In this perspective, the 'cavity' or 'hole' to which these lines refer is that of the triangle, which is identified here with Śrīśaila. In other words, in terms of these symbolic associations, when Bhairava tells the goddess to go to mount Kaumāra / Śrīśaila, he is telling her to descend from the plane in which the god and the goddess are together to the one from which creation unfolds at the uppermost extreme of the subtle body.

Trikūṭa – Kiṣkindha – Kanyākumārī – Daradaṇḍi

Having spoken thus, she went to mount Trikūṭa and, having passed (some) time there, she graced (the place) called Kiṣkindha. She gave that (place) the power of her Command and graced the demons (Rākṣasas) (who lived there).

(Then she went to the shores of the ocean where she tarried) for some time (and said to the goddess who resided there): "As I am standing on the shore of the sea, free of worry, you are there Kanyākumārī."[1]

According to the ŚM:

> Once she had said this, she went to the first Trikūṭa, which is within (its) peaks. There she graced (the world) and then, having done so, went to (the place) called Kiṣkindha. (Then) she graced the demons (rakṣasa) and the sea.[2]

There are not less than four mountains called Trikūṭa. One is the mythical peak on the island of Śrīlaṅkā on which the city of Laṅkā is supposed to have been situated.[3] Another is in Andhra, nowadays called Koṭappakoṇḍa near Kavur in the Narasaraopet Taluk in the Guntur district. A third is the Tirahni or Triraśmi hill at Nāsik.[4] It has also been identified with Junnar and the Yamunotri mountain.[5] Another is, as Bhattacharyya tells us: 'a hill in Aparānta or northern

[1] KMT 2/32-34ab.
[2] evam uktvā [kh: evamuttkā; g: yevamuktvā] jagāmādyatrikūṭaṁ [g: jayā devī trikūṭā] śikharāntagam [g: -gāṁ] |
tatrasthānugrahaṁ kṛtvā kiṣkindhyākhyaṁ [g: kiskiṁ-] tato 'gamat ||
rakṣasānanugṛhyāsau [g: -grahaihyāsāu] samudram anugṛhya sā | ŚM 3/9-10ab.
[3] Sircar 1967: 97, Day (1927) 1990: 205.
[4] Bhattacharyya 1999: 292-293.
[5] Day (1927) 1990: 205-206.

Koṅkaṇa from which the Traikūṭaka kings had derived their family name. The Ajaneri grant of Pṛthivīcandra Bhogaśakti dated AD 709 mentions the Pūrva-Trikūṭa-Viṣaya as a part of the Purī-Koṅkaṇa-Viṣaya.[1] In view of the subsequent history of the Kubjikā tradition, which stresses its association with the Deccan (dakṣiṇāpatha) in general and the Koṅkaṇa region in particular, it may well be that this is the mountain meant here.

Inwardly, Trikūṭa – the Triple Peak – encloses the Santānabhuvana at the End of the Twelve above the head.[2] It is examined in the section dealing with the Santānabhuvana in the context of the history of the development of the Triangle in the End of the Twelve.[3] In one place the ṢSS identifies mount Kaumāra with the End of the Sixteen which, beyond the End of the Twelve, is transcendental and hence 'inexplicable' (anākhya). It is said to be the path 'within the Cavity'.[4] This, I suppose, is the centre of the goddess's Triangle in the End of the Twelve, which is represented here by mount Trikūṭa. This alternation between the transcendental End of the Sixteen in the centre and the End of the Twelve, marking the boundary between transcendence and immanence from which emanation takes place, is discussed in a different context further ahead.[5] The ṢSS explains the relationship between them succinctly in this way:

> It is the base of (the channel called) suṣumṇā and it is at the end of the End of the Twelve. That is the divine maṇḍala, which should be worshipped and contemplated by the wise. That most excellent Wheel is divine wherein the universe is established. O fair lady, the End of the Sixteen, divided into many forms, has come forth from its centre. Those who are foolish do not know it.[6]

---

[1] EI XXV 225.

[2] There is another Trikūṭa, the peaks of which are projected into the two eyes and the crown of the head. See below, commentary on KMT 2/86cd-91, p. 98 ff..

[3] See below chapter two, p. 269.

[4] kaumāraparvataṁ yac ca anākhyaṁ ṣoḍaśāntakam ||
tad vai yad randhragaṁ mārgaṁ tac ca kaumāraparvatam | ṢSS 1/49cd-50ab.

According to Schoterman (1981: 61) the ṣoḍaśāntaka means 'the sixteenth'. He concludes that 'the Kaumāraparvata symbolizes then the totality of the human body.' But Schoterman was unaware, it seems, of the existence of the End of the Sixteen beyond the End of the Twelve. Schoterman translates randhragaṁ mārgaṁ as 'the path, which leads to the [Brahma-] randhra'. In other words, according to him, mount Kaumāra is the body which is the path leading to the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head. If this interpretation is correct, one wonders why the mountain / body is said to be 'inexplicable' (anākhya).

[5] See chapter two p. 376 ff..

[6] ṢSS 1/31-33ab.

Kanyākumārī – the Virgin Goddess – is the only deity mentioned in these places. There seems no reason to doubt that the place on the seashore to which the texts refer is Cape Comorin, which draws its name from the local goddess who is worshipped there. The seashore also symbolizes the brink of finitude that marks the boundary, as it were, with the transcendent.[1]

Once she had graced the sea (thus), she went next to (the cave called) Daradaṇḍi. There the goddess assumed the form of the Bearer of Shade (chāyādharī), her mind set on the quality of the Unmanifest. There she again released (her) Command in order to grace the world.[2]

Schoterman suggests that Daradaṇḍī is the name of a cave.[3] It makes sense that the goddess should become the shade within a sacred cave. According to some accounts, she assumed the form of a Liṅga in a cave on the Mountain of the Moon. The darkness and depth of that cave also symbolize the Void of the Unmanifest.

The Five Main Sacred Seats

The Western Himagahvara – Oḍḍiyāna

"The (the goddess) Speech who was (present) in the previous place will (also) be here itself." Having said this she went a great distance to the western Himagahvara where there is a village in the forest (vanapallikā)[4]

---

[1] See KuKh 3/137 and 14/64cd-66ab.
[2] KMT 2/34cd-35.
[3] Schoterman 1981: 53. According to the ṢSS (47/118bc): The cave and that which is the nape of the neck is called Daradaṇḍī. gartā yā ca kṛkāṭikā daradaṇḍī samākhyātā.
[4] MSs ABCEFG of the KMT read 'vanapālikā'. MSs A of the ṢSS reads: -palikaṁḥ. Other MSs of these two texts read 'vanapallikā'. The ŚM also reads 'vanapālikā'. It says:

Then Pārvatī reached the Western Himagahvara. There was a guardian of the forest (vanapālikā) there called Ratnāvatyā.

tato 'pi paścimaṁ prāpya pārvatī himagahvaram ||
ratnāvatyā ca nāmnā vai [g: nāmena] tatrasthā vanapālikā [kh: -kī] || ŚM 3/11.

A little further ahead the reading is confirmed twice more:

The goddess who was the guardian of the forest bowed her head to the goddess surrounded by the host of female skyfarers. Her face charming, the goddess said to the guardian (pālikā) (of the forest) (. . .) .

called Olambikā. (The goddess there is) Raktā who wears red clothes and, immersed in blood (raktasthā), craves sex (ratilālasā).[1] She resides there in a canyon within a deep cave. Everything was made of (her) yoga[2] as long as she stayed (there).

The goddess was satisfied by them (that is, the goddess there and her attendants) and by many ways and means (nayopāya). Then content and profound, Kujeśvarī who is endowed with the quality of discernment and whose creation (takes place) by many means said this: "As (I) have flown up (oḍḍitā) (here) within Oḍḍīśa, therefore this (place will be known) as Oḍḍiyānaka."[3]

. . . . devyā yā [kh: nāṁ; g: tāṁ] vanapālikā [kh: -kāṁ; g: vanapālikī] |
praṇamya śirasā devīṁ [g: devī] khecarīgaṇasaṁvṛtām ||
prasannavadanā [g: -nāṁ] devī provāca pālikāṁ prati [kh: vanapālikāṁ] | ŚM 3/12b-13ab.

However, despite these readings, rather than consider that the goddess here is also called Olambikā (ṢSS: Ulaṁbikā), which would mean that, unlike the goddesses of the other seats, she has two names. I accept this reading which is, moreover, the lectio difficilior. Schoterman (1981: 53-54) reads Laṁbikā but agrees that it is the name of a village, not a goddess.

[1] KMT 2/37cd reads: raktāmbaradharā raktā raktasthā ratilālasā. The reading in ṢSS 4:5/12cd is the same except for the word 'raktā' which is replaced by 'devī'. We may take Raktā to be the name of the goddess here, as Schoterman does. This view is supported by the KMT (2/49) where Kubjikā addresses the goddess of this seat as Raktacāmuṇḍā.

[2] Although the MSs of both the KMT and the ṢSS agree on the reading yogimayam, it makes no sense and so has been emended to yogamayam.

[3] KMT 2/36-40. The last line of this passage in the edited text of the KMT (2/40cd) is problematic. It reads:

oḍḍitā yena aṅgribhyāṁ tenedaṁ oḍḍiyānakam ||

The intended meaning appears to be: 'The (place) will be (called) Oḍḍiyāna because (I have) flow up (into the sky here) with (my) two limbs'.

Sanderson (2002: 10) notes that 'the reading accepted by the editors gives no sense'. He therefore refers to the more satisfactory reading of this line in the ṢSS (4:5/15cd-17ab) which is:

uḍḍitā (k: uḍritā; kh,gG: uḍḍita) yena uḍḍīśe tenedaṁ uḍḍiyānakam ||

This is (called) Uḍḍiyāna because (the goddess) flew up by means of it within Uḍḍīśa.

Sanderson proposes to emend the first half of this line to – uḍḍito yena uḍḍīśa (sic for uḍḍīśas) and so translates the entire line as: This is (called) Uḍḍiyāna because the (Siddha) Uḍḍīśa ascended (here) into the sky. He finds support for his emendation in the commentary which says: uḍḍīśam uḍīnaṁ (em: uḍyīśam uḍyānaṁ Cod) karoti yadā tadā uḍḍiyānakam. The commentary does indeed appear to say that it is Uḍḍīśa who is ascending, not the goddess. However, this is probably not so, we could just as well emend the first word to uḍḍīśe. This would make more

The ŚM simply says that this is 'where the Divine Command has flown up (oḍḍitā)'.[1] The goddess flies up into the Wheel of the Skyfaring goddesses at the summit of existence. From there she will descend, as does her consort and then their spiritual offspring, to spread the teachings. The ṢSS expands the last line into the following explanation:

---

sense. The Kubjikā sources portray this seat as one in which it is the goddess who flies. Thus, describing the goddess when she is in this seat the KuKh (6/32cd-33ab) says of her:

Full (bharitā) (of energy), she is Bhairava's bliss and has taken flight (khegatā) on Śiva's path.

It is not unreasonable, therefore to accept the reading of the ṢSS as it stands. It is saying, essentially, that the power of this place stimulated the ascent of Kuṇḍalinī in the body of the Siddha who resides there. Śitikaṇṭha, who was a teacher of the Kashmiri Kālīkrama, derives the name of this seat in a similar way: here in (this) sacred seat Śakti flies up by the outpouring of energy (pīṭhe śakter ullāsanena śaktir atra uḍḍīnā MP (1) p. 49). Sanderson himself quotes the line that follows in the same passage which he translates as: The (name) Oḍḍiyāna is appropriately applied because the Śakti of the residents of this Pīṭha is seen to be very, i.e. permanently, 'in ascent' (uḍḍīnā, i.e. vibrant)'. Clearly, according to the Kālīkrama, it is the goddess, not the Siddha of this seat, who is 'in ascent'. The KuKh (42/16ab) confirms that this is the view in the Kubjikā tradition also when it explains that the name of this seat is related to the goddess who, is the energy of the vital breath and 'the form of the breath is that of a bird (that flies upwards), and so (her seat) is Odyāṇaka' (pātaṅgarūpiṇo vāyus tena odyāṇakaṁ bhavet).

This didactic etymology was so well accepted that it persisted for centuries. So, for example, we find it again in the Gorakṣaśataka in relation to a Haṭha yogic practice (bandha) that derives its name from this place. There we read:

Even as a great bird is able to fly without taking rest, so indeed uḍḍīyāna may become the lion (who kills) the elephantine death.

uḍḍīnaṁ kurute yasmāt aviśrāntaṁ mahākhagaḥ |
uḍḍīyānaṁ tad eva syān mṛtyumātaṅgakeśarī || GŚ 77.

There are a surprisingly large number of spellings of the name of this seat. These are discussed in a note to the Sanskrit text of KuKh 2/28a. The reader will notice some variants in the following pages. Uḍḍiyāna is probably the best 'average' form of the name across the different schools. It is the one generally preferred in the Kālīkrama sources and may well be the original one. But note that Śitikaṇṭha uses two spellings, Uḍḍiyāna and Oḍḍiyāna, in the same sentence (op. cit. p. 49-50). Clearly the latter is a common variant and it is this one or some variant beginning with the same vowel that is, on the whole, the main spelling in the Kubjikā sources. Thus it is not unlikely that the redactors of the KMT intended to promote the spelling 'oḍḍiyāna' even if this meant further corruption of the Sanskrit. Accordingly, we may posit the following original reading of this line: oḍḍitā (< uḍḍitā < uḍḍīnā) yena oḍḍīśe tenedaṁ oḍḍiyānakam ||

[1] oḍḍitā [g: oḍitā] yatra divyājñā . . . . | ŚM 3/12a.

> O fair-hipped lady, she sports there, (her) body consisting of the fifty letters. She abides constantly flying up (uḍḍitā) (as an aspect) of the totality of Speech consisting of the Subtle One (sūkṣma) and the other (levels of Speech). As (she) has flown up (uḍḍitā) within Uḍḍīśa, therefore this [place will be known] as Uḍḍiyānaka. It is the repose of the totality of Speech. Without it there is no hearing.[1]

The goddess is portrayed in these lines as Mālinī who embodies the fifty energies of Speech, of which she encompasses all the levels from the Subtle One onwards. As such she is Kuṇḍalinī who, as the energy of Uḍḍīśa, the god of this seat, rises within him. Thus this is the seat especially associated with Speech. This is its location and so it 'rests' here. Accordingly, this sacred seat is associated with the capacity to hear.[2] The three other seats are similarly associated with the faculties to speak, nourish and see. The fifth one pervades the other four and so does not represent a separate faculty. The ṢSS explains:

> (You) desire to hear (śrotukāmā) in (the place) called Oḍḍa. (You) desire to speak (vaktukāmā) in the one called Jālaka (i.e. Jālandhara). (You are in the place) called Pūrṇa (lit. 'Full') for (nourishing) fulfilment (puṣṭi) and (in the place) called Kāma (impelled) by the desire to see. The goddess abides (associated) with these places and (these) sacred seats burn splendidly with their own qualities. Without them living beings (would be) deaf, dumb, impotent and blind.[3]

The ṢSS presents a systematically interiorized version of the myth in the KMT. It is based on the implicit understanding that the goddess is the power of consciousness that vitalizes the primary physiological functions of the body, which are the domain of the gross elements symbolized by the sacred seats. These primary functions are delegated to aspects of the same energy that, in conjunction with the corresponding power-holders that stimulate their operation, generate the subsidiary energies and power-holders who instigate and preside over the subsidiary functions, parts and constituents of the body. From this perspective, the

---

[1] ramate tatra suśroṇi pañcāśārṇamayā tanuḥ || sūkṣmādiśabdasaṁghasya uḍḍitā tiṣṭhate sadā |
uḍḍitā yena uḍḍīśe tenedaṁ uḍḍiyānakam ||
śabdasaṁghasya viśrāmaṁ vina tena śrutir na hi | ṢSS 4:5/15cd-17ab.

[2] At first sight one would suppose that the capacity to speak would be the one associated with this seat. Two of the four faculties are active – speech and nourishment – and two passive – hearing and seeing.

[3] ṢSS 4:5/20-21.

land of Bhārata is the body, and the goddess's sanctifying and colonizing tour of its sacred sites is the movement of this energy through the body. In this way the body is not only vitalized, it is transformed into the body of the goddess. Emerging from the Liṅga where she abides in her unmanifest, undifferentiated (niṣkala) form, the goddess moves through this sacred microcosm deploying her sacred energies fashioning thus her body, the Yoni which is the most sacred part of the virgin goddess (kumārikākhaṇḍa). The ṢSS represents this process in two phases, corresponding to the two major parts of the body, the head and the trunk. How the locations are projected into the head and the End of the Twelve and the Sixteen above it is described in chapter one of the ṢSS. In chapters 4 and 5 of the ṢSS only the main seats are described and these, along with their inhabitants, are related to the body. The head in this context is just one of many parts of the body. The seats are not allotted specific locations in the body as they were on the head and face in chapter one of the ṢSS. In this context, they relate to physiological functions. So the two accounts balance each other.

Now let us return to the goddess Kubjikā who goes on to instruct Raktā:

"The previous condition will prevail (and it will be) the abode of eight billions (koṭi) (fine) qualities.[1] When (you) return from the assembly of the Skyfaring (Yoginīs) (khecarīcakra),[2] by the grace of (my) unfailing Command, you will have eight mind-born sons and there will be six servants (guṇa). You (will be) the mother of the eight Śākinīs[3] and (there will be) eight kings of thrones.

[. . .] (You are the goddess who) regulates (the cosmic order) (niyāmikā), abides in tranquillity (nivṛttisthā) and, accompanied by eight sons and daughters, brings about many creations. In the Kṛta Age your consort is Mitrānanda, the great lord of Oḍḍa, who burns well, full of (every good)

---

[1] According to the ŚM this number refers to the number of disciples of the eight sons:

And eight lords of the lion's throne will protect the Kaulika (teachings). There will be eight billions (koṭi) of them in my lineages (santāna).

siṁhāsanādhipāś cāṣṭau [g: -dhiyācāṣṭau] pālayiṣyanti [kh: pālayanti] kaulikam [kh: kulakramaṁ] ||
bhaviṣyanti ca santāne [kh: saṁtāna; g: santānaṁ] me teṣām aṣṭakoṭayaḥ || ŚM 3/17.

[2] Located in the End of the Twelve, Khecarīcakra is the highest centre in the macro - microcosm. As the highest of a set of five Wheels, it is described in chapter 16 of the KMT. See Heilijgers-Seelen 1992: 150 ff..

[3] Then the names of these eight goddesses are listed, followed by those of the eight sons (the 'kings of thrones') and the six servants (KMT 2/43–45). See appendix II where all the sons, daughters and guardians of the seats are listed. The daughters of the goddess of this seat are said to be Śākinīs in the ŚM (3/18) as well.

quality.[1] Eight sons will exert (their) authority in (this) the final (paścima) tradition (anvaya). Six Lords of Kula[2] will (similarly) exert authority (there) and in each Age traditions will arise (kramodaya) with different names. Thus you have been informed of everything that is to come, the Current of the Transmission (kramaugha) and the Kula liturgy (paddhati). Raktacāmuṇḍā! Let us go as (we) please."[3]

The account of these seats in the ŚM adds two features not found in the other two sources. One is the description of the iconic form of the deities in each seat and that of their spiritual offspring. According to their gender, they are invariably portrayed as the same as one or other of the two deities. This set up works for the sons and daughters, but as all the guardians are Gaṇeśas, one would expect variant iconic representations of the elephant god. The ŚM also describes a yantra for each of the first four sacred seats.[4] The fifth one, the seat of Mātaṅga, is the abode of the goddess who presides over the fifth gross element, namely, Space (ākāśa). This is 'unmanifest' (avyakta) and for this reason, perhaps, this seat has no yantra. As the other seats are each related to one of the other four elements, their yantra is probably that of their corresponding element. According to the KuKh, the reason why the fifth seat (there called Tisra) is not manifest is that it is the sacred seat of the future[5], which is also implied in the account in the KMT.

Of all the places the goddess visits, the five *pīṭha*s or 'sacred seats' are particularly important. Accordingly, they are described in greater detail and, acknowledging their special status, the ṢSS devotes a separate chapter to them. It is from these seats that the teachings have and will be propagated. Presented in increasingly greater details in the subsequent Tantras after the KMT, the first four seats are each coupled with a Siddha who propagates a transmission (krama) through a lineage (oli) of teachers and disciples founded by him. The absence of any reference to these particular Siddhas and their lineages in the myth narrated in

---

[1] The ŚM says: That sacred seat is called Oḍiyāṇa. Well known, it came to the earth. In the Kṛta Age, the great lord (maheśāna), the venerable Oḍu is your master (nātha). Along with you, he will protect the unfailing Command here in (this) sacred seat.

tat pīṭham [g: pīṭha] oḍiyāṇākhyaṁ [kh: oḍḍiyāṇā-] prasiddham agamad [kh: agamat; g: agamaḥ] bhuvi [g: bhuviḥ] ||
śrīmān [g: śrīmahendra] oḍumaheśānas [g: maheśānat] tava nāthaḥ kṛte yuge | pālayiṣyaty amoghājñāṁ [g: atyamoghā-] atra pīṭhe tvayā saha || ŚM 3/13cd-14.

[2] The six Lords of Kula are the six guardians (praticāra) of this seat. The ŚM (3/20d) says that: these six will be the leaders of the heroes (ṣaḍ ete vīranāyakāḥ).

[3] KMT 2/41-42; 46–49.

[4] See appendix II for descriptions of these yantras and the names of the sons, daughters and guardians of each seat listed in the ŚM and the ṢSS.

[5] Concerning the seat Tisra see KuKh 6/164-190ab.

the KMT and its expansions suggests that this legend had not been formulated at the earliest stages of the development of the Kubjikā cult when, presumably, this myth was first committed to writing. Nonetheless, the seeds of future, elaborate developments concerning these Siddhas and their lineages, which we shall have occasion to examine later, have been sown in the KMT. Indeed, they are already considered so important that, despite the lack of elaboration, the tradition (āmnāya) is defined there as the worship of the sacred seats, their lords, the Siddhas, the mothers of the sacred seats close to them, and the goddess in the middle of the seats who is accompanied by the four Siddhas.[1]

The myth does present a model for the transmission of the teachings from these seats; however it is destined to be aborted. Here, unlike the other sites the goddess visits, the goddess generates sons, daughters and guardians, as Bhairava enjoins that she must if she is to unite with him.[2] In order to do this, she blesses the resident goddess (which the ṢSS refers to as the 'Yoginī'[3]) and Siddha to have sons and daughters who, produced at her instigation, are considered to be her 'mind-born' progeny.[4] Thus the ten sons of the goddess of Jālandhara are said to be 'mind-born in the sphere of Kula'[5], and they come from the assembly of Skyfaring Yoginīs – the Khecarīcakra at the extremity of the End of the Twelve above the head. This is where the goddesses of the seats are sent. "Play (there)," says Kubjikā to the goddess here in Oḍḍiyāna, "with the Skyfaring maidens, by the grace of my Command. You will be the mother of the lineage of Siddhas in each Age".[6] The goddess of the seat must return to her seat if she is to receive Kubjikā's Command by the grace of which she bears the spiritual offspring who are one with its bliss.[7] Ultimately, however, all the progeny of the sacred seats, like the goddesses and their consorts, come from the assembly of Skyfaring Yoginīs impelled by the Command.[8]

Descending from her supreme state in the centre of the Khecarīcakra, the goddess of the sacred seat returns to the mortal world to generate her offspring when the Siddha who is her consort similarly descends to join her.[9] And so Kubjikā promises the goddess of Oḍḍiyāna that: "there will be eight sons according

---

[1] pīṭhāḥ pīṭhādhipāḥ siddhāḥ pīṭhāmbās tatsamīpataḥ |
pīṭhamadhyagatāṁ devīṁ catuḥsiddhasamanvitām || KMT 19/109
Note that the names of the four Siddhas are not mentioned.
[2] ṢSS 4:5/5.
[3] ṢSS 4:5/7.
[4] KMT 2/42.
[5] ŚM 3/41ab.
[6] krīḍasva [g: -tvaṁ] khecarīsārdhaṁ [g: -sārddhe] mamājñāyāḥ [g: -jñā ca] prasādataḥ ||
siddhasantānamātā tvaṁ bhaviṣyasi yuge yuge || ŚM 3/30.
[7] KMT 2/39-42; 2/55-57.
[8] KMT 2/74-75.
[9] KMT 2/53-55.

to your intention and pleasure after (your consort) has come from the assembly of Skyfaring Yoginīs[1] by the grace of (my) unfailing Command."[2] In the Wheel the two, god and goddess, are one, both with each other and their supreme archetypes, and so Oḍīśī, the goddess of Oḍḍiyāna, is the mistress of the Wheel (cakranāyikā).[3] But in the mortal world she is separate from her consort just as she is from the Great Goddess who exercises her authority to bestow the Command, first on the goddess of the seat to make her like herself, and then to arrange her union with the god. In Jālandhara, for example, the goddess says to her counterpart in that seat: "May the god Kuṇḍalīśvara come from the Wheel of the Skyfaring maidens. He, Siddhanātha, who possesses great power, will be your lord (nātha)".[4]

The sons and daughters are very powerful and, possessing the authority to do so, they will 'bring down the Kula and Kaula (teachings into the world)'.[5] The Siddhas they generate thereby will multiply to great numbers. There will be 'twelve billion (koṭi) in Pūrṇagiri'.[6] The twelve virgin daughters of the goddess there will each produce ten million more.[7] Similarly, the goddess's offspring in Kāmarūpa 'will have descendents (santāna) in every age. They are the kings of the thrones and number fourteen billion (koṭi)'.[8] The spiritual offspring in each seat are like their parents. The goddess Karālī in Jālandhara has fierce daughters (karālī).[9] As protectors of the lineages and the teachings, they are always fierce and appear angry.[10] The daughters of the goddess in Kāmarūpa are 'fierce (ugrā) with respect to both grace and restraint (nigraha)'.[11] In other words, they punish with the same powerful intensity those who err against the tradition as they grace sincere devotees of the goddess. But they are also Yoginīs 'born of Yoga' who spread the teachings and so illumine like lamps and fill all beings with bliss.[12]

---

[1] Instead of: 'after (your consort) has come from the assembly of Skyfaring Yoginīs', MS G reads: 'after having seen the assembly of Skyfaring Yoginīs'.

[2] aṣṭau putrā bhaviṣyanti tavoddeśānumānasā [kh: tavoddeśika-; g: tavodeśā-] ||
āgatya [g: āgataṁ] khecarīcakrād amoghājñāprasādataḥ [g: khecarī dṛṣṭvā amoghājñāprabhāvataḥ] || ŚM 3/15

[3] oḍanāthasamopetā [g: -nāthaṁ samopetāṁ] oḍīśī cakranāyikā [g: -kāṁ] || ŚM 3/29cd.

[4] āgatu [kh: āgantu] khecarīcakrād devaḥ śrīkuṇḍalīśvaraḥ [kh: -leśvaraḥ] ||
siddhanātho [g: siddhi-] mahātejas [kh: -jās; g: – jā] tava [g: nava] nātho bhaviṣyati || ŚM 3/38.

[5] dvādaśaite mahātejāḥ kulakaulāvatārakāḥ [kh: -kaulaprakāśakāḥ] | ŚM 3/65ab.

[6] siṁhāsanādhipāḥ sarve [kh: sarvvā] siddhā dvādaśa koṭayaḥ || ŚM 3/68cd.

[7] KMT 2/74.

[8] siṁhāsanādhipā [g: -dhiyā] hy ete koṭayas tu [k: koṭayaś ca; g: koṭayas tuś] caturdaśa [kh g: caturddaśaḥ] || ŚM 3/90cd.

[9] KMT 2/56.

[10] KMT 2/99.

[11] etā duhitaraś cogrā nigrahānugrahaṁ prati || ŚM 3/88cd.

[12] KMT 2/93-94ab.

There are 134 sons, daughters and guardians (praticāraka) (also called 'Lords of the Kula') in the five sacred seats.[1] The ṢSS lists their locations in the body, that is, the 'inner' sites of the one energy (śakti) within the body (dehagā) that correspond to those in the 'foundation of reality' (tattvādhāra),[2] that is, the outer world. The ṢSS also lists the Tantric consorts – śakti – of the sons and, in one case, those of the guardians. The former are the fifty goddesses (or, one could call them Yoginīs) governing the letters of the Mālinī alphabet. It seems unlikely that the redactor(s) of the KMT originally intended this equation. It is unknown to the ŚM. Moreover, as we can see from the chart,[3] the sons are fifty-two, not fifty. To make up the full number the ṢSS has had to resort to the ploy of identifying the last two sons in the seat of Mātaṅga with the lord of the seat himself, although they are sons of the goddess.

The KMT says that the sons are 'kings of the thrones' (siṁhāsanadhipa) just as the daughters are said to be 'queens'.[4] According to the ṢSS these thrones are the parts of the body onto which the energies of the letters of the Mālinī alphabet are projected.[5] There we read:

> The kings of the thrones are created in association with the fifty (letters). All that (body) is garlanded (mālita) with them and is conjoined with the energies of Mālinī (the 'Garlanded One'). The places within the body are (denoted) by the word 'lion' and the 'kings' are the kings of the thrones (lit. 'lion seats') associated with series of Mālinī and the other (alphabets).[6]

---

[1] According to the ŚM (4/118ab): The total extent of (the contents) of all these seats is one hundred and thirty-four units (sarveṣāṁ parimānaṁ [kh: parimāne; g: -ṇe] ca [kh: na] catustriṁśādhikaṁ [kh: catutriṁśādhikaṁ] śatam [g: tataṁ] | This figure clearly refers to the number of sons, daughters and guardians in the five sacred seats. In the ṢSS we read:

> Formerly on the occasion of a conversation between Deva and Devī, when the conversation became decisive with regard to the relation between teacher and pupil, in that moment [Deva] emphatically said [to Devī] the following words: "Go to Bhārata Varṣa [to establish] the authority [of the doctrine] everywhere; in Pīṭhas, Upapīṭhas and Kṣetras create offspring in a manifold way. When [Your offspring] is completed, you will have sons, daughters and guardians; all of them together the number will be 134 on the earth. When this is accomplished, there will be union with me [again]; on their side they will form a community on earth encompassing millions of people. Go to Bhārata Varṣa, and create such an offspring! ṢSS 4:5/2-6 (translation by Schoterman).

[2] ṢSS 4:5/19.

[3] See appendix II.

[4] KMT 2/96ab.

[5] See chapter 18 of the KuKh which deals with the Mālinī alphabet and its projection onto the body.

[6] ṢSS 4:5/30-31.

The daughters and guardians, like the sons, also have their own residences. These too are 'within the body' (gātrānte)[1] and form part of the inner dimension (adhyātmā)[2], which is intended only for the practice of Kula yogis.[3] The 'places' (pura) in which they reside are not outer parts of the body as is the case with the energies of the Mālinī alphabet. They are instead 1) bodily constituents, such as 'bone' and 'sinew' and fluids such as 'tears', 'semen' and 'blood', 2) physiological processes such as those which produce the 'heat' of the body and the 'cooking' or digestion of food, 3) the complexion of the body, its 'splendour', 'brilliance' and the like, 4) bodily movements such as 'quivering', 'running', exhalation', 'inhalation' and 'coughing'.

Karāla – Jālandhara

(Then) having thus given them a boon, she reached Karāla.[4] The place is brilliant with rows of mighty flames (mahājvāla), the greatly astonishing energy (tejas) of the goddess, and so is called Jāla. Passing some time (there), she burnt with the awakened rays (of her radiance) and beheld before (her) countless marvellous creations like (those produced) by magic (indrajāla).

"Whose is this divine creation that was here before in the sacrifice? You have fallen due to the great heat (pratāpa) of my energy (but) have not fled (from it). O Karālavadanā (One with a Fierce Face), you who extend the net (jāla) of Māyā![5] You will soon (be given) lordship over Jālandhara. Once he comes from the assembly of the Skyfaring (Yoginīs) (khecarīcakra), the venerable lord Siddhakauṇḍalin, the lord (nātha) who knows all things (aśeṣārtha), will be your lord (nātha).[6]

---

[1] ṢSS 4:5/118.
[2] ibid. 4:5/74.
[3] ibid. 4:5/61, 89.
[4] The name of this place according to the ṢSS (1/37a and 4:5/40b) is Karālāmba. According to the ŚM it is Karālavaṁśa. There we read:

Once Kuleśvarī had established this intention (uddeśa) and given the boon, then the mother of the universe went to (the place) called Karālavaṁśa.

ity uddeśaṁ [kh: uddesīṁ; g: uddeśī] paristhāpya varaṁ datvā kuleśvarī ǀ tataḥ karālavaṁśākhyaṁ [kh g: -vaṁsākhyaṁ] jagāma jagadambikā [g: -kāṁ] ǁ ŚM 3/31.
[5] Instead of māyājālaprasārike the ṢSS (4:5/45d) reads māyājālaniyāmike – you who control the net of Māyā.
[6] Cf. ŚM 3/38 quoted above, p. 88.

You will have ten fearsome daughters and these ten (will) possess the most excellent qualities and higher bliss (uttarānanda).[1] O fair lady, you will have six attendants in (your) entourage and the race of (your) fierce (karālī) daughters[2] (will possess) the equal oneness of the bliss of the Command.[3]

[. . .] (These) lords (īśvara) will generate the higher bliss (uttarānanda) in each Age, and when the fall from (true) knowledge comes to an end (they will create other teachers) again and again with diverse names (saṁjñābheda) and, O Karālī,[4] they will be in your lineage by (the grace of) my Command.[5]

The KMT supplies two didactic etymologies of the name of this seat, which is understood to consist of two units. One is jāla which is fancifully derived from 'jvāla' – 'flame' or 'fire' – or may be understood as what it literally means, that is, 'net' in the sense of the 'net of Māyā' or the 'net of Indra' (indrajāla) i.e. 'magic'. The second part of the name is derived from dhara that means to 'endure', 'control' or 'possess'. Jālandhara is the seat which 'possesses' (dhara) this magical apparition, or according to the following lines in the ṢSS, where it is controlled:

> As (the goddess's) great heat (pratāpa) was endured (dhṛta) here, it is called 'Jāla'. As the net of Māyā is controlled (dhṛta) (here), that is the most excellent (place) for yogis. And so, the one who restrains the net of Māyā is called Jālandhara.[6]

The ŚM underscores that this sacred seat is especially associated with magical, yogic feats. There we read:

> She who is the light of fire burnt with the power of the great light and displayed a wonder (adbhuta) by the radiant energy (tejas) of her own power. Then, having seen (this) the goddess said: "whose is this auspicious creation? Who is (the god) who has previously made (his) residence here? Who is (the goddess) here who can bear my energy (tejas)?"
>
> Then Karālavadanā (the One with a Fierce Face), looking in front, said: "O goddess, I was previously appointed (sthāpitā) by you

---

[1] Perhaps this expression should be translated as 'elevated' (uttara) sons. Cf. the following lines where the expression recurs.
[2] The ṢSS (4:5/47c) refers to them as 'Kāralinīs'.
[3] I take this to be the meaning of the ungrammatical sentence: ājñānandasamekatvaṁ karālīduhitājanam (KMT 2/57cd).
[4] Read karāli for karālī.
[5] KMT 2/50-57; 62-63ab.
[6] ṢSS 4:5/42-43ab.

> here to this zone." The fierce (karālinī) goddess, seeing the one who could bear intense austerities said: "O fair lady! Well done! O beautiful one! O beloved of devotion! I am satisfied. You will soon rule over the sacred seat of Jāla. Your sons will have a divine form and will be very powerful. O fierce-faced one! You have covered it with the net (jāla) of Māyā and so it will be known in the world as the sacred seat of Jālandhara".[1]

Note that the ŚM implicitly says that the reason why the goddess in this seat managed to bear Kubjikā's energy was because Kubjikā had previously appointed her to be there. In other words, she had already been empowered by the goddess's Command that protected her.

The Sahya Forest – Pūrṇagiri

Having said this, the Great Goddess (maheśānī) went to the great forest called Sahya. She filled the triple universe with the flames of her complete (saṁpūrṇa) maṇḍala. (She filled) the entire universe without residue, (and the world) within (the area demarcated by the mountain) Lokāloka.[2]

The forest to which the KMT refers draws its name from the well-known Sahya mountain near modern Pune, on which it grows.[3] The goddess transforms this place into the sacred mountain called Full – Pūrṇagiri. Its new name is derived from the 'complete (saṁpūrṇa) maṇḍala' of energy that encompassed the entire universe. The mountain is not only itself full of the flaming energy of the

---

[1] mahāprabhāpratāpena jvalantī jvalanaprabhā [g: -prabhāṁ] |
adbhutaṁ darśayāmāsa svapratāpena [g: sa-] tejasā ||
tato dṛṣṭvāvadad [g: vade] devī kasyaiṣā [g: kasyaicā] racanā śubhā |
ko 'tra pūrvakṛtāvāsas [g: pūrvvā-] tejo me sahate 'tra kā ||
tato devī vilokyāgre karālavadanāvadat [kh: -vadano-; g: vadat] |
sthāpitāhaṁ [g: sthāpito-] tvayā devi [g: devī] pūrvam evātra gocare ||
tīvratāpasahāṁ [g: tāṁ pratāpasahāṁ] dṛṣṭvā devī prāha karālinī |
sādhu bhadre mahābhāge tuṣṭāhaṁ [kh g: tuṣṭohaṁ] bhaktivatsale [g: -vachale] ||
jālapīṭhādhipatyaṁ te [g: taṁ] śīghram eva bhaviṣyati |
putrās [g: putrā] tava bhaviṣyanti divyarūpā mahābalāḥ [g: -valā] ||
māyājālāvṛtaṁ [kh: -jālavṛtaṁ; g: -jālaṁvṛtaṁ] yasmāt [kh: tasmāt] karālavadane [kh: -vadanā] tvayā |
tasmāj jālandharaṁ pīṭhaṁ loke khyātiṁ gamiṣyati || ŚM 3/32-37.

[2] KMT 2/63cd-64.

[3] The ŚM confirms this identification saying that the goddess went not to the Sahya forest but the Sahya mountain (prāpya sahyaṁ mahīgiriṁ – ŚM 3/58ab).

goddess; it also marks the centre from which the goddess radiates it. The ŚM describes this event as follows:

> Covered for the full extent of (its) area with many sacred bathing sites on rivers, great and small. It is illumined by many jewels and apparitions (vibhrama) of many forms and full, beautiful (sacrificial) jars that (shine) like divine gold. There that (sacred seat) is completely full with the rays of the (goddess's) divine body (filled in this way) by (her) mere arrival there and so it is called Pūrṇagiri (the Full Mountain).[1]

The mountain burns intensely with the goddess's fire. It blazes with the intensity of the fire of universal destruction that burns at the end of each cosmic age. Brought about by the goddess's intense gaze, her representative here is appropriately called Caṇḍākṣī – 'she with fierce ('burning') eyes'. From here the goddess fills the universe with her energy right up to mount Lokāloka that marks the boundary of the universe.[2] Accordingly, this seat is associated with the element Fire. But fire burns and consumes whereas Pūrṇagiri, as we have seen,[3] is associated with nourishing fulfilment (puṣṭi), which seems to be the very opposite. The goddess's gaze burns up dross, supplies light and produces wonderful luminous forms. It also exudes nectar. Here then the two phases of the liberating action of initiation are reproduced on a cosmic scale. First comes the purification that takes place, as we are told, by the action of the Yoga of the Equinox. This is the rise of Kuṇḍalinī that takes place by the equalization of the Solar and Lunar breaths.[4] This phase is called 'dahana' which means 'burning' because in this

---

[1] nānānadanadītīrthair [g: – suṁdanadītirthair] vyāptaṁ [kh g: vyāpta] paryantamaṇḍalam [g: -paryyana-] ||
nānāratnaiḥ samuddyotam [kh, g: samudyotam] anekākāravibhramaiḥ |
divyakāñcanasaṁkāśaiḥ [g: saṁkāsaiḥ] pūrṇaiḥ [kh: pūrṇa; g: pūrṇai] kumbhair [kh: kuṁbha; g: kuṁbhai] manoramaiḥ [kh g: manorathaiḥ] ||
tatra saṁprāptamātreṇa divyadehamarīcibhiḥ [kh g: -dehaṁ –] |
tatrāsau paripūrṇas tu [kh: -pūrṇābhūt; g: -pūrṇāstu] tasmāt pūrṇagiriḥ [kh g: -giri] smṛtaḥ ||
ŚM 3/58cd-60.

[2] Mani (1984: 457) referring to chapter (skandha) eight of the Devībhāgavata says: There is a mountain between Loka and Aloka. This is called Lokālokaparvata and the land beside it is called Lokāloka. The mountain is as long as the distance between Mānasottara and Mahāmeru. This place is golden in colour and as smooth as glass. Not a single being lives there. God has created this as a boundary to the three worlds. All the planets like the Sun get light from the brilliance of this mountain. Brahmā has posted four diggajas [elephants that guard the quarters] named Vṛṣabha, Puṣpacūḍa, Vāmana and Aparājita at the four corners of this mountain.

[3] ṢSS 4:5/20-21, see above, p. 84.

[4] See note KuKh 2/15-16 concerning the Yoga (lit. 'union') of the inner equinox, which comes about by equalizing and merging the inhaled and exhaled breath, symbolized as night and day.

phase impurities are consumed by the fire of the goddess in her form as Kuṇḍalinī within the body. It is followed and completed by the next one, which is called ploṣaṇa, meaning 'flooding'. In this phase the body and universe is consecrated with the nectar of the lunar fluid that pours down from the lunar goddess who is the energy of the Moon. The ṢSS alludes to how this happens in a verse not found in the KMT:

> The universe is said to be the body. The energy (kalā) above the palate, by virtue of the nectar (that drips from the palate), is the life (jīvita) that is the essence of the universe beginning and ending with the Rudras.[1]

We shall see in detail in the following chapter that this energy above the palate is that of the New Moon hidden in the Full Moon, which, inwardly nourished by it, exudes nectar. This nectar is the life of the body and the whole universe represented here by the fifty Rudras who govern the energies of the letters projected onto the cosmic body. In this way the desire of the goddess who resides there, and of all who go there to receive the Command, is fulfilled. This then is the third reason why this mountain is called Full. As the KMT tells us:

As long as (the goddess) was there, Caṇḍākṣī (offered her) fervent (balavat)[2] worship of many kinds by many means and ways[3] and she produced many beautiful creations by various means. And they shine with the lights of (her) energy filled with the (divine) qualities of Caṇḍākṣī.

The mountain where the goddess stayed, burning intensely and shining with flames, became a firm (well protected) place (while all) the rest of the mobile and immobile (universe) was burnt (away). All of this was filled with countless (beautiful) creations and the like. The Mother beheld the mountain (then) at the end of time with joyful eyes. (Thus) as long as Caṇḍākṣī, whose power was without limit, desirous of the qualities of the Divine Current (of the transmission), gazed (at the things) in front (of her), she filled the universe with (many kinds of divine) nectar.[4]

The Great Goddess (now) said this: "Well done, you whose desire has been fulfilled! As this place has been filled (by you in this way), your nature is full (pūrṇarūpiṇī). And (you) will (possess) sovereignty (over this place which

---

[1] ṢSS 4:5/63.

[2] Perhaps 'balavat' should be understood to mean 'balavatī' and referred to Caṇḍākṣī or as it stands in a compound with 'paricaryāṁ' as I have done.

[3] Read nayopāyair for nayopādair.

[4] I take viśvāmṛtaiḥ to be an irregular compound. The sense being viśvam amṛtaiḥ.

is) this mountain that is your creation (udbhava). As you have purified (saṁskṛta) this (place) with the Yoga of the Equinox (viṣuvayoga) you will indeed be the mistress of (this) sacred seat in every Age. (You will be given) authority at the end of the Dvāpara Age.[1] The seat on the shoulders of fire (tejaskandhāsana)[2] (will be given) to you and your consort in the world will surely be Cakrānanda. He is the Lord of Kula, the foundation of the Knots and his form is that of the maṇḍala, completely full (with all that is sacred).[3]

Another reason why this seat is called Full is because it contains the three other main seats. This notion is implied in a number of obscure statements scattered in these verses. One is that Cakrānanda, as the foundation of the Knots, is the complete maṇḍala. The other is the reference to the Path of the Division of the Gander (haṁsabheda) that occurs further ahead in the narrative. Chapter 27 of the ṢSS explains these connections and how they are related to the Moon, the Yoga of the Equinox, the Fire of Time, time itself and the Divine Current. The latter is the current of energy that flows within the supreme principle. Time and the lunar energy of this seat are implicitly represented by the reference to the Knots of which the Lord of this seat is the 'foundation' and master. We shall see in chapter three how these sixteen Knots are related to the phases of the Moon and the four sacred seats.[4] It is sufficient to note here that in this way the close link this seat has with the Moon and the stream of Time is tacitly reinforced.

The ŚM sums up the essential teaching concerning this sacred seat by declaring that: '(This place is) the Full Moon and, divine, it is located in the principle of Fire (tejas)'.[5] Conjoined with the inhaled breath it is full of the lunar energies and dispenses the plenitude of its lunar nectar to all the elements represented by the sacred seats it contains. Conjoined with the exhaled breath, it burns with the Fire of Time, consuming time by absorbing it and all things into the eternal fullness of unity. The KMT continues:

---

[1] The first four sacred seats are commonly associated with the four Ages (yuga). In this account, however, only this seat and Kāmarūpa (which belongs to the Kali Age) are specifically stated to belong to a particular Age. See KMT 2/90.

[2] Further ahead (in KMT 2/91) we are told that Kāmarūpa is 'on the shoulders of the wind'. Fire, the third gross element and Wind (or Air), the fourth, correspond to the third and fourth sacred seat, respectively. This means that Oḍḍiyāna and Jālandhara correspond to the first and second element, namely, Earth and Water, and Mātaṅga, to the fifth element – Space. These correspondences are in fact commonly made throughout the Kubjikā Tantras. See, for example, KuKh 28/5-6 and YKh (1) 5/25-26ab.

[3] KMT 2/65-73.

[4] See chapter 3, p. 596 ff. where the passage in chapter 27 of the ṢSS is presented and discussed.

[5] pūrṇacandramayaṁ divyaṁ tejastattve [g: tejatatve] vyavasthitam || ŚM 3/74cd.

Twelve virgin daughters will be (given) to you in the world and from each one there (will be) ten million (more) who will (possess) the authority to govern. In the same way, there will be twelve sons and half that number of attendants who will come, impelled by my Command, from the assembly of the Skyfaring (Yoginīs) (khecarīcakra). You have propitiated me and so I will tell (you who they are) by name. [1] [. . .] (The Siddhas who will sit on the sovereign throne on mount Pūrṇa) will illumine the path of the Division of the Gander (haṁsabheda) [2] and the rest. [. . .][3] O Caṇḍākṣī,[4] all this, as is proper, will take place before you at my Command. (Now) I will go to Kāmika."[5]

Kāmikā – Kāmarūpa

Having said this, she quickly went (to the place) where the auspicious river Ucchuṣmā (flows). It is in the Mahocchuṣma forest and transports the Divine and Mortal Currents (of the transmission).[6] The goddess, endowed with the attributes of the divine Command, sports there where the lakes Mahocchuṣma and Nīla (are located).[7] After she had enjoyed herself for some time on the banks of both (lakes), she whose limbs are the universe and the principles of existence, gazed upon (the goddess of the place). She was made haughty by the enjoyment of passion (kāmabhogakṛtāṭopā) and burnt with

---

[1] Then the names of the twelve virgins are listed followed by those of the twelve Siddhas. See chart in appendix II.

[2] Haṁsabheda is one of a series of Tantras listed in the beginning of the Kularatnoddyota (1/10-20). See Dyczkowski 1989: 185 note 177. Here, however, the practice mentioned above, rather than the Tantra, is probably meant.

[3] Then come the names of the six guardians (rakṣaka). See chart in appendix II.

[4] Read caṇḍākṣi for caṇḍākṣī.

[5] KMT 2/74-76ab, 80ab, 81cd-82ab.

[6] Later doctrine makes much of this distinction. We shall see further ahead in detail that the Divine Current is the flow of energy within the goddess. The Mortal Current consists of the lineages of human Siddhas.

[7] These two lakes are in the forest of Mahocchuṣma. The ŚM refers to only one of them. There we read:

The Supreme Goddess (Parameśvarī) (resides) to the north of lake Nīla within the Mahocchuṣma forest and has authority over the sacred seat of Kāma.

nīlasyottaradigbhāge [kh: nīlasyāntaradigbhāge; g: -bhogo] hradasya [g: hṛdayasya] parameśvarī |
mahocchuṣmavanāntasthā [k kh: -chūṣmācanānta-] kāmapīṭhādhikāriṇī || ŚM 3/91.

(the fire of) the Lord of Love (vasantatilaka). (Herself) melting with desire (icchayā), she caused the three worlds to melt (with that same desire).[1]

In her journey around the land of Bhārata the goddess assumes various forms in the places where she resides as the presiding goddess, and so reveals different aspects of herself according to where she manifests. In some of these places the erotic aspect of her nature becomes apparent. The form of the goddess is, as one would expect, particularly erotic in Kāmarūpa. There she is 'made haughty by the enjoyment of passion' (kāmabhogakṛṭāṭopā). Her aroused erotic nature is symbolized by her fluidity; she melts and flows. She is also arousing, causing 'the three worlds' to melt and flow by the force of her desire (icchā). Thus, in a mantra she is addressed as 'she who causes sperm to flow' (śukradrāviṇī).[2] This reminds us of the ancient symbolic connection found in the Veda between moisture, water, rain, potent fluids (including sexual juices and milk) and energy. The goddess's intense spiritual potency is symbolized by her powerful sexuality represented by her perpetual moisture as the Yoni full of seed.[3]

---

[1] KMT 2/82cd-86ab. Instead of icchayā ṢSS 4:5/93cd reads īkṣanair – 'with looks' i.e. by repeatedly looking or gazing. Thus the version in the ṢSS says: (Herself) melting (with desire), she caused the three worlds to melt with (her) looks.

[2] This mantra is the last of thirty-two forms of the thirty-two syllable Vidyā of the goddess presented in chapter 21 of YKh (1). It reads:

AIṀ 5 AIṀ NAMAḤ KLEDANI KLINNE MADADRAVE HRĪṀ (K: HVĪṀ) KUBJIKE HRĀṀ CHRĪṀ KLĪṀ HŪṀ ŚUKRADRĀVAṆI ŚUKRADRĀVAṆI PHREṀ HRĪṀ KLĪṀ KLĪṀ ĀṀ (K: Ā) HŪṀ

AIṀ HRĪṀ ŚRĪṀ KHPHREṀ HSAUṀ AIṀ salutation O you who make wet (with sexual juices)! O you who are wet! O you who flow (with the juices of) passion! HRĪṀ O Kubjikā! HRĀṀ CHRĪṀ KLĪṀ HŪṀ! O (you) who causes sperm to flow! O (you) who causes sperm to flow! PHREṀ HRĪṀ KLĪṀ KLĪṀ ĀṀ HŪṀ!

[3] This association has been perceived for centuries and is still commonly felt. To this day the temple to the goddess Kāmākhya at Gauhati in Assam, the site traditionally identified as that of Kāmarūpa, enshrines the Yoni of the goddess. It is a round black stone that emerges from the ground. There is a cleft running down its centre from which water seeps, constantly fed by a small underground spring. It periodically oozes water that has percolated through minerals under the ground that turn it red. This is said to take place once a year when this formless stone icon of the goddess is considered to be in 'menses' and so is particularly sacred and powerful (see note to KuKh 3/33-4).

Note, by the way, that the contempory goddess Kāmākhyā shares a number of features in common with Kubjikā whom the local Kaula Brahmin priests call Kubjā Kumārī. Like the most prominent iconic form of Kubjikā (described in chapter 29 of the KuKh), Kāmākhyā also has six faces. Her 'secret abode', which is on mount Nīlācala near the town, is called 'the sacred seat of Kubjikā' (KāPu 76/73-75 quoted in chapter 2, p. 250-251). It is hard to say how long these links with the goddess Kubjikā have been in place. The Kālikāpurāṇa draws substantial amounts of

When she is engaged in union with Bhairava, he addresses her as 'one whose mind is wet' (klinnacetas). She is the 'bliss of the sport (of love making)' and the teachings are the Path that Wets (kledanāmārga).[1] Here in the holy site of Kāmarūpa, the goddess's spiritual energy is particularly intense, even the goddess is amazed to perceive the intensity of her arousal and for a moment is 'deluded', loosing consciousness, overawed by the powerful beauty of her own form reflected in the goddess of the place. Here she is young and passionate (kāminī) and what she reveals gives even the god who merely beholds her here 'the attainment of the fruit of the bliss of passion', that is, the empowering energy of the Transmission. Spiritually aroused and arousing in this way, she is accordingly called Kāmeśvarī – 'the Mistress of Passion'. The account in the KMT continues:

The Mother smiled when she saw her. "Who are you and where have you come from?" (she asked). Seeing her, the Mother was deluded, although she knew (everything, it was as if) she knew (it) not. Resting for a while, as she looked (around) again (she saw the goddess of the place) and said: "you are Ucchuṣmā,[2] (the river goddess) who transports (the current) of delight. (You have) come here before. Well done, passionate one! (I am pleased with) what you have shown me everywhere (around). By virtue of this, be Kāmeśvarī, (the embodiment of) the attainment of the fruit of the bliss of passion. Out of compassion, the manifold form of passion (kāmarūpa) has been fashioned before me. And so this will indeed be Kāmarūpa (the Form of Passion), the great sacred seat and your sacrificial rite.[3] When the Age of Strife (kaliyuga) comes your consort (pati) (will be) Candrānanda.[4]

The account in the ŚM is less complex. There we are simply told that:

> Having said this, (the goddess) went quickly to where the great forest of Ucchuṣma is. (The goddess) called Ucchuṣmā resides there in the form of a river. She whose passion has been fulfilled (pūrṇakāmā) went where the great river Ucchuṣmā (flows). At that moment, the goddess Ucchuṣmā, beautiful in all (her) limbs, spontaneously appeared. By the power of the might of that (event), the material from early Bhairava Tantras. It is not impossible that the redactor of this part of it was acquainted with the Kubjikā Tantras.

---

[1] KMT 3/40.

[2] Read tvam ucchuṣmā for tāvocchuṣma.

[3] Instead of mahat pīṭhaṁ tavādhvaram i.e. 'the great sacred seat and your sacrificial rite' the ṢSS (4:5/97d) reads: kāmarūpanirīkṣaṇam i.e. 'the gaze which is passion'. Thus the whole sentence means: And so this will indeed be Kāmarūpa (the Form of Passion), the gaze which is passion.

[4] KMT 2/86cd-90.

> goddess stood before (Kubjikā) with folded hands. Then the goddess, her mind exalted with delight, addressed her saying: "(You are) the goddess who bears (any) form (you) desire (kāmarūpadharā) and (possessing) many forms, you are attractive. (You are) complete in all (your) limbs and endowed with all (good) characteristics. Reside and exert authority here. When Candrānanda comes, he will be your Lord (nātha) and he will exert authority along with you (here) in Kāmarūpa."[1]

After the goddess has gone to the Sahya forest where she projects Pūrṇagiri, she moves on to a river called Ucchuṣmā in the Mahocchuṣma forest. The ṢSS narrates that the goddess:

> went all the way to Ucchuṣmā, the big river, which is situated in the forest called Mahocchuṣma, and which bears along its stream the host of gods and mortals. In the forest Mahocchuṣma where one finds the [pools] Nīla and Mahāhrada, there Devī rested in between the left and right eye.[2]

The ṢSS is referring here to the projection of these places onto the head that is concisely described in the following passage:

> Ucchuṣma is in the central aperture. At the left [peak] the Nīlahrada should be, and the Hrada [= Mahāhrada] at the right peak. . . . This pair of apertures, O Devī, is known as the peak of Trikūṭa. The third one is the (brahmarandhra), which is called the Forest of

---

[1] evam uktvā [k: uktā; kh: uttkā] gatā tūrṇaṁ [kh: pūrṇaṁ; g: tīrṇaṁ] yatrocchuṣmaṁ [k: -cchūṣmaṁ; g: – chūṣmaṁ] mahāvanam [g: -valaṁ] ||
ucchuṣmānāmasaṁjñā [g: ucchūṣmā] ca nadīrūpā [k: nada-; kh: nadi-] vyavasthitā |
pūrṇakāmā jagāmāsau [kh: -māsauḥ] yatrocchuṣmā [k g: -cchūṣmā] mahānadī ||
tatkṣaṇāt [g: -ṇā] sahajocchuṣmā [k: -cchūṣmā] sarvāvayavasundarī |
tatprabhāvabalād [k: kalā; kh: valā] devī babhūvāgre kṛtāñjaliḥ [g: -jali] ||
pratyuvāca tato devī harṣotkarṣitamānasā |
kāmarūpadharā [k kh: -dharāṁ] devī [k: devīṁ; kh: divyāṁ; g: divyaṁ] nānārūpamanoharā [k: -ramām; kh: -harāṁ; g: – rūpo-] ||
sarvāvayavasaṁpūrṇā [k kh: -pūrṇāṁ] sarvalakṣaṇasaṁyutā [k: -śobhitām; kh: -lakṣitāṁ] |
adhikāraṁ [kh: -kāra] kuru [kh: guru] tvaṁ hi atraiva tu [kh: ca; g: missing] kuru [k: vara; g: kula] sthitim [k: -varṇini; kh: sthitaṁ; g: sthiti] ||
candrānandaḥ [kh: -naṁda] samāgatya tava [k: nava] nātho bhaviṣyati | [k: + kāmarūpatvam āpannā tena tvaṁ kāmarūpakam |]
kāmarūpe tvayā sārdham adhikāraṁ [kh: sārddha-] kariṣyati || ŚM 3/78cd-83.

[2] ṢSS 4:5/90-91 translated by Schoterman.

> Ucchuṣma. From [this] Ucchuṣma a [twofold] stream comes forth, right and left. Where [this twofold stream] comes together, O Varārohā, there abides Parameśvarī. Because she can see [there every form] at will, that [place] is known as Kāmarūpa.[1]

We have seen that the KMT says that Trikūṭa is the first place to which the goddess goes from mount Kaumāra and makes no further reference to it in her myth. Above we have noted that according to the ṢSS, mount Trikūṭa is at the End of the Twelve and encloses with its three peaks the Santānabhuvana. But although there is no other reference to it elsewhere in the goddess's myth, the ṢSS (inconsistently, it seems), presumes that Kāmarūpa lies within the three peaks of mount Trikūṭa ('Triple Peak'). In this perspective, the three peaks are the lakes Nīlahrada in the north and Hrada in the south. The third peak is the Ucchuṣma forest that is located in or is itself the Cavity of Brahmā (brahmarandhra) at the top of the head. Schoterman explains: 'the description of the text makes us visualize a triangle, the apex of which is Ucchuṣma, while its base is formed by Nīlahrada and Hrada, the two eyes. From the apex of the triangle a twofold stream comes forth, which debouches into the two pools which Nīlahrada and Hrada actually are. [. . .] The place where the twofold stream comes together is Ucchuṣmavana, and is identified with Kāmarūpa. Probably not only Ucchuṣma, but also the eyes constitute this fourth Mahāpīṭha . . . The identification of these three places which have the shape of a triangle with Kāmarūpa is rather obvious due to the fact that a triangle represents the Yoni.'[2]

The KMT continues:

(Candrānanda) is seated on the shoulders of the Wind and illumines the nature of the Self (ātmabheda). He is the lord (nātha) who knows all things (aśeṣārtha).[3] Omniscient, he is the Supreme Lord (parameśvara). O passionate one (kāmikā), he will be the Lord of Love and a lover for you. There will be thirteen daughters endowed with (all good) qualities. Yoginīs born of Yoga, (they will be) your auspicious damsels (ḍikkārikā). In the same way (you will have) thirteen sons and these seven attendants. They will be lamps for the universe and (will fill) the universe with bliss.[4]

---

[1] ibid. 1/44-47 translated by Schoterman.
[2] Schoterman 1981: 59. For a diagram see Dyczkowski 2004: 173.
[3] Alternatively, one could translate 'aśeṣārtham' as 'all the meaning (of the scripture)'.
[4] KMT 2/91-94ab.

Then the names of the thirteen daughters (referred to as 'queens') are listed followed by those of the thirteen sons. This is what the text refers to as the 'multifarious descent that will take place when the Age of Strife (kaliyuga) comes'. Then, after the names of the seven attendants have been listed, we are told that they are:

(...) terrible (viṣama), angry and the protectors of the entire lineage. These very powerful beings are equal (towards) all and, in the Age of Strife, will reside in each sacred field, sacred seat, primary and secondary, and meeting ground (saṁdoha).[1]

Mahocchuṣma Forest – Mātaṅga Trisrota

O Kāmāmbikā, I will (now) tell (you) something else and you will do it. There will be a wheel of energies (kalācakra) that comes forth from my body and it will know the supreme (transcendent) and lower (immanent) division. Know that that is common to (all) four (sacred seats). Born of the Mātaṅga Kula in the northern part of (lake) Nīla, it is in the forest of Mahocchuṣma.[2] This, (both) supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent), is the fifth lord of the sacred seats. Located in Mātaṅginī's Kula, it is both the first (i.e. the most excellent) and the fifth (of the sacred seats). The entire universe has come into being due to that and that has come into being as Kulākula (Śakti and Śiva) and is born from the limbs of my body. They will (all) be in your sacrificial rite.

It is enjoined with a view to the task (in hand). It is not enjoined for other people. That is located in the middle place (madhyadeśa). It is close to me, (the goddess). There will be an incarnation (avatāraka) accompanied by Siddhas and guardians.

The entire universe is Stillness (nirācāra) and is devoid of Stillness and by means of the Yoga of Stillness they will make it tranquil.[3]

Let us pause here to examine this important practice to which we will find repeated reference throughout our sources. Stillness (nirācāra) is the condition of

---

[1] KMT 2/99cd-100. The ŚM (3/105cd) concludes by saying: This is the authority over Passion (kāma) established in Kāmarūpa.
etat kāmādhikāraṁ tu kāmarūpe vyavasthitam [kh: -sthitā; g: -sthito] ||

[2] This is also the name of the other lake. So this forest may also be close to the other lake. Note that we were told that Kāmarūpa is also in this forest. The KuKh 6/164-165ab similarly says that Trisrota is close to Kāmarūpa, although the Mahocchuṣma forest is not mentioned at all.

[3] KMT 2/101-107. Those who will do this, apparently, are the nine Yoginīs and the thirteen Siddhas whose names are listed next (ibid. 2/108-110ab).

transcendental being which is the source, ground and ultimate nature of the moving universe. Thus the KMT declares that: 'the entire universe is stillness and (yet) is devoid of stillness'.[1] The lineage of accomplished adepts (siddhakrama) and the path they teach are all established in the Stillness[2] of the 'motionless' flow of vitality in the emptiness of the supreme state which is this stillness itself.[3] The adept who recites the mantra in conjunction with this Stillness is purified and protected from all defilement:

> Standing, waking, sleeping, moving, enjoying and intent on sex – the one who observes Kaula practice (caryā) and who is still (nirācārin) (remains always) pure by recollecting mantra.[4]

The adept begins the practice of constant recollection by repeating the Vidyā immersed in the Yoga of Stillness, in a cremation ground or some appropriate solitary place or sacred site. The ŚM explains how he should do this as follows:

> O fair-faced lady, one should repeat the Vidyā (in conjunction) with the Yoga of Stillness. Stillness is power (śakti). One should repeat (the Vidyā) that is within her (garbhagatā). (Straight) in the form of a stick, one should lead here along until she is within the Cavity of Brahmā. By practicing the plane of Stillness, one attains the plane of Stillness.[5]

In the same Tantra we also read:

> By the practice of the Yoga of Stillness, one obtains the fruit. She whose nature is movement (cara) moves, (and her movement is) divided into (downward) motion (cāra) and upward motion (uccāra). That should be known as Stillness (nirācāra). Stillness is not other (than this). (This is) where actions (cāra) cease along with the

---

[1] KMT 2/107. Cf. YKh (2) 19/51cd ff. quoted in chapter 2, p. 375-376.
[2] KMT 1/44-46.
[3] The very last line of the KMT concludes declaring that: This is the plane of Stillness and so it is considered to be supreme. nirācārapadaṁ hy etat tenedaṁ paramaṁ smṛtam KMT 25/232cd.
[4] tiṣṭhan jāgran svapan gacchan bhuñjāno maithune rataḥ ||
caryādhārī [kh: sarvvā-] nirācārī [k kh: -cāro; g: -dhārī] mantrasaṁsmaraṇāc chuciḥ [g: -nāñ chari] | ŚM 11/207cd-208ab.
[5] nirācāreṇa [g: nirākāreṇa] yogena japed vidyāṁ varānane ||
nirācāraṁ [g: nirākāra] bhavec chaktis tasyā [k: – tasya; g: bhaveśakti-] garbhagatāṁ [kh: garbhe; g: managataṁ] japet [kh: samabhyaset] |
daṇḍākārāṁ nayet tāvad yāvad brahmabilaṁ gatā [k: bilāntagā; kh: – gatāṁ; g: – gataḥ] || nirācārapadābhyāsān [g: nirācārāpyadā-] nirācārapadaṁ labhet | ŚM 9/95cd-97ab.

> activities (karman) of speech, mind, and body. When a pure (nirmala)[1] state arises, that is said to be Stillness.[2]

In other words, this Stillness is the highest condition of the movement of the breath when it has reached the summit of existence beyond the End of the Twelve above the head. The Bliss of Stillness (nirānanda)[3] is the supreme bliss that is the ultimate end of all fettered existence. We are told below that this reality is the All – Pervasive Lord (prabhu) who is present in every state of being. There, the goddess who is the power of bliss is in her supreme form, which is 'imperishable and horrific'. Extending down into the body and into the consciousness of the individual soul who resides in it and the entire world, the same Stillness is Śiva who is the universal agent[4] and so, in its immanent aspect also it remains the abode of the power of bliss. There, extending upwards through the central channel between the two breaths, now stilled, the goddess travels through it, awakening the individual soul to its true infinite nature. Thus the Yoga of Stillness serves to still the restless movement of phenomenal, fettered existence.

The Śāmbhava Path, taught in the Kubjikā Tantras as the supreme one that leads to liberation, is that of Stillness. Void of all exertion and conceptions, it is at once the means and the goal. The ṢSS teaches:

> (That reality is) devoid of mind (amanaska), beyond mind, devoid of (both) Being and Non-being, free of (both the) merger and utterance (of cosmogenic Speech), devoid of logic (hetutarka), free of what is to be abandoned or adopted, and devoid of scripture and examples (to explain its nature). Its state that of Non-being (nāstikyabhāva),[5] it is the Void and free of imperfections. The lord who is the cause (of all things), is the transcendent union (yoga) of the series of objects of knowledge.[6]

---

[1] The text implies here that the privative prefix `nir' of 'nirācāra' denotes that state that is 'nirmala' i.e. 'devoid of impurity'. So 'nirācāra' means 'pure activity' or 'pure behaviour'.

[2] nirācāreṇa yogena abhyasaṁs tu phalaṁ [k: abhāvenākulaṁ] labhet ||
cāroccāravibhāgena carate cararūpiṇī [k: carataḥ sthāpiṇi carā] |
nirācāraḥ sa vijñeyo nirācāras tu [k: nirācāraṁ tu; kh: nirācārasu] netaraḥ [kh: cetaraḥ + vāhyācāro na mantraccāra(?)] ||
yatrācārā [kh: yatra-] nivartante vāṅmanaḥkāyakarmabhiḥ [k: cātmanaḥ-; kh: -karmmaṇiḥ] |
*utpanne [k: utpadyante] nirmale bhāve [k: -lā bhā ; kh: -lā bhāvaḥ] nirācāraḥ sa ucyate ||
ŚM 19/337cd-339.

[3] Nirānanda is short for nirācārānanda. Cf. KuKh 2/4cd-6ab and 2/32-34ab.

[4] KuKh 13/7.

[5] Concerning the doctrine of Non-being, see Dyczkowski 2004: 51ff..

[6] amanaskaṁ manātītaṁ [k kh: manotītaṁ] bhāvābhāvavivarjitam || layoccāravinirmuktaṁ hetutarkavivarjitam |

The commentary explains:

> (It is also) devoid of the senses. What is the series of objects of knowledge? It is the line (of deities) associated with the objects of knowledge, namely, Paramaśiva, Śakti, Sadāśiva, Īśvara, Rudra, Viṣṇu, and Brahmā. (The reality) devoid of that is the supreme expanse (parākāśa), the unmanifest. Yoga and the like, as well as the purification of the Sixfold Path[1] (of manifestation) and the like, serve (only) as the instrumental cause (nimitta) of its perception (upalabdhi), that is, as the cause of its yogic perception (yogopalabdhi). By what means (upāya)? The Void of the Mind, that is, the void of thought constructs, should be placed in the Void of Consciousness. Then, the Void of Consciousness should be placed in the Supreme Void in such a way that a state of oneness (sāmarasya) prevails both internally and externally due to the destruction of thought constructs (vikalpakṣaya) and the realisation (upalakṣaṇa) of one's own nature.
>
> These three Voids (ākāśa) (also) have other names. (These are) the Void of the Mind, the Void of Brahmā[2]and the Void of the Yoni. The Void of the Mind (is so called) because it generates thought constructs, the Void of Brahmā because thought constructs are destroyed (within it), and the Supreme Void because it is a condition of oneness. The same is said here: The supreme abode is free from doubt.[3] This is the Śāmbhava Path or the Path of Stillness (nirācāra).[4]

---

heyopādeyanirmuktaṁ śrutidṛṣṭāntavarjitam ||
nāstikyabhāvasaṁpannaṁ śūnyabhūtam anāmayam |
prameyāvaliyogaṁ ca atītaṁ kāraṇeśvaram || ṢSS 29/45cd-47.

[1] See note to KuKh 2/29-30ab.

[2] An interesting variant reads the Void of Fire (vahnyākāśa) instead of the Void of Brahmā.

[3] ṢSS 29/51ab.

[4] indriyarahitam || prameyāvalir iti kim || paramaśiva – śakti – sadāśiva – īśvara – rudra – viṣṇu – brahmāḥ [k kh: brahmā] iti prameyagatā [kh: -yāgatā] paṅktiḥ prameyāvaliḥ || tadrahitaṁ parākāśamayam anābhāsam [k: anātamaṁ; kh: atātamaṁ] || tasyopalabdhinimittaṁ [k: -nimitaṁ] yogādi [k: yogāni] ṣaḍadhvaśuddhyādi [k: ṣaḍhvaśuddhyādi; kh: adhvaśuddhyādi] sarvaṁ tasya yogopalabdhikāraṇam [k: yogopalakṣikaraṇaṁ] || katham upāyaḥ [k kh: upādhayaḥ] || yathā manākāśaṁ vikalpākāśaṁ cidākāśe [k kh: -śaṁ] samāropyam || cidākāśaṁ punaḥ parākāśe samāropyaṁ yena sāmarasyaṁ sabāhyābhyantare [ṭīkā: -bhyantaraṁ] bhavati vikalpakṣayatvāt svarūpopalakṣaṇāt || iti ākāśatrayaṁ saṁjñābhedena sthitam || yathā manākāśaṁ [kh: mana ākāśaṁ] brahmākāśaṁ [kh: vahnyākāśaṁ] yonyākāśaṁ ca iti || manākāśaṁ [kh: mana ākāśaṁ] vikalpakāritvāt || brahmākāśaṁ [kh: vahnyākāśaṁ] vikalpakṣayatvāt [kh: vikalpyakṣayitvāt] || parākāśaṁ sāmarasyatvāt || tathātraivoktaṁ niḥsandigdhaṁ paraṁ padam || iti śāṁbhavamārgaṁ nirācāramārgaṁ vā ||
Commentary on ṢSS 29/46-47.

This is the supreme transcendental 'location' of this, the seat of the future that shall manifest when the yogi initiated into the Kubjikā tradition attains the highest state. The KMT continues by describing the lower, immanent form of this seat:

That sacred seat is both supreme (transcendent) and lower (immanent). It is located in the middle land (madhyadeśa) above the sacred seat of Kāma. It is filled with three streams[1], and so (the goddess) Trisrotā[2] is also in the same way. O Māṅgalyā, you are in the form of a river; be of the nature of passion (kāmarūpiṇī).

O (goddess) born in a family of sweepers (mātaṅga)! You will always be forgiving to the one[3] who praises you. (But) you will not be merciful towards those who do not honour you. O Kulāmbikā, you will always bring misfortune to anyone of another caste apart from yours who will reside here in (this) sacred seat. O my joy! You who make the universe blissful! Abide thus (here) for long. By the grace of (my) unfailing Command, (this place) will be (your sacred) dwelling."[4]

The ŚM says of this seat:

> To the north of (lake) Nīla is the excellent seat of Mātaṅgī. Both supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent), it is the sacred seat of the wheel (cakrapīṭha) in the forest of Mahocchuṣma. Having placed Mātaṅgī in authority (and made her) the leader of the sacred seat (pīṭhanāyikā), that Great Goddess said: "O Mātaṅgī, listen to my words. Your lord will be the great Siddha Mātaṅgīśa. Along with him you should protect the transmission (kulakrama). You will have nine sons and nine daughters. (There will also be) five guardians who known all the teaching (artha) completely.[5]

---

[1] Read trisrotapūritaṁ for triśrotraṁ pūritaṁ.
[2] Read trisrotā for triśrotrā.
[3] Read with MSs EFHJK tasya instead of teṣu.
[4] KMT 2/110cd-114.
[5] nīlasyottaradigbhāge [g: -dīg-] mātaṅgīpīṭham uttamam |
mahocchuṣmavanāntasthaṁ [g: -sthā] cakrapīṭhaṁ parāparam ||
tatrādhikāriṇīṁ [kh, g: -ṇī] kṛtvā mātaṅgīṁ [kh: mātaṅgi; g: mātaṅgī] pīṭhanāyikām [g: -nāyakā]|
uvāca sā mahādevī śṛṇu mātaṅgi madvacaḥ ||
tava nātho [kh: nava-] mahāsiddho mātaṅgīśo bhaviṣyati |
tena sārdhaṁ [kh: sārddha] tvayā bhadre pālanīyaṁ kulakramam [kh: kurukramaṁ; g: kulākulaṁ] ||
nava [g: tava] putrā bhaviṣyanti nava duhitarastava [g: navaiva duhitāstava] |
parijñātasamastārthāḥ [kh: -jñāna-] pañcaiva praticārakāḥ [g: -cārakā] || ŚM 3/106-109.

The main sacred seats are four. But in different contexts even in the same source, they may be more. In chapter six of the KuKh the extra seat is called Tisra. Although Trisrota (or Triśrotra) which is the full name of Tisra is mentioned only here in the KMT, it appears frequently in the later Kubjikā Tantras, especially the MBT. Indeed, it takes over the position of Mātaṅga as the fifth sacred seat with which it is identified[1] and, anyway, with which it is related. Thus, Mātaṅga is the name of the yogi in Tisra.[2] Tisra, like the seat Mātaṅga, is said to be meant for the 'last-born', those of the lowest castes, especially sweepers (mātaṅga). The deities here are the god and goddess of the sweepers – Mātaṅgīśa and Mātaṅgī, who is identified with a form of Kubjikā called Juṣṭacaṇḍālinī. [3]

But although the intended identity of the two seats Trisrota and Mātaṅga is clear, there are differences. The KuKh concurs that this seat is in the region of Kāmarūpa.[4] It is in the 'northern part amidst the worlds of the Triple Peak'. It is called 'Trisrota' after a river that runs through it and is said to be in the middle of three currents (trisrota).[5] But although the KuKh does link Trisrota to Kāmarūpa as the KMT does Mātaṅga, it does not refer to its location in Madhyadeśa – i.e. central northern India. One wonders whether there was an intention to locate it originally in Prayāga, the modern Allahabad in the heartland of this region, where three rivers the Ganges, Yamuna and the celestial Sarasvatī meet. If this was the case, it conflicted with the need to relate it somehow to Kāmarūpa – if, that is, the text is not referring to this geographical region but to some inner equivalent.[6]

---

[1] ṢSS 4:5/118, 127 specifically equate the two.
[2] KuKh 6/179cd-180ab.
[3] KuKh 49/36-38ab. Although Mātaṅgī is hardly mentioned again in the Kubjikā corpus and is, in general, a minor goddess, nonetheless she is significantly present in the later Tantric traditions. She appears in the Īśānaśivagurudevapaddhati, a manual of temple worship compiled by the South Indian Īśānaśivagurudeva Miśra who possibly lived in the 12th century. She is described in the mantrapāda (chapter 26/120) section which is probably of a much later date (Bühnemann 2000: 3). She appears regularly in later compendiums beginning with the Śāradatilaka (12/128) which, after the Prapañcasāra, is one of the earliest (see Bühnemann 2001: 225-226). She continues to be a part of the loosely knit pantheon of such compendiums until we get to the Mantramahodadhi by Mahīdhara who lived sometime between about 1530 and 1610 CE (she is described there in 8/40-49. See Bühnemann 2000: 127-129). Soon after Mahīdhara, when the group of ten goddesses called Mahāvidyās was established as a standard set, she was included amongst them and continues to be worshipped as one of them to this day. Kinsley summarizes this goddess's main features under three headings. She is 1) a goddess who prefers pollution. 2) She is an outcaste or low caste goddess. 3) She is a goddess of magical powers. Kinsley (1997: 209-222) devotes one chapter of his book on the Ten Mahāvidyās to her, to which the reader is referred.
[4] KuKh 6/164-166ab.
[5] See KuKh 6/166cd-167ab.
[6] See ṢSS 4:5/118cd-120.

Indeed, the location of this seat seems to have been variously identified by the Kubjikā Tantras, shifting it from one place to another according to doctrinal developments and, perhaps, the actual geographical spread of the cult. After the Kubjikā cult waned, this continued to take place as the prestige of this seat seems to have lingered on afterwards. Or perhaps there was more than one place with a similar name. In later times the seat Tisra was identified with the river Tistā, formerly called Trisrotā, which flows through the district of Rungpur in North Bengal.[1] The Trisrotā to which late medieval Bengali texts refer as a Mahāpīṭha or Upapīṭha[2] may well have been located on its banks. But it is unlikely that this is the place the redactors of the Kubjikā Tantras had in mind.

The 'inner' location of this sacred seat is in an intermediate 'place' between the transcendent location in Stillness we have examined and the outer sacred site. The goddess there is said to be Kuṇḍalinī who is in the body of the god who is called Mātaṅgīśa in the ṢSS[3] as he is in the KuKh.[4] Kāmarūpa is projected into the Cavity of Brahmā at the top of the head.[5] Tisrapīṭha is above that. Beyond the body in middle of the Wheel of Skyfaring goddesses (khecarīcakra), it is located in the End of the Twelve.[6] Graphically it is represented by the Half Moon and Point along with the slanting line at the top of the syllable AIṀ. These are, presumably, the three streams. In some cases, when there are six seats Tisra, the fifth seat, is represented by the Half Moon. Most often the sixth seat is Candrapīṭha – the Seat of the Moon – that is represented by the Point. So we get the following:

Diagram 1. Vāgbhava – The Syllable AIṀ
The ṢSS stresses that the fifth sacred seat is unmanifest and hence pervasive. Present in the other seats, it has no specific location of its own. The [1] Day (1927) 1970: 206; Bhattacharyya 1999: 293.

---

[2] Sircar 1967: 97.
[3] ṢSS 4:5/128-129.
[4] See KuKh 6/170cd-171ab; 69/26cd-27ab.
[5] See note to KuKh 6/153cd-154ab.
[6] ṢSS 4:5/118-119.

aspect the goddess assumes here is her undifferentiated form 'without parts' (niṣkalā).[1] The KMT says that it is the source of the universe. As the universal, primal cause is commonly considered to be the 'unmanifest', the two sources implicitly agree. The later Kubjikā tradition understood this to mean that it is such because it is not yet manifest yet is destined to become so. The KuKh repeatedly stresses this, implying that it will become the most important seat. The KMT's statement that it is the 'first' of the seats, in the sense that it is the most excellent despite being the fifth, can be taken to be scriptural support for this view. The narrative of the myth that explains the projection of the sacred seats in the KMT is all set in the future tense. So no distinction is possible between the main four seats that already exist and this one which will be 'brought down to earth' in the future at the end of the Age of Strife,[2] when the grace of the deity is particularly weak and the land will be sorely oppressed under the rule of the barbarians (mleccharājya).[3]

Even though we are told that the fifth sacred seat pervades the other four and cannot be touched or seen,[4] in the physical world it is associated with Śrīśaila.[5] Schoterman sees a connection between the sacred seat Mātaṅga and mount Kaumāra visited by the goddess at the beginning of her journey.[6] Although it is also called Śriparvata in some places, there is another mountain with this name in the Zanskar region of the Himalaya. If this is Kaumāraparvata, it is not Śrīśaila, which is in Andhra. Sometimes the two are distinguished and are located in different places internally as well. Śrīśaila is said to be 'above the Cavity of Brahmā' that is, in the End of the Twelve. Śrīparvata, on the other hand, is identified with the sacrificial fire – the 'eater of oblations' (hutāśana) – and is described as a column of smoke above the head. This is Dhūmrāgni – 'Smoky Fire'. It burns in the Cavity of Brahmā, sending up a column of smoke twelve fingers long up through to the End of the Twelve.

Like Trisrota / Tisra, there are several places called Mātaṅga. One is Śrīśaila[7] which, as we have seen, is identified with mount Kaumāra. It seems that mount Kaumāra is implicitly identified with the sacred seat Mātaṅga, as both are associated with the 'unmanifest'.[8] The ṢSS seems to understand the reference to

---

[1] ṢSS 4:5/119-120.
[2] KuKh 6/179cd-180ab.
[3] KuKh 6/175-177ab.
[4] ṢSS 4:5/22.
[5] ṢSS 4:5/119.
[6] Schoterman 1981: 61.
[7] Referring to Pal (1981: 22-23) Bühnemann notes that: Mātaṅga is also the name of a place, identified variously with Mātaṅgāśrama at Bakraur on the Phalgu river opposite Bodhgaya, or with Śrīśaila, Andhra Pradesh, or with Maher, Bangladesh.
[8] See Schoterman 1981: 61.

this seat to be situated north of Lake Nīla to be ‘above’ in the sense of above the head. Even so, the ṢSS identifies the core of the land covered by this sacred seat with Śrīśaila. Inwardly, it is in the middle of the Wheel of Skyfaring goddesses – Khecarīcakra – at the End of the Twelve. The ṢSS understands the place ‘madhyadeśa’ to which the KMT refers not as a region in India but as what it literally means, that is, 'the region in the centre’. And this centre is in the middle of Wheel in the End of the Twelve:

> Above the body at the top, O Dharmī – is the [fifth] Pīṭha called ‘Mātaṅga’. It is above the Cavity of Brahmā (brahmarandhra), in the centre of the Wheel of Skyfaring goddesses (khecarīcakra) where Śrīśaila is said (to be). (That is) where the Transmission (krama), supreme and inferior (parāpara) (is located). The goddess went there in her undifferentiated state (niṣkalābhāva). She should be contemplated (there) as consciousness alone (cinmātrā) abiding there in order to establish (this) sacred seat.[1]

One can tentatively deduce that, at the time of the redaction of this part of the ṢSS, Śrīśaila was considered to be the most important sacred site. Perhaps it had not been appropriated by the Kaulas who worshipped Kubjikā, but they aspired to this end. Thus, the fifth seat was tacitly identified with it. There can be no doubt that Trisrota and Mātaṅga were intended to be identified in the tradition and the account in the KuKh is coherent in this respect with the KMT, the prime authority. Even so, I believe that a careful reading of our sources warrants the view that the seat has been shifted from its earlier conceived location on or near Śrīśaila / Kumāraparvata / Śrīparvata to Koṅkaṇa. Moreover, I suggest that this would have been known to initiates who were taught a range of interlocking associations and projections related both to the 'outer' and the 'inner' location of this seat which, as the 'future one', was considered to be the best. The picture is confusing. We are led, it seems, from one corner of India to another. But this, I suggest, is because the chain of associations is formed by appropriation of older sacred geographies and their internalizations, instead of discarding them for new ones. This is what has taken place in the KMT and is repeated again in the KuKh in which the focus is shifted, as in the rest of the MBT, to Koṅkaṇa.

I suggest that this takes place in the KuKh as follows. Firstly, the older seat Kāmarūpa is quietly assimilated to Koṅkaṇa by making use of old associations with new meanings. The KuKh declares that 'Koṅkaṇa is Kāmarūpa and Kāmarūpa is Koṅkaṇa', adding that it is also the holy city of Kāñci in the south of India and even Kailāśa,[2] demonstrating how easily these transpositions can be made. Kāmarūpa is the seat of the present Kali Age. It is the seat of Mitradeva who is clearly identified in the MBT not just with the First Siddha, as he is in the KMT, but more specifically with the Siddha of Kāmarūpa. He propagates the Transmission that is the most effective in the Kali Age. Like the other seats, the KuKh posits a 'secret' equivalent to this seat. This is Ucchuṣma, which connects it with the sacred geography onto which Kāmarūpa is projected in the KMT. On the other hand, it is related to the new major site of the propagation of the teachings by making the secret goddess there Koṅkaṇā, 'who has come forth from Koṅkaṇa'.[1] Another significant detail is that Kāmarūpa, and hence this goddess and her consort, is symbolically located on the tip of the downward-facing triangle of seats to which is added, in the KuKh, the Circle of the Mothers thus:

[1] ṢSS 4:5/118cd-120.
[2] KuKh 59/48cd-49.

Diagram 2. The Yoni and the Circle of the Mothers
This addition coincides, perhaps, with the claim in the ṢSS that the Siddha who brought the teachings to Koṅkaṇa established there on a hill a Circle of the Mothers, in the middle of which he installed the goddess Koṅkaṇā. Clearly, the intention is to identify Kubjikā as the patron goddess of Koṅkaṇa, the ancient Śrīdeśa, the Land of Śrī now understood not as being of Lakṣmī but of Kubjikā. Once the KuKh has established that Kāmarūpa, the land of the original propagation of the Kaula teachings by Matsyendra is there, it goes on to further reinforce the link with the goddess and her sacred geography. It predicts what has taken place to confirm that this was divinely ordained. Moreover, it conforms to the earlier revelation which says that it is pervasive. In the KuKh this detail, at least in the account in chapter six, is missing or, better, it is understood concretely. This, the most excellent seat, is where Kubjikā herself is directly the goddess who exerts her authority,[2] not as an aspect or a hyposthesis, as with the other seats. After the founding of the barbarian kingdom (mleccharājya) in the north of India and the waning away of the power of the transmission i.e. the decrease of the followers of Kubjikā's cult there, this seat will be established. The KMT does not specify that this is a cause of the deterioration of her cult, as the MBT and later Kubjikā Tantras repeatedly insist. It seems that when the KMT was redacted, Mātaṅgapīṭha was just a developing possibility as a site for the initiates into Kubjikā's Kula who were trying to establish themselves on Śrīśaila, one of the most prestigious Śaiva sites. By the time we get to the KuKh, the Kubjikā cult had taken refuge in Koṅkaṇa from the trammels of the North. Now in the sacred seat Tisra the original Krama 'will be worshipped' and 'will again be stable'.[1] All the other sacred seats will be there and worshipped there. I would hazard to add that they would also all be represented in the sacred geography there in the seat that the earlier Tantras said was 'pervasive' and which the KuKh says is 'surrounded by all the sacred seats'. Close to this seat, projected into the local sacred geography will be a replica of Kāmarūpa in the region where the KuKh predicts Tisra will be.[2] This is a supposition, but it does find support in what appears to be the reference to a more concrete geographical location. In the KuKh we are told that the goddess of this seat and hence the seat itself is 'amidst the worlds of the Triple Peak' which is in the northern part[3] of the Island of the Moon, inwardly located at the End of the Twelve and externally identified with Koṅkaṇa. We have noted above that Trikūṭa was probably a hill in Aparānta, which is in northern Koṅkaṇa from which the Traikūṭaka kings derived their family name.

[1] KuKh 6/151cd-153ab.
[2] KuKh 6/179cd-180ab.

Tisra / Trisrota is said to be in the KuKh, like Trikūṭa, 'in the middle of the three currents', that is, three rivers.[4] There is a region of modern Goa – the heart of the ancient kingdom of Koṅkaṇa – called Tiswadi. It is on the sea and bounded on three sides by rivers in such a way that it is, in a sense, an island – which fits with the inner characterization. Thus we are told in the KuKh that the three rivers symbolize the three currents of the breath. The exhaled breath (prāṇa), the inhaled breath (apāna) and the upward-moving breath (udāna) that rises between them transporting the energy of Kuṇḍalinī.[5] This is indeed one of the characterizations of the sides of the triangle projected into the End of the Twelve which, according to the ṢSS, is the inner Trikūṭa.[6] In short, a series of successive identifications were formed 'inwardly' as the doctrinal system of the Kubjikā Tantras developed and the main centre of the cult shifted. By the time the KuKh was redacted, the seat Trisrota / Tisra, mount Trikūṭa and the Island of the Moon are all identified externally with the land of Koṅkaṇa and share a common inner identity as the location of the goddess's Triangle in the End of the Twelve we shall analyse in the following chapter.

---

[1] KuKh 6/178cd-179ab.
[2] KuKh 6/164-165ab.
[3] KuKh 6/166cd-167ab.
[4] KuKh 6/164-165ab.
[5] KuKh 60/67cd-69.
[6] See below, chapter 2, p. 273 for a diagram of this Triangle.

The Seats of the Eight Mothers

Having said this, she went to Devīkoṭa, (arriving there) in a moment, and with a powerful look (āloka) (it became a sacred site. Then she went to) Aṭṭahāsa, (so called) because she laughed (there) loudly. (Then she went to) Kolāgiri, Ujjenī, Prayāga, Varṇā (i.e. Vārāṇasī), Viraja, Ekāmra and other (places) and (then on to) another universe.[1]

Pīṭha, which I translate as 'sacred seat', is a general term for a place where a goddess or Yoginī resides. Internalized, these places may be represented as the 'location' of the fifty letters within the goddess's triangular Yoni. When viewed in this form the Yoni is called the Meruprastāra. This is described in detail in chapter eight of the KuKh. We shall see there how this diagram or grid – prastāra – is drawn and used to extract letters to form mantras. Suffice it say here that these fifty places correspond to fifty geographical locations in South Asia, the sacred land of Bhārata. They are listed in the end of chapter six of the KuKh (but without reference to the Meruprastāra) as an additional fifty sacred places to which the goddess goes in her tour of India.[2] These are presented as those 'other places' the goddess visits to which KMT refers generically. Although the KuKh quotes the concluding verses of chapter two of the KMT, it omits the reference to these eight places and replaces them with these fifty, amongst which they are included. They are treated separately in the beginning of chapter fourteen as the residence of the Eight Mothers in the context of a long exposition of the contents (that is, the deities and their mantras), of the goddess's maṇḍala. The Pīṭhastava follows this. It is a eulogy to sixty-four seats, which include most of the fifty projected into the Meruprastāra and begin with these eight that are thus, in that context, implicitly treated as the main ones.

They are projected into the outer circle of the Kramamaṇḍala. In fact, sacred sites are projected into every part of the maṇḍala. The main four seats are in the Triangle in the centre, which may also be filled out with the set of fifty seats. A group of six seats mark the corners of the hexagon that surrounds it. The eight Mothers are worshipped in their sacred sites in the lotus around the hexagon. Then outside them come the sixty-four sites in which are worshipped as many Yoginīs with their Bhairavas and attendant guardians (kṣetrapāla).[3] Again, all these places, like the maṇḍala itself, can be projected into the officiant's body. Thus we have a three-tiered representation of the one sacred reality in which all the divine and mortal beings reside and interact. The first is in the outer

---

[1] KMT 2/115-116.
[2] See also chapter 3, p. 570-571.
[3] Cf. chapter 3, p. 549 ff..

macrocosm. The second is in the inner microcosm. The third is the maṇḍala that is the focus of the world of ritual that links the two. The worshipper moves through these three dimensions simultaneously, just as the goddess does. In the outer world he is on pilgrimage, imitating his divine model and accompanied by her. Inwardly his sentient, vital, sensory and biological energies are regenerated as the inner mantric energy of the goddess moves along with his consciousness through them. In the same way he worships the Transmission (krama) – each part of it in its sacred site within the maṇḍala.

Returning to the goddess's myth narrated in the KMT we notice that, although all eight places are mentioned, not only is their connection with the eight Mothers passed over in silence, they are also not listed in the standard order in which they regularly appear in the Tantras, or indeed elsewhere in the KMT itself. However, we find this standard identification and serial order in the corresponding passage in the ŚM. There the eight are referred to, as they are generally in the Kubjikā Tantras and elsewhere, as *kṣetra*s – 'sacred fields'. This is the oldest term for a sacred site. It appears already in the middle Vedic period in the name of the most famous kṣetra and probably the earliest one – Kurukṣetra.[1]

Although these distinctions are significant, insofar as they help us to distinguish groupings of sacred sites and attribute varying degrees of importance to them, all these types of sacred sites are essentially *pīṭha*s of various sorts. In broad terms, a pīṭha is the generic name of any place where goddesses and / or Bhairavas, their partners, are worshipped. Thus with reference to these eight places the KuKh declares that: 'The sacred seats (pīṭha) are indeed sacred fields and the sacred fields are sacred seats (arranged) in due order'.[2] The ŚM says that: '(The goddess) conceived the sacred fields (kṣetra) by means of the mantras of the fields'.[3] However, the goddesses who are said to reside there are not, it seems at first sight, the eight Mothers. There they are as follows: 1) Prayāga – Khecarī, 2) Varuṇā (Vārāṇasī) – Ātmī, 3) Kollāpura – Somā, 4) Aṭṭahāsā – Vahni, 5) Jayantikā – Calinī, 6) Caritrā – Bhānumatyā, 7) Ekāmraka – Mahi, and 8) Devikoṭṭa – Sukṛtā. Although, as far as I know, these goddesses do not appear elsewhere in the Kubjikā corpus as a group, even so the ŚM declares: 'worshipped, (these) eight (goddesses) who have authority over the sacred fields (kṣetra), bestow boons. The goddess assumed many forms in relation to the eight Kulas'.[4] The Kulas are the 'families' (kula) of Yoginīs lead by the eight Mothers

---

[1] See chapter 3, p. 481 ff..
[2] KuKh 14/77 = TS 15/64. The development of the term pīṭha in this technical sense and the earlier term kṣetra is discussed below in chapter three.
[3] ŚM 3/127ab. MS Kh says: O beloved, she is the deity residing in the field.
[4] kṣetrāṇi [g: -ṇī] kalpayāmāsa kṣetramantravidhānataḥ [kh: kṣetrasthā devatā priye] |
prayāgā varuṇā [kh: varuṇā] kollā [g: kolā] aṭṭahāsā jayantikā || and so the ŚM implies that they should be co-identified. The goddess herself assumes the form of these eight goddesses, just as she assumes the form of the eight Mothers. Thus the nature of the goddesses of both groups is anyway essentially the same. Indeed, we find several groups of eight goddesses installed in these places in the Tantras of most if not all the major schools that stress the worship of the Mothers. Their existence implies that, like the main goddess, the Mothers can assume numerous identities and so form the nucleus of equally numerous Kulas.

There are secondary sacred sites (upakṣetra)[1] (and other sacred places), sacred bathing sites (tīrtha) and meeting grounds (saṁdoha), of many kinds wherever the goddess went and wherever she cast her gaze.[2]

The word tīrtha literally means a 'ford'. It denotes a sacred place on the banks of a river, lake or tank where a ritual bath is considered to be particularly purifying. It is a term that belongs to the nomenclature of the Epics and Purāṇas.[3] Terms like pīṭha and saṁdoha,[4] on the other hand, originally specifically belonged to the lexicon of the Tantras. Some terms for sacred sites are common to the Purāṇas and the early Tantras (i.e. those redacted prior to the 12th century). The most popular one is 'kṣetra' ('field' or 'area of ground'). Indeed, the sacred geography in both these types of sacred text was initially quite rudimentary and largely the same. The development of Tantras that fostered Yoginī cults hailed the beginning of the development of elaborate sacred geographies in the Tantras that were distinct in their basic conception, although not necessarily in all the sites, from those developing in the Purāṇas. From the 12th or 13th century onwards we caritraikāmrakaṁ [kh: caritrekāṁmrake; g: -kāṁmrakaṁ] caiva devikoṭṭaṁ [g: devī-] tathāṣṭamam ǀ prayāge khecarī devī adhikāre niyojitā ǀǀ ātmīnāmā varārohe vārāṇasyadhikāriṇī [kh: vārāṇasyādhikārikā] ǀ kollāpure [g: kolā-] tato devī [kh: devi] somānāmādhikāriṇī [kh, g: soma-] ǀǀ aṭṭahāse punar devī vahnināmā tataḥ [g: tata] priye ǀ calinī [kh: valinī] ca mahādevī jayantīpuravāsinī [g: -sinīṁ] ǀǀ caritrāvāsinī devī bhānumatyā [kh: -matī] ca kīrtitā ǀ ekāmrake varārohe mahināmādhikāriṇī [kh: mahimā nāmā-; g: mahināmo-] ǀǀ devikoṭṭe [g: devīkoṭe] varārohe [kh: tato bhadre] sukṛtā samudāhṛtā [kh, g: sā-; g: -hṛto] ǀ aṣṭau kṣetrādhikāriṇyaḥ [g: -kāriṇya] pūjitāś [kh g: pūjitā] ca varapradāḥ [g: -pradā] ǀǀ nānābhedagatā devī aṣṭadhā kulabhedataḥ [g: nandataḥ] ǀ ŚM 3/127-133ab.

---

[1] We can understand that the reference here to secondary or 'nearby' fields (upakṣetra) implies that the eight listed in the previous verses are sacred fields (kṣetra). As these are not mentioned in the version found at the end of chapter six of our text, this term is replaced by the nondescript variant āyātana – 'sacred site' when this verse is quoted in the KuKh (6/219cd-220ab).

[2] KMT 2/117-122 is reproduced, with variants, as KuKh 6/219cd-225ab.

[3] Cf. below chapter 3, p. 529.

[4] See chapter 3, p. 538, note 2.

witness an extensive assimilation of Purāṇic sites – '*tīrtha*s' – into the sacred geography of the Tantras and Tantric sites – '*pīṭha*s' – into the Purāṇic.[1] The rare occurence of the term tīrtha in the Tantras that fostered Kaula or proto-Kaula cults (i.e. those in which Yoginīs play a prominent role) is a sign that this process is still in its initial stage. Therefore we may understand the use of this term here to imply that the goddess colonizes Purāṇic sacred sites just as she does Tantric and Kaula ones.

The ŚM elaborates by adding other standard categories of sacred sites. The full set normally consists of eight kinds, with the usual variants.[2] Four are primary each of which are associated with four 'secondary' or 'nearby' ones. According to the ŚM these are: 1) the sacred seats, primary and secondary – pīṭha and upapīṭha; 2) Sacred fields, primary and secondary – kṣetra and upakṣetra; 3) meeting grounds, the primary saṁdoha. Perhaps because they had not yet emerged as a standard group, the ŚM omits the secondary sacred grounds – upasaṁdoha. More likely, they are the *upapītha*s to which the verses that follow the list of the saṁdohas refer.

In addition to these types of sacred sites the ŚM prefixes four holy mountains and lists the goddesses who reside and are worshipped on them.[3] The juxtaposition of sacred mountains and these other sacred sites is somewhat unusual even though mountains are generally considered to be sacred. After listing the eight sacred fields where the Mothers reside noted above, the ŚM lists the eight secondary sacred fields (upakṣetra), saṁdohas and other secondary sacred seats.[4] Bhairava concludes saying:

> O goddess, (these are) the secondary sacred seats the (goddess) emanated (as she did) the sacred fields and bathing places. Having emanated (her creation) of many kinds, (she also made) an abode of many gems and having fashioned these, she again made meeting grounds (saṁdohas) all around having established the Yoginīs who had came there (as their goddesses).[5]

---

[1] See Dyczkowski 2004: 147-148 and map 11.

[2] For a Buddhist variant drawn from the Hevajratantra, see chapter 3, p. 538, note 2.

[3] See below, chapter 3, p. 563.

[4] ŚM 3/135-138. The eight secondary fields are Kadaṁba, Alamba, Gokarṇa, the Vindhya mountain, Vimaleśvara, Sindhumāla, Mahāsena, and Mātaṅga. The first saṁdoha of the Yoginīs was emanated near to Śrīgiri and the second near the town of Ujjayinī. The others are Trikūṭa, Tripura, Gopura, Bhadrakarṇa (MS Kh: Bhadrakaṣṭa; MS G: Bhadrakīrṇa), Kirāta, the region of Kaśmīra, Sauvala (kh: Sauvara, g: Śaivāla) and Sindhudeśa. The Upapīṭhas are Śrījayantī, Kulutā, along with Mālava and Mahaujas, Kāṁcīpura, Kurukṣetra, Barbara, and Sāṁvara.

[5] upapīṭhāni deveśi kṣetratīrthāni saṁsṛjet |
nānāprakāraṁ saṁsṛṣṭya [k: saṁgṛhya] nānāratnakṛtālayam [k: nāranātra-(?); kh: -lasaṁ; g: nānāratno-] ||

The KMT continues:

The Virgin (goddess) (kumārikā) established her fame[1] in the land of Bhārata (in this way) and so the meritorious and holy Region of the Virgin (kaumārikākhaṇḍa) came into being.[2]

'Kumārikākhaṇḍa' – the Region of the Virgin – literally means `a part of the young virgin (goddess)'. This 'part' is the Yoni, which is also the goddess entire, and the South Asian subcontinent. Although its triangular shape was well known centuries before the Kubjikā Tantras were written, it was only much later that it was identified with the goddess's triangular Yoni. This identification is significant for the KMT because as the god says to the goddess: 'In this way your influence will be (felt) in (the land) called Kumārikā.'[3]

The SvT also refers to the Land of Bhārata i.e. India as that of the Virgin, although it is not associated with her Yoni. According to the cosmology of the SvT, reproduced by Abhinava in chapter eight of his TĀ, there are eight continents. Each of them lies beyond one of eight mountain chains that surround mount Meru in the centre. Bhārata is to the south of the Himalayan chain, which is itself south of Meru and is shaped like a bow. It differs from the other continents because the beings who inhabit most of it can only experience pleasure and pain (bhoga) and not produce Karma.[4] Bhārata is divided into nine islands, separated from one another by seas. The island closest to the Himalayas is called Kumārikā. This is India. Of all the parts of the continent of Bhārata, this is where Karma is created and destroyed. There are many sacred sites and rivers there and a great variety of castes and ways of life (āśrama).[5] Abhinava writes:

> There (in Bhuvar, the second of the seven worlds) of all the venerable (mahārgha) lands (varṣa) and islands where the gods enjoy themselves, the most excellent is the one called Kumārikā, where the wise have the sinless privilege (adhikṛti) to rise progressively from the lower level to the supreme that culminates in Śiva.[6]

---

kṛtvaitāni [g: kṛtvā-] punaś cakre sandohāni samantataḥ |
sthāpayitvā tu [k: sthāpayet kratu] yoginyā [k: yoginyo; g: yoginyaḥ] yās tatraiva [k g: ye yatraiva] samāgatāḥ [kh, g: -tā] || ŚM 3/139-140.

[1] Read kṛtā for kṛtaṁ and kīrtiḥ for kīrti.

[2] KMT 2/118 = KuKh 6/220cd-221ab.

[3] tathā kumārikākhye tu tvatprabhāvo bhaviṣyati KMT 1/49cd

[4] TĀ 8/78-82.

[5] TĀ 8/85-91.

[6] TĀ 37/35.

The KMT continues:

Then, O Kubjeśī, our union takes place here (in this world) at the end (of your tour which began) when the god of the previous lineage (santāna) said (to you): 'Go to (the land of) Bhārata'.[1]

In the ṢSS the god says to the goddess:

> Go to the land of Bhārata in order to (establish your) authority in all respects. Bring about the manifold creation in this (sacred) field of sacred seats, primary and secondary.[2]

This verse was noticed in a manuscript of the ṢSS by Haraprasāda Śāstrī who refers to it in his catalogue of the former Darbar Library in Kathmandu.[3] In the past scholars have disputed whether what they considered to be 'Tantrism' or 'Tantra' originated in India or not. Although the text in which this passage appears was at that time hardly known, this verse was thought to be strong evidence for the foreign origin of 'Tantrism'. Goudriaan[4] has outlined the views of Indian and foreign scholars concerning this dispute, which Banerji[5] summarizes as follows:

H.P Śāstrī thought, on the basis of a verse in the Kubjikāmatatantra (sic. Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṁhitā), that Tantra came to India from outside. According to others, this verse does not prove anything conclusively; it might simply hint at the prevalence of Tantra in India from earlier times. Arthur Avalon is of the opinion that Tantra was imported to India from Chaldea or Śakadvīpa. There is a Tibetan tradition that Asaṅga introduced Tāntric principles and practices into India. P. V. Kane does not attach importance to this tradition, which is mainly based on the 'History of Buddhism' by Tāranātha (b. 1573 or 1575 CE) who wrote over one thousand years after Asaṅga. Some have tried to establish the foreign origin of Tantra on the ground that the exalted position of the guru in it has nothing comparable in the Vedic and Purāṇic religions. Others, however, reject this argument by pointing out the high place of honour accorded to the guru in the Nirukta (2/4), the Śvetāśvataropaniṣad, the Liṅgapurāṇa, Devībhāgavata etc. After an examination of the diverse views on the question, P. V. Kane concludes that a few mystic practices like Kulācāra and Vāmācāra might have originated

---

[1] KMT 2/119 = KuKh 6/221cd-222ab.

[2] gaccha tvāṁ bhārate varṣe adhikārāya sarvataḥ ||
pīṭhopapīṭhakṣetre 'smin kuru sṛṭim anekadhā | ṢSS 4:5/3cd-4ab.

[3] Śāstrī 1905: 78ff., also Report on the Search of Sanskrit Manuscripts (1895–1900) in IHQ, IX, p. 358.

[4] Goudriaan 1987: 292-306.

[5] Banerji 1978: 12.

abroad and have been brought to India, but there is no positive evidence of the Tantric system as a whole arising outside'.

Banerji goes on to conclude quite reasonably that: 'against the view that Tantra was brought to India from China or Tibet, it may be pointed out that, whereas many Sanskrit Tantras were translated into Chinese and Tibetan, there is no evidence of any Tantric work of these places having been translated into Sanskrit'. We may add that now that more progress has been made in editing, translating and studying texts of a wide range of Tantric traditions, including the ṢSS itself, we know very well that Banerji was not mistaken in his belief that the earliest ones originated in India.

Once the goddess had done all that, namely, brought about the awakening of the bliss of the Command, she returned there in accord with her previous form (pūrvarūpānuyāyinī).

(Bhairava said): "O (goddess) worshipped by the best of the gods! The god was also (your) disciple in the previous lineage and (having made of him) the venerable Oḍumaheśāna, he again gave (you) the Command. Grace (has come into the world) from (the time I said to you) "go to the land of Bhārata". In order to reside again in the seat of Uḍḍu, bring about the emanation of the (of the universe) countless times."

Having said that the invisible lord who resides at the extremity of the summit of Triple Peak (mountain) disappeared again in a moment.[1]

Now that the goddess has completed her journey around India, established her sacred sites and appointed there divine beings who, as aspects of herself, can establish her divine lineage, she can unite with the god. Perpetually renewed and renewing, this same process is repeated countless times. The god of the previous lineage gives the goddess the Command to travel around India and then when she returns to the place from whence she set out, she makes of him who had become her disciple the Great Lord of that place. Not only the teachings are transmitted from there, the first and foremost sacred seat. This is the place where the entire universe is generated, originating in the same transcendent reality by means of the same power and made manifest through the same channels and by the same process that bring the teachings into the world and with them the deity's liberating grace – the Command (ājñā). United finally on the plane of immanence – in the concrete location of sacred place here in this world, the cycle begins again with the disappearance of the god who returns to his transcendental residence on Triple Peak mountain at the End of the Twelve, at the summit of existence.

---

[1] KMT 2/120-123.

Later Developments of the Myth

In the later sources the myth is expanded and filled out with theological and soteriological reflections. More concretely, the origins of the goddess and the teachings are explained in greater detail by extending the time scale of the narrative to the goddess's previous lives. Particularly important is the goddess's seventh life, the one preceding the life in which the later Kubjikā Tantras say the events recounted in the KMT took place. One could well ask how the supreme deity can undergo rebirth. Clearly, mythology is not in this case, as in others, subservient to theology. Deity is not in this context the object of realisation or mystical experience and theological reflection to which they give rise. The Purāṇas do dedicate space to these matters even, at times, in the course of narrating their myths. Nonetheless, the primary concern of myths is to explain why things are as they are, not just universally, but concretely through the narration of the origin of specific, powerful entities, places, living beings, vegetal, animal and human that are both in the world around us and in other worlds. In this context Goudriaan[1] points out that:

Devī's different existences are systematisations of different, even contradictory revelations about the manifestations of Power within the realm of time. But the same could be maintained about Śiva or his manifestations, which are nevertheless only seldom said to undergo rebirth. It would seem therefore that "rebirth" is a typical prerogative of the feminine manifestation of the godhead – at least in the mythological sphere, where it probably reflects the observation of the recurrence of death and rebirth in the natural world. This state of affairs implies that the union of the God and Goddess, absolutely necessary for the continuance and renewal of the world process, is periodically repeated – or rather, re-enacted, actualised.

Certainly the most conspicuous tradition concerning the succession of the goddess's earthly existences is the mythological cluster relating to her death as Satī and successive rebirth as Pārvatī. The later tradition presumes that the myth in the KMT takes this earlier life of the goddess, which was then as now very well known, for granted. The later Kubjikā Tantras are not novel in this respect although it is clear that they seek to give their goddess the deep roots of the earlier parallel Śaiva traditions, Purāṇic and even Vedic. Moreover, they imply that the well-known goddess who in her previous birth was Satī, Dakṣa's daughter, was actually none other than Kubjikā. The story of Dakṣa's sacrifice, which explains the goddess's death in her previous life, is therefore an important topic.

[1] Goudriaan 2001: 184-185.

References to this story appear, as we shall see, in the Ambāmatasaṁhitā and in various places in the MBT, especially the Yogakhaṇḍa, although, there is no mention of it in the KMT. The ŚM and ṢSS seem to be acquainted with this development but do hardly more than allude to it. It is known to the KRU, which probably preceded the ṢSS. The Kumārikākhaṇḍa, at least some part of which, certainly post-dates the ṢSS,[1] treats the myth relatively extensively.

The first part of the story is told in a few verses in chapter three of the KuKh.[2] It is followed by the Stavarāja, a hymn Dakṣa composes to praise Śiva and to atone for having failed to invite him along with the other gods to his sacrifice. Finally, Śiva, who explains that those who fled from the sacrifice and were injured or even killed were ultimately graced, comforts Dakṣa. The narrative ends happily with the restoration of Dakṣa's sacrifice.[3] Once this has been established, the narrative returns to the goddess. She feels that the destruction of her father's sacrifice was her fault and so to purify herself from the sin she feels she has committed, she immolates herself in the sacrificial fire.[4] Then, reborn as Bhadrakālī (also called just Kālī or Kālikā), she sends Bhairava to the Cave where she achieved enlightenment. There Bhairava finally receives the grace of her Command.[5]

Before examining the details of the goddess's previous birth and rebirth as Kālikā destined to become Bhairava's consort, the goddess Kubjikā, we turn to Dakṣa's sacrifice.

The Destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice

The myth of the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice occurs for the first time in the Ṛgveda[6] and has been retold in the Brāhmaṇas, Epics and Purāṇas.[7] Bhattacharyya[8] notes that: 'the relationship between Śiva and Devī became more intimate in the Gupta Age [i.e. from fourth to the middle of the sixth century], as is suggested by the evidence of the earlier Purāṇas. The story of Dakṣa's sacrifice

---

[1] Relative dating of the Kubjikā texts will be discussed in the last chapter of this introduction.
[2] See KuKh 3/74-84.
[3] See KuKh 3/146-155.
[4] KuKh 3/156-159.
[5] KuKh 3/160-170.
[6] ṚV 1/51/5-7.
[7] The myth is narrated in the Aitarīyabrāhmaṇa (13/9-10) and in the Śatapathabrāhmaṇa (1/7/3/1-4). It occurs in both the Epics and in the Purāṇas, including Mahābhārata, Śāntiparvan 284; Rāmāyaṇa, Bālakāṇḍa 65/9-12; Śivapurāṇa, Rudrasaṁhitā, Satīkhaṇḍa 12-42 and Vāyavīya-saṁhitā 18-33; Vāyupurāṇa 30; Liṅgapurāṇa 100; Skandapurāṇa, Maheśakhaṇḍa, Kedārakāṇḍa 2; Brahmapurāṇa 39; Kūrmapurāṇa 1/15; Matsyapurāṇa 5; Bhāgavatapurāṇa 32; Devībhāgavatapurāṇa 6/38; Mahābhāgavatapurāṇa 4/1-10 and Kālikāpurāṇa 16-18.
[8] Bhattacharyya 1974: 72.

must serve as a good example'. Indeed, that a version of this myth is found here testifies to its continuing importance as an authoritative statement of the alliance of the female principle with Śiva. In this case this alliance is especially with the goddess Kubjikā who, by implication, assumes the role of Umā Dākṣāyanī, Śiva's Divine Consort 'par excellence'.

The common nucleus of the story is simple. A Brahmin named Dakṣa sponsored a great Vedic sacrifice to which he invited all the gods except Śiva, of whom he disapproved even though (indeed because), he was the beloved husband of his favourite daughter, Umā. The god was sorely offended and, much angered, destroyed the sacrifice and his consort immolated herself in the sacrificial fire. Thus Dakṣa accrued the demerit of failing to complete it.

Actually, Dakṣa was acting in accord with common practice. Rudra in the Vedic period was a god with profoundly contrasting and ambiguous aspects. One was awesome and frightening, the other peaceful and benign. All benign beings in the universe were regarded as the benign forms of Rudra[1] by his Vedic devotees and the malign ones as his destructive forms. Some of his Vedic names, such as Bhava and, very occasionally, Śiva, are those of his benign aspect, others, like Śarva and Rudra, of the malign. Said to be derived from the root śarv meaning 'to hurt, injure or kill', Śarva, true to his name, is said to hold a thunderbolt and punish sinners.[2] The formidable Rudra was identified with the raging, destructive fire. It was said of him that 'just as a tiger stands in anger, so he also (stands)'.[3] He roams the forests where men fall victim of fear. He was the lord of wild animals[4] whose savage, violent nature was considered to be a manifestation of his cruelty.[5] Although he is occasionally identified with Indra, the slayer of the demon Vṛtra, unlike Viṣṇu who fights demons, he does not. It is not surprising, therefore, that prayers are addressed to Rudra not to harm his devotees. Thus in a rare reference to him as Śiva, a prayer is addressed to him to remind him of his benevolent aspect: 'Śiva is the name; you are a healing medicine, forbear to do me harm!'[6] As the bringer of disease, he could also remedy it. Accordingly, he is addressed as the giver of medicine[7] and as the oldest, divine physician.[8]

Another aspect of Rudra's ambivalence, which remains apparent in his later classical identity as Śiva-Bhairava, is his liminal character and hence his close relationship with those who were at the margin of Vedic society. Thus, for

---

[1] White YV 16/49.
[2] AV 10/1/23.
[3] TS 5/5/7/4.
[4] VS 16/49, 16.53-7.
[5] ŚBr 12/7/3/20.
[6] VS 3/59/63.
[7] ṚV 2/33/2.
[8] TS 4/5/1.

example, in the Śatarudrīya, the famous Vedic hymn to Rudra, members of the lowest castes and outcaste tribals (Niṣāda and Vrātya) were regarded as his manifestations and salutations were offered in his name to charioteers, potters and blacksmiths by Brahmins and Kṣatriyas.[1] He later assumed the traits of the cosmic man (puruṣa) and finally was identified with the absolute being, especially in the Śvetāśvataropaniṣad.[2] Even so, as Gonda puts it: 'the essence of [Rudra] was, in the minds of Vedic men, the power of the uncultivated and unconquered, unreliable, unpredictable, hence much to be feared nature experienced as a divinity'.[3] Thus, despite his benign traits he was excluded from the Vedic Soma cult, but did receive some of the remains of the oblation.[4] Offerings were made to appease him and his cult required precautions.

The basic common point this myth makes in all its versions is simply that, despite these Vedic precedents, Śiva is an important god who cannot be ignored. According to the Ṭīkā[5] this myth also teaches initiates of the Kubjikā Tantras another important point. After outlining in brief the contents of the goddess's liturgy (krama), the Ṭīkā continues:

> This Kula liturgy (krama) is linked in this way to (the tradition transmitted through) the series (of teachers) (pāramparya). He who practices it having learnt it from the teacher's mouth is endowed with (every) accomplishment (siddhibhājana). Otherwise, for anyone who acquires this knowledge by deceit, it will at that very moment be fruitless for him. As (is said):[6]
>
> '(Then the lord became extremely angry and), in order to destroy the sacrifice, (he cursed Dakṣa).'[7]

Dakṣa was deceitful. The sacrifice Dakṣa was performing, according to the traditional view of the Kubjikā Tantras expressed by the author of the Ṭīkā, was not a Vedic sacrifice; it was the Krama ritual of the goddess. After the destruction of his sacrifice Dakṣa repented and atoned for his mistake. The god, thus

---

[1] VS 16/27; TS 4/5/4.
[2] ŚvUp 2/16-17; 3/2-3, 3/9-10.
[3] Śaivism and Vaiṣṇavism p. 5.
[4] ŚBr 1/7/3/1.
[5] This and the other main Kubjikā sources will be descibed and discussed in the last chapter of this introduction.
[6] In KuKh 3/79.
[7] The Ṭīkā then goes on to paraphrase in prose KuKh 3/80-84.
evaṁ pāramparyayuktam idaṁ kulakramaṁ yaḥ gurumukhāt jñātvā [k kh: + yaḥ] abhyaset sa siddhibhājano [k kh: -naṁ] bhavati | athavā yaḥ kaścid anyāyena cumbakavṛttyā [k: -vṛdbhyām; kh: -vṛtbhyā] idaṁ jñānam upārjayet tasya tatkṣaṇān niṣphalam| yathā yajñavidhvaṁsanārthāya ||
Ṭ MS K fl. 66a.

propitiated, was pleased with him and told Dakṣa to perform his sacrifice again, assuring him that it would be successful.[1] This successful sacrifice was the Krama ritual.

We may fruitfully contrast Dakṣa's situation with that of Himavat, the father of Dakṣa's reincarnated daughter.[2] According to the KMT, Bhairava goes to see Himavat who, instead of rejecting him, as does Dakṣa, welcomes him by intoning a laud in five verses. Moreover, unlike Dakṣa who was not pleased with his son-in-law, Himavat ardently desires to get his daughter married to Bhairava. Before asking this favour to which Bhairava graciously consents, Bhairava grants him five boons, one for each of the verses of his hymn. And so in this way also, the contrast between the cursed Dakṣa and the blessed Himavat is intense. We have noted already that the ŚM makes no direct reference to Dakṣa's sacrifice. Instead, it focuses on Himavat's sacrifice and his identity as the sacrificial priest, as if to underline the contrast between Dakṣa and Himavat – the former who initially ignores Śiva and the latter who acts in the exact opposite way.

Let us see how this works. According to the KMT, the first boon is Bhairava's promise to be, along with Himavat, close to any person who recites the five verses of Himavat's hymn. Secondly, he promises that he will be present at Himavat's sacrifice (adhvara) and so, far from destroying it, he will make it fruitful. Thirdly, he makes Himavat the emperor of all the mountains in the world. Fourthly, Bhairava promises Himavat that he will be his equal and, lastly, that he will liberate others.[3] In the ŚM we learn of the internal equivalents of these boons and so how this sacrifice is correctly performed in all its elevated interiority. There, after Bhairava promises Himavat that he will be his equal and an emperor, that is, the third and fourth boons he offers in the KMT combined, he goes on to grant him five 'yogic' boons by means of which he will achieve this status. Bhairava promises Himavat that:

> 1) "(You will be) the foundation of the sacrifice, the lord of the sacrifice, a pure soul free of imperfections. (You) who move between Iḍā and Pingalā with the movement of the inhaled and exhaled breath and are merged within Sūṣmanā[4] will become (the essence of) the individual soul (jīvarūpin). 2) The divine emergence of the Aggregate of Letters takes place within Kuṇḍalī. You will be the emperor who is the energizing (dīpaka) fire within the letters. 3) You will offer oblations in the radiant energy (varcas) of the fire[5] in the middle of the

[1] KuKh 3/153d-155.
[2] See KuKh 3/160ff.
[3] KMT 1/21-23.
[4] See note to KuKh 2/18.
[5] This is the reading in MS Kh, other MSs read -'sun'.

End of the Twelve and the Nine (navānta).[1] Established in the vital breath, you will be the sacrificial priest (adhvaryu). 4) You (will be the) lord, whose form is the sacrifice which is the dissolving away (of the vital breath) above and below. (Seated) where the (vital) channels (nāḍī) of embodied beings are established in the vital breath, you will convey it. 5) (As) the cosmic energy (viśvatejas) in the middle of the eyebrows (between) the two Drops at the extremity of the Supreme, merged into the plane Beyond the Fourth (of the liberated state), you (will be) said to be the vital breath. O Lord of the Mountains, these are the five boons I have given you."[2]

The Ṭīkā implicitly identifies Dakṣa's sacrifice with the sacrifice of the Great Churning Bhairava mentioned in the colophons from which the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras originated. It says that: 'the path of the Western tradition originates from the great (sacred) field, that is, the great sacrifice of the Churning Bhairava'.[3] In this way the Great Path of the Churning was revealed. A little further on we are told that the Path of Meru is Dakṣa's sacrifice. As the Path of Meru, which is the End of the Twelve above the head, is the path through which the teachings are transmitted, the two sacrifices are the same. Thus, in fact Dakṣa's sacrifice was fruitful after all, insofar as it initiated the process whereby the goddess came to earth in her eighth life, the final and most powerful one. Or we may understand that the successful sacrifice that Himavat undertakes by Śiva's blessing is the one Śiva tells Dakṣa to start again and promises will be successful. This is not only the Krama ritual but also, it seems, the sacrifice of Bhairava's marriage with the goddess. This is not mentioned in the KuKh. In the KMT we are told that Bhairava consummated this rite by 'churning' his consort. Engaged in

---

[1] The End of the Nine refers to the state of consciousness attained by reciting Bhairava's seed syllable mantra – Navātman. It consists of nine letters and is in the centre of the maṇḍala in the End of the Twelve. See below, chapter 2, p. 417.

[2] yajñādhāro [g: -psaro] yajñapatiḥ [kh: -pati; g: yakṣapatiḥ] pūtātmā vigatāmayaḥ [g: -maya] | iḍāpiṅgalayor madhye niḥśvāsocchvāsacāriṇaḥ [g: niśvāsośvāsa-' kh g: -ṇaṁ] ||
sūṣmanāntaralīnas [kh: sukṣma-] tvaṁ jīvarūpī [kh: rudra-] bhaviṣyasi [g: -ṣyati] |
kuṇḍalyantargataḥ [g: kuṇḍalā-; kh g: -taṁ] divyaḥ [kh g: divyaṁ] varṇarāśisamudbhavaḥ || varṇānte [kh: -nta] dīpako vahniś cakravartī [kh:-varttir; g: -vartti] bhaviṣyasi |
dvādaśānte navānte ca madhyasthaḥ [kh g: -sthaṁ] sūryavarcasaḥ [kh: vahni-; kh g: -saṁ] ||
juhvase [kh: juhuṣe] prāṇago bhūtvā adhvaryus [kh: adhvaryyu-] tvaṁ bhaviṣyasi |
yatra prāṇavahā nāḍyaḥ [kh: nāḍyo; g: nadyo] prāṇārūḍhās tu [g: prāṇarūḍhasya] dehinām||
adha ūrdhve [g: ūrddha] layo bhūtvā patis tvaṁ yajñarūpiṇaḥ [kh: -rūpiṇa; g: -ṇaṁ] |
bindudvaye [kh g: -yaṁ] bhruvor madhye [g: bhrūvor-; kh: -madhya] parānte viśvatejasam ||
turyātītapade [g: -gīta-] līnaḥ [kh: līnaṁ; g: līne] prāṇātmeti nigadyase [g: nigadyate] |
ete [kh: evaṁ] pañcavarās tubhyaṁ mayā dattā girīśvara [kh: giri-; g: -raḥ] || ŚM 2/71-76

[3] paścimāmnāyamārgasya [k kh: + apaścimāmnāyamārgasya] utpattiḥ mahākṣetrān mahāmanthānabhairavayajñād | Ṭ (MS K) fl. 1a.

this act he is called the Churning Bhairava. In the KMT this takes place after the goddess has completed her tour of India in which she spreads the teaching. It is its fulfilment and completion. As the goddess is induced to undertake this tour in order to reach this final union, one could say that this 'sacrifice' brought the teachings down into the world. Perhaps this is why the YKh (1) referring to Kālī whose 'form is crooked' says that:

> (...) she descended into Dakṣa's sacrifice into the family of the snow mountain in the eighth birth of accomplishment. There the Command is very well known, it saves from the abyss of phenomenal existence and is Khañjinī (i.e. Kubjikā), the wealth of liberation (mokṣalakṣmī).[1]

The KuKh[2] says that in her eighth birth the goddess was reborn in the Himalayas as Himavat's daughter. The implication here seems to be that Dakṣa's sacrifice reaches fruition in that incarnation. An additional point made here in the KuKh, as in the Śākta versions recorded in the Purāṇas noted above, is that the goddess is, no less than Śiva, a great deity. Most Paurāṇic Śākta versions of the myth narrate how Śiva, distraught with the suffering of having lost his wife, took the body from the pyre and wandered, flying through the sky, with it on his shoulders. The gods, realizing that his suffering would not pass until he was free of the corpse, requested Viṣṇu to intervene. This he did by slicing the body of the goddess into fifty or fifty-one parts. These fell in various places in India and became sacred seats (pīṭha) where the goddess is worshipped. The events of the myth narrated here do indeed serve as a prelude to the establishment of goddess sites, but only indirectly. The texts that refer to the dismemberment of the goddess are all relatively late and our text knows nothing of it.

The Goddess's Previous Births

We may now turn to this part of the narrative as it appears in the Kumārikākhaṇḍa. The goddess tells the god:

> (I am) she who, during the Age of Strife (kaliyuga), descends (into this world) to liberate those who, frightened by the fear of the world of transmigration, desire liberation. I am Bhadrakālikā,

---

[1] dakṣayajñāvatīrṇā [k: dakṣe-] tuhinagirikule aṣṭame siddhajanme tatrājñā suprasiddhā bhavagahanaharā khañjinī [k: khyaṁjinī] mokṣalakṣmī [k: bhyokṣya-] ||
YKh (1) 15/79cd.

[2] KuKh 3/160-161.

formerly Dakṣa's daughter. My eyes (were) large; (I was) beautiful and married to Śambhu.[1]

The ṢSS refers only once to the goddess as the virgin Umā, Dakṣa's daughter (Dākṣāyaṇī). Most of chapter 43 where that reference occurs is reproduced in chapter 46 of the KuKh. The original source was probably the ṢSS. This is apparent from the fact that the contents are selectively changed in KuKh, distorting the presentation in such a way that the text cannot be properly understood without reference to the ṢSS. Moreover, the KuKh draws a great deal from other sources whereas, apart from the KMT, the ṢSS does not. Again, what is said about Dakṣa's daughter in the ṢSS is not coherent with what is said about her in the KuKh. According to the ṢSS, the god in the form of Siddhanātha, also called Piṅgalanātha, descended into the world on 'the northern bank of the milky ocean'.[2] The text simply adds that:

> The virgin Umā, daughter of Dakṣa (Dākṣāyaṇī) (lived) there and so an act of grace took place. (Then), he who is the supreme saviour of all people in the city of the triple world came down into the land of Bhārata in four forms (caturmūrti).[3]

The commentary explains:

> Then, another time, the fifth (siddha) Piṅgalanātha,[4] assuming a bodily form, came down (into the world) in order to grace (it). Where (did this take place)? (It happened) in the northern part of the ocean of milk. There, on the sides of the Kaula mountain (śilā) (he did) everything together with Dakṣa's daughter including grace (the world) and the rest, having brought about the first descent (into the world of the teaching in the form of) the first (ādi) Kādi division[5] called the descent (into the world of) Dakṣa's daughter. [6]

---

[1] KuKh 3/72-73.
[2] KuKh 46/43cd = ṢSS 43/13ab.
[3] KuKh 46/38-39 = ṢSS 43/15
[4] In the KMT 3/94-98, Bhairava declares that he appears in the world in the form of the teacher. In particular he assumes the form of five teachers. These are the Siddhas Sādākhya, Piṅga (the Tawny One) Ananta (Endless), Anugrahīśa (Lord of Grace), and Śrīkaṇṭha. These are related to the five elements Space, Wind, Fire, Water and Earth, respectively. The fifth Siddha, who in this reference is called Piṅgalanātha, may be Śrīkaṇṭha.
[5] This is one of the many ways of referring to the Kubjikā school.
[6] tataḥ kālāntare anugrahārthaṁ piṇḍabhūtatayā piṅgalanāthena avatāraṁ kṛtaṁ pañcamena || kutra || kṣīrasamudrasya uttaradigbhāge || tatra kaulaśilāpṛṣṭhe dakṣakanyayā [k kh: -kanyā]

Perhaps in deference to the total silence of the KMT, its prime authority, the ṢSS limits itself to no more than a brief mention of this form of the goddess and imply indirectly her relationship to the first Siddha. Alternatively, this may have been the first hint of the subsequent myth, but this is unlikely. The myth was certainly known to YKh (1) of the MBT which, as the evidence we shall examine in due course suggests, was redacted before the KuKh and probably also preceded the ṢSS. A hymn in YKh (1) praises the goddess in her previous birth:

> Dakṣa's daughter was (born) in this Vārāhakalpa, her mind powerful (java) (and deep like a) lake. Having requested that (god) whose form was fierce like a demon . . . (?) in a good sacred bathing place (sutīrtha), overruled (paribhavitā) in every respect by (her) father, out of anger she gave up her body in the sacrifice. I bow to that Kālikā who (thus) after other rebirths became part of the family of the Himalayas.
>
> I always bow to that Kālī who has removed (all) suffering by the awakening of the divine Command along with the venerable Śaṅkara who, endowed with the most excellent qualities, has come from Kailāśa to the venerable sacred seat of the lineage (santānapīṭha) and has been united by grace with the daughter of the Himalayas. She is the one who, having gone to the Island of the Moon, is Mālinī who, established in Yoga, has reached the supreme plane.
>
> Having fashioned (piṇḍīkṛtvā) the pure body of the venerable Udyāna Liṅga by union (yoga) with the Mother, Kālī attained (that) form and illumined the directions with the rays of the Moon. She came forth from the Liṅga [. . .]
>
> The descent of all the western (tradition) of mother Kujā is linked to the previous tradition (pūrvāmnāya) and to Dakṣa's daughter.[1]

---

saha anugrahādikaṁ sarvaṁ ādyāvatāraṁ ādikādibhedaṁ dakṣakanyāvatārākhyaṁ kṛtaṁ kṛtvā || Comm. on ṢSS 43/19.

[1] asmin vārāhakalpe sarasijavamatir dākṣanāmā [g: -javamatidakṣa-] sūtābhūt *taṁ [g: ta] pūtanograrūpaṁ * * rasamihataḥ (?) prārthayitvā sutīrthe* | yajñe sarvatra [g: sarvadva] kopāt pitṛparibhavitā [g: -paribhavato] yā tanuṁ [g: tanuḥ] svām vihāya prāptaṁ [g: prāptā] janmāntarebhyas [g: -rebhyaḥs] tuhinagirikulaṁ [g: -la] kālikāṁ [g: tālalī] tāṁ [g: nān] namāmi || kailāśād āgatena [g: ke-] pravaraguṇavatā śrīmatā śaṁkareṇa śrīmatsantānapīṭhe himagiritanayā [g: -vanayā] yojitānugrahena | candradvīpe gatāyāṁ paramapadagatā mālinī yogasaṁsthā [g: -sasthā] divyājñānandabodhāt [g: -vodhat] pratihataduritāṁ tāṁ sadā naumi [g: nomi] kālīm || piṇḍīkṛtvāmbayogān nijavapuramalaṁ śrīmadudyānaliṅgaṁ [g: -liṅgāṁ]

According to the KuKh, after the destruction of her father's sacrifice and her self-immolation in the sacrificial fire, the goddess is reborn in her seventh and final rebirth as Pārvatī, Himavat's daughter. In the Mālinīstava, Bhairava praises the goddess as the deity who receives the offering of the meat of men who are born with just one to seven lives left before they achieve liberation. [1] According to our text, liberation is attained after seven lifetimes:

> This is the divine Kulakrama of the Tradition, that is, the Western Tradition. (It proceeded) from Dakṣa ten thousand one hundred years ago and so all that has been said by Siddhanātha was (uttered) before by Dakṣa. O god, this, the most excellent Krama Current, should not be written in a book.
>
> One should known that the transmission (krama), the pure meaning of the doctrine (matārtha), is transmitted verbally. By worshipping (it), one attains liberation within seven lifetimes.[2]

The seventh is the last and supreme rebirth. When Kuṇḍalinī rises completely and perfectly, she eradicates the sins of the previous lives and so, entering the condition of the 'seventh birth', the Yogi attains liberation. As the KuKh explains:

> Kuṇḍalī (the Coiled One) is the pure moonlight (of consciousness). She is reverse (viparīta) action. Then, in a moment, (one experiences) the bliss and upsurge (udbhava) of (the vital) Fire and Wind. Then one attains (the energy of consciousness) which destroys the sins of (all true) yogis and, in the seventh birth, (the Karma) of (all one's previous) births. Even the foolishness (of thoughtless action) is completely eradicated. [3]

Occasionally, the same is said of the eight birth understood to be the completion and culmination of the seven lives that have passed. Then in that supreme birth, 'the casket of knowledge', that is, the scripture and its teaching

---

rūpaṁ saṁprāpya [g: sa-] kālī śaśikiraṇakarodbhāsitānekadiśām [g: saśikaraṇikarodbhāśitāneka ikṣā] |
 niṣkrāntā liṅgato * * * * * * * * * *|| YKh (1) 39/21-23abc
pūrvāmnāyena saṁbaddhaṁ saṁyuktaṁ [g: -yukta] dakṣakanyayā [g: -kā] ||
avatāraṁ tu sakalaṁ paścimaṁ tu kujāmbikām | Ibid. 39/46cd-47ab.

[1] Cf. note on line 91 on the Mālinīstava in chapter 4 of the KuKh.
[2] KuKh 45/33-35.
[3] KuKh 60/43-44.

manifest.[1] From the lifetime in which the adept begins to practice seriously to attain liberation, he rises progressively from birth to birth to higher stages marked by his attainment of the ultimate reality taught in successive, progressively higher schools. Practicing in this way, he and his body becomes progressively more pure and powerful until his seventh and last rebirth when he final reaches the Western House of the Yoginī, that is, the tradition of the goddess Kubjikā. There he attains the supreme condition, the liberated Śāmbhava state. He retraces in this way the seven births the goddess herself is said to have taken in this world until she finally assumed the form of Bhadrakālikā and became the daughter of Himavat in her last incarnation. As the Sūtra of the (goddess's) Births (Janmasūtra) says:

> The Kaulika (reality) manifests in the seventh birth, that of the Śāmbhava state, which is the last (paścima). These Siddhas in the Western House attain the goal in (this) the Kali Age. A Bauddha is in the first life and a Jaina in the second. (Then) a Vedika (bhaṭṭa) is in the third, a Vaiṣṇava in the fourth, a worshipper of the Sun (saura) in the fifth and (a Śaiva), the most excellent, in the sixth. The seventh (birth is in) the Western House, which is the Teaching of the Three Lineages.[2] [. . .]
>
> The six beginning with the Buddhists and ending with the Śaivites are in the fettered state (paśubhāva). The seventh that has come into being is the House (veśman) of the Yoginī whose sign is liberation. In the first one Tārā is the goddess (śakti) and Ambikā in the second. Gāyatrī is (the form of the goddess) in the third (birth) and Lakṣmī in the fourth. In the fifth she is Rājñī and is said to be Umā in the sixth. In the seventh she is Khañjī who has descended in each Age.
>
> She is one in the venerable Western House, but of many kinds (bheda). Or else, (beyond all forms) she is the Transmental who knows the ultimate limit (of immanence) and bestows liberation at the end of the Kali Age.
>
> Called the eighth, present in the three lineages, she gives worldly benefits (bhoga). Free of the practice of Tantra (tantrācāra), she is on the plane of practice of Kula (kulācāra).[3] She, the one called Parā, is the energy Kujā who, threefold (in relation to the three lineages), emanates the universe. From Brahmā to (this) world

[1] KuKh 65/2: In the last and supreme birth, when seven lives have passed, the casket of knowledge, which is like a sky flower, manifests.
[2] This is a distinctive way of referring to the Kubjikā school.
[3] These two modalities of practice (ācāra) will be discussed in chapter six.

> (bhuvana) the entire universe is fourfold. She is one, (but) abides in seven forms (rūpa) and is again divided up by them.[1]

Whether seven or eight lives, this notion appears to have been derived from two basic ideas. One is the common, general notion that animals offered in sacrifice are liberated after they have been offered seven times in successive rebirths. At the most basic level the same holds good for human sacrifice, of which we are told in the Mālinīstava the goddess is particularly fond.[2] Any human offered in sacrifice is ex conceptio in one or other of his last seven lives. Sublimated and interiorized death itself becomes the sacrifice and the path to liberation is traced through seven lives, lived realising higher levels of attainment, marked by seven deaths. Men draw closer to the goddess in this way, and so she likes, both literally and symbolically, to eat their flesh in their last series of rebirths, especially of those who are in their last life.

Secondly, these doctrines appear to be influenced by an early Buddhist conception. According to this view there is a stage of spiritual development when

---

[1] saptame [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -maṁ] paścime [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -maṁ] janme [k, kh, gh, ṅ: janmaṁ] śāmbhave [k, kh, gh: sāṁ-; ṅ: -vaṁ] kaulikodayam ||
siddhyante [k, kh, gh, ṅ: sidhyate] ca kalau [ṅ: kalaṁ] hy ete [k, kh: rate; gh: rata; ṅ: ratta] ye [k, kh, gh: ya] siddhāḥ [ṅ: siddhā] paścime gṛhe |
bauddhaṁ tu prathame janme jinaṁ [ṅ: jitaṁ] caiva [ṅ: caitad] dvitīyake [k, kh, gh: dvitiyake] ||
bhaṭṭaṁ [k, kh: tadūṁ; gh: ta iṁ; ṅ: bhadṛṁ] tṛtīyake janme vaiṣṇavaṁ tu [ṅ: ca] caturthake [gh: catuṁthake] | *sauraṁ tu pañcame [ṅ: paścime] janme [ṅ: * ] ṣaṣṭhe [k, kh, gh: ṣaṣṭe] vai cottamaṁ param ||
*saptamaṁ paścimaṁ veśma [k, gh: vesmaṁ; kh, ṅ: veśmaṁ] ūlitritayaśāsanam [k, kh, gh: -sāsanaṁ; ṅ: * litritayasāśanaṁ]* | [. . .]
paśubhāvāḥ [k, kh, gh: -vā; ṅ: esubhāvā] sthitāḥ [ṅ: -tā] ṣaḍbhiḥ [k: ṣaṭbhiḥ; kh, gh, ṅ: ṣadbhiḥ] bauddhādyaṁ śaivam antimam [k, kh, gh: -maṁtinaṁ; ṅ: -matinaṁ] ||
saptamaṁ [ṅ: sapramaṁ] yoginīveśma [k, kh, gh: -vesmaṁ] saṁjātaṁ [kh: + saṁjātaṁ] muktilakṣaṇam |
ādau tārā bhavet [k, kh, gh, ṅ: bhave] śaktir ambikā [kh, ṅ: cchakti-] ca [ṅ: vad] dvitīyake ||
gāyatrī ca tṛtīye [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -yā] ca lakṣmī caiva caturthake [ṅ: -kaṁ] |
pañcame [k, kh, gh: -maṁ] ca bhaved [kh: bhave] rājñī [kh: rādrājñī] umā ṣaṣṭhe [k, kh, gh: saṣṭa] prakīrtitā [k, kh, gh: -tāḥ] ||
saptame ca bhavet [ṅ: bhave] khañjī [gh: khajī] avatīrṇā [k, kh, gh: avatārṇā] yuge yuge |
ekā sānekabhedena sthitā śrīpaścime gṛhe ||
*unmanā [k, kh, gh: unmānā] sāvadhijā [k, kh, gh: sāvadhijñā; ṅ: -dhirjā] vā [ṅ: tā] kalauvante [ṅ: kala * ] ca muktidā |
bhuktidā [ṅ: bhaktidā] sāṣṭamākhyātā [gh: sāmākhyātā] ughatritayagāminī [k, ṅ: udya-] ||
tantrācāravinirmuktā kaulācārapadasthitā [k, kh, gh: -tāḥ] | *sā parākhyā kujā śaktir [k, kh, gh: śa ] viśvaṁ śṛjati [ṅ: sṛjati] sā tridhā [ṅ: nvava] ||
caturvidhaṁ [ṅ: -dha] jagat sarvaṁ ābrahmabhuvanāntikam [kh: -nāntitikaṁ] |
*ekā [ṅ: ekī] sā [k, kh, gh: śā] saptarūpasthā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: daśarū-] punas tair eva [k, kh, gh: -tanaiva; ṅ: tenaiva] bheditā [k, gh: vanditā, kh: * ditā]* || YKh (1) 23/12cd-15ab; 18cd-24.

[2] KuKh chapter 4, Mālinīstava line 91. See note to this line in the translation.

the aspirant becomes a srotāpanna, lit. 'one who has entered the stream'. Having entered this 'stream' he needs only seven more lifetimes in order to achieve liberation. This notion was later adapted by the Buddhist Tantras who, developing within the same cultural milieu as their Śaiva counterparts, needed in a like manner to purify and interiorize more primitive beliefs. In this context we may refer to the Hevajratantra which affirms that the best sacrificial offering is a man who has traversed this course and become one who has 'returned seven times' (saptāvarta).[1] Whilst the commentator Vajragarbha accepts that this is literally the case, echoing the Tantra, he stresses that the human victim sacrifices himself willingly, implying that his action is guided by the altruistic spirit that inspires a Bodhisattva. However, he goes on to explain the 'figurative sense' in the Tantric perspective according to which liberation is to be achieved in this very life, and that the offering is not an outer ritual but takes place spontaneously within the body. Vajragarbha begins by outlining the godlike features of men in their seventh birth:

> They appear with seven shadows, their eyes are unflinching, there are three creases on their foreheads, their bodies emit a pleasing odour and so on. If you see such a one, offer him flowers in salutation, circumambulate him and address him thus: "O Great Lord of Yogis, the time has come to act for the good of such as us." If you address him thus he will surrender his life. . . . As for the figurative sense of saptāvarta it is said: Of all embodied beings this body represents seven births, for from the eating and drinking of food and drink with their six flavours, these are digested and nourishment increases. This is called the first birth. Then the blood is formed and this is the second birth. Then flesh which is the third, skin which is the fourth, the formation of veins which is the fifth, then bones which is the six, then flesh and marrow, and this is the seventh.[2]

Now let us now return to the main thread of the story. The KuKh emphasizes the continuity of the goddess's identity in both incarnations by also referring to her as Bhadrakālikā when she is reborn as Himavat's daughter.[3] Similarly, in the KMT Himavat introduces his daughter to Bhairava as the virgin (kumārikā) Kālikā who is 'intent on Dharma' and is his favoured one,[4] and asks him to marry her. YKh (2), like the KuKh, refers to her as Bhadrakālikā. Although

---

[1] HT 1/7/21.
[2] Hevajrapiṇḍārthaṭīkā by Vajragarbha, commentary on HT 1/7/21. Translation by Snellgrove.
[3] KuKh 3/160-161.
[4] KMT 1/27.

the AS is probably later than YKh (2), it prefers to follow the KMT and call the goddess born to Himavat, Kālī or Kālikā. There Dakṣa asks the god for her to be reborn in this form and unite with him.[1] Pārvatī who, as her name suggests – 'She who is of the Mountains' – is generally said to be Himavat's daughter. But she is associated with the young goddess Kālikā from as far back as the Devīmāhātmya of the Mārkaṇḍeyapurāṇa. There we are told that: 'Kauśikī emerged from the muscles of Pārvatī, and the latter turned black and become known as Kālikā dwelling in the Himalayas'.[2] We find traces of these developments in the ŚM but they are hardly more than hints.[3] There Himavat says to Bhairava:

> I have a beloved daughter born of Menakā's womb. Out of fear of having her wings cut, she entered the sea. One of my daughters is Āparṇā[4] and the second one is Ekapāṭalā. The third is the youngest (laghvīyasī). She is the beautiful Kālinī who is (still) alive. (These are my) daughters the eldest, middle one and the one called the child, respectively. I have given you one (namely) Sukālinī, who is present (here). O god, she is beautiful, well mannered and devoted to her husband (satīdharmaratā). May she now worship the feet of the Lord.[5]

The reference here appears to be to Agastya's clipping of the wings of the Vindhya mountains. The text does not specify who entered the sea and, presumably, died. It may have been Menakā or, more probably, her daughter Aparṇā – 'Without Wings'. Note also the name Ekapāṭalā. Pāṭalā is the name of a form of Dakṣāyanī – Dakṣā's daughter. The manner in which Himavat refers to his third daughter as the youngest – laghvīyasī – reminds us of one of Kubjikā's

---

[1] AS 27/66-72ab. See below, p. 147 ff. where the entire account is translated.

[2] Bhattacaryya 1974: 76.

[3] Note that the less-developed condition of the myth suggests, as do numerous other indications, that the ŚM is older than the ṢSS.

[4] MS G reads Ekavarṇā.

[5] menakāgarbhasaṁbhūtā [g: -gardbha-; kh: -taṁ; g: -tāṁ] vallabhā tanayā mama [kh: + mainākas tanayo mahyaṁ mahāvalaparākramaḥ] |
pakṣacchedabhayodvegāt [g: pakṣacchedobhayādvegāt] praviṣṭāsau [g: praviṣṭosau] mahodadhau ||
ekāparṇeti [kh: ekāparṇāti; g: ekavarṇoti] me kanyā [g: kanyā] dvitīyā caikapāṭalā |
laghvīyasī tṛtīyā tu [g: tṛtīyāste] jīvabhūtā sukālinī [kh: sukārinī] ||
saṁkhyayā tanayāḥ [kh: saṁkhāya munayo; g: śaṁkhāya munaye] jyeṣṭhā [g: jyeṁṣṭhā] madhyamā bālikākhyā [k: vālikhilya; g: vālakṣīlya] ca |
saṁpradattā mayā tubhyaṁ tiṣṭhaty ekā [kh: -aikā] sukālinī [kh: sukārikī (kālinī)] ||
satīdharmaratā [k, kh, g: sāti-; g: -tarā] deva vinītā rūpaśālinī |
karotu prabhupādānām idānīṁ [g: -dānāṁmidānīṁ] paryupāsanam || ŚM 2/81-84.

names, that is, Laghvikā. This name is amongst the earliest ones of the goddess Kubjikā but becomes rare quite early on in the later literature. Indeed, it does not occur at all in the KuKh. However, in the lines the ŚM has in common with the KMT, there is a tendency to use the name Laghvikā / Laghvī instead of Kubjikā / Kubjinī / Kubjī.[1] So, although laghvīyasī is best understood to be an adjective meaning 'youngest', rather than a proper name, there is probably an intended suggestion here of Kubjikā's other name. Moreover, although the KMT refers to the goddess who is betrothed to Bhairava repeatedly as Kālikā, the ŚM never does so, generally preferring to call her Pārvatī.[2]

Finally, we notice the reference in the above passage to the goddess as satīdharmaratā. If it were not for the later developments this expression would mean little more than my colloquial translation, namely, that the goddess is 'devoted to her husband', the equivalent of pativratā. The myth of Umā's self-immolation is generally well known. We need not postulate that its adaptation to the myth of Kubjikā's origin had already taken place in the early period of the development of the Kubjikā Tantras when the ŚM was written, but, we may see here the beginnings of it. At least a door appears to have been unobtrusively left open. The unfolding events further on in the ŚM seem to confirm this supposition. Once the goddess has served her future spouse diligently, the ŚM tells us:

> After some time had past, (Bhairava) the blue and red lord was pleased and gave her an intense form of the Command (tīvrājñā). All her impurities having been removed by the transference of the Command (ājñāsaṁkrāntimātra) alone, Pārvatī recollected all the actions of (her) previous lives. Then the Daughter of the Mountains, perceived everything to (be illusory) like a conjuring trick (indrajāla).[3] [. . .] (Pārvatī said:) "By your grace I recollect my previous worldly state (bhavāntara). Be gracious! Be compassionate! O Lord, recollect, the previous state."[4] [. . .] (Bhairava said:) "You

---

[1] Heilijgers-Seelen 1994: 12.

[2] I have accepted the reading in MS G – sukālinī – for the goddess's name. Although the lexicons do not record the name Kālinī or Sukālinī as a variant of Kālikā or Sukālikā, This reading is supported indirectly by MSs DFHJK of the KMT which read kālinī instead of kālikā in KMT 1/27d.

[3] kiñcit kāle atikrānte [kh: vyati-] bhagavān nīlalohitaḥ |
prasāditasukhas tasyās tīvrājñāṁ [kh: -mukhaṁ tasyā ājñā; g: -sukhaṁ tasyā ājñā] sanniyojayet ||
ājñāsaṁkrāntimātreṇa [g: -saṁkrāti-] nirdhūtāśeṣakalmaṣā [g: -kalmasvaṁ] |
sasmāra [kh: sasmare] pārvatī sarvāḥ [kh: sarvvān; g: sarvvā] pūrvajanmāntarakriyāḥ [g: -janmātara; kh, g: -kriyāṁ] ||
indrajālam [kh: -tālam] ivāśeṣaṁ manyamānā [kh: -mātā] tadādrijā | ŚM 2/93-95ab.

[4] smarāmi tvatprasādena bhavāntaram ahaṁ [kh: -mija] nijam [kh: mijasahaṁ] |
prasīda kuru kāruṇyaṁ pūrvāvasthāṁ [g: -vasthā] smara prabho || ŚM 2/104.

> have (simply) remembered everything concerning the earlier (Kaula) tradition (santāna) because the Command has been transferred (to you). Why do you hide yourself?"[1]

An aspect of the omniscience the Buddha attained when he achieved enlightenment was the capacity to recall all his past lives. It would not be surprising if the ŚM says that the goddess's enlightenment empowered her in the same way, if it were not for the total silence concerning this in the KMT. Although we are not told what she recalls, her reaction clearly indicates that it was very significant. Could it not have been the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice? She had immolated herself because she felt responsible for it. Is this not one of the reasons why she is asking the god for forgiveness and feels shame? The god for his part doesn't understand. Why should she feel guilty and ashamed? He tries to pull her out of this useless remorse first by telling her that she is mistaken. She should not recall past events that trouble her. Instead, he insists that what she should really remember is the past Kaula tradition. In short, we may conclude that in the ŚM Dakṣa's sacrifice and the goddess's previous birth as his daughter is starting to emerge as an additional element in the myth of the goddess – a possibility that was taken up later and developed extensively.

Let us return to the narrative in the Kumārikākhaṇḍa. After Dakṣa performs austerities and intones a hymn to Śiva (the Stavarāja) and is blessed by him, the KuKh resumes:

> And then when the goddess came to known what had occurred, (she said): "My father Dakṣa's sacrifice has been destroyed by me because (its destruction was) due to me. I am the sinner (and so) will purify myself."
>
> Having stoked the supreme fire, brilliant with waves of raging flames, and having contemplated it burning fiercely in the middle of the Maṇḍala of Gesture (mudrāmaṇḍala),[2] she then sat on the adamantine seat (vajrāsana) and recalled to mind the energy of Aghoreśvarī. She burnt herself with the Fire of Time and became (like) a smokeless, burning coal. (This) wise woman, dead and reduced to ashes, left the mortal world.[3]

---

[1] ājñāsaṁkrāntimātreṇa pūrvasantānagocaram |
sarvaṁ [g: sarvve] te [kh: tai] smṛtim āyātaṁ [g: māyāntaṁ] kim ātmānaṁ [g: -na] pragopyase || ŚM 2/106.

[2] The goddess is Gesture – Mudrā. The 'Maṇḍala of Gesture' is therefore her Kramamaṇḍala.

[3] KuKh 3/156-159.

The Vedic formula: 'Rudra is indeed Fire' (rudro vai agniḥ) identifies this god with the sacrificial fire from early times. In Tantric and Purāṇic literature this form of the sacrificial fire became Kālāgnirudra – the Rudra who is the Fire of Time that 'cooks' the worlds and then ultimately consumes them at the end of each cosmic cycle. Kubjikā is frequently identified with Rudraśakti throughout our text. In this aspect she is, amongst other things, the energy of this divine Fire. As such she is also, as we have seen, Saṁvartā, the Doomsday Fire that burns in the centre of the maṇḍala with the power of bliss. In this way, the goddess who is said to 'reside in fire' (vahnivāsinī)[1] is implicitly identified with the spiritual power of the Vedic sacrificial fire. Thus the goddess, who 'stoked the supreme fire' and contemplated it burning in the centre of the maṇḍala, contemplated her own nature. The Ṭīkā, commenting on this passage, explains:

> (Contemplating the fire burning fiercely, the goddess) reduces her body to ashes in order to purify herself. Her body burnt with the practice of Yoga (yogayukti) in accord with the sacred seat, that is, in accord with the sacred seat that is the 'Maṇḍala of Gesture' by means of the transmission (krama) that is located in the centre (of it). When (her) body had been (completely) burnt by the Fire of Time, (she) assumed the form of a burning coal.[2]

Thus the goddess's self-immolation is an act of auto-combustion that frees her, as it were, of the impurity of her manifest form. Burnt by the Fire of Time, she resumes her original blissful nature and in a 'body of bliss' unites and merges with the god in the transcendent Void of the Śāmbhava state.[3] She then emerges again from the god, as if born from him, to assume her last body. As YKh (1) says:

> Śambhu, who observes the Great Vow (was) the husband of Dakṣa's daughter. Again, out of anger that goddess died on the banks of the Ganges (where Dakṣa performed his sacrifice). Reduced to ashes by (the purifying) fire, she went to the Śāmbhava plane. She, who is the Transmental, the mother of Kula and Śambhu's daughter was born in the Age of Strife.[4]

---

[1] KuKh 8/94.

[2] ātmaśodhanārthe svaśarīraṁ [kh: śva-] bhasmībhūtaṁ [kh: bhaśmī-] karoti | jvalantaṁ [k kh: -rantaṁ] svaśarīraṁ [kh: śva-] yogayuktyā pīṭhānugamena mudrāmaṇḍalapīṭhānugamena [k kh: -maṇḍale-] madhyasthitakrameṇa kālāgninā śarīre dagdhe [k kh: dagdhaṁ] aṅgārarūpā gatā yāvat | Ṭ MS K fl. 66b.

[3] KuKh 3/72cd-73.

[4] mahāvratadharaḥ [k, kh, gh: -raṁ] śambhuḥ [k, kh, gh: śaṁbhuṁ] dakṣasya duhitāpatiḥ ||
punaḥ krodhena sā devyā gaṅgātīre [k, gh: gaṁgāṁ-; kh: gagāṁ-] mṛtā tu sā |

We find a similar account of the goddess's self-immolation and subsequent rebirth as Bhadrakālikā in chapter nine of the Kularatnoddyota, which is the earliest Kubjikā Tantra where this is mentioned. The Tantrasadbhāva, a Trika Tantra, refers to the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice, the suicide of his daughter and her rebirth as Bhadrakālī, just as we find in the version of this myth in chapter three of our text, although it does not mention the goddess Kubjikā at all. This event is set in the broader context of the goddess's previous lives as it is in the KRU. In both the TS and the KRU the purpose is to describe the previous incarnations of the goddess Kātyāyanī / Durgā. Moreover, the names of the incarnations of the goddess over the first few aeons largely agree in both accounts. In short, although there are a good number of variants, the account in the KRU of the goddess's previous incarnations is clearly similar both in content and actual wording to the one in the TS. In chapter ten of the TS we read:

> She is called Umā and is endowed with every (form of) worldly benefit. (All) worship that goddess. She is like a mother who is always giving birth. O fair-faced one, having brought her down along with me into the midst of fettered souls (aṇu), O eternal one, she appeared in order to grace the worlds. In the first aeon (kalpa) (she was) Jaganmātṛ (Mother of the Universe), in the second Jagadyoni (Source of the Universe), in the third Śāmbhavī, in the fourth Viśvarūpiṇī (All Things), and in the fifth Varārohā (Fair Lady). Again, in the sixth she is known as Gaurī (the White One). Her colour (was) white and, beautiful, (she was) Dakṣa's auspicious daughter. Due to Dakṣa's insult she burnt her own body. Then again, in the seventh (aeon) she was the New Moon (amā kalā) called Kṛṣṇā (the Black One). Again, you who are worshipped by Himavat made yourself into (his) daughter and performed terrible austerities up to the end of the remaining half of the time (left of that aeon). O beloved, once you attained me, (your) husband you, become (a part of me like) the hair on (my body). I reside on (Mount) Kailāśa with you, O fair-faced lady. You are the body of my left half. You are not separate from me.
>
> Born again in Dakṣa's sacrifice with the name Bhadrakālī, she is one and has emerged a little (īśāt) in another form. When this set of four ages came, (she is) with Viṣṇu in the Dvāpara (age). In order to kill (the demon) Mahiṣa (she) became manifest (utpannā) (in a) black

---

bhasmabhūtā [k, gh: bhasmā-; kh: bhasmī-] pāvakena [k, gh: padegena; kh: pardegena] gatā sā śāmbhave pade ||
śambhuputrī kalau jātā unmanā sā kulāmbikā | YKh (1) 4/286cd-288ab.

> and brown (form) with many names, including Kātyāyanī and Durgā. The beloved of devotion and the one who bestows boons to the people who are your devotees, she descended first of all onto the peak of the Vindhya mountain.[1]

In the KRU, as in the TS, the narrative is framed in a large time span. Chapter nine of the KRU opens with the goddess asking how the Kula tradition (kulāmnāya) will be worshipped along with its mantras and Vidyās and who will bring it down (avatāraka) into the world in the various cosmic aeons (kalpa). After explaining that it is brought down into the world by incarnations or aspects of both the god and the goddess (aṁśamātra),[2] the god goes on to list the names of these aspects – a goddess and her consort – in nineteen aeons (kalpa), many of which we recognize from the earlier version in the TS. The first seventeen are as follows: 1) Jaganmātṛ – Jagannātha, 2) Jagadyoni – Jagaddhātri, 3) Śāmbhavī – Śambhu, 4) Viśvarūpiṇī – Viśvarūpa, 5) Nandinī – Ānandīśa, 6) Gaṇāmbikā – Gaṇasaṁghapati, 7) Vibhūti – Īśvara, 8) Subhūti (JY: Bhūti) – Sarveśvara, (9) (Ānandī 10) Vāmalocanā, 11) Varārohā), 12) Sumaṁgalā – Māṅgalyeśa, 13) Mahātanu – Mahādeha, 14) Anantā – Anantīśa, 15) Bhūtamātṛ – Bhūtanātha, 16) Mahāvidyā (JY: Uttamā) – Vidyeśvara, and 17) Sahasradhārā – Sahasraliṅga.[3] As

---

[1] umā [g: aumā] iti samākhyātā sarvabhogasamanvitā [g: -tāḥ] ||
paryupāsanti [g: -pāśanti] tāṁ devīṁ mātā iva sadāsutā [g: -sutaḥ] |
tām avatīryāṇumadhye mayā sārdhaṁ varānane ||
anugrahārthaṁ lokānāṁ prādurbhūtā sanātane |
pūrvakalpe jaganmātā [g: jagatmātā] jagadyonir dvitīyake [g: -yonidvitīyake] ||
tṛtīye śāṁbhavī [g: sāṁ-] nāma caturthe viśvarūpiṇī |
pañcame tu varārohā [g: -he] ṣaṣṭhe gaurī punar matā ||
surūpā gauravarṇā ca dakṣasya duhitā śubhā |
apamānāt [g: -nāṁ] tu dakṣasya svatanudāhitā [g: svātañturdāhitā] punaḥ ||
amā kalā tu candrasya kṛṣṇā nāma [g: name] tu saptame |
punar himavatārādhyā [g: -vatārāndhya] duhitṛ tv ātmanaḥ kṛtā [g: kṛtāḥ] ||
tvayāparārdhakālānte [g: -kālottus] tapas taptaṁ [g: tapta] sudāruṇam [g: suduṁvaraṁ] |
māṁ tvaṁ [g: tva] bhartā punaḥ [g: puraḥ] prāpya jātā tv aṅgaruhā priye ||
kailāśanilayaś [k: kailāsa-] cāhaṁ tvayā sārdhaṁ varānane |
tvaṁ tanur vāmabhāgasya mama tvaṁ na viyujyase ||
dakṣādhvare punar jātā [g: jatā] bhadrakālīti nāmataḥ |
ekā tu sā [g: śā] ity aparā mūrtir īśād vinisṛtā [g: -tāḥ] ||
idaṁ caturyugaṁ prāpya dvāpare viṣṇunā saha |
mahiṣasya vadhārthāya utpannā kṛṣṇapiṅgalā ||
kātyāyanīti durgeti vividhair [g: vividhai] nāmaparyayaiḥ |
mānuṣāṇāṁ tu bhaktānāṁ varadā bhaktivatsalā ||
avatīrṇā [g: avatīrṇa] pūrvam eva vindhyaparvatamūrdhani | TS 10/1027cd-1038ab

[2] KRU 9/1-10, see note to KuKh 5/8-11ab.

[3] ādikalpe jaganmātā jagannāthasamanvitā |

it happens, this is exactly what we find in the first and probably oldest ṣaṭka of the JY. There the context is a sumptuous description of Bhairava, here called Umākānta – the Beloved of Umā, seated with his consort on Kailāśa, and the host that surrounds and attends on them. The names of the goddesses listed in the JY[1] are virtually identical to the ones in the KRU, as are other details we shall note further ahead. The JY does not name the goddess's consort in each age (kalpa). The KRU does do so, but in most cases his name is simply derived from that of the goddess. Although the wording is quite different and the account more detailed in the JY, it is highly likely that the KRU drew its version from the JY. The latter may well have been inspired by the TS or an earlier common source. Assuming this to be the case, the missing names of the goddesses have been taken from the JY and noted in brackets in the above list.[2]

What follows next in the KRU also largely coincides with the account in the JY. In the usual prophetic key with which the teachings of the KRU are presented, the god continues to address the goddess. The KRU simply mentions the 'host of mothers' that worship the couple on the mountain. The JY refers to the thousands of millions of Yoginīs (i.e. 'mothers') there and dedicates space to describing the eight Mothers who govern them. Thus the two accounts continue essentially to agree. The KRU says:

> There will be one named Ruru, king of the demons and very powerful. You will be on the path (of the world) at the end of the Mahākalpa in order to slay him. O mother of the universe, you who jagadyonir [k kh: -yoni] dvitīye tu [kh: bhu] jagaddhātrī [k kh: -tri; g: jagadvātrī] puraḥsarā [kh: pura-] ||

---

tṛtīye śāmbhavī nāma śambhunā [kh: sambhunā] saha saṁgatā |
viśvarūpasamopetā caturthe viśvarūpiṇī ||
pañcame nandinī nāma ānandīśasamanvitā |
gaṇāmbikā sthitā ṣaṣṭhe gaṇasaṅghapatiyutā [k kh g: tiryutā] ||
vibhūtiḥ [kh: vibhutiḥ] saptame kalpe īśvareṇa samanvitā |
subhūtiś cāṣṭame kalpe sarveśvarasamanvitā ||*
sumaṅgalā dvādaśame [k: dvādaśe] māṅgalyeśena [k: māṁlyaśena; kh g: māṁgalyaśena] saṁyutā |
mahātanur mahādehasaṁyutā ca trayodaśe ||
caturdaśe [g: -śa] tv anantākhyā anantīśapuraskṛtā [g: ananteśa-] |
bhūtamātā pañcadaśe bhūtanāthasamanvitā ||
mahāvidyā ṣoḍaśame [k kh: ṣoṭaśame] vidyeśvarasamanvitā |
sahasradhārā saptadaśe sahasraliṅgasaṁyutā || KRU 9/11-17.

*Note that the names of the goddesses in the ninth to eleventh age are missing. This is, no doubt, due to a drop out that occurred in the course of the transmission of the text of the KRU. The two or three lines in question are missing in all nine of the MSs consulted.

[1] JY 1/9/323 ff. folio 105a of MS K.

[2] Note that the goddess of the eleventh age – Varārohā – is the name of the goddess of the fifth out of the seven ages in the reference quoted above from the TS.

are forgiving and (yet) very fierce, Mahāmāyā and extremely powerful, you will destroy him. Accompanied by Mahābhairava and worshipped by the great host of mothers (mātṛ), you will be united to the one who is the god of all as (your) husband in the eighteenth aeon.[1]

In an interesting aside, we are told in the KRU that prior to the goddess's incarnation in the nineteenth kalpa as Dakṣa's daughter, she will come into the world to kill the demons Caṇḍa and Muṇḍa. Then as Durgā and Kātyāyaṇī in 'a black and brown (kṛṣṇapiṅgalā)' form she will slay Mahiṣa, the king of the demons. She then appears again in the end of the Dvāpara Age, as described in the Purāṇas, to slay the evil king Kaṁsa and thereby save the newly-born Kṛṣṇa.[2] Again, the JY says practically the same, identifying the goddess of the nineteenth

---

[1] rurur nāmāsurendras [g: -suredras] tu bhaviṣyati mahābalaḥ |
tvaṁ tasya nidhanārthāya mahākalpāntasaṁcare ||
kṣemaṁkarī mahāraudrā mahāmāyā [kh: mahābheyā] mahattarā |
bhaviṣyasi [g: bhaviṣyati] jaganmātas tvaṁ tasya [kh: talpa] kṣayaṁkāriṇī || mahābhairavasaṁyuktā mahāmātṛgaṇārcitā |
satī cāṣṭadaśe kalpe sarvadevapatiyutā [k g: -patir-] || KRU 9/18-20.

[2] The passage in the KRU says:

O mistress of the gods, before that, there will be two lords of the demons, namely, Caṇḍa and Muṇḍa. O Mistress of Kula, there is a Man who brings about creation (sṛṣṭikarmakara) who will bring about your descent (into the world) in order to kill them. O goddess, beloved, his second name is Viṣṇu and he creates and destroys, having worshipped you with devotion and terrible austerity.

There will be a demon called Mahiṣa who hates the gods. O goddess, you will descend into the world in order to kill him as Durgā and Kātyāyaṇī in a black and brown form. O goddess, (you will be) the means to achieve every goal and you will destroy the suffering of those who bow before you. (This will take place) in the sixth Manvantara of the coming Vārāhakalpa. O one of good vows, in the twenty-eighth of the four Yugas in the course of the seventh (Manvantara) (you will incarnate) in order to kill a certain demon called Kaṁsa.

tadagre caṇḍamuṇḍākhyau [kh: -khyo] bhaviṣyato 'surādhipau [k kh g: bhaviṣyanty asurādhipau] ||
tayor vadhāya [k kh: tābhyāṁ vadhāya; g: ?mvadhāya] deveśi avatārakriyāṁ [k kh g: -yā] tava |
kariṣyati kuleśāni sṛṣṭikarmakaraḥ [kh: śṛṣṭi-] pumān ||
viṣṇur nāma [k kh g: -mā] dvitīyas tu sṛṣṭipālanakarmakṛt |
ārādhya bhaktyā tvāṁ devi ugreṇa tapasā priye ||
mahiṣo [k g: mahiṣā] nāma daityas tu bhaviṣyati suradviṣaḥ [kh: -dvipaḥ] |
vadhārthaṁ tasya taṁ devi avatāraṁ kariṣyasi [k, kh, g: -ti] ||
kṛṣṇapiṅgalarūpeṇa durgā kātyāyanīti [kh: -ṇīti] ca |
sarvārthasādhanī devi praṇatārtivināśanī [kh: -sanī; g: -vnāśnī] ||
bhāvi vārāhakalpe tu ṣaṣṭhe manvantare gate |
saptame vartamāne tu aṣṭāviṁśe caturyuge [kh: catuyuge] ||
kaṁso [kh: kāṁsā] nāmāsuraḥ kaścid vadhārthaṁ tasya suvrate | KRU 9/25cd-31ab.

and last age as Bhadrakālī.[1] In this way, the JY neatly accommodates the narrative of the TS and extends it by implicitly identifying its own goddess Kālī with the Great Goddess (mahādevī) of the Devīmāhātmya. The KRU follows suit but ultimately, of course, completes and adapts the account by identifying Bhadrakālī with Kubjikā and so explains her origin and that of her school (kula) and its teaching. Thus the account in the KRU concludes with Ādinātha, the god, saying:

> Such, O Mother of Kula, will be the descents (into the world) of aspects (aṁśamātra) of you with many kinds of bodies and names. I will also fashion my own body with an aspect (of myself) with the aforementioned names, O goddess, in accord with the condition in each aeon (kalpa) in order to bring the Śrīkula[2] down (into the world) with the intention of gracing the world.[3]

Thus:

> O Supreme Goddess, in the nineteenth (aeon you will be born) as Dakṣa's daughter with the name Bhadrakālī, O beloved, accompanied by Bhava. Due to Dakṣa's insult, (you) gave up the body generated at that time and having done so (became) the energy (kalā) called the New Moon (Amā) present in the midst of the Moon, Sun, and Fire. O goddess, (in this state) you will be the one who nourishes (apyāyanakarī) in the three worlds. O goddess, conjoined with Amṛteśvara, (your) form fashioned by the energies (of the Moon) (kalākalitavigrahā), bestows supreme bliss, nectar and lordship. O fair

---

[1] The nineteenth who is said to be Umā (and came into the world) due to the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice, is another. She received the name Bhadrakālī and has two bodies in this the fourth age (yuga). (In one body) she is accompanied by Kṛṣṇa and (in the other) she is black and brown and is the (veritable embodiment of the) destruction of (the demon) Mahiṣa and so is Durgā, Vindhyavāsinī ('she who lives in the Vindhyas'). She with a beautiful waist came down to grace (her) devotees.

dakṣasya makhavidhvaṁśād ekonaviṁśā [k, kh: ekānaṁśā] hy umā smṛtā ||
bhadrakālīti cānyāsau nāma prāptā tanudvayā |
asmin caturyuge kṛṣṇasahitā kṛṣṇapiṅgalā ||
avadhīrmāhiṣaṁ [k, kh: mahiṣaṁ] tena durgāsau vindhyavāsinī |
bhaktānām anukampārtham avatīrya sumadhyamā || JY 1/9/359cd-361.

[2] See below, KRU 1/78-82 quoted on p. 144.

[3] evaṁ nānāvidhaiḥ kāyair anekair nāmaparyayaiḥ [kh: -kaināma; g: kāryairanekai?maparyayaiḥ] |
aṁśamātrāvatārās te [k kh: aṁsa-; g: aṁsamātrāvatārās ta] bhaviṣyanti kulāmbike ||
aham apy aṁśamātreṇa [kh: -semātreṇa] kārayiṣye svakāṁ tanum |
pūrvoktanāmabhir devi kalpakalpavyavasthayā [g: kalpe kalpe vyavasthayā] || śrīkulasyāvatārārthaṁ [g: -tālārthaṁ] lokānugrahakāmyayā | KRU 9/33-35ab.

> lady, on the Island of Jambu (i.e. South Asia) there is a mountain called Himavat. O beloved, (Himavat) having become supremely content, you will become his daughter.[1]

Note how in both the TS and the KRU the goddess, who is reborn as Dakṣa's daughter, becomes Bhadrakālī and is identified with the New Moon.[2] Surprisingly, the latter identification is not made in the JY, at least here. But it is such an important detail for the Kubjikā tradition, as it was for the TS, that it is also mentioned in the account we find in the KuKh. This is the form in which the goddess Kubjikā unites inwardly with the god in the Śāmbhava state. The New Moon is, as we shall see, the black goddess Kālī and the Full Moon, the white goddess Gaurī. The New Moon symbolizes the unmanifest, transcendental store of vitalizing lunar energy and the Full Moon the fullness of its actualization. Thus the former is the 'burning coal' the goddess becomes when, according to the KuKh, she throws herself into Dakṣa's sacrificial fire.[3] The god is, appropriately, Amṛteśvara – the Lord of Nectar. Otherwise known as Mṛtyuñjaya – the Conqueror of Death, well known to the Kubjikā Tantras and their predecessors, including the TS, he is still commonly worshipped as a lunar, medicine god who bestows long life and good health. We are told in the KRU, as in the KuKh,[4] that the goddess's name when she was Dakṣa's daughter was Bhadrakālī. But in the

---

[1] ekonaviṁśe [g: ekoṇaviṁśe] dakṣasya [g: dakṣaśai] duhitā parameśvari ǀ bhadrakālīti nāmena bhavena [g: bhāvena] sahitā priye ǀǀ apamānāt [kh: -nād; g: -nāḥ?] tu [g: missing] dakṣasya tyaktvā [k g: tyajya; kh: tyakta] dehaṁ tadodbhavam [k kh g: tadudbhavaṁ] ǀ *amā nāma [kh: nā ] kalā bhūtā candrārkānalamadhyagā [g: -naramadhyagā] ǀǀ apyāyanakarī devi [g: devī] bhaviṣyasi jagattraye [kh: jagatraye] ǀ amṛteśvarasaṁyuktā kalākalitavigrahā ǀǀ *paramānandadā [k: -nanda ] devi amṛtaiśvaryadāyikā [g: amṛteśvarya?dāyikā] ǀ jambudvīpe varārohe himavān nāma bhūdharaḥ ǀǀ tasya tuṣṭiṁ parāṁ [kh: parā] gatvā [kh: gandhā] putrī [k: putri; kh: patri] tvaṁ yāsyasi priye ǀ KRU 9/21-25ab.

[2] Indeed, these lines are very similar in the two sources, thus strengthening the view that the KRU, which is certainly later than the TS, drew from it. Compare TS 10/1031cd-1032ab:

apamānāt [g: -nāṁ] tu dakṣasya svatanudāhitā [g: svātañturdāhitā] punaḥ ǀǀ amā kalā tu candrasya kṛṣṇā nāma [g: name] tu saptame ǀ with KRU 9/22:

apamānāt [kh: -nād; g: -nāḥ?] tu [g: missing] dakṣasya tyaktvā [k g: tyajya; kh: tyakta] dehaṁ tadodbhavam [k, kh, g: tadudbhavaṁ] ǀ
amā nāma [kh: amānā] kalā bhūtā candrārkānalamadhyagā [g: -naramadhya-] ǀǀ

[3] See KuKh 3/156-159 quoted above on p. 133.

[4] KuKh 3/72-73.

following verse from the KuKh, as well as in other accounts, this is the name of her reincarnation as Himavat's daughter. So we may assume that the references to Dakṣa's daughter as Kālikā relate to her more essential nature as the embodiment of the New Moon with which the youthful Kālikā is identified.[1] In this aspect she emerges in her subsequent and last life to ultimately attain the fullness of her most authentic form as Kubjikā, when she unites externally with the god.

The sources we have quoted explain that the goddess immolated herself because she was angry[2] with Dakṣa for having insulted Śiva, her consort. But although this is a major reason for her sacrifice in virtually every version of this story, the KuKh prefers to ignore it and to focus instead on the goddess's compunction. This may seem misplaced. After all, she was only indirectly responsible for the destruction of the sacrifice. Her only fault was that she had chosen a spouse her father did not approve. Nonetheless, her gesture serves an important purpose. The goddess has passed through a series of previous lives in which she graced the world. Now she must summon all her power for the ultimate, supreme act of grace in the Age of Strife when it is most required and the hardest to impart. In order to do this the goddess, who is herself the essence of this grace, must refine it and hence herself, in order to possess it and be able to apply it in its purest and most potent form. This is the purpose of the goddess's self-immolation.

In order to do this the goddess contemplates the processes that take place in the centre of her maṇḍala. As happens in the rite of initiation, first impurities – in this case symbolized by the goddess's body – are burnt away. This is followed by the phase of completion in which nourishing nectar is released through the union that takes place with the god when the impurities have been removed. In the initial phase we are told that the goddess contemplates the energy of Aghoreśvarī. Aghoreśvarī is the consort of Svacchandabhairava. His iconic, visualized form is described in the SvT.[3] His consort who 'devours disease' (vyādhibhakṣaṇī) is mentioned there briefly with the remark that her form, with regards to the attributes she holds and other basic features, is the same as his. We may conclude that the goddess is contemplating her own energy as that of Aghoreśvarī in her aspect as the consort of Svacchandabhairava. The narrative in the KuKh continues:

> (The goddess said): I was reborn in the temple of the Himalayas. In the eighth great rebirth, I was born (as) Bhadrakālikā. Having first recognized (jñātvā) my voice, the Lord wished to get

---

[1] See KuKh 3/116.
[2] YKh (1) 4/286cd-287ab.
[3] SvT 2/88cd-97ab and SvT 2/114cd-116.

> married (to me and so said) to Himavat: "O observer of good vows, give me Kālī."
>
> Himavat gave the beautiful Kālī in devout attendance (to him in marriage) (paricarya) in the temple of the God of the gods, that is, on the great mount Kailāśa. (Then) a great instruction (mahādeśa) arose: "now there is something that is part of the tradition, namely, the Śāmbhava plane, that is in the middle of the Cave Dwelling. Having gone there, I will now be your grace."[1]

The Ṭīkā, commenting on these verses, explains:

> Then (she) again assumed a body, (this time) in the house of mount Himavat. That was her eighth birth. As she was burnt then by the Fire of Time, she was born again as Time, that is, abiding in the form of creation and destruction (sṛṣṭisaṁhārarūpa), (and so she was) then Kālikā (the goddess of Time).
>
> Then, at that time, there was at first a voice, (that is) speech was uttered, spoken by the lord to Himavat: "Having taken (your daughter's) hand and having led (her home), and performed the wedding ceremony and the rest, give me Kālī." Then Kālī was given to the Supreme Lord on mount Kailāśa in the house of the God of the gods. There a great instruction arose, that is, an unfailing voice (amoghavāṇī) which (said): "there is something that is part of the tradition within the Kadamba Cave (namely), Śāmbhava knowledge."[2]

The Ṭīkā does not tell us who gave this instruction; all we are told is that it was 'an unfailing voice' (amoghavāṇī). Perhaps the goddess is speaking and telling the goddess to go to the cave, just as he tells her in the KMT to go to mount Kaumāra. Whatever be the case, neither the KMT, the ŚM nor the ṢSS know about this cave. Nor do they ever refer to mount Kailāśa in this context. On the other hand neither the KuKh nor the rest of the MBT make any reference to mount Kaumāra. Nonetheless, the transposition of the events described in the

---

[1] KuKh 3/160-164ab.

[2] _tataḥ punar eva himavantaparvatasya gṛhe [k: nāsti] śarīrasya [k: -re *; kh: -ra *] grahaṇaṁ kṛtam | tasyās tat [k: * * tataḥ; kh: * * tat] aṣṭamaṁ janma | yadā kālāgnidagdhā punar utpannā [k kh: + tadā] kālarūpeṇa vartate sṛṣṭisaṁhārarūpeṇa tadā kālikā | tatas [kh: tataḥ] tasmin samaye purā vāṇī vāg [k kh: vāka] uccaritā himavantasya [k kh: himavantasyā] īśvareṇoktā [kh: īśvareṇa uktā] pāṇikodvāhaṁ hastagrahaṇaṁ [k kh: -grahaṇa] vivāhādikaṁ kṛtvā [k kh: kṛtvāt] kālīṁ [k kh: kālī] mama dehi | tataḥ kālī parameśvarasya dattā [kh: dantā] kailāśaparvate devadevasya gṛhe | tatra mahādeśam [k kh: mahā-āde-] utpannam amoghavāṇī yad [k kh: | yadi] kiñcid anvaye [kh: kiṁcit-; k kh: -nvayaṁ] kadambaguhāmadhye śāmbhavaṁ jñānaṁ vidyate_ | Ṭ MS K fl. 66b.

KMT, which are said to take place on the Island of the Moon, to the cave on the mountain Kailāśa is clearly intended. In the KuKh we are told that the goddess assumed the form of a divine Liṅga there and so was 'established in authority'[1] and that in this way she obtained Śiva's Command (śāmbhavājñā). This is essentially what takes place, according to the KMT, when the goddess goes to the Island of the Moon.

Indeed, despite the absence of any reference to it in the KMT, this cave assumes considerable importance in the later sources as the place where the goddess in the Liṅga received the empowering Command.[2] This Cave Dwelling, which the Ṭīkā calls the Kadamba Cave, is the Void of the Triangle that represents the goddess's Yoni projected into the End of the Twelve above the head.[3] It is called the Kadamba Cave because there is a Kadamba tree near to it that symbolizes the maṇḍala of which the triangle is the core. The tree is in the centre of the maṇḍala as the seed-syllable of the deity or in a potential form as its spherical bud (kadambagola) symbolizing the Point (bindu). The latter contains the four energies of bliss, will, knowledge and action. The first is the energy of the Point at rest in itself. The other three are the energies generated from it deployed in the Triangle symbolized by the Kadamba Cave. The god explains in the KRU that when the male and female seed (rajas) are generated by the union of Śiva and Śakti:

> There, O beloved, the (male) seed and the female (rajas) are mixed. The great and immortal Point originated there, O fair-faced one, energized and shining, its light was like that of tens of millions of suns. O mistress of the gods, endowed with four energies, (its) form is round. (Everything) was engulfed (kadambīkṛta) in every way within the mass of (its) rays and flames. O goddess, one should know that to be the Kadamba tree (taught) in the Kula teaching. O dear one, Sound consisting of the Great Light came forth from the Point. The Great Point split apart so that Sound may come forth. The cavity that came into being there is said to be the Kadamba Cave. Fashioned by the God of the gods, it should be worshipped in the lineage (santāna) of the Śrīkula.[4]

---

[1] KuKh 3/168-169.

[2] See note to KuKh 3/1.

[3] See below, p. 167.

[4] tatra bījarajodhātoḥ [kh : dhāto; g: vīrajanodhāto] saṁmiśritvaṁ bhavet [k: saṁmiśritva bhavat; kh: sadyiśretva bhava; g: saṁmiśretva bhavat] priye |
tatrotpanno [kh: tatrojñā; g: -pannā] mahābindur amṛto [g: -durāmṛte] yo varānane ||
dīptivān bhāsvaraś [kh: dīptivārtāsvara; g: bhasviraś] caiva sūryakoṭisamaprabhaḥ [k kh: -prabhuḥ] |

The Sound is the 'sound' of the transmission, the teachings and mantras through which the universe is created and fully accomplished adepts – the Siddhas – attain liberation. Thus, according to the Ṭīkā: 'This tradition (anvaya), which extends for billions (of verses), is sealed in the first sacred seat called Oḍyāṇa within the Kadamba Cave.'[1] Oḍyāṇa (= O/Uḍḍiyāna) is the 'first seat' (ādipīṭha) from which the transmission of the Command, and hence all the tradition, originally issues forth. The Cave is the transcendental Void, vibrant with the play of energies from which all manifestation and the teachings are generated. It is the goddess herself, the vacuity of her womb, the source – Yoni – of all things. As such it is the abode or 'house' of her tradition that, as we shall see, has many names. In the passage from the KRU quoted above, it is called the Śrīkula which is the one most frequently used in the KRU. In the following one it is called the 'western,' 'final', 'ultimate', 'last' or 'culminating' – paścima – 'house'. This is the place where the goddess received here consecration. As the Ṭīkā says:

> That is this Western House, which is the most excellent. It is the House of all accomplishments. In particular (it is the abode of) the Śāmbhava (state). Merely by recollecting it, it gives rise to penetration (āveśa) and just by recollecting it, the consecration takes place. I (said the goddess) received it from within the Kadamba Cave. How? (I received it) by means of the sixteenfold consecration of the Command (ṣoḍaśājñābhiṣeka).[2]

With these words, the Ṭīkā introduces a long exposition of the goddess's consecration, which serves as the model for what is characterised in the Saṁvartāsūtra at the very beginning of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa as the basic rite of initiation. In this way a chapter of the version of the goddess's myth ends in our *catuṣkalasamopeto [k kh: catuṣkanā*mopeto] vṛttākāraḥ [kh: -kāra; g: vṛrttā-] sureśvari [k: sūreśvarī; kh: sū-]* ||

---

raśmijvālāsamūhena [k: rasmi-; kh: raśi-] kadambī sarvataḥ kṛtaḥ |
sa kadambatarur devi vijñeyaḥ [g: vijñayaḥ] kulaśāsane [k kh: -sāsane] ||
bindor nādaḥ [kh: -rnāda] samutpanno mahājyotimayaḥ priye |
bhidyamāno [g: bhidyamāne] mahābindur [k kh: mahāvindo; g: mahāviṁdai] nādaniṣkramanārthataḥ ||
yo randhras tatra cotapannaḥ sā kadambaguhā smṛtā [g: -tāḥ] |
pūjyā śrīkulasantāne [k: -sandhāne; kh g: -santāno] devadevena nirmitā || KRU 1/78-82.

[1] idaṁ lakṣakoṭipramāṇam anvayaṁ [k: -ya; kh: -ye] ādipīṭhe oḍyāṇābhidhāne [k kh: auḍyāṇāṁbhidhānam] kadambaguhābhyantare mudritaṁ sthitam | Ṭ MS K fl. 1b.

[2] tad [k kh: yadā] idaṁ paścimaṁ gṛhaṁ guṇavattaram [kh: guṇavantaraṁ] | sarvasiddhīnāṁ gṛhaṁ | saviṣeśaṁ [kh: viśesaṁ] śāmbhavaṁ [k kh: sāṁbhavaṁ] smaraṇamātreṇa āveśotpādakam [k kh: āveśamu-] tathā smaraṇamātreṇa abhiṣecanaṁ bhavati | taṁ mayā kadambaguhābhyantarāt prāptam | katham | ṣoḍaśājñābhiṣekena | Ṭ MS K fl. 67a.

text, the Kumārikākhaṇḍa. In the following chapter of the KuKh the god evokes the goddess from the Liṅga. In consonance with the version of the myth in the KMT, she does travel around India but not to the places specifically mentioned in the main part of the myth narrated in the KMT. Instead Bhairava travels to the five main sacred seats to meet her – a reversal that is consonant with the greater weight given to the goddess in the KuKh.

Although they have much in common and are clearly related, the account of the founding of these five seats in chapter six of the KuKh differs substantially from the one in the KMT. The two accounts agree that the sacred seats are established after the goddess emerges from the Liṅga. The rest is quite different, indeed, in some respects, totally opposite. According to the version of the myth in the KuKh, an aspect of Bhairava goes to meet the goddess in each sacred seat. He propitiates her in every way to please her. He manifests his devotion for her and his intense need, even to the extent of weeping. When she is pleased with him, they unite and the god receives the seed of her Command and is instated as the Siddha of that seat with a form of the goddess as his consort. But although numerous beings form part of the goddess's retinue in each of the seats, she is not said to have offspring.

The goddess in the KuKh is not incited to do this by the promise of an ultimate union with Bhairava. She does not need to have surrogate unions with the Siddha in each sacred seat, making use of the goddess there to serve as the proxy for her own 'mind-born' offspring. In the KuKh the goddess is the dominant figure. She herself unites with Bhairava throughout. Thus whereas the god says to the goddess in the KMT: "O Kubjeśī, since the god of the previous lineage (santāna) said (to you): "Go to (the land of) Bhārata", our union has been taking place here at the end".[1] The goddess says to the god in the KuKh: "O lord of gods, the union of (us) two is taking place here (in this world) from when the god of the previous lineage (santāna) said (to me): "Go to (the land of) Bhārata." [2]

There appears to be a contradiction here. But it is only apparent. The goddess who has both the initiative to be the speaker and unites repeatedly with her male counterpart is actually no less chaste than when she is silent and unites with him only at the end. When her pilgrimage has been completed and she has passed through all the conjunctios, the land of Bhārata has been transformed into the Region of the Virgin (kaumārikākhaṇḍa). But even so, as the name of her land implies, despite all these unions she has not lost her spiritual status. She remains the Virgin. In both the KMT and the KuKh we are told: 'Once the goddess had done all that, namely, brought about the awakening of the bliss of the Command, she who is all-pervasive returned there in her previous form.'[3]

[1] KMT 2/119.
[2] KuKh 6/221cd-222ab.
[3] KMT 2/120 = KuKh 6/222cd-223ab.

According to the version in the KMT, the goddess is on a pilgrimage to various sacred places. Her presence and activity in those places transforms them into her sacred seats. The differences in that account of the sacred seats and the one in the KuKh as well as the elaborate additions to their geography, form, metaphysical identity, and symbolism, we find there and in other parts of the KMT and in other Kubjikā Tantras, relate to the `original' seats not the ones onto which they are projected. The later tradition developed the symbolism of the 'original' seats and ignored the latter. The textual scholar notices in this change how the importance of the 'original' seats, which are actually later ones, is developing in the ambit of the Kubjikā cult, a feature of which we shall have occasion to discuss in chapter three.

The Goddess's Myth according to the Ambāmatasaṁhitā

To conclude this presentation of the goddess's myth, we now turn our attention to other versions of it. We have examined three, namely, those in the ŚM, ṢSS and the KuKh. Here we record three more. They all post-date the one in the KuKh, from which they draw several details, and have been more or less extensively adapted to accommodate later developments in the teachings. The first two are drawn from the AS and the third from YKh (2). The first one is found in chapter twenty-seven of the AS. Out of the three, it the closest to the original and so we may conveniently start with that. We shall see that the other version in the AS contains several significant and interesting changes that distance it to some extent from the original, as is the case with the version in YKh (2). Eloquent as they are, we may largely let the texts speak for themselves. The main doctrinal developments we notice here and there will be discussed in the following chapters.

In the following version, drawn from the AS, the stage of the action is set in the first of the four ages (yuga). The revelations of the teachings in the four sacred seats are related in the KMT to these ages as they are generally in the later Kubjikā Tantras. Accordingly, we assume that the myth narrated in the KMT is also set in the same age, although this is not expressly stated. In the AS, the goddess is speaking. She begins by saying:

> Next I will briefly recount the descent of Kālī (into the world). At the beginning of the Kṛta Age, in the world on Kailāśa Meru, the God of the gods came to know that (Dakṣa thought) that other people could be subdued without his power. He laughed (loudly making a great) sound like that of a (storm) cloud. "(The gods) Brahmā and the rest are present at Dakṣa's sacrifice. (But, why) is the Lord (īśvara) > not (there) anywhere?" When he had playfully asked this question (but received no answer) he became angry.[1]

The AS goes on to describe the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice. The description is briefer than the one in the KuKh but adds the detail that Śiva, angered by Dakṣa's indifference towards him, assumed a wrathful form called Vīrabhadra and destroyed Dakṣa's sacrifice with his Mahāpāśupata weapon.[2] The account continues:

> Then when a hundred years had past, the angry Maheśvara was satisfied (and said): "O Dakṣa, what is the boon you are asking for? Tell me the boon you desire. In truth there is no doubt here (I will grant it. Now tell me) why have (you made this) request?" Then the very wise Dakṣa asked for an auspicious boon: "O god, the sacrifice has been destroyed. O Maheśvara, be satisfied! If (you are) satisfied give me, along with the learned (who attended the sacrifice, the fruit) of the religious sacrifice (dharmayajña) and the (attainment of the) supreme plane and then, O Maheśvara, leave, united with Kālī. (This would be) the most excellent conclusion. (Such is) my conclusion." When (he had made his) declaration with eyes full of tears and spoke (thus, his) delusion destroyed, the God of the gods, pleased (said): "I am calming myself." [3]

---

[1] tataḥ [tato] kālyavatāraṁ tu pravakṣyāmi samāsataḥ |
ādau kṛtayuge loke kailāsamerum āśrite ||
devadevasya viditaṁ [-ta] hasitaṁ meghanādavat [-vet] |
madbalena vinā vaśyāḥ [vaṣṇu(?)] bhavanti aparā janāḥ [janaḥ] ||
dakṣayajñe vai [na] brahmādya īśvaro 'pi na kutracit |
līlāmātrakṛtapraśne kopam ārabdham ataḥ param || AS 27/58-60.

[2] yajñavidhaṁsanārthāya vīrabhadro mahāgaṇaḥ | trailokyavijayāyukto gaṇakoṭiparivṛtaḥ ||
mahāpāśupataṁ astraṁ gatvā tatra visarjitam [-taḥ] |
vidhvaste [-sta] caiva [naiva] tadyajñe [-jña] mahāpāśupatabalāt [-patovale] ||
trailokyavijayāyukto nigrahaṁ kartum [kṛtam] icchati |
kecit [kecait] trastā [trastho] mṛtāḥ kecid bhayabhītā mṛtena kim ||
naṣṭāḥ kecit pranaṣṭāś ca bhayabhītāś ca kenacit |
evaṁ vidhvaṁsite yajñe mahādakṣaḥ prajāpatiḥ ||
ārādhayati taṁ devaṁ devadevaṁ maheśvaram |
īdṛganukṛtaiḥ [īḍa gaḍḍukrṭe] jāpaiḥ [jāpe] homair nānāvidhaiḥ [-vidhau] śubhaiḥ ||
AS 27/61-65.

[3] tato varṣaśate prāpte ruṣṭas tuṣṭo [-tuṣṭa] maheśvaraḥ |
kiṁ varaṁ yācyase dakṣa kāmikaṁ vada [dada] me varam [padam] ||
satyaṁ nāsty [nāmty] atra sandeho 'bhyarthitaḥ [sandehotyahitat] kena hetunā |
tato dakṣo mahāprājño varaṁ yācyati śobhanam ||

Although it is quite clear in the KMT that the goddess who enters the Liṅga to come out of it transformed into Kubjikā is Kālī, this version chooses to stress Kubjikā's original identity further. Dakṣa's daughter is already Kālī with whom the god is already united before she is 'reborn' in Himavat's house in accord with her nature on the night of the New Moon, which she embodies. The 'razor', to which the following passage refers, is Kuṇḍalinī who cuts through the inner vital centres as she descends through them. As far as I know this is the only place where the Western House, that is, the Kubjikā tradition, is identified with that of Himavat. We have seen that Himavat was granted amongst other boons success in the practice of Kuṇḍalinī Yoga and that, liberated thereby, he would liberate others. The AS has understood this to mean that his 'house' is the western one of the goddess and that his family – kula – is her Kula, that is, Kaula school. By this simple play on words the AS explains the difference between the Kālī in her previous birth – that is, in her original traditions – and the Kālī who is Kubjikā, the goddess of a different tradition. Kubjikā is not just a form of Kālī, although she is closely related to her both mythically as well as historically. The experience Kālī seeks and finds in the Western House is the rise of Kuṇḍalinī within herself. This unites her inwardly with Bhairava who in this version is therefore already blissfully united with her when he goes to Himavat's house in the upper extremity of Kuṇḍalinī's rise.

> That goddess who was at the end of (her) eighth (birth) was born there in the house of Himavat at a very fearful time at night on the fourteenth day of Āṣāḍha in Himavat's house by the power of the Razor Weapon (kṣurikāstra).
>
> Kālī said in due order: "I desire experience in the Kula which is in the beautiful house of Himavat." She was graced there in the (tradition of the) West by Himavat with the very essence of the piercing (that takes place through the Wheels of the subtle body by means of Kuṇḍalinī). (When Bhairava) went there to the West, joyful because he was united with Kālikā, everything was revealed there, namely, the Kula liturgy (krama) which is the primordial sacrifice.[1]

---

deva vidhvaṁsitaṁ yajñaṁ tuṣṭo [tuṣṭa] bhava [nava] maheśvara [-raḥ] |
yadi tuṣṭaḥ prasannātmā dharmayajñaṁ paraṁ padam ||
dehi māṁ viduṣaiḥ sārdhaṁ tathā [tvayā] gaccha maheśvara |
tadā kālisamāyuktaṁ śreṣṭhārthaṁ mama niścayam ||
aśrupūrṇena vijñapte [-pta] pralāpe naṣṭamohane [-naṁ] |
devadevena [-devana] tuṣṭena ātmānaṁ śamayāmy aham || AS 27/66-70.

[1] āṣāḍha asitapakṣe rātrau tatra caturdaśī |
kṛtaṁ kālaṁ mahāghoraṁ kṣurikāstreṇa [-ṣṭena] śaktinā ||
aṣṭāntā tatra sā devī saṁjātā himavadgṛhe |

According to the KMT, Kālī initially worships Bhairava, in this version he worships her in the liturgy – Krama – that is revealed in the Western House of which she is the focus. This he does in the 'inner sanctum', which is the End of the Twelve where, as we shall see in the following chapter, the triangular Yoni of goddess is located. He is transported there by the current of Kuṇḍalinī who rises up through his divine body from the Wheel in the navel called the City of Gems (maṇipura) where, according to the Kubjikā and other early Tantras, she is located. Bhairava worshipped her in the sacrifice of union in which he is the 'churning' Bhairava. Engaged in this way for a hundred years, Kālī was transformed into the newly-born Kubjikā – the 'bent' goddess in the form of the triangular Yoni. Her birth and transformation is neither a real birth nor change, just an awakening. Previously Kālī was asleep to her true essential nature. After 'a hundred years' she is awakened. Now she has the power that awakens her disciples and brings the transmission into the world along with the lineage of teachers through which it moves. Moreover, she is the energy of the Command and so she is also Bhairava's essential nature. Within him she 'sleeps'. She awakes as she emerges out of him. As she does so her sonic body (piṇḍa) made of the energies of the letters and her Vidyā is generated into which she is transferred in her undifferentiated form as the pure spiritual energy of the Command. Now she is the Kālī of the Western House from whom issues forth the transmission which, no less sacred then its source, she worships as she does the one that comes from the previous Kaula tradition which in the KMT was shown to her by Bhairava and here she sees for herself as she generates the new one. So the AS continues:

> (Bhairava said to the goddess) "You are Kālī. Stand (here) in front (of me) and be the object of worship in the liturgy (krama). You are the Command, a widow of good family and the Ganges." Once the Lord had said this and, having pierced through this (Wheel in his body called) the City of Gems (ratnavatī purī), he went to the inner sanctum (antaḥpura).
>
> Then I (Bhairava) worshipped the goddess for a hundred years. (Thus) you (O Kālī) were born in the Sacrifice of the Great (Churning) Bhairava, in the Kādi division[1] that (inspires) the true signs of realisation. Pure, it has been brought down (to earth) by Himavat.

---

kālī krameṇa kathitā icchāmy anubhavaṁ [icchāyānyabhavaṁ] kule [kulaṁ] ||
himavante gṛhe ramye tasyās [tasyān-] tatra anugraham |
kṛtaṁ [kṛta] vedhasvarūpeṇa [vadha-] himavantena paścime ||
gato 'sau [gatastaṁ] paścime tatra kālikāyuktananditaḥ [-nandanaṁ] |
darśitaṁ sakalaṁ tatra ādyayāgaṁ [-yāga] kulakramam || AS 27/71-74.

[1] How 'kādibheda' is another name for the Kubjikā tradition is discussed in intro. vol. 3, p. 72-73.

> When a full hundred years had passed, the goddess of the Moon, who (is the triangular Yoni that) faces downwards, (came down into the world)[1] as the great awakening. She is the awakening of the Command in the mutual relationship (between herself and the god). Bhagamālinī illumines (rajate) the grace of the Command of realisation and all the disciples in order to achieve the attainment of the body by transference (saṁkrānti). She brought down the entire current of the Transmission (kramaugha) and that of the teachers (gurukrama) (into the world). Kālī, who is the Command, worshipped the tradition of the teacher as it has come (from the past). [2]

The AS continues with a description of the goddess's condition in the Liṅga. It is not immediately apparent that this is what the following passage is about. However, in the end, we are implicitly informed that this is the case when we are told that Bhairava worshipped for the hundred years when all this was happening. The goddess in the Liṅga is practicing austerity. This is the observance of her own special vow of continence (brahmacarya). Within her Liṅga, that is, the Yoni, she is ever Kumārī – the Virgin.[3] There she resides as the pure bliss of the genderless absolute. As such she is identified with the 'neuter' Brahman, the absolute of the Upaniṣads that is neither god nor goddess, simply unqualified bliss. Her continence is thus what the word for it in Sanskrit, i.e. brahmacarya, Kaulas understand to mean, namely, the 'practice of bliss'.[4] Paradoxically, this 'continence' is her inner union with the god.[5] Within the goddess's Liṅga, Bhairava has become the Point (bindu), that is, the powerful Drop (bindu) of vital seed represented as the Point that is in the centre of the triangular Yoni. This is the inner Command 'pervaded by that fierce power of austerity'. It is the energy of [1] AS 27/78cd reads *bhūpātāvadhirī * raiḥ* which is obviously corrupt and requires emendation.

---

[2] kālī tvaṁ tiṣṭha purataḥ kramārādhyā [-dhye] yathā bhava | ājñā kulavadhū gaṅgā imāṁ ratnavatīṁ purīm ||
evam uktvā tu bhagavān bhittvāntaḥpuraṁ [bhittvā-] gataḥ |
tato varṣaśate hy eke devīṁ [devī] ārādhaye hy aham ||
mahābhairavayajñe tu saṁjātā kādibhede 'si [-bhedasi] |
satyapratyayake śuddhaṁ himavantāvatāritam ||
gate (-tā) varṣaśate pūrṇe candradevī adhomukhī |
*mahābodhasvarūpeṇa bhūpātāvadhirī * raiḥ (?)* ||
parasparānusaṁbandhe ājñābodhasvarūpiṇī |
saṁkrāntyā piṇḍasiddhyarthaṁ pratyayājñā – anugraham ||
śiṣyavargamayaṁ sarvaṁ rajate bhagamālinī |
tayāvatāritaṁ sarvaṁ kramaughaṁ ca gurukramam ||
ājñā ārādhayet kālī gurvāmnāyaṁ yathāgatam | AS 27/75-81ab.
[3] Cf. KuKh 3/45.
[4] Cf. TĀ 29/96cd-100ab.
[5] Cf. KuKh 3/63-64ab

bliss (ānandaśakti), which is the goddess's inner nature. So, as we shall see in greater detail in the following chapter, Bhairava is within the Virgin goddess inside the Liṅga in this form. At the same time, he is also outside the Liṅga praying to the goddess to come out and grace him.

> Kaumārī, in the form of the Brahman, practiced spiritual discipline (anuṣṭhāna) in the past by means of the fire of austerity (tāpanāgni) and came (into the world as) Bhagamālinī. She is in the grip of (the practice) of continence (brahmacarya) and you (Bhairava) have become the Point (bindu). She attained the imperishable nature that, unmanifest, is consciousness (bodha). Her Command is terrific (bhīmā) like (her Vidyā) that begins with BHA and ends with C(E).[1]
>
> That bliss is the Neuter (absolute). It is neither female nor is (its) form (ākāra) male. Its body is the first principle (āditattva), the Command in the form of Bhairava. Everything (sakala) is pervaded there and the universe that is the divine, radiant pulse of (the most) intense Command is (also) pervaded by that fierce power of austerity.
>
> Then having lived for a hundred years on mount Meru, everything was done by him regularly in (all) the three times (of the day). [. . .] He went (to the goddess) in order to (receive her) grace and worshipped the Liṅga for a long time. Such was the offering for a hundred years. The goddess called Mālinī is the goddess who granted him boons.[2]

The other version of the goddess's myth narrated in the AS begins with a short dialogue between the god and the goddess, also found in our text,[3] from

[1] The goddess's Vidyā, which is thirty-two syllables long, is the subject of chapters eight to twelve of the KuKh to which the reader is referred.
kaumārī brahmarūpeṇa tāpanāgnimukhena tu ||
anuṣṭhānaṁ kṛtaṁ pūrvaṁ āgatā [āgataṁ] bhagamālinī |
brahmacaryavaśā sā tu bindus tvaṁ prāptavān api (-nyapi) ||
prāpnoti avyayaṁ rūpam avyaktaṁ bodharūpakam |
tasyājñā vartate bhīmā bhādicāntāvadhir (vādivāntā-) yathā || AS 27/81cd-83.
[2] na strī na puruṣākāram ānandaṁ taṁ napuṁsakam | (=KuKh 3/46ab).
tasya dehaṁ āditattvaṁ ājñā bhairavarūpiṇī ||
vyāpitaṁ (-te) sakalaṁ tatra vyāpitaṁ tena tu [tena tuyo] jagat |
tīvrājñāsphuritaṁ divyaṁ tapanograbalena (tapanāgravalena) tu ||
tato varṣaśataikena vāsitvā (vālivā) meruparvatam |
kṛtaṁ ca (mṛtena) tena sakalaṁ trikāle nityam eva hi || [. . .]
gato 'nugrahārthāya tat liṅgam ārādhayec ciram ||
yāvad varṣaśataikaṁ tu īdṛgrūpapradānakam [iḍagaḍḍupradānake] |
mālinī nāma yā devī devī tasya varapadā || AS 27/84-86, 88cd-89.
[3] AS 10/149-153ab = KuKh 3/20-24.

which it has probably been drawn. The god implores the goddess to impart Kaulika knowledge to him and repeatedly insists that his intentions are pure. This declaration is in line with the rest of the dialogue reported and repeated in bits and pieces throughout chapter five of the KuKh. In order to teach him the goddess insists that the god must be sincere and not just desire sexual union with her. Even so, according to the KuKh, the god unites with the goddess repeatedly in each of the sacred seats in order to receive the transmission. The following version is more consistent in this sense. Here, the goddess seeks union from the god.

This is the first of a series of reversals with respect to the original version of the myth. Indeed, it is virtually a mirror image of its prototype. This is apparent in the presentation itself, which begins from the end, as it were, with Kāmarūpa, which here is the first seat, not the last. In this version the goddess has not been abandoned by the god and does not hide from him. She does not allow him to wander forlorn in search of her but assents to his entreaties and joins him. This means, of course, that she is also not alone when she enters the sacred seats. Nor is there any need of a proxy, implicit union between the goddess she meets in the seats and the consort elected for her as happens in the KMT. The goddess transmits the Kaula knowledge to the god who thus, like the goddess, is endowed with a divine body and, fully conscious of his divine nature, unites with her directly. In this way this seat, like the others, is blessed by their union. United one with the other, they are equally powerful, equally present. The gaze of one is not more powerful than that of the other. There is no test of strength. Their gaze is combined. Here, as in the following seats, they both equally exercise their 'authority' – that is their union which empowers them through the transfer of the seed-like Command – the grace that gives them their divine capacity (sāmarthya) to grace the world.

Kāmarūpapīṭha

> (The goddess said) "I am coming to your side. I am telling you the Kaulika (teaching)." When invited by the goddess, Śambhu came (and took) refuge (in her). Thus he who is Siddhanātha is you (O god) in the primordial sacred seat (ādyapīṭha) in the Sky (where) Kaulinī revealed all the Kaula (teaching) to him. Then he became (a god with a) divine body and went along with the goddess to the very holy (mahāpuṇya) place (where they were to enjoy love) games. Adorned with the sea and other (such beautiful sites) and possessing seven districts (viṣaya),[1] it was called the venerable Kāmākhya.

[1] Inwardly, these seven 'districts' are probably meant to correspond to the seven rows of letters within the Yoni with which Kāmarūpa, as pars pro toto, is sometimes identified. KuKh 8/28-32.

> It is the venerable (land of) Kāma(rūpa) where (the god of) Love (Kāma) himself resides and is supremely beautiful. Thus, (my) descent (into the world) takes place there in (that) land along with you. The goddess appeared (jātā) on mount (mandara)[1] Pulinda, as did the wise Siddha. The two made love and achieved success and whoever they looked at also attained the supreme plane. They became invisible again at the end of the Age (yugānta).[2]

Jālapīṭha

In the next seat in to which the couple descends in the following cosmic era (yuga) we notice another transformation. This one relates to the seats themselves. Normally these seats are associated with mountains, or mountainous regions. Here the last three are caves symbolizing their hidden inner and vacuous, transcendental nature.

> And, having descended into a cave in the sacred seat called Jāla, when the goddess fashioned the form beautiful as the moon that women possess, the god also (assumed a bodily form) for the sake of emanation. Thus emanation is said (to have taken place there). They again exercised their authority there for a long time.[3]

---

[1] The expression 'merumandara-' exists, which I take to be analogous. The word 'mandara-' may also mean 'heaven'.

[2] āgacchāmi tava pārśve [pāśve] vadāmi tava kaulikam ||
āmantrito yadā devyā [devyāḥ] śaṁbhuḥ śaraṇamāgataḥ |
tenāyaṁ siddhanāthas tvaṁ ādyapīṭhe nabhastale ||
kaulinyā sakalaṁ kaulaṁ tasya tat prakaṭīkṛtam |
tadā divyatanur jāto devyā saha yuto [yutā] gataḥ [hratam] ||
krīḍāsthānaṁ mahāpuṇyaṁ samudrādivibhūṣitam |
viṣayaiḥ saptabhir yuktaṁ śrīmatkāmākhyasaṁjñakam [-saṁjñikaṁ] ||
śrīkāmaṁ [śrīvikrama] paramaṁ ramyaṁ yatra kāmaṁ svayaṁ sthitam |
tatra deśe [deśa] tvayā sārdham avatāraṁ bhavet [chatot] tataḥ ||
pulindamandare jātā devī siddho 'pi [siddhāpi] buddhimān |
kāmakrīḍāṁ [-krīḍā] prakurvāṇau [prakurvāṇaṁ] tau dvau siddhim upāgatau [sidham upāgatam] || yo yo 'valokitas tābhyāṁ so 'pi yātaḥ [pātā] paraṁ padam |
punar yugānte saṁprāpte antardhānagatau [-to] tu [nu] tau || AS 10/153cd-159.

[3] śrīmajjālākhyapīṭhe ca guhāyām avatīrya ca |
rūpaṁ rūpendunārīṇāṁ [kūpe-] kṛtaṁ devyā [devyaṁ] yadā tadā [tadaḥ] ||
devo 'pi sṛṣṭihetuś ca tena sṛṣṭiḥ [sṛṣṭyā] prakīrtitā |
tābhyāṁ [tāddhyāṁ] tatra ciraṁ kālaṁ adhikāraṁ kṛtaṁ punaḥ || AS 10/160-161.

Pūrṇapīṭha

In the following passage we find several covert allusions to the land of Koṅkaṇa, where the Kubjikā tradition subsequently developed. We have already noted the possibility that these sacred seats are transposed into this region and that Kāmarūpa especially is identified with it and so is said to be, as is Koṅkaṇa, by the sea. In the above passage we were told that it consists of seven districts.[1] One of these is possibly Śrībimba which we may tentatively identify with Candramaṇḍala – a region in ancient Koṅkaṇa, the capital of which was Candrapura. There, as we shall see, the First Siddha to propagate the Kubjikā Tantras is said to have miraculously felled a tamarind tree by the yogic power he was given by the goddess.

> When the Dvāpara (Age) came, (the goddess) went to the venerable cave (gahvara) of (the sacred seat called) Pūrṇa and, having assumed the form of a Śāvarī,[2] became of benefit to (the whole) universe. (Similarly, the god), having attained the power of the knowledge (of the teachings), arose (there) in order to sport (with the goddess). (Thus the goddess) shone brilliantly like the lunar orb (candrabimba) there in the country of Śrībimba. She became intent (on exercising her) authority along with the Siddha and bestowed accomplishment.
>
> The Lord (nātha) also, who was very angry (for some reason), forcefully struck (and felled) by virtue of the intense (grace of the inward) piercing (of Kuṇḍalinī) with (his) gaze alone (the tree) called 'tamarind' (ciñca) and so is called the venerable Ciñcinin.[3]

---

[1] Note that in the passage after the following one Odyāna (i.e. Oḍḍiyāna) is also referred to as a 'district'.

[2] According to the account in chapter six of the KuKh, the goddess in each of the seats has the form of a young and beautiful tribal woman – Śāvarī. See KuKh 2/2cd-3ab and 6/64-65.

[3] dvāpare samanuprāpte yātā [yāto] śrīpūrṇagahvaram |
tatra sā śāvarīrūpaṁ [śāvaraṁ-] kṛtvā jātā jagaddhitā [-ta] ||
siddhe [siddho] vijñānasāmarthye [-rthyaṁ] krīḍanārthaṁ [-rthyaṁ] samutthitaḥ |
tatraiva deśe śrībimbe candrabimbavadujjvalā ||
adhikāraratā jātā siddhena saha siddhidā |
*nātho 'pi [nāthāpi] tīvravedhāc cātiruṣṭo [-vedhārāta * rustā] marayed [-yad] balāt* || dṛṣṭamātreṇa ciñcākhyaṁ tena śrīciñcinī smṛtaḥ [smṛtaṁ] | AS 10/162-165ab.

Udyānapīṭha

This is normally the first seat and, in a sense it remains so in this account as well, even though it is revealed at the end. It is here that the goddess enters the Liṅga. This account thus conflates this seat, which the texts regularly call the first one (ādipīṭha) from which the first teachings are said to originate, with the Island of the Moon. This makes sense, as it is there that Bhairava received the teachings from the goddess. Again, we notice that the Siddha here is identified with the Bhairava Oḍīśa with whom the goddess unites at the conclusion of her journey according to the KMT. Again, here we find virtually a unique reference where we are explicitly told that the goddess 'sports' with the god in the Liṅga. The splitting of the Liṅga, like that of the proto-cosmic Point (bindu), generates the Sound (nāda) that extends in the form of the universe made of mantras. In other accounts it is the goddess's condition that is the focus of attention. Here, in keeping with the modality of reversal it has chosen, this version concentrates instead on the god. Just as the goddess in the Liṅga is the white Gaurī, the god there is the white benign Śiva. Outside, he is the fierce Bhairava.

> Then, in the terrible Age of Strife she, the three-eyed (goddess) Maṅgalā,[1] descended into the Northern Cave (uttaragahvara) in the district (viṣaya) of Odyāna. Siddhanātha also (descended) there into (his spiritual) lineage (santati). Having thus flown up (oḍḍīya) in the body[2] he obtained lordship and so is famous in all respects by the name of the venerable Oḍīśa. The place there is Oṣadhiprastha and she is praised as the auspicious one of the universe.
>
> There is a Liṅga there made of jewels. There she meditated for a long time. Once attained the one who brings an end to the cause of suffering, she ascended with effort into (the Liṅga).[3]
>
> She sported (there) with him, (Śiva) the Bearer of the Half Moon (ardhendumaulin). The goddess meditated for a moment as she

---

[1] Concerning Maṅgalā, see below, chapter 3, p. 679 ff..
[2] Cf. above, p. 81, note 3.
[3] tataḥ kaliyuge ghore śrīmaduttaragahvare || śrīmadodyānaviṣaye sāvatīrṇā trilocanā |
maṅgalā nāma tatraiva siddhanātho 'pi santatau || evaṁ śarīre oḍḍīya īśitvaṁ [oḍīya isitvaṁ] prāptavān [-vāny] api |
śrīmadoḍīśasaṁjñāto [-tā] vikhyātas [-tā] tena sarvataḥ ||
sthānaṁ tatrauṣadhiprasthaṁ [tadroṣadhi-] prastutā sā jagacchubhā |
liṅgaṁ ratnamayaṁ tatra tatra sā cintayec ciraṁ ||
tasmin ārohayet yatnād [tasmād rohoyato yantā] labdhaṁ duḥkhakarāntakam |
AS 10/165cd-169ab.

> abided (there) unconditioned (amitā). That Liṅga was split in two and the goddess then arose (out of it). A fierce, deafening supreme Sound (nāda) (of mantras) emerged out of it. [. . .] (The god) looked (at the goddess) with (his) three eyes and so (his) tawny eyebrows were knit together and crooked (giving him a fearsome appearance). He illumined the worlds with his lustre and (his presence), like the Fire of Time, was hard to bear. When she saw him, the goddess suddenly felt intense fear and shame. Then her limbs bent and so she was known as Kubjī (the Humpbacked One).[1]
>
> Then the god praised her with a hymn (saying): "O Umā! Beloved of my life! Salutations, O mother of the universe! Be compassionate, O mistress of the universe! You who bestow the (teachings of the) tradition (sampradāya)! Salutations (to you) the Nirvāṇa who saves me! You who give wealth, save and forgive! The previous Rule, which is the essence (of the teachings), was fashioned (by you) along with me. O bearer of the trident! explain the beneficial mantras (to me in a simple way) as (you would) to children. Originally, I myself told you the most excellent Yoga."[2]

The goddess now proceeds to teach the god out of compassion for all living beings. She does this by intoning a hymn dedicated to the goddess extolling her presence in the inner centres or 'wheels' of the subtle body.

---

[1] tena sārdhaṁ tayā [mayā] krīḍā kartavyārdhendumaulinā ||
dhyānam ādāya sā devī kṣaṇaṁ [kṣaṇa] yāvat sthitāmitā [-tāḥ] |
dvidhā viddham etal liṅgaṁ [vidhām atalliṅgaṁ] tadā devyā [divya] samutthitā [-tāḥ] ||
tadutthaṁ pauruṣaṁ [puruṣaḥ puruṣaṁ] nādaṁ badarīkaraṇaṁ param |
[. . .] AS 10/169cd-171ab.
bhrūbhaṅgapiṅgakuṭilas trilocanavilokanāt ||
svakāntyā bhāsayel lokān kālāgnir iva duḥsahaḥ |
taṁ dṛṣṭvā sahasā devī bhayalajjāvatī [bhayaṁ lajjā mahān] bhṛśam ||
kuṭilāṅgī tadā [yadā] jātā tena kubjī [kubji] prakīrtitā | AS 10/172cd-174ab.

[2] tato devena sā stutā [-tvā] sastotraṁ prabhuṇā [-tā] svayam ||
namas te [tes] tu jaganmāte mama prāṇapriye ume |
dayāṁ kuruṣva viśveśi saṁpradāyapradāyini ||
namo mattrāṇanirvāṇe [matrāṇavirvāṇa] dānaharakṣamākari [-hārakṣāmakṣare] |
sāratvaṁ samayaṁ pūrvaṁ kṛtaṁ hi tu [kṛtogha kur] mayā saha ||
vyākhyāhi hitamantrān ca śiśūnām iva śūladhṛk |
mayaiva te samākhyātam ādau yogam anuttamam || AS 10/174cd-177.

The Goddess's Myth according to the Second Recension of the Yogakhaṇḍa

The following version of the goddess's myth is narrated in chapter sixteen of YKh (2), which is called 'the descent and bestowal of the Command to Śrīnātha'. There are several new and striking additions to the myth in this version. We also find interesting explanations of several details of the main myth. For example, in one place we learn why the goddess who emerges from the Liṅga is called Vāmā.[1] Others are 'inner', 'metaphysical' explanations of elements of the myth such as those we find in our own text, the KuKh (from which some of them may well have been drawn), and those found elsewhere. These largely concern the nature of the goddess's Triangle – the Yoni, the Liṅga that she enters, and the energy of the Command – subjects that will be treated at length in the following chapter. Several other details are entirely new. Particularly interesting is the constant reference to the city of Vārāṇasī and to Madhyadeśa – the Middle Land – where it is located. One wonders whether the shift of the scene of these mythical events to this sacred city is a sign that this part of text was composed here.

An interesting doctrinal development is the many Vaiṣṇava associations. The goddess appears in this version as Vaiṣṇavīśakti who is identified with Mahāmāyā and Prakṛti. She emerges out of the Liṅga after being worshipped for five nights, reminding us of the legendary sacrifice performed for five nights – pāñcarātra – from which one of the main Vaiṣṇava Tantric tradition is supposed to draw its name. While these associations are quite unusual in the Kubjikā sources, they are common in the Kālī cult taught in the Jayadrathayāmala and associated Tantras in which Kālī in the form of the goddess Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī is identified with Vaiṣṇavīśakti and is the consort of Narasiṁha, an incarnation of Viṣṇu. She is well known to the Kubjikā Tantras.[2] Indeed, according to the MBT the form of Kālī who was born in the house of the Himavat was Kālakarṣiṇī. When she entered the Western House she became Saṁvartā[3] – Kubjikā, the Goddess of the Doomsday Fire. But we shall see that here these Vaiṣṇava associations are provisional. They operate only so long as the condition of ignorance prevails. When the time comes for the god to receive the liberating Command, the scenario reverts to the original Śaiva Kaula one, although it has been reformed and elevated by its passage through its Vaiṣṇava permutation.

Let us turn now to the text. Śrīnātha, that is, Bhairava himself in the guise of the first teacher, is speaking:

---

[1] KMT 2/5 and YKh (2) 16/10-11.
[2] See, for example, KuKh 31/62cd-63ab.
[3] KuKh 57/21cd-22ab.

> Accompanied by millions of Yoginīs and surrounded by the seven Mothers,[1] along with Siddhas and Yoginīs, (you are) constantly engaged in worship. You have entered the cave-dwelling that is in the world behind (bhuvanapaścima) Meru. You are worshipped by the gods and demons in the middle of the peaks of the mountain (śilā) (of the Triangle) with divine gems, flowers, camphor, musk and vermilion.
>
> Once the scripture of (that) mountain (śilāgama), Kula and Kaula was worshipped there with devotion, the great goddess was worshipped and lauded by men and the rest. The one called Mīna (i.e. Matsyendranātha)[2] was present there. He became fully accomplished (siddha) there in that House. (1-4)[3]

The god now describes the goddess's Triangle, that is, her Yoni that is commonly called Meru, as it is in the following passage. In the centre (= on the top) of mount Meru is the Point – bindu. This is the Stone or Liṅga called here, as it is in the KMT, Udyāna Liṅga. The Triangle is in seven parts because the letters are arranged within it in seven rows and line its sides in the manner described in chapters seven and eight of our text. The goddess, who is the embodiment of all the phonemic energies, each of which correspond to a world, is thus also the series of worlds in the body of the Triangle. In the centre, she is the Point (bindu), which is Mālinī, and so she is called Bindumālinī. She embodies all the letters, each governed by a Yoginī, arranged in an alphabetical order that begins with Na and ends with Pha. The fifty gods attending on Mālinī govern the same fifty letters but these are arranged in the usual alphabetical order and are projected into the Triangle and around the sides.

---

[1] The reference here to just seven Mothers, rather than eight that we find in the goddess's maṇḍala. Perhaps the seven Mothers in this context govern the seven rows of letters arranged in the goddess's triangle. Again, the goddess herself may be the eighth Mother and leader of the others.

[2] Note that in this version Matsyendranātha is not the founder of the previous (pūrva) Kaula tradition as he is usual represented to be in the Kubjikā sources. But whether he is or not, he achieved complete realisation through the Kubjikā tradition, which is the final (paścima) one.

[3] yoginīkoṭisahitā mātaraiḥ saptabhir vṛtā |
siddhayoginisaṁyuktā [k, kh: siddhi-] anuṣṭhānaratā [k: anuṣṭāna-] sadā [k: satā] || 1 ||
praviṣṭā tvaṁ guhāvāse meror bhuvanapaścime |
śilāśekharamadhye [k, kh: śilāse-] tu pūjitāsi surāsuraiḥ || 2 ||
divyamāṇikyapuṣpaiś ca karpūrāgurukuṅkumaiḥ [k, kh: -mai] |
śilāgamaṁ kulaṁ kaulaṁ bhaktyā saṁpūjya tatra vai || 3 ||
ārādhitā mahādevī saṁstutā ca [k, kh: -tāś ce] narādibhiḥ [varā-] |
tatra sthitaś ca mīnākhyaḥ [k, kh: sthitaṁ ca mīnākhyaṁ] siddho 'sau tatra vai gṛhe ||
YKh (2) 16/1-4.

The goddess is both the Triangle and the Point (bindu) in the centre of it. The former is called 'bhaga' – the Womb. The latter is the living being (jīva) it contains, which is formed by the union of the male and female seed. This 'ball of vital seed' is feminine. Generated by the fusion of opposites, it is the androgynous embryonic goddess. It rotates in an anticlockwise direction, that is, to the left – vāmā – and it is the woman – vāmā – who is the goddess Vāmā of the Practice of the Left (vāmācāra).

> You observed a vow of silence for a thousand years within the Triangle. Then you became subtle (there) within the Stone in the middle of Meru. (5)
>
> O goddess, I heard the truth (tattva) previously from Himavat's mouth. (Then the goddess), who is worshipped by the best of the gods, was seen to be intent on the practice of Yoga. You pervaded (all the universe), beginning with the netherworld up to the sky, and so (you) who possess a divine body came (here) by the power of (your) divine Yoga. (6-7)
>
> (The goddess said): "O Mahādeva, I myself am the divine Command and beautiful by nature conjoined with the letters beginning with Na and ending with Pha and surrounded by the fifty gods." The mistress of the gods was (enveloped) by three lines. (The first is embodied in) the goddess who is the mistress of the circle of vowels. Then (the one) consisting of (the letters) beginning with Ka and ending with Ta and the third one beginning with Tha and ending with Sa.[1] (8-9)
>
> (The goddess continued): "In this way, in due order, I abide there (as) Bindumālinī. (I am) called Vāmā because (I am engaged in) the Practice of the Left (vāmācāra). I have attained the instantaneous penetration (āveśa) (of grace), which is like (the union) of heaven and

---

[1] maunaṁ varṣasahasraikaṁ trikoṇānte tvayā kṛtam ǀ laghutvaṁ ca tadā prāptaṁ śilānte merumadhyataḥ [kh: (?)] ǁ 5 ǁ tattvaṁ devi [k. kh: deva] mayā pūrvaṁ [k: pūrve] himavato [k, kh: -nta] mukhāc chrutam [k: – mukhā chataṁ] ǀ yogābhyāsaratasthā [k, kh: – sthaṁ] ca dṛṣṭā [k, kh: adṛṣṭaḥ] suravarārcitā [k, kh: – taḥ] ǁ 6 ǁ *pātālādyantarikṣāntaṁ [k: yotālādyanta- kṣaṁ tu; kh: yotā * * * * * (?)] vyāpitaṁ [kh: (?)] tu [kh: (?)] tvayā yataḥ [k: dyataḥ; kh: (?)] ǀ divyayogaprabhāvena divyadehā [k: -deha; kh: -dehaḥ] samāgatā [k: camāgata; kh: (?)] ǁ 7 ǁ aham eva mahādeva divyājñā [k, kh: divya – ājñā-] susvarūpiṇī ǀ nādiphāntākṣarair yuktā [kh: (?)] devaiḥ [k: devyai; kh: (?)] pañcāśabhir vṛtā ǁ 8 ǁ svaracakreśvarī devī kāditāntamayā tataḥ ǀ thādiśāntā tṛtīyā ca tribhī [k, kh: tribhi] rekhaiḥ [k, kh: -khai] sureśvarī ǁ Ibid. 16/5-9 > earth, and (so) have assumed the condition of a Liṅga. My manifest Liṅga is divine, (whereas) I am the unmanifest Kumārikā (the Virgin).

>
> The divine Liṅga is said to be Udyāna (Liṅga) and is in the middle of the Moon, Fire and the Sun (on the corners of the Triangle).[1] The Fire is present in the middle of the Sun and the great glory (mahacchriya) (of the Moon) is in the middle of Fire. And I am she who is called the venerable Bhaga, she who is the series of worlds (bhuvanāvalī) within the Stone. Possessing seven sections (skandha) she is Bhairava's deity. (10-13)
>
> And she (also) moves in the middle of the Stone in an anticlockwise circle. The energy Vāmā, who is called Anantā (Endless) and the soul (jīva), is the ball of vital seed (kuṇḍagolakā). (Her) rotation is spherical, she is a spark (of consciousness) (kākinyā) and her form is Unstruck Sound (haṁsa).[2] (14-15ab)

We shall see in some detail in chapter five how the Western House (gṛha) or Tradition (āmnāya) is the Kula of Kubjikā, the supreme Yoginī. Often identified with the goddess's Yoni, which is the source of emanation, the teachings and the lineages of teachers, here it is represented as the female Liṅga, the temple of the Western tradition, the City of the Moon, the Cave and the Hermitage. Just as this 'Devīliṅga' gives rise to creation, it also withdraws it into itself. As the power of the goddess in the Liṅga develops, it expands to fill the universe. The universe shakes and its inhabitants tremble with fear of its impending destruction.

---

[1] The two MSs read śivāgniravi-. Although having the goddess in the midst of Śiva's Fire and the Sun does make some sense, the standard formula is that the Liṅga, represented by the Point in the middle of the Triangle, is in the midst of these three luminaries. Symbolically located on the corners of the goddess's triangular Yoni, they are illumined by the goddess's Liṅga which is the sole light that shines in the darkness of the unmanifest state when these other three lights are extinguished. Cf. KuKh 2/28 where the three luminaries are identified with the three Siddhas in the goddess's Triangle.

[2] evaṁ krameṇa tatrāhaṁ [k, kh: krameṇāhaṁ tatra] saṁsthitā bindumālinī |
vāmācāreṇa vāmākhyā vāsu-r-ambarayor iva || 10 ||
sadhyāveśaṁ [k: sajyā-; kh: sajya-] mayā labdhaṁ gatā [k, kh: gataṁ] liṅgatvam eva tu |
divyaṁ [k, kh: divya] me vyaktakaṁ liṅgaṁ avyaktāhaṁ kumārikā || 11 ||
divyaliṅgaṁ smṛtodyāṇaṁ [kh: -dyānaṁ] somāgniravimadhyataḥ [k, kh: śivā- |
ravimadhye [kh: -madhya] gataḥ agnir agnimadhye [k: gatorānirarimad; kh: gatorārirarisādhya] mahacchriyaḥ [k: mahachiyaḥ] || 12 ||
sā cāhaṁ śrībhagākhyā ca śilānte bhuvanāvalī |
saptaskandhasamāyuktā sā ca bhairavadevatā || 13 ||
bhramate ca śilāmadhye vāmāvartaparibhramāt |
vāmāśaktir anantākhyā [k, kh: atantā-] jīvākhyā kuṇḍagolakā || 14 ||
vibhramā golakākārā kākinyā haṁsavigrahā | YKh (2) 16/10-15ab.

O Hara, you worshipped her for a thousand divine years (as a result of which) she is visible and (her) light (is like that of) well-heated gold and, surrounded by a garland of flames, she emanates (her) intense (puṣkalā) Command by the power (of her) knowledge. Extending for millions of leagues, Meru (her) abode, shakes. The gods and sages were frightened. The Siddhas, Gandharvas and Kinnaras were (also) very frightened that (their) hermitage would be destroyed. Distraught, they fled. (15cd-18ab)

Some praise the Rule, others repeat Bhairavī's (Vidyā). Others fainted there and some broke down in despair. In this way all of (these) fettered souls were made homeless by the goddess's austerity. Thus my Liṅga is not male (vīra). It is the Yoginīkula[1] by name.[2]

There, in the temple of the Western (tradition arose) the great sound of the wave of the Command. Countless millions of divine Yoginīs sport there. This is the house of the Yoginīs that is fierce, terrible and very frightening. O god, it is called Candrapura (the City of the Moon), the most excellent abode of the gods. There the Command is born spontaneously. It is the Cave, the Hermitage of the Celestial Command. Fame has arisen there in (that) House, (the fame) which has authority over the Kula Vidyā.[3] (18cd-23ab)

---

[1] The Liṅga Kaula's worship is commonly called 'siddhaliṅga'. Presumably, 'vīraliṅga' means the same. The goddess is saying that her Liṅga is the triangular Yoni. Identified with the abode of her tradition, it is the 'Western House' (paścimagṛha). Out of all the families of Yoginīs – Yoginīkulas – it is the one, supreme Yoginīkula. Just as all the Yoginīs play in this, the 'temple of the Western tradition', similarly all the Yoginīs ultimately belong to this unique Yoginīkula.

[2] divyavarṣasahasraikaṁ [k, kh: -srekaṁ] tvayā cārādhitā hara ‖ 15 ‖ *jvālāmālākula * * sutaptakanakaprabhā [kh: sutaṣṭa-; k, kh: -prabhaṁ]* ǀ dṛśyate jñānasāmarthyād ājñāṁ [k, kh: -tājñāṁ] sṛjati puṣkalām [kh: (?)] ‖ 16 ‖ lakṣayojanavistīrṇaṁ kampate meruvāsavam ǀ trastā devāḥ [k, kh: devā] samunayaḥ siddhagandharvakinnarāḥ ‖ 17 ‖ āśramadhvastasutrastā [k: āśamā- -sutrasthā; kh: āśramā- -sutrasthā] vihvalāḥ [k, kh: -lā] prapalāyitāḥ [k, kh: -tā] ǀ kecit [kh: (?)] stuvanti samayāṁ [k, kh: samayā] kecid jāpanti [k, kh: yāpanti] bhairavīm ‖ 18 ‖ mūrchitās tv apare tatra kecid vihvalatāṁ gatāḥ [k, kh: gatā] ǀ evaṁ nirvāsitāḥ [k, kh: -tā] sarve paśavo [k: pasavo; kh: (?)] devitāpasā [k: ṛṣitāpaśāḥ] ‖ 19 ‖ *evaṁ vīraṁ na me liṅgaṁ [kh: (?)] nāmnā [kh: (?)] tad [kh: (?)] yoginīkulam [k: -kula; kh: * * (?) kula] ǀ YKh (2) 16/15cd-20ab

[3] ājñā – ūrmimahārāvaṁ tatra paścimamandire ‖ 20 ‖ krīḍanti divyayoginyaḥ [k, kh: -nye] koṭikoṭis tva saṅkhyayā ǀ yoginīnāṁ gṛhaṁ [kh: ?] hy etat [kh: ?] vyāgrogram atibhīṣaṇam [k, kh: vyagrāgram iti-] ‖ 21 ‖ nāmnā candrapuraṁ deva devālayam anuttamam [k, kh: devānālayamuttamam] ǀ tatra ājñā svayaṁbhūtā nabhasājñāśramaṁ [k: nābhi- -srasaṁ; kh: nābhi- -sramaṁ] guhā ‖ 22 ‖ tatra [kh: (?)] kīrtir gṛhe [k: kīrti-; kh: (?)] jātā kulavidyādhikāriṇī ǀ YKh (2) 16/20cd-23ab.

Once the god Bhairava had thus seen the great pervasion of the Command, distraught and astonished, the god of the gods fell to the ground in Vārāṇasī, on the beautiful shore of the Ganges. Frightened, the god shook and moved around (swaying in circles) like the ecliptic (kadamba). (20cd-25ab)

"What is this?" thought the god, "from where has this great fear come? Meru is covered by deities and other (divine beings) and they play (there) with great vigour. All the gods have been made homeless. Has the end of the world come here? Nor do I know myself. Where has that troubled (vikala) one gone? (My) soul is very troubled. O dear! I am undone!"[1] (25cd-27)

He wondered over all the earth with its mountains, forests and groves (and said to himself): "I see all the gods (who ignore me). Indeed my Command has been destroyed today. There is no Śāmbhavī creation.[2] All this is (transcendent) and without defect. I see that the Liṅga has expanded. It is full and very powerful. It is proper to abandon my body for it serves no purpose. I possess no Śivahood and Śāṅkarī's energy (kalā) does not function; I am frightened even by the goddess. There is no means for me (to find relief). What use has well-performed austerity? Of what use are riches? What is the use of (belonging to) a virtuous family? What (is the use) of my matted hair and ashes? What is (the use of my) double-headed drum and trident? What is (the use) of the five ensigns (ascetics bear)? What is (the use) of skeletons and the ascetic's staff and the crescent moon as an adornment? O what a wonder! The goddess has destroyed the Great Vow I have been observing. There is no means (to help me), all that I have done is undone."[3] (28-33)

---

[1] evaṁ ājñāmahadvyāptiṁ [k, kh: – pti] dṛṣṭvā devas tu bhairavaḥ || 23 ||
vārāṇasyāṁ tu gaṅgāyāṁ tīre cātimanorame |
vihvalo deveśo vismito [k, kh: viśmito] patito bhuvi || 24 ||
saṁtrastaḥ kampate devo [k, kh: -vaḥ] bhramate ca kadambavat [k: kadambatat; kh: kadaṁvat] |
kim etac cintayed devaḥ [k: devā, kh: deva] kasmād [k: yaśyām; kh: yasyām] etan mahadbhayam || 25 ||
devādivyāpitaṁ meru [k, kh: devābhirthāpitaṁ meruḥ] krīḍanti atinirbharam |
devā [k, kh: -vāḥ] nirvāsitāḥ sarve saṁhāraṁ kim ihāgatam || 26 ||
naiva jānāmi [k, kh: neva viṁpati] cātmānaṁ vikalaś ca [k, kh: vikalaśai] kuto [k, kh: -ro] gataḥ |
atīvaṁ [k, kh: atīva] śocayaty ātmā aho 'haṁ ca kṣayaṁ gataḥ || Ibid. 16/23cd-27.

[2] The reader will recall that Śiva's emanation is withdrawn when the goddess enters the Liṅga, leaving behind an all-consuming darkness of the Unmanifest. Although this transcendental state is 'without defect' the god is confused by it. Cf. above, p. 30 with reference to KMT1/58 ff.

[3] pṛthivīṁ [k, kh: -vī] bhramate sarvāṁ [k, kh: sarvā] saśailavanakānanām [k, kh: -nā] |
paśyāmi tridaśān sarvān ājñāhānir mamādya vai || 28 ||

At first the god is penetrated by the energy of the goddess's Command generated in the Liṅga and falls to the ground by its impact. As the goddess's power waxes inwardly, the god's energy diminishes and so he looses the stability and inner tranquillity it gives and he becomes weak and distraught. We have seen that the god experiences a loss of his power in the goddess's presence in other versions of the myth. However, there is a new twist in this version: Bhairava loses his Śivahood and his Śāṅkarī – the energy inherent in it. The goddess has destroyed the Great Vow he had been observing, that is, the vow of a Śaiva ascetic. As Śambhu, that is, Śiva, Bhairava cannot be allowed access to the goddess because she is Viṣṇu's energy and Viṣṇu's essential form (mūrti). Viṣṇu does not approve of the Śaivite vow that involves eating from impure skulls and practicing in cremation grounds full of ghosts and demons. When the god realises that the goddess will not allow him into her empowering presence because of his Śaiva practice, which instead of nurturing the divine energy of the Command within him has destroyed it, he decides to give it up. Thus he 'splits apart' his own Liṅga, that is, he no longer worships it and abandons the observance of the Great Vow also called the Vow of the Skeleton. Instead of carrying a skull, ensigns and weapons that are the outer signs of the Great Vow we shall discuss in chapter three, he takes up the staff (daṇḍa) of the Brahmin ascetic. Now as the Ṛṣi Vyāsa, a veritable epitome of Brahminical orthodoxy, he tries to approach the goddess again hoping that this form will be acceptable to her.

> Thus, the excellent, wise and very skilled Viṣṇu, ever frightened by the fear of transmigratory existence, lives alone. He had criticized the Vow of the Skeleton in the past. (He) saw that very sign of attainment (pratyaya) and (thought): "This is a great wonder!" The drinking of wine, the booty of victory, eating from a skull and the like, residing in a cremation ground full of ghosts and demons – na kācit [k: kiṁci; kh: ki~ ncit] śāmbhavī sṛṣṭiḥ sarvam etan nirāmayam [k: -yaḥ] ǀ *paśyāmi jṛmbhitaṁ liṅgaṁ [k, kh: liṁga] * * pūrṇaṁ [k: * * pūrṇa; kh: pūrṇṇa] mahābalam [kh: -vanaṁ]* ǁ 29 ǁ dehatyāgaś [k, kh: -gaṁ] ca me yukto [k, kh: yuktaṁ] na tu [k, kh: ta] tena [k, kh: yena] prayojanam ǀ vidyate na śivatvaṁ [k, kh: -tva] me śāṅkarī [k: śāṁkarīṁ] nodyate [k, kh: tudyate] kalā ǁ 30 ǁ devyāpi trāsitaś [k, kh: trāḍitāś] cāhaṁ nopāyo [k, kh: -yaṁ] vidyate mama ǀ kiṁ tapena sutaptena vibhavaiḥ kiṁ prayojanam ǁ 31 ǁ kiṁ kulena suśīlena kiṁ jaṭair bhasmanā mama ǀ kiṁ ḍamarutriśūlena [k, kh: ḍamarukatri-] kiṁ mudrāpañcakena tu ǁ 32 ǁ kiṁ tu [kh: (?)] kaṅkālakhaṭvāṅgaiḥ [k, kh: -khaṭvāṁgeḥ] kiṁ mauliśaśibhūṣaṇaiḥ [k, kh: -ṇam] ǀ aho āścaryakaraṁ devyā hataṁ mama mahāvratam ǁ 33 ǁ nopāyo [k, kh: -yaṁ] vidyate kaścit sarvaṁ [k, kh: sarva] kṛtam [k, kh: vṛtam] akṛtaṁ mama ǀ

---

YKh (2) 16/28-34ab.

Svacchanda and the other the eight weapons[1] are (also) useless.[2] (34-37)

All this is (just) magic. O dear! (All) I see is danger! Vaiṣṇavīśakti is very fierce. She alone is my refuge. This Vaiṣṇavī, (this) Mahāmāyā creates (this) deluding creation. That is itself the means (to liberation), namely, Viṣṇu's energy whose face is the Yoni (bhagānanā). When she has been (properly) worshipped, whatever happens is clearly by the grace of (her) Command and is my radiance."[3] (38-40)

(His) eyes full of tears, Śambhu went behind (paścima) Meru and worshipped Śakti, the Mother, the Virgin who is the divine Liṅga. For a thousand years therein he contemplated (the goddess whose) form is Viṣṇu. The god stood in front of the door and worshipped the goddess. The goddess was concealed (viluptā) by (her) divine powers (daivata) as Śaṁkara stood at the door.[4]

---

[1] What is meant here is not clear to me. One possible explanation is the following. Ascetics, imitating the deity they worship, carry weapons (cf. KuKh 14/100cd-102ab ff). These are empowered by 'weapon mantras' (astra). One of the most common among them is Aghorāstra – the Weapon of Aghora, alias Svacchandabhairava. One form of this mantra recorded in the Siddhakhaṇḍa (MS G, folio 40a) is: AIṀ HRAUṀ HRĀṀ HRAḤ AGHORĀSTRĀYA KṢAḤ. I cannot say what the other weapons may be.

[2] ata eva varo [k, kh: varaṁ] viṣṇur [k, kh: viṣṇu] dhīmān cātivicakṣaṇaḥ [k, kh: -ṇa] || 34 ||
saṁsārabhayabhītātmā [kh: -bhūtātmā] sadā caikāntavāsinaḥ |
kaṅkālavratam [k, kh: kaṁkāra-] atyugraṁ dūṣitaṁ tena yat [k: tat] purā || 35 ||
tam eva pratyayaṁ dṛṣṭaṁ ity āścaryakaraṁ mahat | jayabhūtisurāpānaṁ kapālādikabhojanam || 36 ||
śmaśāne tu nivāsaś [k, kh: -saṁ] ca bhūtavetālasaṁkaṭe [k, kh: -ṭaṁ] | svacchandādi hy aṣṭāstrāṇi [k: haṣṭāstrāṇi; kh: hṛṣṭāstrīṇi] caivam eva [k, kh: śaivameva] vṛthā hi tu [k: paśu; kh: paśuḥ] || YKh (2) 16/34cd-37.

[3] indrajālam idaṁ sarvaṁ aho paśyāmi saṁkaṭam [k, kh: śaṅkaṭam] |
vaiṣṇavīśaktir atyugrā sā [k, kh: tām] eva śaraṇaṁ [kh: śaranaṁ] mama || 38 ||
vaiṣṇavīyaṁ mahāmāyā racate sṛṣṭiḍambaram |
tam evopāyam astīti [k, kh: -pāyasamāstīti] viṣṇoḥ [kh: viviṣṇoḥ] śaktir bhagānanā || 39 ||
tasyā [k, kh: tasyām] ārādhanaṁ kṛtvā yat kiñcid upajāyate |
tasyā [k, kh: tasyām] ājñāprasādena [k, kh: -praśādena] bhavate mama saṁsphuram [k, kh: sasphuram] || YKh (2) 16/38-40.

[4] aśrupūrṇekṣaṇaḥ [k, kh: -pūrṇā-] śambhuḥ gatas [k: vrata; kh: vrate] tu merupaścime |
tatra [k, kh: māta vai] cārādhayec chaktiṁ divyaliṅgāṁ [k, kh: -liṅgā] kumārikām [k, kh: kumārikā] || 41 ||
tasmin varṣasahasraikaṁ [k, kh: -srekaṁ] dhyāyate viṣṇumūrtikām |
devīm [k, kh: devyā] ārādhayed [k: -ye] devo dvārāgre [k: -ragre] upari [k, kh: ru-] sthitaḥ || 42 ||
viluptā [k, kh: vivrūptā] daivatair devī [kh: daivī] dvārāgre [k, kh: dvīrāgre] śaṁkaraḥ [k, kh: -ra] sthitaḥ | Ibid. 16/41-43ab.

(He said): "I am devoid of the Command. (My) vow has been ruined; (my) mind is distraught. O great goddess! (What is your) command there (in this case)? Tell (me) what should be done! Allow (me) entry. Why is this not to be granted (to me), Śaṁkara?"

Hearing this speech, the goddess was angry and said this:

"Entry should never be given to one who does not have the Command. He observes the (deceitful) vow of a cat, O god, (such is he) the lord of Umā. He is a fettered soul without authority. He is proud and lustful. I do not see his face and he returns to (his) previous impure state. (This) has been forbidden at (my) command. O god, the entry (of such a one) is useless."[1] (41-47)

After he tarried there for fifty years . . . (?) Śaṁkara (thought): "I have not entered. My effort is useless." (Then) Śaṁkara wandered in the mortal world and performed austerities. Then, greatly troubled by the pain of (his) distress, he went again to Vārāṇasī. (Thinking that) one who is detached should abandon (the worship of) the Liṅga, he became a staff-bearing renouncer by himself (without taking initiation from someone else). The lord renounced (everything, including the observance of his vow) at the confluence of the Ganges and Yamuna by himself and, having brought about his own splitting apart of the Liṅga, returned to Vārāṇasī.[2] (48-51ab)

He then assumed the form of a Ṛṣi, that is, a great sage by the name of Vyāsa. (And so) that same Śaṁkara yoked to Māyā (became)

---

[1] ājñāhīno vrataduṣṭo vikāragatacetanaḥ [k, kh: vikārā- -na] || 43 ||
tatrādeśaṁ mahādevi yat kartavyaṁ [k, kh: kattavyaṁ] vadasva tat | praveśaṁ [k, kh: pradeśaṁ] dīyatāṁ kiṁ [k, kh: no] vā śaṁkarasya na dīyate || 44 ||
tam ākarṇya [kh: -karṇṇo] vacaṁ devī kopāviṣṭāvadad idam [k, kh: vade hi vaṁ] |
praveśo [k, kh: -śaṁ] naiva dātavyo [k, kh: -vyaṁ] ājñāhīnasya karhicit || 45 ||
vaiḍālavratadhārī [k, kh: -ri] ca eṣa deva umāpatiḥ [k, kh: -ti] |
paśuḥ sa cāprameyī [k: yaśacaś cā-; kh: paśavaś coprameyī] ca garvitaḥ kāmalampaṭaḥ || 46 ||
tasya vaktraṁ na paśyāmi [k, kh: -syāmi] āśaucaṁ yāti [k: āśīstyeyati; kh: āśītmeyati] pūrvakam |
niṣiddham ājñayā deva [k, kh: devo] nirarthaṁ [k, kh: narathaṁ] ca praveśanam ||
Ibid. 16/43cd-47.

[2] sthitvā varṣaśatārdhaṁ tu [k, kh: -stu] uditmānī(?) ca śaṁkaraḥ [k, kh: -ra] |
praveśaś [k, kh: -śaṁ] ca na me jāto [k, kh: -taṁ] vṛthā mama pariśramaḥ [k, kh: -mam] || 48 ||
*bhramate martyaloke [k: matyaloke; kh: manyaloke] tu tapasaṁtaptaḥ [k: tapabhratapta; kh: tapabhra * pta] śaṁkaraḥ* |
vikalātapasaṁkliṣṭo [k, kh: -kliṣṭaṁ] vārāṇasyāṁ gataḥ punaḥ || 49 ||
viraktas tu tyajet [k, kh: tyaje] liṅgaṁ daṇḍapāṇiḥ [k: dandayāṇi; kh: daṁdapāṇi] svayaṁ kṛtaḥ [k, kh: kṛtam] |
gaṅgāyamunayor [kh: -yamnunayo] madhye [k: madhya] nyāsaṁ kṛtvā svayaṁ [k: tavāṁ; kh: kṛtavān] prabhuḥ || 50 ||
liṅgabhedaṁ [k, kh: -bhedaḥ] svakaṁ kṛtvā vārāṇasyāṁ punar gataḥ | Ibid. 16/48-51ab.

Vyāsa-Śaṁkara and, in order to earn (the boon of the) Command, he returned to the goddess's hermitage. The god worshipped again in the western temple of Meru. Tranquil, bearing a form of Māyā and that of the great Ṛṣi Vyāsa, the deities asked him: "Who are you, sir? Why have you come here? (Are you a) Gandharva or a Kinnara? Or (are you) some Ṛṣi? (Are you) Brahmā or Viṣṇu, or Rudra or some Siddha? Or are you the Moon or Sun or (are you) a human aspirant (sādhaka)? You are sinking in the ocean of transmigratory existence and, due to (your) dispassion, have come here. Pray tell (us) truly, as the goddess would, what (your) purpose is." This the Yoginīs asked Vyāsa and Śaṁkara.[1]

The Ṛṣi Vyāsa-Śaṁkara, hearing their words (replied): "I am a soul frightened by transmigratory existence. I am the soul of Vyāsa and have conquered the senses. I will travel on this painful inner journey to (achieve) liberation. Please convey my message to the goddess in the hermitage of the eight Mothers (aṣṭagraha); (tell her that) I, (her) disciple, am present (here) and desire initiation and am anxious (to achieve) liberation. O goddess, I have come. O Maheśvarī! knowing that the wise Vyāsa also thus stands immobile (before you),[2] be compassionate." (51cd-60ab)

Then, the goddess was informed (of his presence) by the (divine) forms, (who are never) separate (from her). When the great goddess (Maheśānī) had heard that, (she knew that) Śaṁkara in the form of Vyāsa (was present and so), she whose face is the Full Moon

---

[1] ṛṣirūpadharaḥ paścān nāmnā vyāso [k, kh: missing] mahāmuniḥ ‖ 51 ‖ sa eva māyayā yukto śaṁkaro vyāsaśaṁkaraḥ | ājñā-m-upārjanārthāya gato devyāśramaṁ punaḥ ‖ 52 ‖
punaś cārādhayed [k, kh: punarārā-] devo meroḥ [k, kh: mero] paścimamandire | māyārūpadharaḥ śānto [k, kh: -ntaḥ] vyāsarūpī mahā – ṛṣiḥ ‖ 53 ‖
pṛcchante devatās tasya ko bhavān kim ihāgataḥ | gandharvaḥ kinnaro vāpi ṛṣir vā [k, kh: ṛṣayo] vātha [k, kh: cātha] kaścana [k: kaścena] ‖ 54 ‖
brahmā vā viṣṇu rudro [k: rudrā] vā kiṁ vā siddho 'pi kaścana | candraḥ [k, kh: candra] sūryo 'thavā tvaṁ hi mānuṣo [k, kh: -ṣī] vātha sādhakaḥ ‖ 55 ‖
saṁsārābdhinimagnas tvaṁ virāgād iha āgataḥ [k: virāgaḥd ihamāgataḥ; kh: virāgād ihamāgataḥ] | yat kāryaṁ [k, kh: kārya] kathyatāṁ satyaṁ [k: śattvaṁ; kh: śatvaṁ] yathā devyā [kh: deyā] nigadyate [k: -nte; kh: -dyaṁte] ‖ 56 ‖
evaṁ pṛcchanti yoginyo vyāsasya śaṁkarasya ca | Ibid. 16/51cd-57ab.

[2] The Sanskrit reads: vyāso 'py evaṁ viditvā ca sthito niścalo buddhimān | I take 'iti' which marks direct speech to be understood. Restoring it we get: vyāso 'py ayaṁ ca sthito niścalo buddhimān iti viditvā (dayāṁ kuru maheśvari).

> was pleased. Śaṁkara (then) observed a vow of silence[1] for a full hundred years. (Then) Vyāsa was told there (what to do) in a dream.[2] (60cd-62)

The period of a hundred years is one of completeness. This is the length of a full lifetime and the time it takes to complete a vow or penance. Thus, the goddess is finally pleased and reveals herself in her Vaiṣṇava form. However, Śaṁkara / Vyāsa is in the deluded state of Māyā induced by the goddess and by him freely accepted out of ignorance. In relation to this illusory dream-like state in which false, unreal things appear, the condition of yogic consciousness in which reality is perceived is like a dream. In this state the goddess flies up into the sky. Thus she affords a glimpse of how she will ultimately reveal herself in her most authentic form as the bird goddess – Khageśī – the goddess – īśī – who moves – gā – in the sky – kha – of transcendental emptiness. She takes him to the cave dwelling, that is, the Triangle at the End of the Twelve, also called Candrapura – the City of the Moon, in the centre of which she, the Virgin Goddess, sits within the Liṅga. Before it, as in the other versions, Vyāsa / Śaṁkara / Bhairava recites a hymn of praise. In this case it is prefixed by a recitation of the scriptures, but not the Kaula ones, which the goddess has yet to reveal.

> (The goddess) flew in the sky. She whose face was most beautiful and bore Viṣṇu's form, was wet (with nectar). She carried a sword and, expanding (with joy), the sage saw her then. She lifted Vyāsa up and placed (him) in the cave dwelling. In a dream Vyāsa entered into Candrapura, the auspicious House and by the power of (the goddess's) intense Command, he uttered the ocean of scriptures (śāstra). (He uttered) the Vedānta and Siddhānta along with (their)

---

[1] The observance of a vow of silence is empowering. We have seen that the goddess also observed it and so does the First Siddha who is accordingly called Tūṣṇīnātha – the Silent Lord (KuKh 3/1).

[2] teṣām ākarṇya [k, kh: – kaṇya] vacanaṁ ṛṣir yo [k, kh: ṛṣayo] vyāsaśaṁkaraḥ || 57 ||
ahaṁ saṁsārabhītātmā vyāsātmā ca jitendriyaḥ |
mokṣārthaṁ tu kariṣyāmi [k, kh: cariṣyāmi] idaṁ kāṣṭāntarāyaṇam || 58 ||
aṣṭagrahāśrame [k: -māṁ; kh:-rgrahāśramo] devyāṁ [k, kh: devyā] vijñaptiṁ kriyatāṁ mama | upasannas tv ahaṁ śiṣyo [k, kh: śiṣya] dīkṣārthī mokṣakāṅkṣiṇaḥ [k, kh: – kāṁkṣitā] || 59 ||
āgataś ca ahaṁ devi dayāṁ kuru maheśvari |
vyāso 'py evaṁ [k, kh: avaṁ] viditvā ca sthito niścalo buddhimān || 60 ||
vijñaptā tu [kh: (?)] tadā devī divyābhinnātmamūrtibhiḥ [k: devyābhirnnasra-; kh: devyābhinnasra-] |
tad ākarṇya [k: – karṣya; kh: -karmma] maheśānī [k, kh: -ni] vyāsarūpī tu śaṁkaraḥ || 61 ||
*tuṣṭā pūrṇenduvadanā maunam āsthāya [k: -māsthā *] saṅkaraḥ [kh: śaṁka (?)] |
pūrṇavarṣaśate [kh: pūrṇavarṣavarṣaśate] tatra svapne vyāso niveditaḥ [k, kh: svapnaṁ vyāse niveditam] || YKh (2) 16/57cd-62.

> parts in accord with the order in which they are read. By offering such knowledge, and with flowers, he worshipped Speech. Vyāsa worshipped the Liṅga with other words of the hymn. (Finally) the Virgin Goddess (Kumārikā) was satisfied by his great King of Hymns (Stavarāja).[1] (63-67ab)

The goddess within the Liṅga is Vaiṣṇavī. When she is within it, everything – even the gods – is dissolved away into the consuming void of her pervasive state. Then she is Viṣṇu, the Pervasive One. He is all the gods, everything that exists and the author of their creation, persistence and destruction. And the goddess Vaiṣṇavīśakti is his essential nature.

> The venerable Kumārī said: "I am the Vaiṣṇavī and the power that is the cause of the universe's persistence. (I am) Vaiṣṇavī, the fivefold energy; (I am) Viṣṇu's essential nature (ātman) and the deity. (I am) Viṣṇu's seal (mudrā)[2] within the Triangle and I am Viṣṇu's form. (I am the goddess) whose face is the Yoni (bhagānanā), the Great Pervasion,[3] the effect and Viṣṇu's instrument. There is no Rudra, no Viṣṇu, no Śambhu anywhere in the mortal (world). There is no Sadyojāta, Vāmanaka, Aghora, Īśa, Tatpuruṣa[4] nor Sadāśiva.
>
> There is no Brahmā, no Fire, no Sun, no Moon, no Śakra, Varuṇa, Agastya, Ketu, Dhruva or the teacher Bṛhaspati. Everything is the universe made of Viṣṇu. The seed is said to be Brahmā. Viṣṇu is persistence. Viṣṇu is the ocean. Viṣṇu is the Pervasive One (viṣṇu) who is the supreme divine form. He holds a conch, discus and mace.[5] (67cd-73ab)

---

[1] ākāśagāminī klinnā viṣṇor [k, kh: viṣṇo] mūrtir varānanā |
khaḍgahastā vijṛṁbhantī [k: vikṛṁ-; k, kh: -bhānti] paśyate [kh: (?)] tāṁ tadā muniḥ || 63 ||
tayā cotthāpito vyāso nikṣipto guhavāsake |
svapne [k, kh: praviśate] praviśate [k, kh: svapne] vyāso gṛhe candrapure śubhe || 64 ||
tīvrājñāyāḥ [k, kh: -yā] prabhāvena [kh: (?)] nigadet [k, kh: -ta] śāstrasāgaram |
vedāntaṁ caiva siddhāntaṁ pāṭhakramapadānvitam || 65 ||
*īdṛgjñānapradānena [k, kh: iga * * pra-] vācaṁ [k, kh: -kaṁ] puṣpaiḥ samarcayet* | liṅgam ārādhayed vyāsaḥ stuter anyaiḥ [k, kh: stutir-] pralāpakaiḥ || 66 ||
stavarājena mahatā tuṣṭā tasya kumārikā | Ibid. 16/63-67ab.

[2] Mudrā – literally 'gesture' or 'seal' is śakti – the energy of the god or that of the goddess that she herself embodies. In this case she is Viṣṇu's energy – Vaiṣṇavīśakti.

[3] The Great Pervasion (mahāvyāpti) is the liberated state free of the confines of the body, space and time. Viṣṇu's name, which is derived from the root viṣ, meaning 'to pervade', literally means 'the pervasive one'.

[4] These are the five faces of Sadāśiva, also called the Five Brahmās or Instruments (karaṇa). They are discussed below in chapter 3, p. 637 ff..

[5] vaiṣṇavī ca ahaṁ śaktiḥ [k, kh: śakti] sthitihetur [k, kh: -hetor] jagasya ca || 67 ||

> Know that Rudra is made of Viṣṇu and Viṣṇu is subtle, supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent). Viṣṇu is universal pervasion. He is the intellect, mind and ego.
>
> Vaiṣṇavī is said to be Nature (prakṛti). The bliss of consciousness belongs to Viṣṇu. The Bhaga is Viṣṇu. The supreme will which is made of Viṣṇu is Kula. Viṣṇu is eternal bliss. Viṣṇu is the energy of Kuṇḍalinī. All that is made of energy belongs to Viṣṇu. The energy Vaiṣṇavī is the deity.
>
> There is no other Rudra at all, no other Viṣṇu, Brahmā, god or deity. There is one energy with three aspects, that is, the imperishable energy Vaiṣṇavī. She is the mother who generates Brahmā in the mobile and immobile universe. I abide in three forms to emanate, preserve and withdraw. I am that Vaiṣṇavī energy. I abide in the form of Viṣṇu.[1] (73cd-79ab)

The goddess declares that she is the Mother of the universe. She sustains the world and nourishes all living beings with her divine, nectar-like power and so she is Viṣṇu, the sustainer. Rudra, the destroyer is born from Viṣṇu when the time

---

vaiṣṇavī pañcadhā śaktiḥ [k, kh: śakti] viṣṇor ātmā ca [k, kh: viṣṇur ātmā na] devatā |
viṣṇor mudrā trikoṇānte [k: trikonaunte; kh: trikonānte] ahaṁ vai viṣṇumūrtikā || 68 ||
bhagānanā mahāvyāptiḥ kāryaṁ karaṇavaiṣṇavaṁ |
na rudro [k, kh: rudra] vidyate kaścit na viṣṇur vidyate [k, kh: nānavī vidyate] kvacit [k, kh: kvaci] || 69 ||
na śambhur vidyate [k, kh: śambhu-] martye na sadyo [k: sadyā] naiva vāmakaḥ [k, kh: -kam] |
nāghoro [k: nāghorau] vidyate īśas tatpuruṣo [k, kh: īśaṁ -ṣa] na sadāśivaḥ [k, kh: -vam] || 70 ||
na brahmā na ca vai vahnir [k, kh: vahni] na sūryo naiva candramāḥ [k, kh: -mā] |
na śakro varuṇo 'gastyo [k, kh: varuṇāgastvo] na ketur dhruvakaś ca [k, kh: ketu dhruvakasya] na || 71 ||
na gurur bṛhaspatiḥ kaścit sarvaṁ viṣṇumayaṁ jagat |
bījaṁ brahmā smṛto viṣṇuḥ [k, kh: viṣṇu] sthitir viṣṇur mahodadhiḥ || 72 ||
viṣṇur viṣṇuḥ [k, kh: viṣṇu] parāmūrtiḥ śaṅkhacakragadādharaḥ | YKh (2) 16/67cd-73ab.

[1] rudraṁ viṣṇumayaṁ vidyād viṣṇuḥ [k: viṣṇu] sūkṣmaḥ [k, kh: sūṣma] parāparaḥ || 73 ||
sarvavyāptimayo [k, kh: -yaṁ] viṣṇur buddhimano 'haṁkṛtiḥ [k: viṣṇubuddhinarahaṁ-; kh: viṣṇuvuddhivarahaṁkṛtiḥ] |
vaiṣṇavī prakṛtir uddiṣṭā caitanyānanda – [k, kh: vaitatyā-] vaiṣṇavam || 74 ||
bhagaṁ viṣṇuḥ [k: viṣṇu] parecchā yā viṣṇumāyā [k, kh: – māyāṁ] kulātmikā | nityānandamayo [k, kh: -māyā] viṣṇuḥ viṣṇuḥ [k, kh: viṣṇu] kuṇḍalinīkalā || 75 ||
viṣṇoḥ śaktimayaṁ sarvaṁ vaiṣṇavīśaktir [k, kh: -śakti] devatā |
nānyo rudro bhavet kaścin nānyo viṣṇuś ca kaścana [k, kh: -naḥ] || 76 ||
brahmāpi [k, kh: brahmo 'pi] nānyam astīti nānyo devo na devatā |
ekā śaktis tridhā bhedair [k, kh: bhedai] vaiṣṇavī śaktir avyayā || 77 ||
brahmasyotpattijananī [k: brahmasyātpatti-] jage [k, kh: yage] sthāvarajaṅgame |
sṛṣṭisthitivināśāya triprakārā [k, kh: trikārā] hy ahaṁ sthitā [k, kh: sthitāḥ] || 78 ||
ahaṁ sā vaiṣṇavī śaktiḥ [k, kh: śakti] sthitāhaṁ viṣṇurūpiṇī || Ibid. 16/73cd-79ab.

of universal destruction comes. Thus she is the beginning, middle and end of all things:

> (I am she who) is called the supreme Mother and is much loved by the Siddhas. (I am) also she (who) protects the universe according to its nature, age after age. At the end, when it finishes, it is lead to the cage (of darkness) by (that same) energy. Then Viṣṇu is Rudra and Rudra's energy is Vaiṣṇavī. Rudra is born from Viṣṇu's bliss, the supreme that is (both) supreme and inferior (is thus generated from) the supreme. By virtue of (my) triple nature I, Vaiṣṇavī, possess all (these divine) forms. (I am the energy that) abides threefold in the beginning, middle and end for (each) person. The soul (jīva) does not live in living beings without nectar, (and I am that nectar). As long as energy does not assume (this) form, so long does death persist. In this way, (I am) she (who) is your supreme energy, (the energy) of Viṣṇu that brings about (universal) destruction.[1] (79cd-84ab)

Ultimately everything is generated, sustained and dissolved away in the goddess's triadic energy. She is at once both all the energies of Speech (i.e. 'the letters') and the lunar nectar that gives life to all living beings:

> That great power (mahat) is Viṣṇu and (its) form is energy (śaktibimba) that abides threefold. The great fools (of this world) do not know the empowered (śākta) body of Viṣṇu. Then those who are undeveloped have the form of many (corporeal) abodes. They do not know the one energy, (the goddess) who pervades everything and is the abode of all living beings who is said to be made of (the energies of) all the letters. Satisfaction (of all desires is attained) by means of that nectar and there is no rebirth. I am she who is threefold as emanation, persistence and withdrawal. I pervade the entire universe

---

[1] parā mātā samākhyātā siddhānāṁ cātivatsalā || 79 ||
sā cāpi pālayed viśvaṁ yugānuyugarūpataḥ [k, kh: -ta] |
ante caivāvasāne [k, kh: – vaśāne] tu śaktyā nayati [k, kh: nīyati] pañjaram || 80 ||
tadā viṣṇur [k, kh: viṣṇu] bhaved [k, kh: bhave] rudraḥ rudraśaktis tu vaiṣṇavī |
vaiṣṇavānandajaṁ rudraṁ parāt paraṁ [k, kh: para] parāparam || 81 ||
sarvamūrtidharāhaṁ vai vaiṣṇavī trisvarūpataḥ |
ādimadhyāvasāne [k: – madhyāvaśānaṁ; kh: -vaśāne] tu tridhā tiṣṭhati jantave || 82 ||
amṛtena vinā jīvaḥ naiva jīvati jantuṣu |
yāvan na [k, kh: yāvat ta] rūpate śaktis tāvan mṛtyuḥ kṛtaḥ kila [k, kh: kilaḥ] || 83 ||
evaṁ te sā [k, kh: tā] parā śaktiḥ viṣṇoḥ saṁhārakāriṇī | Ibid. 16/79cd-84ab.

> and the four types of living beings.[1] Why do you praise (me)? Why do you meditate on me? Who else apart from me has authority? Who are you (heralded thus) with hymns and words (of praise)?"[2] (84cd-89ab)

After the goddess has told the god about herself, it is the god's turn to do so. However, he does not tell her who he really is. He is still under the powerful influence of Māyā – the form in which the goddess is now interacting with him. Somehow he realises at least this much and that, like all fettered souls, he must first propitiate the goddess in this form because it is in this form that she is the source of bondage.

> Vyāsa said: "I am a Brahmin and a Ṛṣi. I am Vyāsa, a companion of the gods. I am a soul frightened by the fear of transmigratory existence. I am an insensitive fool. I was born in the Middle Country (madhyadeśa). (I am) distressed and (my) senses are disturbed. O goddess, I am Vyāsa. The goddess is Nature (and (I am) under the control of Nature. O Bhairavī, by prostrating fully (before you) (I take) your refuge. Impart all the teaching, the initiation and the transmission of the Command (ājñākrama) to me.[3] (89cd-92ab)

The goddess is still not ready to transmit the Command to the god because, until he gives up the illusory form he has assumed, he is not ready to receive it. However, she is sufficiently pleased to teach the god the true nature of Māyā now that she sees that he is receptive enough to at least begin to understand. Māyā, she explains, is both binding and liberating, generates either an illusory or a real universe, is profane or sacred, according to whether one is ignorant of its true divine

---

[1] See note to KuKh 2/14.

[2] etad [k, kh: eta] eva mahad viṣṇuḥ śaktibimbaṁ [k, kh: -viṁva] tridhā sthitam || 84 ||
na jānanti mahāmūḍhāḥ śarīraṁ śāktaṁ [k, kh: śākta] vaiṣṇavam |
tadā te apravṛddhāś ca nānāśramaparigrahāḥ || 85 ||
śaktim ekāṁ [k, kh: śaktirekā] na jānanti yayā [k, kh: yena] vyāptam aśeṣataḥ | ālayaḥ [k, kh: -yaṁ] sarvabhūtānāṁ sarvavarṇamayī [k, kh: -varmma-] smṛtā || 86 ||
tenāmṛtena tṛptiḥ [k: tṛptī; kh: tṛpta] syāt [k, kh: sya] punarjanma na vidyate |
sāhaṁ tridhātmikā caikā sṛṣṭisthitilayātmikā || 87 ||
*mayā vyāptaṁ jagat [kh: ja * t] sarvaṁ bhūtagrāmaṁ [k, kh: -ma] caturvidham* |
kasmāt [k, kh: kasyāt] tvaṁ stavase kim arthaṁ dhyāyase mama || 88 ||
ko [k, kh: ki] mamānyo 'dhikārī syāt kas tvaṁ vākstutipūrvakaiḥ | Ibid. 16/84cd-89ab.

[3] brāhmaṇo 'haṁ ca ṛṣis tu [k, kh: ṛṣaya] vyāso 'haṁ devasārathiḥ [k, kh: -thi] || 89 ||
saṁsārabhayabhītātmā mūrkho 'haṁ sa jaḍātmakaḥ [k, kh: – kaṁ] |
madhyadeśe tv ahaṁ jāto [k: jātar; kh: jāta] vikalo [k, kh: -kālā] vikalendriyaḥ [kh: -kālā-] || 90 ||
vyāso 'haṁ [kh: vyāsodaṁ] prakṛtir devī [k, kh: -devi] prakṛtyā vaśavartinaḥ [k, kh: caśa-] |
sāṣṭāṅgapraṇipātena [k, kh: śā -] śaraṇaṁ tava [k, kh: nava] bhairavi || 91 ||
dīkṣām ājñākramaṁ sarvaṁ upadeśaṁ vadasva me || Ibid. 16/89cd-92ab.

nature and does not worship, or otherwise. So the goddess exhorts the god to be truthful and authentic in relation to himself first of all. In this way Māyā will work for his benefit to reveal what Māyā herself has hidden. Anyway, he cannot hide himself from the goddess who is omniscient Māyā:

> The venerable Kumārī said: "Vyāsa's state is nothing (real). O Śaṁkara, (there is nothing) of mine (I can give) you. O Śaṁkara! (See) the illusory form of a Ṛṣi assumed (by you). Why do you take suffering (onto yourself by the observance of) vows, Kaula practice (caryā), austerity and the like? All this is the net of Māyā. Māyā is the cage of Nature. Māyā is the intellect. Māyā is the mind. Māyā is the wish-granting gem. Māyā is (the variety and changes of phenomena and so is) like waves; also, (it is the essential nature of all phenomena and so it is) like the water (from which waves are made). Māyā is the bondage of Karma. Māyā pervades this world and the entire mobile and immobile universe. Māyā is the supreme Nirvāṇa. Māyā is the supreme delusion. Māyā, the whore, is the source (yoni) (of the universe). Māyā is the sacrifice (yāga) without consciousness. Māyā is maṇḍala and mantra. Māyā is the ocean of the principles (of existence). Māyā is Śakti. Śiva is Māyā. Due to Māyā, Śaṁkara (appears as) a sage.[1] (92cd-97)
>
> And (there is) Māyā in the form of one's sister and she is (one's) daughter due to Māyā. And that pure mother is Māyā. Another Māyā is the (liberating) sixteenth energy (of the moon).[2] Māyā paralyses all things. Māyā is (one's) relative and my intelligence (mati). Māyā is in the encompassing (union of) the Bhaga and Liṅga. Māyā serves to delude and is the lord of worldly experience. The

[1] vyāsatvaṁ na bhavet kiñcit [k, kh: kici] mama tvaṁ prati [k, kh: pari] śaṁkara || 92 ||
aho māyātmakaṁ rūpaṁ śaṁkara [k, kh: -ro] ṛṣer uddhṛtam [k, kh: ṛṣirūdhṛka] |
kim arthaṁ kuruṣe [k, kh: -mā] kaṣṭaṁ vrataṁ caryātapādikam || 93 ||
māyājālam idaṁ sarvaṁ māyā prakṛtipañjaram |
māyā buddhir mano māyā māyā cintāmaṇiḥ [k, kh: – maṇī] pṛthak || 94 ||
māyormyādijalavidhiḥ [k, kh: māyārmmādi-; kh: -jaladhviḥ] māyā karmanibandhanam |
māyāvyāptam idaṁ lokaṁ sarvam eva carācaram || 95 ||
māyā paramanirvāṇaṁ māyā paramaḍambaram |
māyā raṇḍā bhaved yonir [k, kh: yoti] māyā yāgam acetanam [k, kh: -naḥ] || 96 ||
māyā maṇḍalakaṁ mantro [k, kh: mantraṁ] māyā tattvamayārṇavam [k, kh: -rārṇavaṁ] |
māyā śaktiḥ [k, kh: śakti] śivo māyā śaṁkaro [k, kh: śekharo] māyayā [k, kh: muni] muniḥ [k, kh: māyayā] || Ibid. 16/92cd-97.

[2] In the following chapter we will discuss the symbolism of sixteenth and seventeenth energies of the Moon and their relationship to the goddess.

entire universe is born from Māyā. Bliss is the outpouring brought about by Māyā.[1] (98-100ab)

In this way everything is made of Māyā. (Māyā is the goddess) Bhairavī (who embodies and generates the) Śāmbhavī creation.[2] You, Bhairava, have come here after assuming Hara's state of Māyā and (you are) the Self. Why do you conceal (yourself) and do not reveal yourself? O sinless one, (even) I do not know your (true) nature by (means of) Māyā. O god, Umā's lord, you are always a liar. The concealment, which is falsity, is a sin and due to falsity there is hell. (The soul) is bound by falsity. There is (frustrating) deceit in falsity. Lassitude is the result of falsity and lassitude binds with (many) impediments. Due to falsity there is an impediment at every step. Due to falsity there is no other (superior world) beyond and there is (no benefit) here of this world due to falsity. Knowledge is not transmitted due to falsity and there is no liberation due to falsity. O wise one, falsity is death (itself). Falsity is the worst mistake. O Śaṁkara, your form is concealed. You present yourself as if you were Vyāsa. Abandon all that untruth and reveal yourself. It is not the case that I do not know you. Why do you hide yourself again?"[3] (100cd-107)

---

[1] bhaginīmayamāyā ca duhitrī sā ca māyayā |
sā ca māyāmbikā śuddhā māyānyā ṣoḍaśī kalā || 98 ||
sarvastambhakarī [k, kh: -stambhaṁ-] māyā māyā bandhur matir mama | bhagaliṅgāvṛtā [k, kh: -tau] māyā māyā mohāya [kh: mohoya] bhogarāṭ || 99 ||
māyotpannaṁ [k: māyātpannaṁ] jagat sarvaṁ ānando māyayodbhavaḥ [k: ānandaṁ māyayādbhavaṁ; kh: ānandaṁ māyayodbhavam] | YKh (2) 16/98-100ab.

[2] See above, p. 30; also verses 28-33 of this passage.

[3] evaṁ māyāmayaṁ sarvaṁ śāmbhavīsṛṣṭibhairavī || 100 ||
māyāharapadaṁ [kh: māyoharapadaṁ] kṛtvā bhairavas tvam ihāgataḥ [k, kh: bhairava-; k, kh: –gatāḥ] |
kim arthaṁ guhyase [k, kh: gṛhayase] cātmā ātmānaṁ na prakāśyase [k, kh: prakāsyase] || 101 ||
māyayā [k, kh: adyayā] ca tvadīyātmā naiva jñātaṁ mayānagha |
asatyavādī tvaṁ deva sarvakālam umāpate || 102 ||
asatyācadanāt [k: nacadaṁmāt] pāpaṁ narakaṁ cāpy asatyataḥ [k, kh: -nā] |
asatyād bandham āpnoti asatye ca [k, kh: missing] viḍambanā || 103 ||
asatyād bhavate glāniḥ [k, kh: -ni] glānir vighnaiḥ [k: ślānoṁ; kh: ślāno] prabādhyate |
asatyād bhavate vighnaṁ bhavate ca pade pade || 104 ||
asatyān na paratra syān nehalokam asatyataḥ [k, kh: syān ekalokam asatyata] |
asatyān na kramet jñānaṁ naiva mokṣam asatyataḥ [k, kh: -na] || 105 ||
asatyaṁ [k, kh: asatyā] sādhu maraṇaṁ asatyaṁ duṣkṛtaṁ param |
śaṁkara cchannamūrtis tvaṁ vadasy ātmānaṁ [k, kh: -na] vyāsavat || 106 ||
asatyam etat sarvaṁ tyajya ātmānaṁ prakaṭaṁ kuru |
na tvaṁ [k, kh: tva] na tu [k, kh: nastva] mayājñātaḥ [k, kh: -taṁ] kim ātmā guhyase [k, kh: gṛhame] punaḥ || YKh (2) 16/100cd-107.

The god has understood the goddess's teaching sufficiently to realise and admit that he is in reality the god. Nonetheless, he cannot shake of the Māyā that torments him by himself. Knowledge is not enough if it is not accompanied by the grace of the goddess's liberating Command. The proud man who believes that he can achieve everything without the deity's grace will never be freed of the illusion that binds him. He must first of all realise how profoundly helpless he is without the deity's grace. Until she reveals herself to him, his miseries will only increase because the source of all his suffering is her absence. So, as in the other versions, the god pleads with the goddess that she should transmit the Command to him because it is from him that she originally received it. But above all, he has reached the depth of dispair; he is desperately in need of her and the Command she transmits through the union that can only take place when she reveals her true nature.

> Vyāsa said: "Although you are Mahāmāyā whose nature is emanation and, (symbolized by an inverted triangle), face downwards. And you are Māyā, the deity with three eyes (virūpākṣī), Kaśmalī by name. You are the construction of forms (mūrtiracanā) and, without parts, your nature is the Māyā, which is the womb (of creation) (bhaga). In this way, by the process (krama) of Māyā, I am Vyāsa whose nature is Śaṁkara. Māyā deludes me and I am distraught due to Māyā. Your great knowledge has arisen on the mountain of Himavat who knows accomplishment and, O goddess, (it having been received) from you and offered in this way, you are today my refuge.[1] O (goddess) my lord (svāmin),[2] by worshipping (me you have) become as I am (samadharmiṇī). And in this (your) eighth rebirth you have energized the Command. O great goddess, by giving (you) the Command it has become mine, O Kuleśvarī. (I have) become distraught as (my) body is tormented by austerity. Have mercy on me! Be gracious! Transmit the Command (to me)! (I am) a humble, blind, miserable fool. (I am) deformed and insensitive. (I have) fallen from

---

[1] yady api tvaṁ mahāmāyā sṛṣṭirūpā adhomukhī [k, kh: adho-] |
tvaṁ ca māyā virūpākṣī kaśmalī nāma devatā || 108 ||
tvam eva mūrtiracanā bhagamāyāsvarūpiṇī |
tathā māyākrameṇaiva vyāso 'haṁ śaṁkarātmakaḥ || 109 ||
māyayā ca vimūḍho [k: vimūḍo] 'haṁ māyayā vikalaṁ gataḥ | tavotpannaṁ mahājñānaṁ siddhijñahimavangirau [k, kh: siddhijñā-] || 110 ||
tvatto devi samarpyaivaṁ [k, kh: samārpyevaṁ] tvam adya śaraṇaṁ mama | Ibid. 16/108-111ab.

[2] Concerning this way of addressing the goddess as if she were male, see note to KuKh 4/38 and to the Sanskrit texts of KuKh 5/40c and KuKh 3/45b. The goddess possesses all that the god does, including the prestige and status of his gender. But note that although the goddess is the god's equal, she is so because she worshipped the god.

> wisdom. (I have) fallen from (my) austerities and from heaven. (I have) fallen from (my) final goal. O divine mistress of the gods, you are my saviour in (this) profanity (adivyaka). (Your) form is Viṣṇu and the rays (of divine Light). You have created the entire universe. Kaulinī, assume your own (true) nature and reveal reality!"[1] (108-116ab)

Now Kumārikā – the Virgin Goddess – relents, or at least does so to the extent that she withdraws her deluding Māyā and reveals herself to the god as Viṣṇu. Now we begin to learn the truth. The goddess has assumed the form of Viṣṇu because, as his essential nature, she is the power he possesses, as is the case with all the gods and, indeed, all things. Viṣṇu's power is his Vaiṣṇavīśakti, that is, Mahāmāyā. Kumārikā, the goddess in the Liṅga, has assumed this form in order to bind the god:

> Then, after the goddess Kumārikā had heard Vyāsa's words, she hid her Māyā nature from him and assumed (her) Vaiṣṇava form. Viṣṇu held a conch, discus, mace and rosary. Stainless (nirañjana), he wore yellow clothes and, mounted on Garuḍa, he was radiant. Keśava, that is, Janārdhaka, was accompanied by Mahālakṣmī. (He), the god Hari, born from a lotus womb, is the imperishable cause (of all things). Thus, infinite Viṣṇu is Kumārikā who is Māyā and, in order to delude Vyāsa, resides face down in the Liṅga; she appeared (saṁjātā) there on the Island and, (as) Viṣṇu, asked Śaṁkara.[2]

---

[1] saṁpūjanāt tu [k: sapūjanāni; kh: sapūjanmāni] me svāmi [k, kh: bhāyī] saṁjātā [k: sajātāṁ; kh: sejātāṁ] samadharmiṇī [k, kh: samaṁdharmiṇī] ǁ 111 ǁ janmany asmin aṣṭame hi [k, kh: asmin caivāṣṭame janme] ājñā uddīpitā tvayā ǀ ājñādānād mahādevi [k, kh: -dānirmmahādevi] mama jātā kuleśvari ǁ 112 ǁ tapasā kliṣṭadehe tu [k, kh: stu] vikalatvaṁ [k, kh: -tva] samāgatam [k, kh: -ta] ǀ kṣamyatāṁ me [k, kh: mai] kṣamāpāya [k, kh: kṣamāyesi] ājñāsaṁkrāmaṇaṁ kuru ǁ 113 ǁ dīnāndhakṛpaṇo mūrkho [k: mūrkheḥ; kh: mūrkhaḥ] vikalāṅgo [k, kh: -ṅga] hy acetanaḥ ǀ jñānabhraṣṭas [k, kh: -ṣṭaṁ] tapobhraṣṭaḥ [k, kh: tapa- -ṣṭaṁ] svargāc cyutaparāyaṇaḥ [kh: -cyutaṁ-; k, kh: -yaṇaṁ] ǁ 114 ǁ

tvaṁ trātā mama deveśi divya adivyake rūpe [k, kh: rūpake] ǀ tvayā sṛṣṭaṁ jagat sarvaṁ viṣṇurūpā gabhastayaḥ ǁ 115 ǁ svarūpaṁ gṛhṇa tattvaṁ [k, kh: gṛhiyacca tvaṁ] ca prakaṭaṁ kuru kaulini ǀ
YKh (2) 16/111cd-116ab.

[2] vyāsasya vacanaṁ śrutvā tato devī kumārikā ǁ 116 ǁ māyātmā [k, kh: sadhātmā] gopayet tasya vaiṣṇavaṁ rūpam āsthitā ǀ śaṅkhacakragadāpāṇiḥ akṣasūtraṁ nirañjanam ǁ 117 ǁ pītāmbaradharo [k, kh: -raṁ] viṣṇuḥ [k, kh: viṣṇuṁ] tārkṣyārūḍhaḥ [k, kh: tārkṣā- ḍhaṁ] sutejasaḥ [k, kh: -saṁ] ǀ

> The venerable Bhagavat said: "O Rudra, Supreme Lord whose mind has merged into the goddess! What excellent boon do you desire? O Hara, I will explain what liberation is (to you). I am Viṣṇu who is called Endless and bear a conch, discus and mace. O Vyāsa, if there is anything you desire, I will give (it to you,) beyond (all) conception."[1] (116cd-122)

The goddess has withdrawn her Māyā and revealed herself as deity and so a great deal of progress has been made, but the god is still far from his goal. The goddess has not yet revealed herself in her true, most complete nature. She has only revealed the form she has assumed in order to delude the god. She has shown enough of herself for the god also to realise a part of himself as he truly is. Accordingly, she addresses him as Rudra, but even so continues to also call him Vyāsa. So even though he has received a revelation, instead of becoming blissfully enlightened, the god is even more distressed. Now the god's authentic identity comes to the fore at the expense of the false one. So first Śaṁkara speaks and then Vyāsa, but as Vyāsa who knows his true identity and as Śaṁkara who knows he has been deluded. So he understands enough to know that the goddess is still tricking him. He wants his spouse back, the goddess who is hiding from him in the Liṅga and for whom he is suffering the pangs of separation. This is whom he has been seeking and with whom he wishes to converse. He has never forgotten her. She is has always been the focus of his spiritual discipline – a fact the goddess herself acknowledges when she addresses him as one whose 'mind has merged into the goddess'. The god implicitly explains that this is so because he constantly recalls the 'scalpel of divine knowledge', which is the goddess herself within his own body as Kuṇḍalinī and her seed-syllable mantra that embodies her sonic energy.[2]

---

*mahālakṣmīsamāyuktaḥ [k, kh: -ktaṁ] keśavo [k, kh: -vaṁ] * janārdhakaḥ [k, kh: -rakam]*|| 118 ||
padmagarbhodbhavo [k, kh: -vaṁ] devo [k, kh: -vaṁ] hariḥ [k, kh: hari] kāraṇam avyayam |
evaṁ viṣṇur anantātmā māyārūpā kumārikā || 119 ||
*vyāsasya mohanārthāya [k, kh: -nāya ] liṅgasthā cādhomukhī [k, kh: cottarāmukhī] | saṁjātā tatra dvīpānte viṣṇuḥ [k, kh: viṣṇo] pṛcchati [k, kh: pṛchāmi] śaṁkaram [k: -ra] ||
Ibid. 16/116cd-120.

[1] *śrībhagavān uvāca [k: * * * * * *; kh: * * (?)śrībhavān uvāca] bho rudra parameśāna devyāstaṅgatamānasaḥ |
kiṁ varaṁ [k, kh: varā] vañchase [k, kh: vachase] vāraṁ [k, kh: jāraṁ] mokṣaṁ vyākhyāmy ahaṁ hara || 120 ||
ahaṁ viṣṇur anantākhyaḥ [k, kh: – khyaṁ] śaṅkhacakragadādharaḥ [k: -ra; kh: -rī] |
*yat kiñcid icchase [k, kh: -saṁ] vyāsa dadasyāmy atikalpanāt [k: * * dasvāṭikalpata; kh: (?)]* ||
Ibid. 16/121-122.

[2] See note to KuKh 5/35-36.

The venerable Śaṁkara said: "I am disfigured, distraught and foolish, and am not one whom you should have relations with (agamya) and (so) I do not ask you anything. And I do not ever want knowledge of the Command from you. Nonetheless, even though I have become distraught (vikala) in the Middle Country, I have come recalling to mind that scalpel of divine knowledge. The goddess Umā is my wife who, due to Māyā I have not know. . . . (?) Recollecting you I have come, O great lady, greedy for knowledge. There is not the slightest thing you need do for me here. My previous wife is present within the Liṅga. Concealing (herself) she has become Bhagavat (i.e. Viṣṇu) and it is she who should speak to me."[1] (123-127)

The venerable Bhagavat said: "O Śambhu! Supreme Void! (You) whose mind is centred on the goddess! The goddess in the form of Kumārī was born on Himavat's mountain. She gave this Liṅga which is reality and the supreme cause (of all things). And I am the authority there. I, Kumārikā, am a limb of that (Liṅga). Thus, (I) abide as the bliss of my own experience of the Void. O Vyāsa whom do you contemplate having performed painful austerities?"[2] (128-130)

The goddess is ready to concede that the god is right. She admits that she is in reality the Virgin born to Himavat in the Western House and so is the goddess he lost in a previous life and is now hiding from him in the Liṅga. But she has not yet finished testing him. She asks him here whether it is really her that he contemplates, to which he responds further ahead that there is no other Vidyā except her. She will

---

[1] śrīśaṁkara uvāca
yady apy ahaṁ [k: yadyapahaṁ] ca vikalo [k, kh: vikalaṁ] vihvalo [k: -lā] dhīvivarjitaḥ |
tathāpi te agamyo 'haṁ [k, kh: agamyāhaṁ] na te pṛcchāmi kiñcana [k, kh: kahi] || 123 ||
tvan nāhaṁ [k, kh: + na] ca icchāmi ājñājñānaṁ kadācana [k: -naḥ] | [kh: (?)]
yady apy ahaṁ ca vikalaḥ saṁjāto madhyadeśataḥ || 124 ||
divyajñānaśalākāṁ tāṁ [k, kh: -kāyā] smṛtvā cāhaṁ samāgataḥ [k, kh: smṛtvāhamāgataḥ] | *māyājñātā umā devī mama bhāryāha [k: bhāryaha; kh: (?)] * * * [kh: (?)]* || 125 ||
tava [kh: (?)] smṛtvā mahābhāga āgato jñānalampaṭaḥ |
yuṣmābhir na ca me kāryaḥ [k, kh: kāryaṁ] svalpo 'pi iha vidyate || 126 ||
madīyā pūrvikā bhāryā liṅgānte samupasthitā |
*āstāṅgakṛtasaṁjātā [k, kh: -sākṛtra-] bhagavān [kh: bhaga * n] sā bravīti [k, kh: -hi] mām* ||
YKh (2) 16/123-127.

[2] śrībhagavān uvāca
śambho [k, kh: śaṁmo] bho paramākāśa devyāstaṅgatacetasaḥ |
*kumārīrūpiṇī [k: kumārarū * ṇī; kh: kumārī * * (?)] devī saṁjātā himavadgirau || 128 ||
tayā liṅgam idaṁ dattaṁ tat tattvaṁ kāraṇaṁ param | tatrādhikāriṇī cāhaṁ [k, kh: haṁ ca] tadaṅgāhaṁ kumārikā || 129 ||
ataḥ svānubhavānandā saṁsthitā gaganasya [k, kh: gagatasya] tu |
*kāṁ tu tvaṁ dhyāyase [k, kh: kā * tvamārāse?] vyāsa kṛtvā kaṣṭottarāyaṇam* || Ibid. 16/128-130.

go on labouring him with the same question put in different ways: "O Rudra," she will ask later, "tell me the truth. Why have you taken refuge in me?"[1] Again: "Why do you contemplate me? Why am I being praised (in this way)?"[2] As in the version in the KuKh, the god locates the goddess he seeks by the sound of her voice.[3] He knows she is there and is prepared to do anything to prove how much he loves her, even to the extent of immolating himself in the fire of his own austerity and Yoga:

> The venerable Vyāsa said: "I heard the voice of Umā before in this Liṅga. She reposes in my heart and (so) today I have come to take refuge (in her). If that slender (beautiful) woman were not to exist then what purpose (could there be) in life?"
>
> Thus, Vyāsa, greatly pained, committed an astonishing suicide (kāla). Having kindled the Fire of Time and having recollected the energy of Vaiṣṇavī, he was burnt by the fire of divine Yoga (and so) there was no Vyāsa and no Śaṁkara and, O Maheśvara, Nature was burnt to ashes by Māyā.[4] (131-134ab)

We have observed several reversals in this version of the myth with respect to the ones we have examined before. The 'heterodox' god Śaṅkara becomes the 'orthodox' mortal Vyāsa. The Śaiva goddess becomes the god Viṣṇu. The smārta Viṣṇu becomes Kaula and is represented by a Yoni. All these reversals depend on one, namely, the Śaiva goddess who is the liberating energy of the Command becomes Vaiṣṇavīśakti, the binding energy of Mahāmāyā and Prakṛti. It is this reversal that reverses truth to falsity and the authentic liberated nature of deity to the illusory fettered one. But these reversals must be brought to an end. The matter must be set straight by another reversal, namely, the god's self-immolation. In the 'forward', original version, the goddess recollects her own nature as Aghoreśvarī who, as the consort of her future partner Aghora, is a more authentic form of herself. Here the god contemplates the goddess who is in an illusory form. In the first version the goddess is alone. In this one, both the god

---

[1] Ibid. 16/140.
[2] Ibid. 16/147.
[3] See above, p. 142 with reference to KuKh 3/162-164ab.
[4] śrīvyāsa uvāca
asmin liṅge purā vāṇī umāyāḥ [k, kh: -yā] saṁśrutā mayā |
viśrāntā [k, kh: visrāntā] hṛdaye me 'dya tasyāhaṁ śaraṇaṁ gataḥ || 131 ||
yadi nāsti ca tanvaṅgī [k, kh: tanūgī] jīvane [k, kh: jīvite] kiṁ prayojanam |
evaṁ duḥkhāturo vyāsaḥ kurute kālam adbhutam || 132 ||
*kālāgniṁ [k, kh: -gni] ca samuddīpya smṛtvā vai vaiṣaṇavīṁ [k: -vī; kh: -vī] kalām [k, kh: -l*ā] |
divyayogāgninā dagdho [k: dagdhā; kh: dāgdhā] na vyāso na ca śaṁkaraḥ || 133 ||
prakṛtir bhasmasānītā [k, kh: prakṛtiṁ-; k, kh: -bhaśma- -ta] māyayā ca maheśvara |
YKh (2) 16/131-134ab.

and the goddess are consumed by their own innate fire, the former in that of Yoga and the latter, Māyā.

The goddess realises that she has pushed the god too far. After all, she has deluded him, however much she may try to explain to him that his state is an illusory one and it is his ignorance of his true nature that is at the root of his troubles. One wonders how much she has been tormenting him out of spite – as vengeance for her own mistaken feeling that the god does not really care for her. Whatever be the real reasons, she repents and brings him back to life. The goddess's immolation was the door to her final rebirth in which she is destined to receive the full empowerment through which she assumes her most authentic and essential nature. In the same way the god is brought back to life in his original form now ready to be completely divested of the Māyā that envelops him and see the goddess who may accordingly reveal herself fully so that she can give and he can receive her empowering grace. But first he must understand that just as his form as Vyāsa does not really conceal him, so too her form as Viṣṇu and his energy are not really distinct from the one he is seeking. He must worship her also as Viṣṇu:

> Then Viṣṇu, the supreme Yoni, was sad. (He / she thought): "I have fallen from (my) austerities (and so) Bhairava has disappeared into the earth." Then when that goddess, who is the divine energy of nectar that rains down specks (of nectar) onto Himavat, meditated there, a drop of this nectar, which is the supreme energy, fell that very moment from the sky onto the earth. O Hara, thus the god who is Bhairava appeared (saṁbhavita). He is Śrīkaṇṭha, that is, Rudra, Maheśvara with one face. Viṣṇu, the Kaula immersed in Yoga looked (at the god who stood) in front (of him).[1] (134cd-138ab)
>
> The venerable Bhagavat said: "O Śrīkaṇṭha! Great Rudra! You have come into being due to (this) drop of nectar. I am Kumārikā, Viṣṇu's supreme energy, (the awakened Kuṇḍalinī whose form is like) a straight line. O foolish one, you previously committed suicide due to

---

[1] evaṁ viṣṇuḥ [k, kh: viṣṇu] parā yoniḥ śokam ācarate tadā ॥ 134 ॥ *tapobhraṁśaś [k, kh: tapabhraṁśaṁ] ca me jāto [k, kh: -taṁ] bhairavo 'staṅgataḥ [k: -taṁ; kh: bhai * vostaṁgataḥ] kṣitau* । yā sā divyāmṛtakalā himavatkaṇavarṣiṇī ॥ 135 ॥ dhyātvā devī tatas tatra antarikṣāc [k, kh: antarī-] ca bhūtale । tatkṣaṇāt patito bindur āmṛteyā [k, kh: āmṛteyaḥ] parā kalā [k, kh: -kalāt] ॥ 136 ॥ tasmāt saṁbhavito devaḥ [k, kh: deva] sa [k, kh: mā] ca yo [k, kh: yā] bhairavo hara । śrīkaṇṭho bhavate rudra ekavaktro [k, kh: – vaktraṁ] maheśvaraḥ [k, kh: -ra] ॥ 137 ॥ *paśyate purato viṣṇuḥ yogāvasthitas tu [k, kh: -sthita ] kaulikaḥ [k, kh: - kaṁ] । Ibid. 16/134cd-138ab.

> (your) mistaken knowledge. You did not see (that) great body (mahāpiṇḍa) in the form of a Liṅga. I, Hari's energy, Mahālakṣmī, abide in your body. O Rudra, tell me the truth. Why have you taken refuge in me?"[1] (138cd-141ab)
>
> Śrīkaṇṭha said: "I have fallen due to (my) pride (ahaṁbuddhi) and due to the fall of (my) intellect, I have been destroyed. O (goddess) worshipped by the gods, due to Māyā, I do not know your (true) nature (rūpa). O Supreme Goddess, have mercy. O goddess, you are my refuge. O fair lady, I praise your Viṣṇu nature with great devotion."[2] (141cd-143ab)

Next comes Śrīkaṇṭha's hymn which is in a prose metre (daṇḍaka), like the Mālinīstava with which Bhairava praises the goddess in the Liṅga. The goddess is praised in this hymn as Viṣṇu and other deities, many of which are mentioned in the original Mālinīstava. In the last line she is addressed as Kāmeśvarī, supreme Ciñciṇī, wish-granting gem, supreme Kaulinī, Khageśvarī of the Command. Then the god says:

> "Victory! Victory (to you who are) in the middle of the Liṅga of the Void (khaliṅga), invisible, (you who are) Light and (whose) form is the Supreme Void (ākāśa), worshipped with great devotion. I have come (to take) refuge (in you) O mistress (svāminī), have mercy on me."[3]

---

[1] śrībhagavān uvāca
bho [k, kh: mā] śrīkaṇṭha mahārudra jātas tv [k, kh: tvā] amṛtabindunā ‖ 138 ‖
ahaṁ viṣṇoḥ parāśaktiḥ ṛjurekhā kumārikā | bhrāntijñānāt tvayā pūrve kṛtaṁ kālam abuddhimān ‖ 139 ‖
liṅgarūpaṁ mahāpiṇḍaṁ tvayā naivopalakṣitam | mahālakṣmī hareḥ śaktis [k, kh: śakti] tiṣṭhāmi tvaccharīragā ‖ 140 ‖ sadbhāvaṁ brūhi māṁ rudra kim arthaṁ śaraṇaṁ mama ‖ Ibid. 16/138cd-141ab.

[2] *śrīkaṇṭha [k: * * ] uvāca ahaṁbuddhyā paribhraṣṭaḥ matibhraṁśāt [k, kh: -sāt] kṣayaṁ gataḥ ‖ 141 ‖ *tvadīyaṁ māyayā rūpaṁ na me jñānaṁ [k, kh: jñāṁ ] surārcite | kṣamyatāṁ parameśāni [k, kh: -śvari] tvaṁ [k, kh: -tvāṁ] devi śaraṇaṁ mama *[k: mamaḥ; kh: * maḥ]* ‖ 142 ‖
stunomy [k, kh: stutomy] ahaṁ mahābhaktyā viṣṇutvaṁ [k, kh: viṣṇutve] tava [k, kh: nava] sundari | Ibid. 16/141cd-143ab.

[3] khaliṅgamadhyasaṁsthitām adṛṣṭavigrahāṁ jyotirūpāṁ parākāśamūrtikāṁ mahābhaktyārcitāṁ śaraṇāgato 'smi jaya jayānukampasva māṁ svāmini ‖ Note that the concluding phrase echoes the one (i.e. kṣamasvāparādhaṁ) that occurs at the end of the Mālinīstava.

The text continues:

> The purified soul who, pure, recites this in front of the Kramaliṅga is free from all sins and attains Rudra's world. It was uttered by Śrīkaṇṭha and, secret, it should not be told to (just) anybody. It should be given to a true devotee, (and) never to one who is averse (to the goddess). She who offers Śaṁkara a boon, the faultless energy of Viṣṇu, worshipped by (this) hymn, spoke (the following) words free of fear.
>
> The mistress of the sacred seats said: "O Rudra, born from nectar! Fire born from the Middle Country! Vyāsa! Śaṁkara! Śrīkaṇṭha! Why do you contemplate me? Why am I praised (in this way)? Tell me the cause (of this) as it really is!" (143cd-147)
>
> Śrīkaṇṭha said: "Having abandoned this Vaiṣṇavī Māyā, reveal (your) essential nature (svarūpa). Tell me the Kula liturgy (krama) and (give me) the Kaulika consecration. O mistress of the gods, you are my saviour. There is no other (true) Vidyā at all. (I am) devoid of the Command and have fallen from (my) austerities. O mistress of the gods, tell (me) the knowledge (that will liberate me)." [1] (148-9)

Now, finally, the goddess acknowledges the purity of the god's intentions. She relents and, giving up her Māyā, the true identity of both the god and the goddess is restored. As in the version in the KuKh, she is the young Bhadrakālī. He is Śaṁkara as the androgynous Ardhanarīśvara with five faces. In the Kubjikā Tantras, the god is commonly represented as a form of the five-faced Svacchandabhairava who is the equivalent of the Sadāśiva of the Siddhāntāgamas.

---

[1] yaḥ paṭhet śuddhaśaucātmā [k, kh: suddhasāvātmā] kramaliṅgāgrataḥ śuciḥ [k, kh: su-] ll 143 ll sa muktaḥ sarvapāpebhyo rudralokaṁ sa gacchati l śrīkaṇṭhabhāṣitaṁ guhyaṁ nākhyeyaṁ yasya [k, kh: missing] kasyacit [k, kh: yasya cit] ll 144 ll sadbhaktāya [k: sadbhuktasya; kh: sadbhaktasya] pradātavyaṁ vidviṣṭaṁ [k, kh: vidviṣṭa] na kadācana [k, kh: – naḥ] l stotreṇārādhitā [k: stotraṇārodhitā; kh: -rodhitā] tuṣṭā viṣṇuśaktir anāmayā ll 145 ll *vadate tv abhayaṁ vākyaṁ [k: vākya] śaṁkarasya [kh: śaṁka * sya] varapradā* l pīṭheśvarī uvāca bho rudrāmṛtasaṁbhūta madhyadeśodbhavānala ll 146 ll vyāsa śaṁkara śrīkaṇṭha kim arthaṁ dhyāyase hi māṁ [k, kh: mama] l stutāsmi [k, kh: stuto.asi] tat kim arthaṁ māṁ kāraṇaṁ brūhi tattvataḥ ll 147 ll śrīkaṇṭha uvāca māyāṁ ca [k, kh: māyeyaṁ] vaiṣṇavīṁ [k, kh: -vī] tyaktvā svarūpaṁ [k, kh: -pa] prakaṭaṁ kuru l kulakramaṁ [k, kh: -ma] ca me brūhi abhiṣekaṁ ca kaulikam ll 148 ll tvaṁ trātrī [k, kh: -nā] mama deveśi nānyā vidyā hi [k, kh: ni] karhicit [k, kh: karhacit] l ājñāhīno tapobhraṣṭo [k, kh: tapa-] brūhi jñānaṁ sureśvari ll Ibid. 16/143cd-149.

However, he is very rarely, if ever, represented as Ardhanarīśvara. The intention behind doing so here is, presumably, to stress that although the goddess controls Māyā and can delude even the god, in reality she originates from him. Notice also that the god is the divine prototype of the earthly Siddha – the fully accomplished adept who has achieved – siddha – the goal. The teachings are the 'oral tradition of the Yoginīs' that is on the lips of the goddess.[1] Even so, they are propagated in the world through lineages of Siddhas. Although they are all earthly representatives of the god, the First Siddha – Ādisiddha – is identified with the god most directly. The god is the First Siddha and the First Siddha is the god. The interface between these two conditions is the vision of the goddess accompanied by the realisation that union has taken place with her:

> Having heard the God of the god's words and, auspicious, established in the state of Yoga, she abandoned (her) Vaiṣṇavī Māyā and she became Bhadrakālikā, the goddess who is Dakṣa's daughter, in order to delude Śrīkaṇṭha. (150-151ab)
>
> Bhadrakālī said: "I am Dakṣa's daughter, born as Bhadrakālikā. O Vyāsa, Śrīkaṇṭha! Śaṁkara! (I am) beautiful and have big eyes. A great, divine and supreme Command was born on Himavat's mountain. Dakṣa's daughter, who desired you, in (her) eighth birth, abandoning Māyā, (her) true nature was revealed. O Śaṁkara, you also displayed this, one of your forms. Thus, O lord Śaṁkara, I wish to see you, Śaṁkara. O Lord, you have appeared (before) in this way by the power of supreme knowledge. (You are) he, the Siddha who has been pierced (by the power of the Command) and, made of universal bliss, is accompanied by Yogeśvarī. He is Śaṁkara's lord; supreme, he has five faces, three eyes, holds a spear and, adorned with matted hair and crown, (his) divine body is covered with ashes. He is the pervasive lord Ardhanarīśvara. (151cd-157ab)
>
> Beautiful he is, stainless as pure crystal. (He is) the Lord (īśvara), supreme Śambhu, who bears a divine form and is auspicious. O Mahādeva, the three-eyed one, who, self-generated, is such as was repeatedly praised with greatly divine and mental hymns."[2]

---

[1] See below, ibid. 16/182ab.

[2] devadevasya ca girāṁ śrutvā yogāvasthasthitā [k, kh: yogāvasthaṁ] śubhā [k, kh: śubhāṁ] |
tyaktvā tu vaiṣṇavīṁ [k: -vo] māyāṁ jātā sā bhadrakālikā || 150 ||
dakṣasya duhitā devī śrīkaṇṭhasya vimohanāt | bhadrakāly uvāca
dakṣasya duhitā cāhaṁ utpannā bhadrakālikā || 151 ||
surūpā ca viśālākṣī [k: viśākṣī; kh: viśākṣīṁ] vyāsa śrīkaṇṭha śaṁkara [k, kh: śekhara] |
mahādivyā parā ājñā saṁjātā himavadgirau [k: -vangirau; kh: -vaṅgirau] || 152 ||

The venerable Bhadrakālī said: "O Śambhu! Supreme Lord! Destroyer of the universe! Why are you pained, O Lord? (There is no need for it), the Lord's accomplishment is complete. There is no other (truly) knowledgeable being apart from you amongst the wise in the triple world. Why do you worship me, delighting (as it were) in the darkness of ignorance? That is an unparalleled wonder. Get up and have mercy on me!"[1] (157cd-161)

The Lord said: "Today, I am one who has done auspicious work. Today I am Śaṁkara and Śiva. I have seen a divine energy: Dakṣa's daughter, in (her) youth. I have become distraught and mad by that second very powerful curse. Thus, today, I have seen you; (so, I have become) a great Siddha. (I have) experienced you as (my) wife for seven births, age after age. (162-164ab)

(Coming from) Himavat's house you were married (to me) for seven rebirths. In the first (birth your) name (was) Subhagā and Kāladūtī in the second birth. You (were) Revatī in the third and Mokṣalakṣmī in the fourth. You (were) Durga in the fifth birth and Jayeśvarī in the sixth. In the previous birth – the seventh – you (were) Umā, my favourite. You became my wife on Himavat's mountain. Countless daughters of Dakṣa were married off. It is (only) you who tvadarthī [k, kh: tvadarthi] cāṣṭame [k, kh: -mo] janme [k, kh: janma] dakṣasya duhitābhavat |

---

māyāṁ tyaktvā [k, kh: tyajya] svarūpaṁ tu tattvataḥ prakṛṭīkṛtam || 153 ||
tvayāpy ātmīyaikaṁ rūpaṁ śaṁkara tv idaṁ [kh: tvadaṁ] nidarśitaṁ | [This and the following two lines are missing in MS K]
tatas tvāṁ draṣṭum icchāmi [kh: draṣṭami-] śaṁkaraṁ nātha śaṁkara [śaṁkaraṁ] || 154 ||
evaṁ nātha tvam āpannaḥ [kh: -nnaṁ] parajñānaprabhāvataḥ [kh: prā-] | sarvānandamayo viddhaḥ [k, kh: viddhi na] siddho yogeśvarīyutaḥ [k, kh: -saha] || 155 ||
bhavate śaṁkarasyeśo [k, kh: -syāsī] vaktrapañcadharaḥ paraḥ |
trinetraḥ [k: -trā; kh: -traṁ] śūladhārī ca jaṭāmukuṭamaṇḍitaḥ [k, kh: -te] || 156 ||
bhasmoddhūlitadivyāṅgaḥ [k, kh: -ṅga] ardhanārīśvaro [k, kh: -raṁ] vibhuḥ [k, kh: vibhum] |
śobhāḍhyaḥ [k, kh: -ḍhyaṁ] sundaro [k, kh: -raṁ] hy ekaḥ [k, kh: dekaṁ] śuddhasphaṭikanirmalaḥ [k, kh: -lam] || 157 ||
īśvaraḥ [k, kh: -raṁ] paramaḥ [k, kh: -maṁ] śambhur divyarūpadharaḥ [k, kh: śambhuṁ divyarūpadharaṁ] śubhaḥ [k, kh: -bham] |
evaṁvidhaḥ [k, kh: -vise] mahādeva svayaṁbhūtaḥ [k, kh: -naṁ] trilocanaḥ [k, kh: -nam] || 158 ||
stutaḥ [k, kh: stuti] stotrair mahādivyair mānasaiś ca muhurmuhuḥ | Ibid. 16/151cd-159ab.

[1] *śrībhadrakāly uvāca [k: śrī * * * * vāca (?)]* bho śambho parameśāna jagatsaṁhārakāraka || 159 ||
*kim arthaṁ kliśyase [k: kliṇyase] nātha sarvā siddhir yataḥ [k: siddhi yata; kh: si * yata] prabhoḥ [kh: prabho]* |
tvadṛte [kh: nvadṛte] jñāninām vidvān trailokye 'nyo na vidyate || 160 ||
ārādhyatāṁ kim arthaṁ māṁ ajñānatamamoditaḥ |
āścaryam etad atulaṁ [k: -menada-] uttiṣṭhasva kṣamasva mām || Ibid. 16/159cd-161.

was born over the course of the repeated round of the Ages."[1] (164cd-168ab)

No version of the myth can omit an account of the union of the god with the goddess. There are two modalities, both of which we have already noted are found in the versions synthesized in the KMT. In one modality, the couple do not marry; in the other they do. In most cases, as in this instance, the hierogamy is presented in the Kubjikā Tantras as a 'legitimate' marriage, echoing the one between Śiva and Pārvatī described in the Purāṇas. There is no transgression of basic Brahminical norms. Indeed, it is understood in the most 'orthodox' way possible of repaying the debt incurred towards one's forebears who by their union maintained the propagation of the family lineage. But in this case it is the god and the goddess who repeatedly through seven rebirths marry until finally in this, the eighth one, the debt is extinguished. In other versions we have seen that in previous lives the goddess is the goddess of a series of traditions. We are not told there that she unites with the god in those lives. Conversely, the identity of the goddess in previous births in this version does not agree with the others. But although she is not presented her as the goddess of earlier, lower traditions, if we are justified in linking the two versions, the implication is that the origins of those traditions were also attended by a hierogamy as this one is. Uniting in marriage in the previous lives they enjoyed the bliss of the highest state taught in the tradition in that life through their union. Now in the last one, there is no need of further union in the world of rebirth. The god attains Nirvāṇa, the extinction of transmigratory existence. The purpose of the hierogamy described at the beginning of the KRU (which is also a marriage) is to generate the universe – a cosmologonic concept that pre-dates the development of the Tantras. In that case union takes place prior to the existence of the cosmic order and hence is outside it.

---

[1] *īśvara uvāca [kh: uvā ] adyāhaṁ [k, kh: adyahaṁ] puṇyakarmaṇaḥ adyāhaṁ [k, kh: adyahaṁ] śaṁkaraḥ śivaḥ ǀ divyā śaktir mayā dṛṣṭā dakṣaputrīti yauvane ǁ 162 ǁ dvitīyenātiśāpena vikalonmattatāṁ gataḥ ǀ tasmād adya [k: tasyādadya] mahāsiddhaḥ yaj jātaṁ tava darśanam ǁ 163 ǁ saptajanmani bhāryā tvaṁ anubhūtā yuge yuge ǀ himavato [k, kh: -nta] gṛhāt [k, kh: gṛhā] tvaṁ hi saptajanmavivāhitā ǁ 164 ǁ prathame subhagā [k, kh: śubhagā] nāma kāladūtī dvijanmani ǀ revatī tvaṁ tṛtīye tu mokṣalakṣmī caturthake ǁ 165 ǁ durgā tvaṁ pañcame janme ṣaṣṭhe caiva [kh: ṣaṣṭhaścaiva] jayeśvarī ǀ *umā tvaṁ saptame janme mameṣṭā pūrvajanmani [kh: pūrvvana * ni]* ǁ 166 ǁ himavato [k: himvanta; kh: himavante] girau jātā tvaṁ ca bhāryā madīyakā ǀ dakṣakanyā [k: dakṣakaṁnyā] anyānekāḥ [k: nyakāmāni; kh: nyekāni] asaṁkhyātā vivāhitāḥ [k, kh: -tā] ǁ 167 ǁ yugānāṁ punarāvṛtir jātāsi [k, kh: -tijātāsi] ca [k: va] tvam eva hi ǀ Ibid. 16/162-168ab.

It is a transcendental union that does not take place in the world of transmigratory existence. These unions, however, are not like that. They do not mark the beginning of the cosmic order, but rather the stages that lead to its end. The god and the goddess are portrayed as the deities of love and passion. One would expect their union, like their love and their very nature, to be divine. Indeed, when it takes place in the world, each instance nevertheless exemplifies somehow the false enjoyment created by Māyā. But it is nonetheless necessary for the spiritual development that ultimately leads beyond Māyā. So having come to the end of the series of unions, Bhairava is finally fit to receive the goddess's empowering Command and with it the transmission of the teaching. This is the ultimate accomplishment (siddhi), greater even than the attainment of Nirvāṇa.

> Once the Lord of the gods, the Lord of the Lord of Passion had spoken thus, he desired union with the goddess by the power of the divine Command. Maheśvarī enjoyed the sport of love and, in (her) eighth birth she enjoyed their mutual passion. (The god said:) "Today be Bhadrakālī. (It is) I, Śaṁkara who has come. Mutually we play up to the end of the cosmic age. (We are) mutually Rati and Kāma (for one another)."
>
> Thus (the goddess) was delighted in Śaṁkara and full of the bliss of (love) games. The goddess who bestows boons (to all) and to Śaṁkara, spoke: "In (this my) eighth birth having enjoyed pleasure (bhoga), with me, this is the debt that remains. We have mutually enjoyed the false object of enjoyment as it is (in the world and created) by Māyā. In this, the eighth age of Māyā, there is no return anymore." When the Lord, full of bliss, heard, the goddess's words, he said: "O Mother of Kula, with you I am one whose suffering has been burnt away. I am Śrīkaṇṭha who is free of debt. My world of transmigration has been destroyed. So what wonder is it if (I have attained) Nirvāṇa, the supreme state. I am detached in every way (and so) reveal (your) divine knowledge!"[1] (168cd-176)

---

[1] *evam uktvā [kh: evamuktā] * deveśaḥ [k, kh: -śa] kāmarājeśvareśvaraḥ [k, kh: -reśvara]* ‖ 168 ‖
divyājñāyāḥ [k, kh: -yā] prabhāvena devyā saṁgamam icchati | kāmakrīḍāvinodena upabhuktvā maheśvarī ‖ 169 ‖
bhuktvā caivāṣṭame [k, kh: -ma] janme divyaṁ kāmaṁ parasparam | bhadrakālī bhavādya tvaṁ śaṁkaro 'haṁ samāgataḥ ‖ 170 ‖
krīḍāmau [k, kh: -mo] yugaparyantaṁ ratikāmau [k: -maṁ; kh: -kāmaṁ] parasparam | *evaṁ sā śaṁkare [kh: śaṁ * re] hṛṣṭā krīḍanānandanirbharā [k, kh: krīḍitā-]* ‖ 171 ‖ vadate varadā devī śaṁkarasya varapradā | bhavate cāṣṭame janme bhuktvā bhogaṁ mayā saha ‖ 172 ‖
idaṁ ṛṇaṁ [k, kh: riṇo] ca śeṣo 'yaṁ vidyamānaṁ yathāsthitaṁ [k: yarbha-; kh: nvayarbhasthitaṁ] |

When the goddess first revealed herself as Bhadrakālī and, as a consequence, the god resumed his original identity, the goddess hastened to reiterate that the god need not receive the Command from her. Instead of worshipping her, the goddess pleads: "Get up and have mercy on me!"[1] Here again she declares her true identity within the Liṅga and so she initiates the dialogue we are already familiar with in the other versions we have examined.

> After the goddess Bhadrakālī heard this, that is, Śambhu's speech, the virgin (goddess) also came in the form of a divine virgin (kumārī) and freely uttered with all (her deepest) feelings (these) divine words.[2] (177-178ab)
>
> The venerable Kumārī said: "I am Khageśvarī, the virgin who observes a vow of chastity. I am the leader within the tradition (anvya) and the Cave is the Liṅga which is my hermitage. You are Bhairava, the pervasive Lord whose cardinal characteristic is supreme bliss, directly apparent. Accomplishment is achieved in a special way by the transmission that takes place from master to disciple. You are my Lord, so how can you relate (to me as my) disciple? O Mahādeva, you are omniscient; how can you (assume the role of a) disciple? Bearing this in mind, tell me what would be best, and free of fear."[3] (178cd-181)

---

kṛtrimaṁ [k: kṛtimaṁ] māyayā bhogyaṁ bhuktaṁ tac ca parasparam || 173 ||
punarāvartanaṁ nāsti asmin māyāyugāṣṭame |
devyāgirām imāṁ śrūtvā īśvaro 'śokapūritaḥ || 174 ||
vadate śokadagdhas tu tvayā sārdhaṁ [k, kh: tvayārddhaṁ] kulāmbike |
śrīkaṇṭho 'haṁ [k, kh: -kaṇṭhāhaṁ] gata – ṛṇaḥ [k, kh: -riṇaṁ] saṁsārasya kṣayaṁ mama || 175 ||
bhavatīti kim āścaryaṁ nirvāṇaṁ paramaṁ padam |
virakto 'haṁ sarvabhāvena divyaṁ jñānaṁ prakāśayet || Ibid. 16/168cd-176.

[1] Ibid. 16/160ab. See above, p. 183.

[2] śambhor vākyam idaṁ [k, kh: śaṁbho] śrutvā devī sā bhadrakālikā |
divyakaumārīrūpeṇa [k, kh: -kaumārarūpeṇa] kumāry api [k: kumāryāśīm; kh: kumāryyaśīm] upāgatā || 177 ||
bruvate sarvabhāvena divyāṁ [k, kh: divyā] vāṇīṁ [k, kh: vāṇī] svatantrataḥ [k, kh: -tā] | Ibid. 16/177-178ab.

[3] śrīkumāry uvāca [kh: -kumāyyuvāca]
ahaṁ khageśvarī nāma kumārī brahmacāriṇī || 178 ||
anvaye nāyikāhaṁ [k, kh: nāyakāhaṁ] sā mama liṅgāśramaṁ guhā |
tvaṁ bhairavo [k, kh: -va] vibhuḥ sākṣāt paramānandalakṣaṇaḥ || 179 ||
guruśiṣyakramāt siddhir [k, kh: siddhi] viśeṣād upalabhyate |
evaṁ te śiṣyasaṁbandhaṁ kathaṁ [k, kh: katha] me tvaṁ prabhur yataḥ || 180 ||
sarvajño 'si mahādeva kathaṁ śiṣyas tvam arhasi [k, kh: śiṣya-] |
evaṁ buddhvā [k, kh: baddhā] mama brūhi yathā śreyo 'bhayo bhavet || Ibid. 16/178cd-181.

The Lord said: "The oral tradition (mukhāmnāya) of the Yoginīs that is hard to acquire is on your lips. I here  (?).[1] Devoid of the Command, I am powerless. You are (my) teacher and my refuge. If you considered (yourself) to be my wife and if there was ever any love (for me) in the past then, O Great Goddess! you should impart (this) auspicious initiation to me. Just as you were previously (my) wife, I was previously (as passionate towards you as would be) the god of love (pūrvamanmatha).[2] The debt between us has been cleared; (neither of) us has (any debt towards the other) by any reckoning."[3] (182-185ab)

The venerable Khageśī said: "Occasionally, a husband can be a disciple, (but) that the lord (should) be (one's spiritual) son is contrary (to all the rules). O god, you previously enjoyed all (marital) pleasure (upabhoga). (You) yourself have referred to the affection we have (for each other because of our) friendship. O Bhairava, by (doing things) in reverse, the Command is destroyed; how can it flower? O Vīrendra, this is improper, but nonetheless I will tell (you) how Yoginīs and Siddhas behave – (a teaching) that is never easy to acquire. (As if) replete with one hundred blades, the Vidyā and the Kula liturgy (krama) are (dangerous). There is no success (siddhi) in the Kula liturgy without the (ritual) drinking of liquor (vīrapāna), the sacrificial substances (kuladīpa), along with (various kinds of) meat and the (eating of the remains of) sacrificial food (ucchiṣṭacaruka). Worship is offered (by means of these things) to the oral scripture (that the god and goddess transmit) to one another. (The latter) is the arising of the transmission of the Command and the essential meaning of scripture, which is (the teaching concerning) the group of six (parts that constitute the liturgy). It is very tough and frightening (raudra) with its (secret) terminology, conventions and rituals. Tranquil, forbearing, free of anger, the eater of food, a beggar of food and conqueror of the

---

[1] This line is too corrupt for me to emend.
[2] The same expression occurs in the KuKh 5/8.
[3] īśvara uvāca
yoginīnāṁ mukhāmnāyaṁ [k, kh: +su] durlabhaṁ tvanmukhe sthitam |
*tvasthakā sādbhaveśmā kanacā * sya [kh: kanakasthāsya(?)] bhavediha [k, kh: – haṁ] (?)* || 182 ||
ājñāhīno hy aśakto 'haṁ [k, kh: -hīnamaśakto] tvaṁ guruḥ [k, kh: guru] śaraṇaṁ mama |
yadi manyasi me [k, kh: manyāma de] bhāryā pūrvasneham asīt kvacit [k: -snehadasāt kvat; kh: -snehadasāt kvacit] || 183 ||
tadā śubhāṁ [k, kh: namāṁ] mahādevi dīkṣāṁ [k, kh: dīkṣā] māṁ kartum arhasi |
purāsīs [k, kh: purāsī] tvaṁ yat me bhāryā [k, kh: tvamerbhā] asmy ahaṁ [k, kh: āsyaṁ] pūrvamanmathaḥ [k, kh: – manmathaṁ] || 184 ||
ṛṇaṁ parasparaṁ śuddhaṁ [k, kh: suddhaṁ] nāvayor vidyate kvacit | Ibid. 16/182-185ab.

> senses – as long as one is not like this, how can one (achieve) accomplishment in the Kula?"[1] (185cd-192ab)

Note that the goddess stresses that the essential core of Kaula practice is the offering and consumption of the Kaula sacrificial substances: liquor, meat and the like. Although the goddess introduces this topic by saying that she will explain how Siddhas and Yoginīs behave together, she does not refer to their union. The union of the god, who is the First Siddha and the goddess Yogeśvarī, the supreme Yoginī, is evidently a divine model, but this connection is not made. Instead, the worship of the teachings requires that Siddhas and Yoginīs eat together. Although a possible euphemism for sex, this is passed over in silence. It is how correctly the adept eats the food offered to him by the Yoginī, rather than as a 'conqueror of the senses' how he engages in ritual union with her that is presented as the measure of accomplishment.

Again, before the goddess imparts her empowerment, she expects the god to fulfil the basic requirement demanded of anybody who takes initiation. First of all he must be perfectly moral in the normally accepted sense of the term. He must also give up all outer signs of his previous condition. Concealing one's spiritual identity is basic to Kaula practice.[2] In addition, the goddess wants the god to reform. In order to be a Kaula, he must give up his conventional, public identity in which he is portrayed sitting on a bull with the Ganges flowing from his hair and the rest. He must also renounce the lifestyle of the wandering, transgressive ascetic – the Kāpālika and the Avadhūta. He must even give up worshipping the

---

[1] śrīkhageśy uvāca
patiḥ śiṣyaḥ [k, kh: patiśiṣyaṁ] kuto 'py asti prabhuḥ putraḥ [k, kh: prabhu putraṁ] viruddhavān ‖ 185 ‖ pūrvaṁ deva tvayā sarvam upabhogaṁ tu bhuktavān [k: sarvan upabhon upabhuktavān; kh: sarvvān upabhon upabhuktavān] ǀ asmākaṁ maitrikāhlādaṁ svayaṁ [k, kh: svayā] pūrvaṁ ca [k, kh: pūrveva] sūcitam ‖ 186 ‖ ājñāhānir vilomena kathaṁ puṣyati bhairava ǀ yuktam etan na vīrendra tathāpi te bravīmy aham ‖ 187 ‖ yoginīsiddhacaritaṁ sulabhaṁ [k, kh: sulabhe] na kadācana ǀ kulakramaṁ ca vidyā ca kṣuradhārāśatākulam ‖ 188 ‖ vīrapānaṁ vinā siddhiḥ kuladīpaiḥ [k, kh: -pai] saphalguṣaiḥ ǀ vinā ucchiṣṭacarukaiḥ [kh: ucchiṣṭa-] siddhir naiva [k, kh: siddhiṁ naiva] kulakrame ‖ 189 ‖ tatra pūjāṁ prayacchyante [k, kh: pūjā prayacchanti] parasparamukhāgamam ǀ ājñākramodayo [k, kh: -yaṁ] nāma śāstrārthaṁ [k, kh: -ya] ṣaṭkanirṇayam ‖ 190 ‖ *atikaṣṭataraṁ raudraṁ bhāṣāsaṁketakarmakaiḥ [k, kh: * rmmakaiḥ]* ǀ śānto [k, kh: – ntaṁ] dānto [k, kh: – ntaṁ] jitakrodho [k, kh: – dhaṁ] bhikṣāśī [k, kh: -sī] ca jitendriyaḥ ‖ 191 ‖
yāvad evaṁ kule nāsti [k, kh: kula nā] siddhis tasya [k, kh: -stasyāt] kuto [k, kh: kṛto] bhavet ǀ Ibid. 16/185cd-192ab.

[2] See below, chapter 3, p. 507.

Liṅga. This is not generally the view we find in the Kubjikā corpus as a whole. The KuKh expressly says that the initiate should not give up worshipping the Liṅga. Moreover, the wandering, ascetic way of life is normally kept an open option, although there is a very strong tendency to internalize it. The Kubjikā sources reflect in their own way, to a degree, a range of possibilities, which we shall have occasion to discuss in chapter three. In the same way, across Kaula traditions we find a number of possibilities. The Mālinīvijayottaratantra, which Abhinava takes as his prime authority, teaches that nothing is prohibited or enjoined; what is essential is that whatever practice one undertakes, it should aid the development of spiritual consciousness. Commenting on the MVT, Abhinava explains:

> The worship of the Liṅga is prescribed in the Śaivasiddhānta in order to impart the knowledge that it consists of the entire cosmic order (viśvādhvan). In the Kula and other scriptures, on the other hand, it is prohibited in order to teach that the cosmic nature is in the body. Here (Trika doctrine is concerned with that) which is of the nature of all things, so how can there be either prohibition or injunction?
>
> The practice of the discipline (niyama) (enjoined by other Śaiva schools demands) matted hair and the rest. But in order to achieve the state of oneness (tādātmya) (this kind of discipline) has been abandoned in the Kaula tradition because it teaches the means based on bliss (sukhopāya).[1]

In short, Kaula practice as a whole and the various Kaula schools including the Kubjikā tradition are in part the result of reforms of earlier Śaiva ascetic traditions variously applied as the particular case may be. The Kubjikā cult as a whole has, as we shall see, been adapted to the householder whilst keeping the renouncer's peripatetic ascetic way of life an open alternative. Thus the goddess continues:

> "Being one who has matted hair, shaved head, (having a) topknot, carrying a skull, smeared with ashes or wearing the five insignias – O god, (none of this) leads to accomplishment in the Kula tradition. (Even) a renouncer (avadhūta) who does not bear the five insignias and is naked does not quickly achieve success in the western (transmission) of the House of the Yoginīs. This is forbidden and (so)

[1] TĀ 4/256-258ab.

all this is absent in the Kaula (teachings). O Maheśvara, as this is improper how can the Command be given to you?" (192cd-195ab)

After the Lord who is the fulfiller (of all things) had heard this divine speech, the god who desires Nirvāṇa spoke to the virgin goddess (kumārikā).[1] The Lord said: "If you are my friend, recall what was previously agreed. And so tell (me) the liturgy (krama) and * *, having known (it), the Kula scripture. O goddess, tell me (about) the offerings, the sacrificial substances of the Siddhas and the Kula liturgy. To you belongs the glory (kīrti) (while) I am a worshipper of the transmission (krama). (Tell me) how the practice of the Rule is; otherwise, I (cannot) cross over (this fettered state). I will abandon the Liṅga and follow your Command, as it is established by the tradition (pāramparya) on the western path. And I will worship the first teachers. I will give up all that is forbidden in the Kaula (teachings), especially what is excluded from the teaching (matabāhya) and I will practice in tranquillity (nirvāṇa). (195cd-201ab)

My greed, passion, and delusion have been destroyed today in every way. The triple world is pervaded by pride and ego. I will give up deceit and especially lust and anger. Tradition and virtue (vinaya) – this Kaula (teaching) has emerged today. I will observe all that. O Kaulinī, be gracious!"

After Kumārikā, who is the divine Liṅga, had heard what Śaṁkara said, Khageśī spoke from within the great Liṅga, powerful with (its) radiant energy.[2] (201cd-203ab)

---

[1] jaṭī muṇḍī śikhī [k, kh: -khā] caiva kapālī bhasmaguṇḍitaḥ ǁ 192 ǁ pañcamudrādharo deva siddhido [k, kh: -daṁ] na kulānvaye ǀ mudrāpañcakanirmukto 'vadhūto 'tha digambaraḥ ǁ 193 ǁ na [k, kh: sa] siddhim āpnuyāc chīghraṁ yoginīgṛhapaścime ǀ yad viruddham idaṁ [k: yadirūddhaṁmidaṁ; kh: yadirūddhamidaṁ] kaule tat sarvaṁ na ca vidyate ǁ 194 ǁ kathaṁ te dīyate ājñā anyāyāc ca maheśvara ǀ *divyāṁ [k, kh: devyā] girām imāṁ [kh: * * * (?)] śrutvā [kh: (?)] īśvaraś cāha [k: -ścāhya; kh: (?)] pūrṇakaḥ ǁ 195 ǁ nirvāṇaṁ vāñchate devo vadaty asau ca kumārikām [k, kh: -kā] ǀ Ibid. 16/192cd-196ab.

[2] īśvara uvāca
smara [k, kh: śmarā] me [kh: ma] yadi mitratvaṁ saṁketaṁ pūrvakaṁ [kh: (?)] ca yat ǁ 196 ǁ *tenācakṣva [k, kh: -cakṣa] kramaṁ * * jñātvā caiva kulāgamam* ǀ siddhadravyopacārāṇi [k: -dravyāpacārāṇi] brūhi devi kulakramam ǁ 197 ǁ bhavatāṁ bhavate [kh: bhavatāṁ] kīrtiḥ kramasyārādhako hy aham ǀ samayācaraṇaṁ yādṛk [k, kh: yāddhak (?)] pārayāmi na cānyathā ǁ 198 ǁ liṅgaṁ [k, kh: liṅga] visarjayiṣyāmi tvadīyājñāṁ [k, kh: – jñā] karomy aham ǀ yathā [k, kh: yathe] sā [k, kh: mā] paścime mārge pāramparyavyavasthitā ǁ 199 ǁ tān [k, kh: te] cāhaṁ pūjayiṣyāmi ādibhūtān [k, kh: -tā] gurūn [k: guruś] ca yān [k: ya; kh: ye] ǀ

As in this version of the myth, much of the dialogue between the god and the goddess reported in the KuKh takes place while the goddess is still in the Liṅga. Here the goddess tells the god to abandon his form with five faces which, as we have seen, is that of the androgynous Svacchandabhairava who, as the god of the Siddhāntāgamas, is Sadāśiva whose faces utter all the scriptures in general and, in particular, the Śaiva Āgama.[1] Sadyojāta, who is Sadāśiva's western face, is the one who utters the Kubjikā Tantras of the western tradition.[2] Authorized and instated as the First Siddha by the grace of the goddess's Command, this will be his task:

> The venerable Khageśī said: "Give up the ash, the matted hair and the form with five faces. Give up the bones and skull and (all) else that is artificial. Give up (the practice of ritual) gestures, the Moon and the sacred thread. Give up the bull and the Ganges. Give up (your) spear and the great serpent, the ascetic's staff and, O god, the garland of severed heads and the skull. Accomplishment (siddhi) (can only be found) in Kula, Kaula and the Western (transmission) of Sadyojāta. O Śambhu, the one who bears the form of Sadyojāta has one face and three eyes. Our condition as the Yoni (bhagatva) arose out of the previous Siddhakula.[3] That is the Cave of this tradition (anvaya) and its teaching (vicāra) is the Śrīmata."[4]
>
> Śaṁkara (was made) whole (avikara) by the gaze of the goddess that fell (on him). Satisfied by supreme bliss, Hara also abandoned his own Liṅga and there arose the form of Sadyojāta, that is, the One-faced Bhairava.[5] (205-210)

---

yad viruddham idaṁ [k, kh: yadi rūddhamidaṁ] kaule matabāhyaṁ viśeṣataḥ || 200 ||
tat sarvaṁ ca tyajiṣyāmi [k, kh: tyajayiṣyāmi] nirvāṇe 'bhyāsayāmy aham [k, kh: nirvāṇo-] |
lobho [k, kh: lobhaṁ] madaś [k, kh: madaṁ] ca māyādya [k, kh: -dyaṁ] naṣṭaṁ me sarvabhāvataḥ || 201 ||
ahaṁkāraṁ mamakāraṁ dvābhyāṁ [k, kh: ā-] vyāptaṁ jagattrayam [k, kh: jaga-] |
ḍambhādikaṁ ca tyajiṣyāmi kāmaṁ krodhaṁ viśeṣataḥ || 202 ||
anvayaṁ vinayaṁ [kh: vinaye] kaulam idam adya [k, kh: kaule daṁvimādyaṁ] vinirgatam |
tat sarvaṁ pālayiṣyāmi prasādaṁ [k, kh: praśādaṁ] kuru kaulini [k: -nī] || 203 ||
śaṁkaralapitaṁ [k, kh: śaṁkaro-] śrutvā divyaliṅgā kumārikā |
tejomahatmahāliṅgāt [k, kh: tejomahaṁ-; k, kh: -ligāt] khageśī vacanam [k: vacana] abravīt [k, kh: vravīt] || Ibid. 16/196cd-204.

[1] See Dyczkowski 1988: 31ff..

[2] See Dyczkowski 2004: 178.

[3] The goddess is alluding to her relationship with the previous Kaula tradition to which she refers as the Siddhakula.

[4] We shall see in the last chapter of this introduction that the Śrīmata is at once the name of this tradition, its teachings and the scripture.

[5] śrīkhageśy uvāca
tyaja bhasmaṁ jaṭājūṭaṁ yad rūpaṁ vaktrapañcakam |

The venerable Bhairava said: "O goddess, have compassion on me. I am Bhairava who has come before (you). O lord (prabhu),[1] impart the Kula liturgy of the Command (ājñā) (to me) – burst apart the Liṅga! Reveal yourself according to your own true nature (svabhāvataḥ) as the greatly sacred Ocean of the Yoni.[2] Accomplishment (siddhi) has come forth from there."

The venerable Khageśī said: "(The Liṅga has) one foot (ekapāda – i.e. E).[3] It is located in (the midst of) three energies and is adorned with the qualities of the three measures. (In five nights), O lord, I will burst apart the Liṅga. I will reveal myself and I will tell you (the teachings of the) Kula." (211cd-214ab)

In the meantime, once the goddess had crossed over the most excellent Yoga and once the fifth night had passed, she emerged from the middle of the Liṅga. (This took place) in an auspicious (śiva) month on the auspicious (śiva) eighth (day of the lunar month) at the end of the middle of the night.[4] She has the form of a sixteen (year-old girl), is dark blue and red and has three eyes. She laughs subtly and is adorned with six faces. She has twelve arms, a crooked form and faces downwards.[5] (214cd-215)

The mass of radiance from (her) garland is associated with the letters (of the Mālinī alphabet) beginning with Na and ending with kaṅkālaṁ [k, kh: kaṁkāraṁ] ca kapālaṁ ca tyajānyad [k, kh: -nyaṁ] yac ca kṛtrimam || 205 ||

---

tyaja mudrās tathā candraṁ tathā copavītakam [k, kh: go- -kāṁ] |
tyajasva vṛṣabhaṁ gaṅgāṁ [k, kh: gaṅgā] tyaja śūlaṁ mahoragam || 206 ||
khaṭvāṅgaṁ ca tathā deva muṇḍamālāṁ [k, kh: -lā] kapālakam |
bhavet siddhiḥ [k, kh: siddhiṁ] kule [k, kh: kulai] kaule sadyojāte tu paścime || 207 ||
sadyarūpadharaḥ śambho ekavaktras [k, kh: -vaktraṁ] trilocanaḥ [k, kh: -naṁ] |
asmākaṁ tu bhagatvaṁ hi pūrvaṁ [k, kh: pūrvva] siddhakulodbhavam [k, kh: siddhi-] || 208 ||
sā guhā anvayasyāsya vicāras [k, kh: -raṁ] tasya śrīmatam [k, kh: – matāṁ] | devyādṛṣṭinipātena śaṁkaro 'vikaro 'bhavat [k, kh: bhavet] || 209 ||
paramānandasaṁtṛptaḥ [k, kh: -pto] svaliṅgaṁ [k, kh: svacaliṅgaṁ] tyajate haraḥ [k, kh: hara] | sadyarūpaṁ [k, kh: sadyo-] tu saṁjātaṁ ekavaktraṁ tu bhairavam || YKh (2) 16/205-210.

[1] Concerning this way of addressing the goddess, see note to MāSt line 38.

[2] See above, p. 21.

[3] See KuKh 3/13-14ab and note and also ibid. 3/49. The letter E has the shape of a small downward-facing triangle which is likened to a person standing on one foot. It represents the Liṅga which is the core of the goddess's maṇḍala. It consists of three measures (mātrā). The syllable AIṀ, which is the sonic form of the goddess within the Liṅga, consists of three and a half measures. The symbolic significance of the measures (mātrā) of the utterance of the letter and the syllable will be discussed in the following chapter. See below, p. 381 ff.

[4] Cf. KuKh 6/87cd-88.

[5] The form of the goddess with six faces is the one preferred in the KuKh. It is described there in chapter twenty-nine.

Pha and, endowed with the fifty rays (of the energies of the letters), she is marked with a garland of flames, has light brown, dishevelled hair, and loves snakes. She (also has other forms with) two or six arms and, beautiful, sits on five ghosts (pañcapreta).[1] In the left hand (she holds) a skull and (in her other) upraised hands (she holds a) noose and spear. Crooked (kuṭilā), her body grey (dhūmra), she is Cāmuṇḍā, the accomplished Yoginī (siddhayoginī). This Vidyā, of many forms, is the woman (bhāmā) who resides within the Triangle. Such is the visualized form (dhyāna) of the goddess, the deity called Khageśī.[2] (215-221ab)

Having split apart the Meruliṅga and come forth, she moves mountains. She came forth within the heart, her radiant energy extremely intense and very hard to bear. Bhairava was pierced then by an intense descent of the energy (of grace) (śaktipāta). Penetrated by

---

[1] These are the Five Instruments (pañcakaraṇa), also called the Five Brahmās, they are the gods, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Rudra, Īśvara and Sadāśiva. These will be discussed in due course in chapter three.

[2] śrībhairava uvāca
kāruṇyaṁ [k, kh: kārūṇyaṁ] kuru me devi bhairavo 'haṁ purāgataḥ |
ājñākulakramaṁ brūhi liṅgasphoṭaṁ kuru prabho || 211 ||
*ātmānaṁ darśayet [k: ātmādarśana māṁ; kh: ātmādarśa moṁ] devi yat svakīyaṁ [k, kh: -ya] svabhāvataḥ [k, kh: – taṁ] |
yonyārṇavaṁ [k, kh: -va] mahādivyaṁ siddhis tasmād vinirgatā || 212 ||
śrīkhageśy uvāca
ekapādaṁ [k, kh: -pādas] triśaktisthaṁ trimātraguṇamaṇḍitam [k, kh: trimātraṁ-] |
caiśāna [k, kh: caśāna tu] liṅgasphoṭaṁ [k, kh: liṁsphoṭaṁ] karomy aham || 213 ||
prakaṭayāmy ahaṁ cātmā kulaṁ te kathayāmy aham | etasmin antare devī taritvā yogam uttamam || 214 ||
vyatīte pañcame [k, kh: – maṁ] rātre liṅgamadhyād vinirgatā |
śivamāse [k, kh: – māśe] śivāṣṭamyāṁ ardharātrāvasānataḥ || 215 ||
dviraṣṭavarṣamākārā [k, kh: -varṣākārā] śyāmā [k, kh: syāmā] raktā trilocanā |
īṣaddhasitamānā ca vaktraṣaṭkavibhūṣitā [k, kh: -ṣaṭkaṁvibhūṣitāṁ] || 216 ||
bhujadvādaśakopetā [k, kh: bhujādvādaśakopetāṁ] vakrarūpā adhomukhī [k, kh: madho-] | sragdāmadhāmanicayā [k: sradāmadāmānicapā; kh: -dāmānicayā] nādiphāntākṣarayutā [k: rādi-; k, kh: -yutāṁ] || 217 ||
pañcāśatkiraṇopetā [k, kh: -tāṁ] jvālāmālākulāṅkitā [k: -mātā-; k, kh: -kulāṅkitāṁ] |
īṣatpiṅgalakeśābhā [k, kh: -bhāṁ] muktakeśā ahipriyā [k, kh: -priyāṁ] || 218 ||
dvibhujā [k, kh: -jāṁ] ṣaḍbhujā [k, kh: ṣaṭbhujāṁ] ramyā [k, kh: ramyāṁ] pañcapretopari [k, kh: padma-] sthitā [k, kh: -tāṁ] |
vāmapāṇikapālasthā [k, kh: -sthāṁ] pāśaśūlakarodyatā [k, kh: -tāṁ] || 219 ||
kuṭilā [k, kh: -lāṁ] dhūmravapuṣā [kh: dhūta-; k, kh: dhūmavapuṣāṁ] cāmuṇḍā [k, kh: cāmuṇḍāṁ] siddhayoginī [k, kh: -nīṁ] |
trikoṇānte sthitā [k, kh: sthitāṁ] bhāmā [k, kh: -māṁ] vidyeyaṁ bahurūpiṇī [k, kh: -ṇīṁ] || 220 ||
dhyānam evaṁvidhaṁ [k: -dha] devyāḥ [k, kh: devyā] khageśī nāma devatā |
YKh (2) 16/211-221ab.

> (that) divine energy, the god rolled around (luṭhate) on the ground.[1] In this way, when he regained consciousness (labdhasaṁjña), Bhairava felt embarrassed (savrīḍa). Similarly, when the goddess with a crooked face (kuṭilānanā) regained consciousness, she too was embarrassed (salajjā). Kujeśvarī's neck was bent (vakra) and she averted her gaze downwards. At that moment (the goddess) Vakrikā became the aged Mahantāryā. In the Western Cave, she became the mistress (nāyakī) in the western tradition.[2] (221cd-225)

We shall see in chapter seven that, in consonance with her roots in the Trika Tantras, the goddess has three forms as a child and as a young and old woman. In this context, in her first form she is the Virgin (Kumārikā) in the Liṅga. She is a young woman when she emerges out of it. Finally, she becomes a mature woman after she passes through the intense union with her consort marked by the signs of possession (in his case) and the 'embarrassment' that heralds union and with it the transmission of spiritual power.

> Then the god Bhairava, who bore the form of Sadyojāta (sadyarūpa), shook. He leapt up by the power of knowledge and rolled around (luṭhate) again and again. The god, intent on the ritual (karmaṇaḥ sanmukhena), secreted blood from the navel, Liṅga and in the Cave. Then he became Bhairava, the abode of blood, in the sacrifice (yajña). (Thus) Bhairava bore the form of Sadyojāta (sadyarūpa – the Immediately Born).[3] (He was) Sadyanātha, the first (ādi) Bhairava in the lineage of Siddhas beginning with Sadya. He acquired the conventional name (saṁketa) 'Mitra' and was then Bhairava of the divine Command. He was freed from the fetters of Karma and the Kaula Command was set into operation.[4] (226-229)

---

[1] Cf. KuKh 5/33-34 and notes.

[2] cālayet parvatān meruliṅgaṁ [k, kh: maruliṅga] sphoṭya vinirgatā [k, kh: -tāṁ] || 221 ||
hṛdaye [k, kh: – yaṁ] yāvan niṣkrāntā [k, kh: – nnikrāntaṁ] tīvratejā [k, kh: -tejāṁ] suduḥsahā [k, kh: -sahāṁ] | *tīvraśaktinipātena [kh: * vraśakti-; k, kh: + na] tadā viddhas tu [k, kh: vidvastu] bhairavaḥ [k, kh: bhairava]* || 222 ||
luṭhate bhūtale devo āviṣṭo divyaśaktinā |
evaṁ sa [k, kh: sā] labdhasaṁjñas tu savrīḍo bhairavaḥ sthitaḥ || 223 ||
devyapi [k, kh: devīpi] labdhasaṁjñā tu salajjā kuṭilānanā |
adhomukhakṛtā dṛṣṭir vakragrīvā [k, kh: -pīvā] kujeśvarī || 224 ||
tatkṣṇāj [k, kh: tataḥ-] jāyate vṛddhā mahantāryā [k, kh: -tāryāṁ] ca vakrikā |
nāyakī paścimāmnāye saṁjātā paścimāṁ guhām || YKh (2) 16/221cd-225.

[3] See note to KuKh 6/87cd-88.

[4] tataḥ sa [k, kh: tatastaṁ] kampate devo bhairavaḥ [k, kh: -vo] sadyarūpadhṛk |

The venerable goddess said: "By virtue of (your intense) desire to achieve (this) in (our) friendship, I have given (you) the accomplishment of the Command (ājñāsiddhi). O lord of the gods, your (Command now) shines radiantly; (this is) the truth. (It is indeed) the truth, it is not otherwise. Endowed with the triply pure Command, abandon (all) thought born of Māyā. O Kujīśa, I have made you into the Lord of Yoga, one who has attained the Command (ājñāsiddha). By virtue of the Command your name is this: Mitrānanda. And I, O god, am Vakrikā and I am always endowed with your (same) attributes. In the Western tradition (paścima) worship takes place within the couple (yugmabheda) of me with you. From today onwards the lineage (olinī) worship of the couple (will be) along with me. You and I have the same essential nature, which is the immortal plane, free from decay. (230-232) Generate the fame (which is the energy called the) Nameless (Anāmā) and authority in the six sacred seats.[1] O Siddhanātha, along with me, you are the leader (nāyaka) in the Kula liturgy. Now you will possess knowledge that has not been seen or heard (by the senses). It is the knowledge announced in the past and brought down (to earth) by Ādinātha. O Bhairava, you have taught its inner[2] reflection, (whereas) my knowledge is (revealed) by the Command and is the Kula liturgy (krama) which is the Ājñākaula. O god, the (liberated) skyfaring state arises by worshipping (that one reality whose) body is without stain. You are all things (sarvātman) and, ever free, you are not bound by Karma. The murderer of Brahmins, women and cows, the thief, one who sleeps in the teacher's bed (with his wife) and those other extremely cruel people who commit very terrible sins, as many as a heap as great as Meru in this ocean of fettered existence, are free from all sins by just remembering you."[3] (230-240ab)

---

plavate jñānasāmarthyād [k: -rthyā] luṭhate [k, kh: lū-] ca muhurmuhuḥ [k, kh: muhu-] || 226 ||
rudhiraṁ kṣarate devaḥ [k, kh: devo] karmanaḥ sanmukhena [k, kh: karmanā sāmukhena] (?) tu |
nābhau liṅge guhāyāṁ tu tadāsau [k, kh: tadāko] rudhirālayam || 227 ||
saṁjāto [k, kh: -taṁ] bhairavo k, kh: -vaṁ] yajñe bhairavaḥ [k, kh: -vo] sadyarūpadhṛk |
sadyādisiddhasantāne [k, kh: -siddhisantānaṁ] sadyanāthādibhairavam || 228 ||
labhate mitrasaṁketaṁ [k, kh: -tā] divyājñābhairavas tadā |
muktas tu karmapāśais tu kaulājñā ca pravartitā || YKh (2) 16/226-229.

[1] See chapter three concerning the sacred seats and their development to six.

[2] MS Kh: 'subsequent'.

[3] śrīdevy uvāca [k: missing; kh: śrīdhy ūvāca]
mayā dattā ca mitratve ājñāsiddhir jigīṣayā [k, kh: -siddhi-] |
sphurate tava deveśa satyaṁ satyaṁ na cānyathā || 230 ||
triśuddhyā [k, kh: -ddhi] cājñayā yukto vikalpaṁ tyaja māyājam [k, kh: māyajaṁ] |

We bring this chapter to a close with a simple, salutary observation. Bhairava craved the goddess's grace because he wanted liberation. And this is what he achieved or, to be more precise, he discovered he already possessed. But what is more important is that he thereby became a source of liberation for others – a boon he never asked for but which is in actual fact the greatest of them all, because it is for everybody. We also find out in this way the reason for the god's distress – why he was 'enveloped in Māyā' and why this covering of ignorance was removed. It was not for himself. It was for us. The goddess kept telling him that he was already pure and liberated. But Bhairava did not fall into the trap of pride. He humbled himself, although he was already Bhairava and could never have been otherwise. He humbled himself and thereby became even greater because in his humility he received the grace that, transmitted through the lineage of Siddhas, is meant for all of us.

ājñāsiddhas tu [k, kh: -siddhistu] yogīndraḥ kujīśa tvaṁ kṛto mayā ‖ 231 ‖
tavedam [k: tevedam] ājñayā nāma [k, kh: + nu] mitrānandeti viśrutam [k, kh: -taḥ | ahaṁ ca vakrikā [k, kh: cakrikā] deva sadā tvaddharmadharmiṇī ‖ 232 ‖
yugmabhede bhavet pūjā tvayā ca mama paścime | adyaprabhṛtir [k, kh: -prabhṛti-] olīnī yugmapūjā mayā saha ‖ 233 ‖
tava mamaikyasadbhāvam ajarāmarakaṁ padam | kuru kīrtim anāmāṁ [k, kh: -nānāṁ] tu pīṭhaṣaṭke 'dhikārakam ‖ 234 ‖ siddhanātha mayā saha [k, kh: sā] nāyakas tvaṁ [k, kh: -stva] kulakrame | *adṛṣṭam aśrutaṁ jñānaṁ idānīṁ te bhaviṣyati [kh: bha * ṣyati]* ‖ 235 ‖
prāk sūcitaṁ [k, kh: prākastucitaṁ] ca yad [k, kh: ya] jñānaṁ ādināthāvatāritam | tasyāntaravicāraṁ [kh: tasyottaravicāran] tu nirṇītaṁ [k, kh: nirnnītaṁ] tava bhairava ‖ 236 ‖
madīyaṁ [kh: -ya] ājñayā jñānaṁ ājñākaulaṁ kulakramam | *khecaratvaṁ bhaved deva āliptāṅgaprapūjanāt [k, kh: āliptā * pra-]* ‖ 237 ‖ sarvātmā tvaṁ sadā mukto [k: mukta; kh: muktaṁ] na te karmanibandhanam | brahmagnaḥ [k, kh: -ghna] strīgavāṁ hantā steyī vā [k: dā] gurutalpagaḥ ‖ 238 ‖
anye krūratarāḥ [k, kh: -rā] pāpā merurāśipramāṇataḥ [k, kh: – nataḥ] | ye [k, kh: ya] kurvanti mahāghorā etasmin [k, kh: sthāsmin] bhavagārṇave [k: bhagavārṇanai; kh: bhavārṇṇane] ‖ 239 ‖
tava smaraṇamātreṇa mucyante [k, kh: -te] sarvapātakaiḥ [k, kh: tarvva-] |

YKh (2) 16/230-240ab.

Chapter Two

The Empowering Command

The origin of the goddess Kubjikā, the teachings and their transmission are all the result of the power and transmission (saṁkramaṇa) of the Command (ājñā). The major transformations and empowerments that occur to both the god and the goddess and, indeed to the entire world in which the myth unfolds, are due to its power that is so extraordinary that even they are astonished by its marvelous effect. Accordingly, directly after the narration of the myth in the KMT, Bhairava launches into an exposition of its nature and function and harkens back to it throughout the KMT. In the same spirit, the later Kubjikā Tantras, elaborating the theology and symbolic representations outlined in the myth, similarly repeatedly focus on this concept. Indeed, it is a fundamental feature of the teachings of the Kubjikā school where, although not peculiar to it, it is elaborated much more extensively than elsewhere.

This term is very common in the contemporary vernaculars, as is its synonym ādeśa. When leaving, a junior may ask his senior for his 'ājñā' i.e. permission to do so. Or the junior man may ask his senior what he wants him to do by requesting him for his 'ājñā'. In a more sophisticated sense, a disciple will ask his or her spiritual teacher for his or her ājñā or ādeśa as the devotee would the deity for grace. Gorakhnāthis especially request Gorakhnātha, their teacher and deity, with great emotion to give them his 'ādeśa' or 'ājñā'.[1] The analogy is with a king's command or his royal consent. For example, the Brahmin Kālidāsa who copied the Ambāmatasaṁhitā, a Kubjikā Tantra, for king Jagajjyotirmalla says in his colophon that he did this at the command – ājñā – of the king.[2] We may cite several examples of this non-technical use of the term. The Kashmiri Śaiva Somānanda says he wrote his Śivadṛṣṭi at the command of lord Śiva. Similarly, Abhinava introduces the eleventh chapter of his TĀ with the statement: 'we will now discuss the Path of the Forces according to Lord Śiva's command (śāmbhavājñā)'. Although many of the notions associated with the term ājñā –

---

[1] One wonders whether this usage is not a trace of the precursors of the Gorakhnāthis association with the Kubjikā tradition. Apart from obvious doctrinal continuities with the earlier traditions that still need to be carefully analyzed, there seem to be several such traces that indicate that they are the transformed remnant of an earlier Tantric or Kaula tradition. For example, Gorakhnāthis address the original Nātha – Ādinātha – as Śrīnātha. Śrīnātha is also the speaker of the later Kubjikā Tantras and figures as the form of the deity who teaches the Kālīkrama. Indeed, the very term 'nātha' is emblematic of their earlier associations.

[2] tasmin avasare vipraḥ (vipra) kālidāsas tu (-dāsasya) dhīmataḥ |
ājñām ādāya kuto (kutu) no manthānaṁ pūrṇalikhitam (-lekhitam) | Final scribal colophon of the sole manuscript of the AS (fl. 120a).

literally 'command' or 'permission' – are fundamental to the metaphysical and theological presuppositions of other Tantric traditions (especially the Kaula ones), in other schools it does not generally signify much more than its literal meaning conveys, which is simply 'command' or ‘permission’ and, by extension, ‘decree’ and ‘will’. A common example we find in the Tantras of all these related schools is the expression ‘this is the command of the goddess / god’, that often concludes a teaching. In the same spirit we are told in the BY that it was taught at the command of Śrīkaṇṭha.[1]

The word appears in this simple, literal sense in the Kulārṇavatantra. The teaching of this Tantra is ‘accomplished by the command’ but the command in this context means hardly more than ‘injunction’; no deep metaphysical nature is attributed to it. The ‘accomplishment of the command’ (ājñāsiddhi) simply means the fulfillment of the injunctions of the scriptures and the teacher.[2] It is not equivalent in the KT, as it is in the Kubjikā Tantras, to liberation. Despite the so-called transgressive modalities of Kaula rites, the KT unambiguously preaches the observance of the precepts. There the god instructs clearly that: 'the cause of Kuladharma, O Kuleśvarī, is not consecration, not mantra, not study of the scripture and the like; it is right conduct (sadācāra)'.[3] Carrying out the teacher's command is the disciple’s duty and service to him is worship.[4] One should practice Kaula ritual in accord with the teacher’s command.[5] The disciple should bow to the teacher and refrain from considering whether the teacher's command is right or wrong.[6] Similarly, Abhinava refers to the Ūrmikaulārṇavatantra, a Kālīkrama Tantra, as saying that the teacher's special characteristic is that his command (ājñā) should not be ignored or doubted even at the risk of one's life. The true teacher is one who reveals the Kula initiation, Kaula scripture and knowledge of reality.[7] Indeed, the Ūrmikaulārṇavatantra[1] repeatedly stresses the

---

[1] In the same way, I have uttered the Tantra worshipped by Bhairava previously in the Kali Age certainly at Śrīkaṇṭha’s command.

tadvad eva [k, kh: evi] mayākhyātaṁ tantraṁ bhairavapūjitam [k, kh: -taḥ] ||
kalau purā na saṁdehaḥ [k, kh: saṁdeha] śrīkaṁṭhasyājñayā [kh: -yāṁ] tathā | BY 1/99cd-100ab.

[2] This (teaching) is accomplished by (following) the command. By misconduct it is destroyed. By observing right conduct there will be truth and the accomplishment of the command.

ājñāsiddham idaṁ anācārad vinaśyati |
ācārapālanāt satyam ājñāsiddhir bhaviṣyati || KT 11/97.

[3] KT 11/98.

[4] KT 12/82cd.

[5] śrīguror ājñayā devi kulapūjāṁ samācaret | KT 6/15cd.

[6] KT 12/110ab.

[7] TĀ 15/588cd-589.

supreme importance of the teacher's command. Without it, there is no virtue (śreyasaṁpada) in the Kula.[2] For the good disciple the teacher's command is the supreme spiritual means (sādhanā).[3] He is eager to observe his teacher's command,[4] and delights in the bliss he experiences by observing the command of the teaching (krama)[5] mediated through his teacher. The Tantrasadbhāva similarly teaches that one who follows the command of the teacher and the deity finds peace.[6] Again, according to the TS, the teacher himself possesses the authority he has by Śiva's command and it is through that that he passes it on to his disciple, the next teacher, so that he too may exert his authority in the same way.[7] The Jayadrathayāmala prescribes that the disciple can begin his practice of mantra or worship the deity only after he has been given the permission (ājñā) to do so by his teacher.[8] One reason for this, according to the Brahmayāmala, is that

---

[1] Unfortunately, none of the references drawn from this Tantra found in the Kashmiri Śaiva texts can be traced in the manuscript I have consulted (see bibliography), but this may well be because it is not complete.

[2] guror ājñāṁ (gurur ājñā) vinā devi kule na (nā) śreyasaṁpadam || ŪKau 2/296cd.

[3] gurvājñā sādhanā (-nāṁ) parā (parām) | Ibid. 1/98b.

[4] gurvājñāpālanotsukam | Ibid. 1/102b.

[5] kramājñānandananditam || Ibid. 1/99d.

[6] In this way, one who obeys Bhairava's command attains peace.

evaṁ śāntim avāpnoti bhairavājñāvidhāyinaḥ (kh: bhairava-) | TS 7/28ab.

[7] The teacher says to the disciple who is receiving the consecration that will make him a teacher as well:

"You who are on the path of grace (should) always give initiation (to your disciples) and explain (the scripture). From today onwards, assume authority by Śiva's command." Then, having lifted (him) up and taken hold of his hand, he causes him to enter the maṇḍala. Once he has gone down on his knees and worshipped Bhairava, O lord, (the teacher) says (to Bhairava): "He has thus been consecrated by your permission (ājñā). (Now) on the teacher's path he should exert the authority that has come with the Krama, along with (the other) teachers, over those who obey your command."

*anugrahapathasthena [kh: -pa * sthena] dīkṣāvyākhyā sadā tvayā* ||
adyaprabhṛti kartavyam adhikāraṁ śivājñayā [g: si-] |
utthāpya hastaṁ [k: haste; kh: hasta] saṁgṛhya [kh: sagṛhya] maṇḍale tu praveśayet ||
jānubhyāṁ dharaṇīṁ gatvā saṁpūjya [k, kh: -jyā] bhairavaṁ tataḥ |
vijñāpya bhagavan [k, kh: -vān] hy evam abhiṣiktas tavājñayā ||
ācāryapathasaṁsthena [kh: -sasthena] tavājñānuvidhāyinām |
kartavyaṁ [kh: -vya] yat kramāyātaṁ adhikāraṁ tu deśikaiḥ || TS 9/507cd-510.

[88] Once he has obtained the command from the teacher's mouth he is thus the lord of adepts and then, observing (his) vow, he should, O goddess, begin the practice of mantra.

avāpyājñāṁ guror vaktrād evaṁ sa [kh: saḥ] sādhakeśvaraḥ | [k: ?]
paścād [kh: paścā] vratayukto [kh: -to] devi mantrasādhanam ārabhet | JY 2/52/44cd-45ab.

mantras originate from the teacher's mouth and are accomplished by his command.[1] The Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā explains that all mantras are under the teacher's control and carry out his command.[2] One should never disobey the teacher's command[3] or that of the deity[4] but must respect and venerate it as the Kula scripture.[5] The Kaula consort in the same way follows the teacher's

---

Then having worshipped the teacher, he should ask for the teacher's command again, and once he has obtained the command in the proper way, he should offer sacrifice.

tadā saṁpūjya ācāryaṁ [k, kh, g: -ryo] yacched ājñāṁ guroḥ [k, kh, g: ājñā guruḥ punaḥ [g: puraḥ] ||
labdhānujñātha vidhivat tato yajñaṁ [k, kh, g: yajña] samācaret | JY 3/7/152cd-153ab.

The excellent adept who has obtained the permission (to do so) should then begin (his) spiritual practice.

labdhājñaḥ sādhako [k, kh, g: -ke] varaḥ paścāt sādhanam ārabhet || JY 3/10/44cd

Then, O goddess, once he has consecrated his mantra, he should offer (it). O goddess, (the teacher) should give the command to him (to undertake) the work of the spiritual discipline of mantra.

abhiṣicya tataś cāsya mantraṁ devi samarpayet |
ājñām asmai daded [g: bharad] devi mantrasādhanakarmaṇi [k: mantraṁ-] || JY 3/13/67.

1 The great mantras, accomplished by the command and well linked to the syllables of the (root) Vidyā, abide by the hundreds and thousands in the teacher's mouth.

vidyākṣarasusaṁbaddhā [k: -vaṁtasusaṁvaddhā] guruvaktre vyavasthitāḥ [k: -tā; kh: -taḥ] |
*ājñāsiddhamahāmantrāḥ [k, kh: -siddhi- -mantrā] śataśo 'tha sahasraśaḥ [k: sahasraḥ ; kh: -saḥ] || BY 49/7

2 Once he knows the essence of the phonemic energies (mātṛkā), the teacher can destroy the fetters. All his mantras are under (his) control and, impelled (by him), they all carry out his command.

jñātvā mātṛkasadbhāvaṁ gurur bhavati pāśahā ||
mantrās tasya vaśyāḥ (vasāḥ) sarve ājñāṁ kurvanti coditāḥ | NTS MS Kh fl. 30b.

3 The JY says with reference to the teacher that: 'one should never transgress (lit. 'cross over) his command or his shadow.'

ājñāṁ na laṅghayet tasya chāyāṁ vā na kadācana | JY 1/45/74ab.

Similarly, the DP says with regard to the teacher: one should not transgress (his) command; (rather), one should offer one's vital breath to him.

ājñābhaṅgo na kartavyaḥ prāṇāṁs [g: prāṇā] tasmai pradāpayet | DP 5/84ab.

4 Typically the JY teaches: Therefore one must with all effort carry out Bhairavī's command.
tasmāt sarvaprayatnena kuryād ājñāṁ [all MS: ājñā] tu bhairavīm [all MSs: -vī] | JY 4/21/185ab.

5 guror no laṁghayed ājñāṁ [g: laṁghaya-] kulaśāstraṁ ca pūjayet | DP 6/8ab.

command.[1] To contravene the command (gurvājñābhaṁga) is a very great sin.[2] Due to that the disciple looses the power of the command (ājñāhāni). Just as the mantras a bad disciple utters are averse to him, similarly the command he received from his teacher looses it radiance.[3]

In this sense the 'command' is more than just an order or permission, it is the power the deity possesses and, by extension, the one the teacher has also. As such it has, in a way, an independent existence of its own. As a spiritual power in itself, it may be also transmitted by means of mantra or Yogic practice.[4] When the word is used in this way, as a sign of its special technical meaning and significance which, as we shall see, is most extensively developed in the ambit of the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras, I translate this important term as 'Command' with an initial capital letter.

The general sense of the word can easily make the transition to its more technical sense. A deity may command that something or other take place.[5] That

---

[1] gurvājñāsuvidhāyinī | ŪKau 2/154b.
[2] pacyate [k, kh: paśyate] narake ghore yas tv ājñāṁ laṁghayiṣyati | JY 2/1/152ab.
[3] mantrāḥ parāṅmukhā yānti ājñā na sphuritā bhavet | ŪKau 1/125ab.
[4] For example, a Kaula mudrā (which in this context is a type of yogic practice rather than a ritual gesture) taught in the ŪKau (2/113ab) is said to bestow the fruit of the accomplishment of the command (ājñāsiddhiphalapradā).
[5] We may cite the following as an example:

Bringing there an unblemished (corpse), the most excellent out of (a selection of) a hundred youths. O god, placing that in the middle, adorned with all the ornaments, the man should sit on his chest with arms upraised and repeat mantra until that corpse begins to shake and make a terrible noise. Then (the adept) says: "the leader of Hiraṇyapura (the City of Gold) has been caught." (The demon in the corpse responds, saying): "I am that king of the Vetālas. Why have you made fire-offerings to the pervasive lord?" Hearing this, the most excellent of adepts (vīrendra), without distress, should say: "Assume perpetually the imperishable condition made of gold. Stand firm! The goddess of the gods has now given you the command." Then, having heard this, the Vetāla turns to gold.

tatrākṣataṁ samānīya [kh: -yaṁ] yuvānāṁ ca śatottamam ||
taṁ devi madhyagaṁ kṛtvā sarvālaṁkārabhūṣitam |
tasya vakṣasi [g: vakṣyāmi] saṁrūḍha [g: -ḍhaṁ] ūrdhvabāhur [k: -vākur; g: ūrdhavāhu] japen naraḥ || tāvad yāvat prakampate [g gh: -peta] taṁ śavaṁ ghoranisvanam [k: ghoramisvanam] |
tadā vadaty asau [kh: vahatyasau] labdho [all MSs: lubdhā] hiraṇyapuranāyakaḥ [k, kh, gh: dviraṇyā-] ||
so 'haṁ vetālarājānaḥ [g: -naṁ] kim āhūtas tvayā [g: -hutaṁtvayā] vibhoḥ |
evam ākarṇya vīrendraḥ [g gh: -dro] taṁ vadeta [k, kh, gh: tava deva] avihvalaḥ [g: su-] ||
akṣayatvaṁ [all MSs: akṣayas-] hemamayaṁ [k: -maya; kh g: mayo; gh: mayī] sadā saṁgṛhṇa [k, kh, g, gh: -gṛha] eva hi |
tiṣṭhasva devadeveśyā dattājñā [k: -jña] tava sāṁpratam ||
evam ākarṇya vetālo sauvarṇo 'sau bhavet tataḥ | JY 3/14/242cd-247ab.

this happens is at first attributed to the power of the deity, but the door is open to attribute it to the command itself. According to the Jayadrathayāmala, the goddess bestows the command of authority in the sacred seats.[1] By the time the Devīpañcaśataka was written the Command is understood to be an abstract principle. Thus the goddess sends Bhairava to the Northern Seat where he will find the oral tradition (mukhāgama) of the Kālīkrama and the 'Command of the present will give fruit in the future'.[2] The Kālīkrama exists because the Command is present in this world.[3] According to the ŪKau, it is the Kaulika Command embodied in the Kālīkrama.[4] The Command that comes from the lips of the virgin who embodies the goddess is itself initiation into the Yoginīkrama.[5] The disciple is impelled through the progressively higher stages he must pass through in the course of his initiation by the power of the Command, until he reaches the most intense form of grace (śaktipāta).[6] The fetters that bind the aspirant are loosened. He experiences possession by the deity and exhibits the signs of attainment in the course of his initiation by the power of his teacher's Command.[7] The same

---

[1] pīṭhe sarvāśrite caiva adhikārājñādāyikā || JY 4/64/68cd.

[2] gaccha śrī-uttaraṁ pīṭhaṁ yatra cāsti mukhāgamam |
tadājñā vartamānasya bhaviṣyati phalapradā [k, kh, g: -pradam] || DP 1/47.

[3] I worship the goddess Saṁhārakālikā as is proper; then the command being present here, this great Krama (is as well).

pūjayāmi yathānyāyaṁ devyāṁ [devya-] saṁhārakālikām [-kā] ||
tadājñā vartamānīha [-haṁ] bhūtvā kramam idaṁ mahat | KS 4/8cd-9ab.

[4] This is the truth: the Krama tradition, the teaching of the Yoginīkrama, the great treasure of the Kaulika Command, is all in the teacher's mouth.

iti satyaṁ kramāmnāyaṁ yoginīkramaśāsanam |
kaulikājñāmahākośaṁ (kaula-) sarvaṁ gurumukhe sthitaṁ || ŪKau 2/293.

[5] Or else, O mistress of the worlds, a virgin is the chosen deity. The Command that comes from her mouth is initiation in to the Yoginīkrama.

athavā bhūvaneśāni kumārī iṣṭadevatā |
tanmukhād (-mukhā) nirgatā ājñā sā dīkṣā yoginīkrame || ŪKau 2/167.

[6] Make food offerings in due order to the supreme Brahma and to Bhairava intensified by all things, right up to the most intense form of grace, which is the power of the true teacher's Command.

nivedyet paraṁ brahma bhairave sarvabṛṁhite ||
atīvraśaktipāte ca [na] sadgurvājñābale kramāt | ŪKau 2/215cd-216ab.

[7] ājñāsāmarthyayogena mudrāsaṁketakena vā |
pracalati [-calaṁti] mahāpāśam āveśaṁ [-pāśan-] tasya jāyate ||
ānanda [ānaṁdo] udbhavaḥ [hṛdbhavaḥ] kampo [kapo] nidrā ghūrmis tu pañcamī | tattvaviddhasya [tatvavidvasya] deveśi pañcāvasthā bhavanti hi || ŪKau 2/231-232.

Concerning these five states (avasthā), also called 'signs of attainment' (pratyaya), see TĀ 5/100cd-105ab and notes to KuKh 33/47.

Kālīkrama Tantra teaches that the Śāmbhava Command which, as in the Kubjikā Tantras, is the highest form of the Command, should be 'uttered' i.e. generated in the concluding part of the initiation.[1] This injunction implies, I suppose, its identity with the root Vidyā. The teacher places the neophant in the presence of the deity, fire and the teacher by the power of Śrīnātha's Command.[2] In the eleventh or twelfth century, when the commentary by Puṇḍarīka was written on the Kālacakra Tantra, it was well known that a sophisticated metaphysical identity was ascribed in Śaiva Kaula circles to the teacher's Command. Just as Puṇḍarīka consistently criticizes all other Śaiva Kaula doctrine whenever he can, he finds fault also in the view that liberation is attained by the power of the teacher's Command. This, he maintains, is purely phenomenal. It is devoid of spiritual power.[3] If liberation were to be attainable by the teacher's Command, the Buddha would not have taught that it is attained by profound spiritual concentration (samādhi).[4]

The Command is not only a soteriological principle; it is also a cosmic power. The two aspects operate together. According to the NTS, an early Śaiva Āgama, the world orders or corresponding series of metaphysical principles are sustained and governed at the command (ājñā) of particular deities who, by virtue of their control of this power, possess the authority (adhikāra) to do this. By virtue of this same power they may grace the living beings in the spheres over which they have been delegated at the command of the supreme deity.[5] Thus Bhairava promises in the BY that he will grace the world by the power of the

---

[1] tataḥ utthāya sahasā śāṁbhavājñām udīrayet | ŪKau 2/255ab.
[2] kulācāryeṇa vai paścāc chrīnāthājñābalena tu |
śiṣyaṁ tu dāpayed (lā-) devi devāgnigurusaṁnidhau || ŪKau 2/260.
[3] Puṇḍarīka writes: Therefore what purpose is served for those who desire omniscience by subduing wicked deities by the teacher's command which is worldly (saṁsāradharmarūpiṇī)? ViPra vol. 3, 91. Cf. above, p. 205, note 5 where a Vetāla is subdued at the goddess's command.
[4] Puṇḍarīka quotes the following from an unnamed source: In some places (it is taught that) the attributes (dharma) impelled by the command bestow liberation and so the Conqueror who teaches the path bestows liberation by means of the command. (But) if embodied beings were to be liberated by the grace of the teacher's command, then the Compassionate One would not teach that liberation (is attained) by concentration. ViPra vol. 3, p. 91.
[5] For example, we read in the Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā:

Thus, O (goddess) praised (by all the gods); those (gods) Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara have all gone to their place once the command was given to them. (But in reality) you are the one who graces the sages and all living beings. Authority was given first of all to the goddess.

* * * * tatas te tu brahmāviṣṇumaheśvarāḥ ||
svasthānaṁ tu gatāḥ sarve ājñāṁ datvā tu nandite |
tvam anugrahakartā tu ṛṣīṇāṁ sarvaprāṇinām ||
devyāyās tu tathā pūrvam adhikāraḥ samarpitaḥ | NTS MS Kh fl. 1a.

Command of the goddess's energy.[1] Theological conceptions continued to be associated with the Command. Thus, according to the KT, the universe is sustained by the Command of the Yoginīs.[2] The notion that the goddess is the Command, which is fundamental in the Kubjikā tradition, although not common, is also found later in other traditions. One of the names of the goddess Lalitā, that is, Tripurasundarī, in the Thousand Names of Lalitā – the Lalitāsahasranāma-stotra – of the Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa, is 'Command' (ājñā).[3] In the Liṅgapurāṇa, Śiva proclaims that: 'In the beginning the eternal Command was born from my mouth.'[4] This Command, identified with the goddess, is the source of all scripture that she, by extension, embodies. Accordingly the LSNS calls the goddess 'the scripture that is her own Command'.[5] The Nityāṣoḍaśikārṇava refers to the goddess as 'the treasure chest of the fourfold Command'.[6] According to the commentators these are the four Kaula traditions. Like Kubjikā's tradition, all of them are a 'transmission of the command' (ājñākrama)[7] collectively identified with the goddess Tripurā. It is this that makes the deity supreme. The Kṛṣṇayāmala, a late mediaeval Tantra, presents Kṛṣṇa as Tripurasundarī's essential nature and, as the KY says: 'she is under the sway of Kṛṣṇa's command'.[8]

The term appears also in the twelve short sūtras of the Śivajñānabodha. According to the Tamil Śaiva Siddhānta tradition this important and famous text was originally part of the Rauravāgama and is represented by the Sanskrit version that accompanies the Tamil text, but this is unlikely. The relevant sūtra is the second one which reads: '(Although he) is another because of (Śiva's) pervasive state he is not different from the agent who, by means of the Command he possesses (ājñayā samavetayā), creates in accord with the karman of individual souls (their) world of

---

[1] anugrahaṁ kariṣyāmi tavāhaṁ śakter [k, kh: śaktir-] ājñayā || BY 1/27cd.

[2] Constant salutations to all those Yoginīs by the power of whose Command the triple world is established.

yāsām ājñāprabhāveṇa sthāpitaṁ bhuvanatrayam |
namas tābhyaḥ samastābhyo yoginībhyo nirantaram || KT 8/50.

[3] This is name 828. See Murty 1975: 174.

[4] purā mamājñā madvakrāt samutpannā sanātanī | Liṅgapurāṇa quoted by Murty 1975: 174.

[5] nijājñārūpanigamā. This is name 287 of the LSNS. See Murty 1975: 95.

[6] caturājñākoṣabhūtāṁ. NṢA 1/12c.

[7] O mistress of the gods, fair-faced one, the Western Tradition is the transmission of the Command.

*paścimāmnāyaṁ [k kh: -ya; gh: -mā * ya] deveśi ājñākramaṁ [k: -krama; gh: -cakra] varānane* |
CMSS 7/42cd.

[8] yathā kṛṣṇasvarūpā ca kṛṣṇājñāvaśavartinī || KY 4/8cd.

transmigration.'[1] According to the commentators, the Command is Śiva's energy of consciousness (cit śakti).[2]

And this is essentially what it is according to the Kubjikā Tantras, but instead of calling it the energy of consciousness (an uncommon expression in these texts), they refer to it as the energy of the Transmental (unmanīśakti). This, essentially, is the empowering and purifying energy imparted by the deity directly or through the teacher. It liberates and bestows every form of accomplishment (siddhi) and worldly benefit (bhoga) to the one who receives it through initiation. As the KMT says: 'Both worldly benefit (bhukti) and liberation come from the Command. It accomplishes everything in a moment. One gets all that one wants, if (one's) devotion is unwavering'.[3] He who has received the Command in its fullest form is no less than the deity itself.[4] It is, in this respect, what other schools and the Kubjikā Tantras themselves also refer to as 'grace' (anugraha) or the 'descent of power' (śaktipāta). So, the Command is said to variously be, as are grace and the 'descent of power', intense (tīvrājñā) or weak (mandājñā), as the case may be. The former is devastatingly powerful and brings about realisation in an instant. The latter is slow and works gradually, elevating the soul (jīva) who receives it stage by stage, merging it into progressively higher principles.[5] Indeed, it may be so weak that its purifying effect may be quickly undone by the formation of more binding impurity. A weak Command gives rise to equally weak and fickle devotion and with it bad morals. Most people in this dark Age of Strife (kali), especially now that we are approaching the end of it, suffer from these defects because in this Age, the Command is extremely weak.[6] But these measures, the KMT warns, apply only in the fettered condition when the individual soul is still sullied with impurities, but as the KMT says: 'once purified in all respects, one should not consider whether there is 'much' or 'little' (of the goddess's transforming grace). One should not think of 'much' and 'little' as superior and inferior or in temporal terms. The cause here is realisation (pratyaya)'.[7] And the ultimate cause of realisation is the Command.

---

[1] anyaḥ san vyāptitaḥ ananyaḥ kartā karmānusārataḥ karoti saṁsṛtiṁ puṁsāṁ ājñayā samavetayā.

[2] Nagaswami 1982: 75.

[3] KMT 3/107. There will be occasion to discuss the importance of devotion further ahead.

[4] Bhairava declares to the goddess: "O Kujāmbikā, he who possesses this Command is my equal." KMT 3/105ab.

[5] All the aforementioned yogic powers (guṇa) certainly arise (within the disciple). By his resting a thousand (moments) and when merged, one hundred thousand. In that very (condition) beyond merger (layātīta), he attains the supreme place, which is free of old age and death, by the power of the intense (form of the) Command. KuKh 33/50–51.

[6] KuKh 31/135.

[7] KMT 3/102cd-103.

Nonetheless, even though the Command itself is purifying, the degrees in which it manifests depends on the purity of the recipient: the 'descent of power' of one who has been purified of his previous Karma is very pure. He quickly attains an intense 'descent of power'. It is very weak for one whose body is full of impurity (mala)'.[1] The transmission of the Command from the teacher to his or her disciple serves to remove this impurity. This is the first step and the first form of the Command. Once the disciple has been purified he is ready to receive the transmission of the second aspect of the Command by means of which he receives the authority to be a teacher in his turn and transmit the empowering and liberating Command to his disciples. The KMT explains:

> The Command that graces the practitioner (sādhakānu-grahātmikā) of one who is intent on the practice of empowerment (samarthācāra) is said to be of two kinds. The Command of the foremost (adept) awakens purity. Then the teacher should bestow the Command so that (he may acquire) authority. He who is satisfied by just (the first form of the) Command alone and gives the Command to someone else is not happy here (in this world) and is troubled in the next.[2]

A little further ahead we are told:

> The Command of Authority (adhikārājñā) is the first one. The Command of Grace (prasādājñā) is the second. If it is attained in due order along with the transmission duly transmitted (sakramānu-krameṇa) from that time on one becomes a teacher.[3]

But the Command is not just 'grace'. The Command in its fullest most essential nature is the supreme state itself. This, according to the Kubjikā Tantras, is the Śāmbhava state, which is that of Śambhu, that is, Śiva himself. The tradition of the Kubjikā Tantras considers itself to be the best because it alone leads to this state.[4] The word for 'state' in Sanskrit – 'avasthā' – is feminine as is the word 'śakti' which denotes the god's spiritual power, embodied in the goddess, his consort. The goddess, in other words, is the state of the god, his divinity that is his

[1] KMT 3/89-90ab.
[2] KMT 3/108-110.
[3] KMT 3/120-121ab.
[4] The KuKh (3/62) declares that: 'The Western (Tradition) is Śāmbhava and so is above all others.' Although, as we shall see in greater detail later, the Kubjikā tradition repeatedly proclaims that this is the hallmark of its excellence with respect to other traditions and Kaula schools in particular, it is acknowledged to be the supreme state by others also.

infinite divine power through which he wills, knows and does all things.[1] Specifically, as the energy of the Command, it has two aspects, corresponding to the two aspects of the Command. The Command (ājñā) is the deity or the teacher, who is its physical counterpart. It is also the gracious consent, that is, the permission which grants divine authority as well as the enlightened consciousness transmitted from the deity through the lineage of teachers. These two kinds or aspects of the Command are two energies. The Command of Authority is Rudraśakti and the Command of Grace is Śāmbhavī. Rudraśakti, the Command of Authority, is the form the Command assumes initially in order to remove impurity. The teacher, or sometimes the deity directly, transmits this to the aspirant by looking at him with the 'Gaze of the Lion' (siṁhāvalokana). A hallmark of the transmission, it is accordingly called the 'Teaching of the Lion' (siṁhaśāsana). Thus:

> Raudrī is the locus of the coming together (grathana) of Kula, which is realisation (pratyaya) and the restraint (of impurity brought about by the gracious) Gaze of the Lion. (She is) the intense form of the Command (tīvrājñā), the radiant energy (tejas) of the Siddhas,

---

[1] Kashmiri Śaiva theologians call this Bhairava's 'freedom' (svātantrya) or 'independence' (nirapekṣatā), the intuitive and creative genius (pratibhā) of his pure conscious nature. The latter is the light of consciousness by means of which all things are made manifest, and the former the reflective awareness that the light has of its own essential nature and the forms made manifest within it through its power. Abhinavagupta explains that from the point of view of his own system:

> The aforementioned pure Light (of consciousness) is Bhairava's supreme (power and) glory. Apart from that one may discern there (for the purpose of instruction) (his) pure freedom. The Light is that which renders all things manifest, nor is the universe separate from it (otherwise it would not appear at all). It is indeed reality (sat) that manifests, (not an illusion). The truth is therefore this, namely, that the Supreme Lord, free of restraints, exhibits in this way in the Void of His own nature the play of emission and withdrawal. Just as earth and water, for example, manifest separately from one another (when reflected) in a stainless mirror, so do the modalities of the All within the one Lord of Consciousness. TĀ 3/1-4.

Again:

> The independence (nirapekṣatā) of the Lord with respect to His being all things is that supreme creative intuition (pratibhā) (the wise) call the Goddess Absolute (anuttarā) Ibid. 3/66

These formulations are entirely absent in our sources. Even so, the parallel conception of the dynamism of Śakti, in the triadic form of the energies of will, knowledge and action, a cardinal feature of this profound phenomenology, is evident in the Śaiva Āgamas in general and in the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras in particular. We shall see that a major source of the conception of this triad for the Kubjikā Tantras is the Tantrasadbhāva, which is an important Trika Tantra for Kashmiri Śaivites also.

> which is the Teaching of the Lion (imparted) by means of the oneness (samarasa of all the energies).[1]

Raudrī is Kuṇḍalinī when she rises through the channel of Suṣumṇā along the axis of the subtle body. When she has passed through all the Wheels in the body and is fully raised and is in her fully expanded state, she rests within her own infinite being which is the very essence of the Command. In that state of profound rest she is Śāmbhavīśakti, that is, Śambhu's (i.e Siva's) own power merged within him. Then, the KMT declares that by its power the adept: 'sees all things before him and knows (them as they truly are)'.[2] In the highest stage of her ascent Rudraśakti first reaches the abode of Rudra which the ancient Pāśupatas called Dhruva – the world of the pole star which is 'Fixed' or 'Stable' (both meanings of the word 'dhruva'). From there she rises to the summit of Kubjikā's universe, where she herself resides in the form of the Command:

> Once she reaches the plane of the Place of the Command, she completes (her) work as she wishes. By (her) movement, she moves all things, including gods, demons and men, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Indra and Rudra, along with the mountains, forests and groves. The yogi whose mind is immersed in that should pierce through the Stable Place (dhruvasthāna).[3]

The cardinal characteristic of Kaula initiation is that the teacher imparts it by awakening in his disciple the energy of Kuṇḍalinī, which once aroused rises upward, piercing (vedha) through the spiritual centres (cakra – lit. 'wheels') in the disciple's subtle body. The Kubjikā Tantras attribute this to the Command. Thus the goddess explains: 'O Great Lord, an intensely powerful Command comes by the grace (śaktipāta) of the Command of the Piercing. (But), O God, without knowledge of the Command of the State (of Being) there is no realisation (pratyaya).'[4] Although uncommon, traces of the notion that the Command pierces through the Wheels in the course of initiation do persist in later independent traditions. The Śāradātilaka, for example, concluding a section on this form of initiation enjoins that: 'the teacher should pierce (his disciple) with the Command[5]

---

[1] KuKh 38/22cd.

[2] śāmbhavena samastārthān [k kh: samarthastān] vetti paśyati cāgrataḥ |
ṢSS 19/56ab = KMT 13/57cd.

[3] KuKh 36/95-96.

[4] KuKh 33/14.

[5] vedhayed ājñayā guruḥ || ŚT 5/131d.

and, his bond severed by the teacher's Command, the disciple should fall to the ground'.[1]

But while the Command is generally a peripheral feature of the articulation of the theology and praxis of other schools, in this one it is central. The teaching of the Kubjikā tradition is that of the innate or spontaneous (sahaja) Command of Realisation (pratyayājñā).[2] 'Liberation (is attained) through the (deity's) Command. (This) is the supreme initiation that bestows Nirvāṇa'.[3] Although there are other forms of initiation, this type is essential and should be imparted first of all by means of the Command, which, like a fire, burns up all impurity. The Command is endowed with the divine qualities of the Śāmbhava plane and so leads to it:

> The initiation endowed with the Fire of the Command is beneficial for the accomplishment of mantras. (When) that (initiation) is preceded by the Command it is accomplished (siddhā), otherwise it is (just) a waste of mustard seed (offered in the course of the rite). And that (initiation) is endowed with the (supreme) principle, which is, indeed, the Śāmbhava plane.[4] He who possesses this (state) is one whose Command is always effective. In order to attain the accomplishment of the Path of Knowledge, the initiation in which the piercing (by means of the Command) takes place (vedhavatī) is auspicious. Thus one should render it to one who is a good devotee and on the Path of Kula, fit (to receive it, for) of all (the forms of) initiation, it is said to be the most excellent.[5]

---

[1] gurvājñayā chinnapāśas tadā śiṣyaḥ pated bhuvi || ŚT 5/138cd.

[2] KuKh 38/22b.

[3] ājñādvāreṇa muktiḥ syād dīkṣā nirvāṇadā parā || ŚM 13/248cd.

[4] The KMT and the ŚM read: And that (initiation) is for those who possesses the (supreme) principle. And the principle is indeed, the Śāmbhava plane.

[5] ājñānalavatī [k kh: ājñayānalavatī; śama: -malavatī] dīkṣā mantrāṇāṁ sādhane hitā ||
sā cājñāpūrvikā siddhā anyathā tilaghātinī [KMT, ŚM: -kī] |
sā ca tattvavatī [KMT, ŚM: -vatāṁ] caiva tattvaṁ vai śāṁbhavaṁ padam ||
tadidaṁ vartate [KMT, ŚM: tat padaṁ vidyate] yasya sāmarthyājñaḥ [k kh: -jñā] sa sarvadā [KMT: sarvaśaḥ] |
jñānamārgaprasiddhyarthaṁ dīkṣā vedhavatī śubhā ||
yogyatātaḥ pradātavyā subhaktasya kulādhvare [ŚM: yogyatā yasya deveśi sa muktaḥ kulaśāsane]* |
sarvāsāmeva dīkṣāṇāṁ uttamā parikīrtitā [ŚM: tasya vedhavatī deyā anyathā na pradāpayet] || .
ṢSS 17/69cd-72 = KMT 10/70cd-73 = ŚM 13/249cd-252.

*Note, by the way, the deviant use of the noun adhvara. Normally it means 'a sacrifice' here, and in several other places in the Kubjikā corpus, it is a synonym of the similar sounding word adhvan, which means 'path'.

According to the intensity of the Command transmitted in this form of initiation, it may take place all of sudden or, if it is weaker, progressively in various phases. The KMT explains:

> They should be known to be those who pierce (and transform their disciples) (vedhaka) like alchemical mercury (rasa) (which they) certainly (do) in this way gradually (stokaṁ stokaṁ) (repeatedly) over many moments[1] by means of the 'resonance' (guñja) (of the energy of the Command). The energy (vibhūti) (of the deity) is described in this way and it accords with the nature of the (cosmic) Age (in which it operates).
>
> The piercing (vedha) (of the body) should take place in a moment (pala). What is not pierced by means of the resonance (guñja) (of the energy of the Command)? [. . .] Just as copper that has been 'pierced' with alchemical mercury (rasa) never again becomes copper, similarly, he who has been pierced by the Command (never again) enters the world of transmigration.[2]

Either way, the teacher looks for signs to make sure that his disciple has been properly and fully initiated.[3] The signs that appear in the disciple are the same as those that indicate that the one who is imparting the initiation is a true teacher. We have seen that both the god and the goddess swoon when they receive the Command from each other. Why this initiation causes those who receive it to faint is because the energy of the Command rises up through the body piercing the Wheels as it travels upwards. When this happens:

> Gesture, mantra and language – he knows all things as they really are. Once the plane of Kubjīśāna has been attained, sleep ensues. Sleeping, he knows just a little. And when the Command (ājñā) is present in the Cavity of Brahmā (at the top of the head), (the yogi) always (becomes stiff) like a piece of (dry) wood.[4]

---

[1] This is how I understand the obscure expression – bahuṁ bahuṁ palakoṭipalānām.

[2] KMT 3/100cd-101,102ab, 104. Note here how that the term 'vedha' (i.e. 'piercing') denotes the process whereby metals form an amalgam with alchemical mercury. In this way they are believed to be purified and transformed into gold. One is reminded of the analogy Abhinavagupta makes between the alchemists mercury (rasa) and the State Beyond the Fourth. Just as the former permanently changes the metals it touches to gold, similarly this state transforms the yogi completely and irreversibly. This is unlike the Fourth state which is not permanent. See ĪPvv vol. 3, p. 348, quoted in Dyczkowski 1992: 202.

[3] Cf. KuKh 31/32cd-35ab and notes.

[4] The KMT reads: brahmarandhragatā cājñā kāṣṭhavat tiṣṭhate sadā |

> (The Cavity of Brahmā) is the size of a grain of wheat (yava) and the excellent form of a triangle. Like the genitals of a mare (vaḍavāmaṇīndriya) it expands and contracts (repeatedly). When the mind (cetas) is present there in the middle (of the triangle of the Cavity of Brahmā), a state (of contemplative absorption) arises (in which all bodily functions are suspended called) the Wooden State (kāṣṭhāvasthā).[1]

The difference between the disciple and the teacher is that the former may succumb to the energy of the Command, whereas the teacher knows how to make use of it. He consciously manipulates the energy that takes hold of his fettered disciple, bringing about in him this certifying sign (pratyaya) of its presence and realisation (pratyaya). Indeed, knowledge of this procedure (vedhakrama) is the hallmark of a true teacher.[2] Outwardly, all that takes place is that, at the appropriate moment, the teacher looks intensely at his disciple. By the power of the teacher's gaze the disciple experiences the pervasion (vyāpti) of the energy of the Command and all the limbs of his body shake.[3] This empowering gaze is, as we have seen, how the goddess transfers the Command to Bhairava.

This procedure is essential in order to free the body and mind of the disciple beset with the natural defects that arise from the fettered condition so that he may avoid falling into the trap of false pride. As the Tantra declares:

> Even if the Command has been given along with (its) power (sāmarthya). (The teacher) should enter (samāviśet) (into the disciple) by means of the physical (corporeal) aspect (bhūtāṁśa). (Otherwise)

The TS (3/21ab) from which this chapter of the KMT is drawn, reads in this place instead:

śivāntas tu [k: śivāṁ tatra; kh: -ntan tu] yadā prāptaḥ [k: mayaṁ prāptāḥ] kāṣṭhavat tiṣṭhate tadā | (g: ?)

If the extremity of Śiva has been attained, (the initiate) then (becomes stiff) like a piece of wood.

The 'extremity of Śiva', i.e. his most elevated aspect is implicitly identified by the redactor of the KMT with the Command. Note how this variant exemplifies the novelty and importance of the Command and how specific it is to the doctrine of the Kubjikā Tantras. Such additions and variations in the Trika teachings of the TS illustrate how the Kubjikā teachings, like those of other Tantric schools, have developed in their own way on the basis, in many cases, of their precedents in preceding traditions.

[1] KMT 4/20-23ab.

[2] KuKh 31/107-108ab.

[3] KuKh 33/28.

> the proud (disciple) is consumed with mental and physical infirmities (ūrmi) and due to (his) ego is destroyed.[1]

The Command is the energy that emerges in a pure form by the will of the Supreme Principle and is that will itself. Rising through the channel of suṣumṇā, it splits it apart[2] until it reaches the Wheel of the Command which is the 'nondual plane of Śiva and Śakti' and the Command itself.[3] The Kula path along which the Command unfolds is itself generated by the Command as it develops, piercing the Wheels of the subtle body in the course of its ascent to increasingly higher levels. The texts describe several sequences in which this takes place. One is the following drawn from the ŚM. The process begins from the Triangle, which, as we shall see, is the goddess's Yoni. A matrix of energies within the End of the Twelve at the extremity of the subtle body that is situated at a distance of twelve fingerbreadths above the head, it enshrines the goddess in her essential metaphysical nature as the Transmental (unmanī), which in the following passage is implicitly identified with the Command. The teacher manipulates this energy in the disciple's End of the Twelve and impels its down into the body through the Cavity of Brahmā at the top of the head. In this way, the vital energy of the Transmental, that is, Kuṇḍalinī and the Command, follows the same path along which the vital breath travels to enter the body (i.e. the 'corporeal aspect' mentioned above) and vitalizes it. Once reached the lowest extremity of its descent, the descending energy of the Command awakens the same energy dormant in the disciple that rises up, piercing as it does so, the Wheels along the axis of the body. It then descends again, carrying with it the individual soul, purified and radiant, transporting it first to the Heart and then to the other centres in the body. Thus the energy of the Command wonders through the body, illumining and filling it with its energy. Bhairava explains in the ŚM:

> I will tell (you) in brief about the Command that gives bliss. (First the Command) is contemplated in the form of a lightning flash situated in the middle of the Triangle (śṛṅgāṭapura) (in the End of the Twelve). Then (the teacher) should cause it to be experienced in the other body (i.e. that of the disciple) entering by the Cavity of Brahmā. The piercing (vedha) (of the Wheels in the body) takes place in a moment by the practice of this visualization (dhyānayoga). Pervading the other body with Sound the Supreme Energy should pierce (the Wheels) in the other body. In this way, O goddess, (the Wheels in the disciple's body) are pierced even at a great distance.

---

[1] KMT 13/66 = ṢSS 19/59cd-60ab.
[2] KuKh 35/38cd-39.
[3] KuKh 35/53.

The womb (of energy) (yoni) between the anus and the genitals shines like heated gold. One should imagine (bhāvayet) that it enters the other body up to the end of emission (in the End of the Twelve).[1] O goddess, that very moment, (the disciple) is well pierced and so falls shaking (to the ground). Having visualized (the goddess) entering into the middle of the Heart in the form of a flame, the goddess in the sheath of the lotus (of the Heart) can cause even mountains to fall.

(The teacher) should think that (that energy) possesses the great force of a rotating wheel within the root Wheel. O goddess, he should think that it is rotating within the other body. He should imagine that (that energy) is straight and, connected to the soles of the feet, (extends upwards). Having visualized it within the other body, (the teacher) will certainly cause (his disciple) to fall (on the ground in a trance).

By squeezing where the channels that transport the vital breath (are located), (with) the two thumbs consecrated with mantra, it heats up and (then) burns up the cage of sin.[2] The mind attains the transmental state and (the disciple) falls on the ground unconscious.[3]

---

[1] The 'end of emission' is located in the End of the Twelve. See KuKh 40/50cd-51ab.

[2] Instead of pāpapañjaram – 'the cage of sin' – MS G reads pāśapañjaram – 'the cage of fetters'.

[3] saṁkṣepāt kathayiṣyāmi ājñām ānandadāyinīm [kh g: -nī] |
dhyātvā vidyullatākārāṁ [g: vidyu-] śṛṅgāṭapuramadhyagām ||
viśantīṁ [k: viśaṁti; kh: viśantī; g: visaṁntī] brahmarandhreṇa [g: cuhma-] paradehe 'nubhāvayet |
anena [g: aneka] dhyānayogena vedham utpadyate kṣaṇāt ||
paradehe parāśaktir nādenākramya vedhayet |
tena vedho bhaved devi yojanānāṁ śatair api ||
gudameḍhrāntare [kh g: guḍa-] yoniṁ [kh g: yonis] taptacāmīkaraprabhām [g: -cāmikara-] | viśantīṁ [kh: viśantī; g: visaṁtī] paradehe [k: -deve] tu [kh: pi; g: śu] visargānte [k: -ntaṁ; kh g: ntā] tu [kh: -nta] bhāvayet [g: + tena vedho bhavad devi yojanānāṁ śatair api |] ||
tatkṣṇāt patate devi kampamānaḥ [k: kampamānaṁ] suviddhataḥ [k, kh: suvihvalaḥ; g: suviddhatam] |
dhyātvā dīpaśikhākārāṁ [g: deīpa-] viśantīṁ [g: visantī] hṛdi madhyataḥ ||
padmakośagatā [kh: -koṣagato] devī [kh g: devi] parvatān api pātayet |
bhramaccakramahāvegāṁ [kh: bhrama-; kh g: -vegā] mūlacakre vicintayet [g: pi-] ||
paradehagatāṁ [kh: -gatā; g: -dehegatā] devi bhramamāṇāṁ vicintayet |
āpādatalasaṁlagnāṁ ṛjurūpāṁ [g: ri-] vicintayet ||
paradehagatāṁ [g: -dehāṁ-] dhyātvā pātayen nātra saṁśayaḥ |
yatra [k: missing] prāṇavahā [k: pratapoṇavadā] nāḍyo [k: nādyo] aṅguṣṭhau dvau ca mantritau [k: mantrite] ||
pīḍanād gharmam [k: gharṣam; kh: ghurmam; g: dharmmam] āyāti dahyate pāpapañjaram [g: pāśa-] | mana [kh: sanā] unmanatāṁ [k: unmattatāṁ; kh: unmanatā] yāti niḥsaṁjñaḥ [k: niḥśabdo; kh: niḥsaṁjña] patate [g: patite] bhuvi || ŚM 13/257-265.

The Accomplishment of the Command and the Accomplishment of Speech

The development of the energy of the Command thus takes place not only by a direct transmission through the teacher's gaze (dṛṣṭi); it is also generated and evoked by means of inner yogic processes. These processes, like the recitation of mantras and rituals, bear fruit in the development of a range of magical and yogic accomplishments or attainments – siddhi. The highest attainment is that of the Command itself (ājñāsiddhi). This is also called the Accomplishment of Speech (vācāsiddhi). The Command is the absence of bondage. This condition is transmitted from 'mouth to mouth' along the chain of the transmission within the Kula (kulakrama) (i.e. the spiritual lineage) and so the Command is the Accomplishment of Speech,[1] which has the power to transmit not just the teachings but also liberation itself. It is to this we now turn.

The range of explanations and the degree of excellence attributed to this accomplishment in the texts illustrates particularly well the general principle that the same siddhi may in some places in the texts be considered to be just one amongst many and of minor importance, and in others particularly special or even the ultimate accomplishment. According to the KMT,[2] the Accomplishment of Speech (vācāsiddhi) is the highest of a series of sixteen states (avasthā) experienced by those who practice Yoga (yogābhipanna). According to the ṢSS, it is a special and specific accomplishment attained by practicing the Vidyā of the seven Yoginīs.[3] The KuKh promises that the regular recitation of the Mālinīstava and the contemplation of its seed-syllables will bring about a 'divine penetration' (divyāveśa) and with it, the grace of the Accomplishment of Speech.[4] It is mentioned in only one other place in the KuKh.[5] Even though it is said there to be liberation itself, it is not mentioned at all in any other part of the MBT. It appears once in the Kularatnapañcaka in a section drawn from the KMT, but otherwise it is not found in other Kubjikā Tantras except the KMT and the closely related ŚM and ṢSS. Although, as we have seen, it is said in one place in the KMT to be the supreme accomplishment, it also appears in several places in the ŚM and the ṢSS as just one amongst many.[6] For example, in one place in the ŚM[7] it is barely the first accomplishment of a series of thirteen attained progressively as the adept repeats a mantra an increasing number of times.

---

1 KuKh 26/43.
2 KMT 11/95-98.
3 ṢSS 36/57. The seven Yoginīs are discussed in chapter four.
4 KuKh 4/43-44ab.
5 See KuKh 26/43.
6 ṢSS 19/49c, 53a, 26/47c and also ŚM 5/147ab, 8/120cd, 15/128ab, 21/174cd etc, 320ab, 22/13cd, and 26/105ab etc.
7 ŚM 21/310cd.

As one of the minor accomplishments, the texts explain the nature of the Accomplishment of Speech variously. In one place it is listed just before the power of poetic expression (kavitva)[1], which suggests that in this case it is simply the ability to speak well.[2] It can also be understood to be, as its name implies, the power to accomplish anything one says. For example we read in the KMT:

> Once uttered the mantra called Kujā, one can destroy even the triple world and cause (mount) Kailāśa to fall – (this is how) the Accomplishment of Speech (vācāsiddhi) functions (pravartate).[3]

This is also what the Accomplishment of Speech appears to be in a passage in the ṢSS where it is listed amongst several other accomplishments.[4] This supposition is supported by the contiguity of the following three accomplishments, which appear to be extensions of this one. These three accomplishments, political, shamanic and magical, are: royal power (māhendrya), the power to assume any form at will, and black magic (indrajālapravartana), respectively. An example of the last is the power to kill by speech alone (vācāmātreṇa) the adept is said to acquire by the magical rite (prayoga) of the goddess Caṇḍālī.[5] A different explanation is found in the commentary on the ṢSS, which says that this accomplishment is the power to attain the eight great yogic powers[6] by speech alone.[7] This accomplishment often appears together with another called the 'Arousal of the Body' (purakṣobha), which is the piercing of the Wheels in the body by Kuṇḍalinī that arouses and purifies the energies of the body. The Arousal of the Body follows after the Accomplishment of Speech in several lists of accomplishments acquired by various means. There are a good

---

[1] ŚM 8/96cd.

[2] Similarly, icchāsiddhi – the accomplishment of attaining every desire – appears before kāmitva which is essentially the same thing.
vācāsiddhiḥ [k: vācāṁ-; g: -siddhi] purakṣobhaṁ kavitvaṁ ca manoharam | icchāsiddhis tu [kh: icchāśaktiś ca] kāmitvaṁ sarvajñānaprabodhanam [g: -prasādhanam] || ŚM 8/120cd-121ab.

[3] KMT 22/15 = ṢSS 33/86.

[4] ṢSS 26/47ff.

[5] KMT 7/110-111.

[6] Concerning these eight powers see KuKh 8/123-124.

[7] vācāmātreṇāṇimādisiddhayaḥ [k: -siddhiḥ] saṁbhavanti [k: sambhavati] | comm. ṢSS 13/187. Perhaps the commentator's authority for this explanation is the ŚM (21/174cd). There we read: aṇimādiguṇāvāptir vācāsiddhiḥ [k: -vācāṁ-; g: -vāpti- -siddhi] pravartate. This line may mean the 'Accomplishment of Speech which is the attainment of the power to make oneself small at will and the other (eight yogic powers) functions.' But it may also refer to two separate accomplishments listed amongst others an adept attains by means of the practice described. This is certainly the case in ŚM 23/189cd (vācāsiddhiḥ [g: siddhi] purakṣobham aṇimādiguṇāṣṭakaṁ [k: puraḥ-]).

number of examples of this in the ŚM.[1] In one place we are told that when the adept acquires these accomplishments, the Command is in its most intense state.[2] This amounts to saying that the attainment of these two accomplishments heralds the attainment of liberation. Accordingly, elsewhere in the texts these two accomplishments are associated with the attainment of flight, which in the Kaula Tantras is synonymous with liberation. The text further confirms that this is the case as we are told that these two accomplishments are achieved along with the burning away of the sins of seven lifetimes and so takes place in the eighth when, as we have seen, liberation is attained:

> All sin committed in seven lifetimes by (one's) action or by the mind is destroyed as is a serpent's sloth (and the adept attains) the Accomplishment of Speech, the Arousal of the Body, conquers flight and the rest.[3]

We have seen that there are two degrees of realisation. These correspond to two forms of the Command, one that accomplishes (sādhakājñā) and the other that graces others (anugrahātmikā). The first 'awakens the state of purity'. The second is given by the teacher to the disciple who has been purified. This liberates him and so he is fit, as is his teacher, to liberate others.[4] The sign that the first of these has been received is the attainment of these two accomplishments. Accordingly, the KMT teaches that:

> As long as one has not experienced (jñāta) the Accomplishment of Speech and the Arousal of the Body of (an accomplished) yogi, one will not be happy here in this world, and is bound in the next and (so) should not initiate (others). This is the Command of the Supreme Goddess.[5]

These two aspects of the Command are attained successively when the adept rises to the sphere of the Wheel of the Command. In the following passage we are told in more detail how the Command is the Accomplishment of Speech

---

[1] See ŚM 5/147ab, 153cd, 8/96cd-97ab, 8/120cd, 21/174cd-175ab and 22/13cd.

[2] vācāsiddhiḥ [g: -siddhi] purakṣobhaṁ ājñā [g: ajñā] tīvratarā [kh: tivra-; g: -tavā] bhavet |
ŚM 22/13cd.

[3] saptajanmakṛtaṁ pāpaṁ karmaṇā manasāpi vā |
tat sarvaṁ nāśam āyāti yathā sarpasya [k kh: sarppastu] kañcukaṁ ||
vācāsiddhiḥ [kh: -siddhiṁ; g: -siddhi] purakṣobhaṁ khecarādiprasādhanaṁ | ŚM 22/92-93ab.

[4] KMT 3/108-109.

[5] KMT 3/110cd-111.

that purifies and so leads to the development of the second aspect of the Command, which is liberating grace:

> Next hear (the description) of the division of (the Wheel of) the Command. Omniscience is achieved by just knowing this. They say the transmission (krama) is Śāmbhava from which all things come into being. The foundation (of practice) is the Accomplishment of Speech. The Command is impelled by Speech. (The Command is) Śāmbhavī who is pure Being (bhāvamātrā) and functions as two processes (dvikramā). (In her) extending (aspect) (prathā), she is Rudra's energy and, within Being (bhāvabhūta), (the power) Śāmbhavī.[1] (The former is) authority (adhikāra) and she bestows the qualities of purity. (But) O sinless one, without the Command of Grace (prasādājñā) there is no liberation for anybody. It is said that grace (prasāda) is the transmission (krama). The (liberating) knowledge (of the) Śāmbhava (state) is (attained) by means of the transmission.
>
> The commentary explains: The Wheel of the Command is described (next). The Command is Śambhu's plane, the foundation that bestows the Accomplishment of Speech. Thus the four (levels of) Speech proceed from the Command.[2] Again, that (Command) is Śāmbhavī who is pure being. That same (Command) is Rudra's energy, that Command is Śāmbhavī which abides twofold (as) the Command of Authority and the Command of Grace as the second. Grace (prasāda) is the transmission (krama). The (liberating) knowledge (of the) Śāmbhava (state) is authority (attained) by means of the transmission. It comes about by the state of a pure Self, not otherwise.[3]

---

[1] Cf. KMT 13/55: It is the pure (mātra) practice of the Śāmbhava (state) that takes place (spontaneously) in due order (kramāt). (The Command is) Śāmbhavā established within Rudra's energy of the individual soul (aṇu) and is within (all) states of being (bhāva) and things (bhūta).

[2] Note that this is one of the rare references to the four levels of Speech we find in the Kubjikā sources. We shall have occasion to discuss them further ahead.

[3] . . . ājñābhedam ataḥ śṛṇu ||
yena vijñātamātreṇa sarvajñatvaṁ prapadyate |
kramaṁ śāmbhavam ity āhur yasmāt [kh: -hu-] saṁbhavate 'khilam || *vācāsiddhis [KMT: vācāsiddhes] tu ādhāraṁ vācayājñā [k: vācājñāna; kh: vācājñā ] pravartate|
śāmbhavī bhāvamātrā [k kh: -mātre; KMT: śāmbhavābhyāsamātraṁ] tu dvikramā [kh: -kramāt] saṁpravartate [k: sa-] ||
prathā tu [kh: athaneṇa; KMT: athāṇu] rudraśaktis tu bhāvabhūte sā [k: ṣa; kh: ṣva; KMT: ṣu] śāmbhavī [KMT: śāmbhavā] |
adhikārātmikā hy eṣā viśuddhiguṇadāyikā ||

Notice that according to the ṢSS the Command is impelled by Speech, whereas the commentary says, on the contrary, that Speech is impelled by the Command. But the contradiction is only apparent. Elsewhere the commentary on the ṢSS explains that 'the Command attained in this way and the Accomplishment of Speech are one and the same'[1] and adds a little further on that this accomplishment is the accomplishment of all things and, what amount to the same thing, the Accomplishment of the Command.[2]

If, as most often happens, although the fullness of realisation, which is the complete transmission of the Command, is attained immediately in the course of initiation, it cannot be maintained, then how should one practice? The ṢSS supplies a brief description of the Yogic practice by means of which the Accomplishment of Speech, that stimulates the operation of the Command, develops:

> One should meditate on the light that is within the Cavity of Brahmā (between) the eyebrows (kodaṇḍa). [. . .] Having meditated on it, one conquers Speech. [. . .] The Command functions by his seeing (darśana) and looking (avalokana) (at the Divine Light). The Accomplishment of Speech, which brings about the immediate possession (āveśa) of men, comes about (spontaneously in this way). It is both speech in Sanskrit and the vulgate (prākṛtā vācā). It is the understanding of the wisdom of the scripture. It is attained if one is intent on practice.[3]

The practice consists essentially in maintaining a state of perfect concentration on the energy of the Command that moves through the central channel along the axis of the body, especially when it reaches the centre between na mokṣo vidyate teṣāṁ prasādājñāṁ [kh: -jñā] vinānaghe [KMT: prasādājñā vivarjitā] |

---

prasādaṁ kramam ity uktaṁ kramād [k kh: kramā] jñānaṁ tu śāmbhavam || ṢSS 19/51cd-55 (= KMT 13/53b-57ab).

vyākhyā- ājñācakraṁ kathyate | ājñā iti śaṁbhupadam ādhāraṁ vācāsiddhidaṁ tasmād vākcatuṣṭayaṁ ājñātaḥ pravartate | sā ca [kh: naasti] bhāvamātrā śāṁbhavīti | sā eva rudraśaktiḥ sā ca [kh: nāsti] ājñā śāṁbhavī dvidhā sthitā | adhikārājñā prasādājñā dvitīyā | prasādaṁ kramam | kramād adhikāraṁ śāṁbhavaṁ jñānaṁ śuddhātmabhāvena bhavati nānyathā |

[1] sā [k: sa] ājñā vācāsiddhiḥ | Comm. on ṢSS 19/73ab.

[2] sarvasiddhiḥ tadājñāsiddhiḥ vācāsiddhiḥ | Comm. on ṢSS 19/89.

[3] brahmarandhrāntare jyotsnāṁ kodaṇḍānte [k kh: -ntaṁ] vicintayet |
[. . .] dhyātvā vācāṁ prasādhayet ||
ājñā pravartate tasya darśanāc cāvalokanāt ||
vācāsiddhiḥ prajāyeta sadyāveśakarī nṛṇām |
saṁskṛtā prākṛtā vācā śāstrajñānāvabodhatā [kh: nāṁ] ||
etat saṁpadyate tasya yadābhyāsarato [k: -taṁ] bhavet | ṢSS 19/70ab, 71b, 72cd-74ab.

the eyebrows. Through this practice the adept realises the Śāmbhava state within the Cavity of the Vajra located there and is freed from all practice by the immediate and direct realisation which is perfection in the contemplation of the Command:

> Having contemplated (in this way), one attains Speech. Time is destroyed by just recollecting it. Thus if he practices this way in between the (two) eyebrows (vajrakodaṇḍa), he (shall) possess omniscience, O fair lady, right up to (the type) called action. The current (of the teaching) flows from action (and this leads to) the infallible (energy) that possesses the Command of Speech (vācājñā). Then after that (comes) the Accomplishment of Speech and the Lord of Speech emanates all things. [. . .]
>
> The place within the cavity ('emptiness') of (such a one) is the (location of) the Śāmbhava state, which is the contemplation of the Command (ājñādhyāna). (Attaining that place, the aspirant) is free of all means (to realisation). There is no utterance of mantra, (finite) knowledge, gesture (mudrā), meditation, thought, extent or restraint, no breaking of knots or concentration what to say of the formation of a place (sthānavikalpanā).
>
> He should place (his whole) being (bhāva) in the location (between) the lower and upper cavity (roma). Above is the Knot, below the Bulb (kanda), in the centre there is nothing at all. Know that place to be Śāmbhava characterized as Śiva's Void (śambhurandra). One should not think of anything there. (There is only) a subtle placement (of awareness) in the energy of consciousness (citi). The bliss of knowledge comes about just by recollecting (saṁsmaraṇa) in this way. (One who has realised this) brings about many insights (pratyaya) in others by (his) speech alone.[1]

Concretely, the gross form of the transmission (krama) consists of the series of mantras transmitted through the lineages of teachers, their projection into the body and the maṇḍala, the worship of the deities in it through these mantras along with the corresponding inner movement of the vital energy in the subtle body. The appropriate mantras engender the piercing of the inner Wheels by the Command. For example, referring to the mantra called Twelve Verses,[2] the KMT says:

---

[1] KMT 13/74-75, 78-82.

[2] See KuKu 3/31-32 and note. It is given in full in KMT 18/43.

> This group of ten and two verses is the plane of supreme nectar. When this is recited the Mothers are always aroused. Immediate possession takes place, and (the one who recites it) becomes a poet. Once this is recited, the accomplishment, which is the Piercing of the Command (ājñāvedha) and everything else, takes place.[1]

Just as reciting certain mantras stimulates the emergence of the Command, similarly by depositing the six limbs of the goddess's Vidyā on the body: 'the sins of one who does so are destroyed and the Command (he receives) is intense'.[2] It is said that:

> He who has the Vidyā within (his) body by recollecting (it) attracts (towards himself) with the Vidyā the supreme goal (of life), the best of women (parastrī) endowed with divine ornaments, the supreme nature, good fortune, the supreme scripture, the supreme Command, the supreme knowledge, and the alchemical mercury.[3]

The Command assumes the form of mantras and seed-syllables. These are the concrete sonic form of the Command. The goddess in this way has two aspects. One that is undifferentiated, 'without parts' (niṣkala) and unmanifest, totally hidden, as it were, in the Godhead. The other is differentiated, 'with parts' or 'with energies' (sakala). The latter is the goddess's Vidyā, which is the sonic icon of the Command. Referring to the inner space within the triangular Yoni, the ŚM says:

> O fair lady, thus Śrīnātha[4] sports in the Circle of the Void (śūnyamaṇḍala) and (so does) Kubjikā, the mother of Kula who is Kuṇḍalī by name. She is the will, the goddess who is Mind Beyond Mind (manonmanī) and her form is the Point (bindurūpā). That

---

[1] KMT 18/49-50.
[2] tasya pāpāḥ [kh g: pāpa] kṣayaṁ yānti [g: yāti] ājñā tīvratarā [g: tivra-] bhavet || ŚM 6/74cd.
[3] parārthaṁ [kh: parārtha] ca parastrīṁ [g: parastrī] ca divyābharaṇasaṁyutām [kh: divyāṁbharaṇasaṁyuta; g: -saṁyutā] ||
pararūpaṁ ca saubhāgyaṁ paraśāstraṁ ca vidyayā |
parājñāṁ [kh g: -jñā] ca paraṁ [k kh: tathā] jñānaṁ rasasiddhirasāyanam [k: para-] ||
karṣayet smaraṇād [g: smaraṇā] vāpi vidyā [kh: yasya] yasya [kh: vidyā; g: paśya] śarīragā [g: śariragā] | ŚM 9/97cd-99ab.

Concluding an exposition of the Vidyā of Parāparā, the ŚM (8/121cd-122ab) says that: '(Those who attain this) know the three Commands, Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava.' These three modalities will be discussed further ahead.
[4] MS G: the Śrīnātha of Himavat.

> energy is called Sahajā (the Innate) and is (the state of) oneness with Śiva.
>
> Applied on the plane of mantra and visualization (dhyāna), she who is undifferentiated (niṣkalā) is differentiated (sakalā). When she abides in the differentiated (aspect), she abides as mantra. Undifferentiated, she is devoid of mantra. When she abides in an iconic form, she is gross; she is subtle when present in the aniconic (amūrti) (aspect). Linked to the planes of mantra and iconic she is action impelled on the plane of visualization (dhyāna).[1]

The goddess resides in the centre of her maṇḍala, the core of which is the downward-facing triangle representing the Yoni. There, in the Point (bindu) in the centre of it, she is the Full Moon replete with its sixteen energies. These are the energies of the sixteen pairs of syllables that constitute the goddess's Thirty-two syllable Vidyā. Similarly, the Command is also her seed-syllable mantra that is, in an analogous way, contained in the Point in the centre. The goddess's emergence from the Liṅga is thus understood to be the emergence of her sonic form from the silent Void of the Point. The first form of the Command imparted by the god to the goddess was his mantra. The second form of the Command that she attains in the Liṅga is her Vidyā.

The same is true of the practice of Gesture – mudrā. Like mantra and Vidyā, this too is an aspect of the goddess and hence a form of the Command. In this context Gesture is not some outer movement or positioning of the hands. It is the energy of Kuṇḍalinī that stimulates and directs its rise through the subtle body. By practicing the Triśikhā mudrā (the Gesture of the Three Flames), for example, it is said that 'the Command is at its most intense'[2] within the body.

---

[1] śrīnāthas tu tato [kh: śrīnāthastu mato; g: śrīnāthaṁ himavato] bhadre krīḍate [g: krīḍaṁte] śūnyamaṇḍale [kh: sūnya-; g: sunya-] ||
kubjikā kulamātā ca [kh: tu] kuṇḍalī [g: kuṇḍalā] nāmanāmataḥ |
icchārūpadharā devī bindurūpā manonmanī ||
sā śaktiḥ sahajā proktā śivena saha caikatā |
mantradhyānapade [kh g: mantrā-] yuktā sakalā niṣkalā [kh: niḥkalā] tu yā ||
sakalasthā tu mantrasthā [kh: -sthāḥ] niṣkalā [kh: niḥkalā] mantravarjitā [g: -varjitāḥ] |
mūrtirūpā sthitā [kh: sthita] sthūlā sūkṣmā caiva amūrtagā [kh: amūrtijāḥ; g: amurtagāḥ] ||
mantramūrtipadair yuktā kriyā dhyānapaderitā [kh: -tāṁ] | ŚM 2/12cd-16ab.

[2] pūjanāt siddhimāpnoti triśikhā yasya dehagā |
sphoṭayec chailavṛkṣāṁś ca śoṣayej [kh: soṣayaj; g: śoṣaye-] jaladhīśvarān ||
nānāvijñānakartā ca ājñā tīvratarā [kh: tīvrāntarā] bhavet | ŚM 8/25-26ab.

The Command and the Establishment of the Lineages of Siddhas

The Command contemplated in this way is the Śāmbhava state, which is, as we shall see in greater detail further ahead, the liberated condition itself. It is also the seed of the goddess that generates this realisation, which is transmitted by means of initiation through the lineage of the goddess's spiritual offspring, the lineage of teachers. It is this that gives them the authority to be enlightened teachers. These fully accomplished adepts – Siddhas – are different from their spiritual progeny in that they were the first playmates of the goddess in the sacred places she visits. The goddess tours the world to spread the energy of her divine Command that gives both accomplishment (siddhi) and liberation wherever she fixes her gaze. Pleased with what she sees, she finds a Siddha there who unites with her and thus receives her empowerment. This union neither depletes the goddess of her power nor the Siddha. On the contrary, it transforms him into a Siddha whose divine body is a sign of his now elevated divine nature that he shares with the goddess.

Indeed, it is the goddess herself who is the bliss of the Command.[1] Accordingly, the second chapter of the KMT where these events are narrated is called 'concerning the virgin goddess otherwise known as the Command'.[2] The Command is the teacher's enlightening and purifying power that, out of compassion for his disciple, assumes the form of the deity.[3] In a series of thirty-two principles listed in the KuKh, the goddess who is the Command (ājñā devī) is said to be above Śiva and is followed by the supreme state (parāvasthā)[4] because it is through the Command that it is achieved directly. Accordingly, the Command is regularly identified with the Transmental (unmanī), which is the highest energy in the ascending series of sonic energies through which Kuṇḍalinī rises. Thus the MBT teaches:

> Above is the tranquil (energy called) Śivā. Subtle, she is (the goddess) Vakrikā of the Abyss (kandara) (of the Void) in the supreme (state). O Kujeśvara, the glory (śrī) within that is the glory of liberation. The (blissful) vibration of the Command (ājñāghūrmi) is (thus) attained in the (supreme) faultless and indubitable (reality). If he desires liberation, the one who possesses (this) glory (śrīmat) should abide on that plane. Taking up Being in Non-being,[5] (this) is

---

[1] KuKh 2/10.
[2] The colophon reads: iti kulālikānāye śrīkubjikāmate ājñāparyāyakaumāryādhikāro nāma dvitīyaḥ paṭalaḥ |
[3] See KuKh 33/35cd-36ab.
[4] See KuKh 34/32-33ab.
[5] See Dyczkowski 2004: 51ff. and below, chapter 2, p. 396 ff..

the nature (svabhāva) of one whose is undisturbed (avikṛta). The one whose mind is devoid of desire, and so has been destroyed, quickly reaches the Self. And then the (Supreme) State arises and that state is Śāmbhavī, (otherwise called) Śivā.

Pulsating (lolībhūta) there, he should ascend from the foundation of the root (Wheel) (kandādhāra) as does a monkey (along) a tree, from the soles of the feet up to the top of the head. Then comes liberation in the venerable Śrīkrama.[1] Beyond that is the Transmental.

He should contemplate pure consciousness (cinmātra) in this way until the mind becomes nothing at all. After that if he contemplates the supreme state of power (śakti), even just a little (kiñcid api), he spontaneously realises (svayaṁ cinoti) the Self and, himself the conscious perceiver (cetṛ), discerns (viceti) (all things).

He is himself the knower who is liberated and is the eternal (reality) at the End of Sound. In this way, O Lord, he should abandon delusion. That which is without parts is omnipresent. In the end (even) the intellect of all of those (who have attained this state) is destroyed (kṣīṇā) in (the reality) devoid of arising and abiding. There is nothing higher than this. There is nothing higher than the teacher's Command. One should know this by means of the scripture (āgama) and (tradition of) the line of teachers.[2]

---

[1] This and the other names of the Kubjikā school will be discussed in a following chapter.

[2] ūrdhve [kh: ūrddhaṁ] śāntā śivā sūkṣmā pare kandaravakrikā ||
*tadantaragatā [k, kh: tedaṁtaragatā] yā śrīḥ sā [k: śrī sā; kh: śrī (?)] śrīḥ [k: śrī; kh: (?)] bhuktiḥ kujeśvara [k, kh: bhukti kujesvara] |
nirāmaye niḥsandigdhe [k, kh: ni-] ājñāghūrmiḥ [k, kh: -rmi] prapadyate ||
tat padaṁ āśrayec [k, kh: āśrīye] chrīmān yadi mokṣaṁ [kh: mo mokṣaṁ] samīhate [k, kh: samīhase] |
abhāve bhāvam ādāya [k: -mādaya] svabhāvo 'vikṛtātmanaḥ ||
nirāśākṣīṇacittas [k: -vittas] tu kṣipram ātmānaṁ [k, kh: -tmāna] saṁcaret |
tadā cotpadyate 'vasthā sāvasthā śāmbhavī śivā ||
*lolībhūtaṁ tu tatraiva [k: tatreva] kandādhārāt samāruhet [k, kh: -dhāra * māruhe]* |
tadā śrīśrīkrame muktir vṛkṣanyāyena markaṭaḥ [kh: -ṭa] ||
*āpādatalamūrdhāntaṁ taduttīrṇā tu unmanā [k, kh: * * * * * * unā]* |
tāvat [k: markkaṭa; kh: nāvāt] saṁcintya cinmātraṁ yāvac cittaṁ na kiñcana ||
paścāt śaktyāḥ [k, kh: saktyā] parāvasthāṁ yat [kh: (?)] kiñcid api [kh: (?)] cintayet |
svayaṁ cinoti [k, kh: cinobhi] cātmānaṁ svayaṁ cetā viceti ca ||
*svayaṁ jñānī svayaṁ muktaḥ [k: mukta] nādānte [k, kh: nādāntā] śāśvataṁ [k: sāsvataṁ; kh: sāsvaṁ ] bhavet |
tathā bhrāntiṁ [k, kh: bhrānti] tyajen [k, kh:-je] nātha niraṅgaṁ sarvatomukham [kh: sarvva-] ||
ante kṣīṇā tu [k: kṣīṇāṁstu] teṣāṁ dhīḥ [k: tesaṁdhi] utpattisthitivarjite |[kh: (?)]
*ataḥ parataraṁ [kh: para * ] nāsti gurvājñāyāḥ [k: -yā; kh: (?)] paraṁ [kh: (?)] na hi ||

The Transmental is both the highest point in the ascent and the first, most pristine and universal form of the energy that emerges from the absolute (the 'Neuter'), in which Śiva and Śakti are fused together. As such, the highest form of the Command (śāmbhavājñā) is the supreme goddess (parā) who manifests by their separation.[1] Hidden within the godhead, like the energy in the Liṅga, she is intent, as it were, on performing austerities, that is, on generating within herself her own essential energy. She emerges at the beginning of time as the sprout of Kuṇḍalinī from this, the seed of the universe. As the KuKh says:

> O God, the Divine Command came forth initially in the first Age. That (was the) goddess (who) emerged there in the form of a sprout. (Her) senses subdued, She performed fearful austerity, at the instance of the Divine Command. And so it is that I who possess three aspects and have the form of a humpbacked woman (kubjikā) and am crooked and naked (nagnavāsasā) have become old.[2]

The three aspects of the goddess, as we shall see in detail later, are the three forms in which she manifests as the goddess of the three lineages (oli) or transmissions (krama) that proceed from her as the embodiment of the Command and the god who, the ultimate cause of all things, is the repository of the Command merged within him. Thus, as the KMT puts it:

> The transmission (krama) of the Divine Command (divyājñā), that is, the lineages of the currents of the line of teachers, has emerged (jāta) from Śiva who, without beginning or end, is the supreme cause (of all things).[3]

It is appropriately represented by the Point, which is the Drop (bindu) of seed in the centre of the maṇḍala.

> In centre of that is the (goddess who is the) Gesture of the Transmission (kramamudrā). It is the Command, which is the teacher in the Three Traditions (oli). (The lineages of) the Eldest, the Middling and the Child along with the divine one (divya), the Transmission of the Skyfarers (khecarakrama).[4]

---

ity āgamena [kh: (?)] jānīyād gurupāramparyeṇa [k, kh: -paretya] tu | YKh (2) 11/22-30.

[1] KuKh 3/61.

[2] KuKh 35/78cd-80.

[3] KMT 11/4.

[4] KuKh 3/11.

The teaching spreads in the world of men from the Point, transmitted through the three lineages of the Eldest, Middling and the Child. The Command is said here to be the teacher in the three traditions, not all four.[1] This is because the Transmission of the Skyfarers (khecarakrama) is the Command in its pure, transcendental form. It is the Divine Current, also called the Divine Tradition (divyāmnāya),[2] that extends through the lineage of Skyfarers who reside in the infinite expanse beyond the world of transmigratory existence. It is what is transmitted through the Current of Men. Entry into the Transmission of the Skyfarers is liberation itself. It is the flow of energy through the higher states that are aspects and direct developments of the Transmental, that is, the Command that is both the goal of the teachings and their vitalizing force. As the KuKh says:

> Without a doubt, there is success (siddhi) in this, the best of the traditions (kula) which is the beautiful Divine Current and the Śāmbhava plane. This is the Command, (the energy) that moves in the Sky of Ultimate Reality (kula).[3]

The goddess, the Command, and the transmission are all aspects of this one reality. Thus her devotee exclaims:

> I praise the Mother, the venerable Raudrī, the mother who awakens the universe, she who is everywhere and at all times – the mother of the current of the Great Transmission of the bliss of the Command.[4]

The Command is the 'sprouting' Point in the centre flowing with the energy of the Divine Current, which pours out from the centre without loosing any of its power. Thus the Accomplishment of the Command (ājñāsiddhi) is said to have the form of an 'unbroken circle'. It pierces through a fettered soul at a distance of 100 leagues in an instant.[5] It is liberation itself[6] attained by initiation into the transmission (kramadīkṣā),[7] that is, the consecration of the Command. Initially it spreads to the sacred seats where the Siddhas who propagate the three

---

[1] KuKh 3/19.
[2] see KuKh 2/21cd-26 and KuKh chapter 57.
[3] KuKh 57/76cd-77ab.
[4] ājñānandamahākramaughajananī yā sarvadā sarvagā |
*tāṁ vande * jagatprabodhajananīṁ [-nī] śrīraudrināmāmbikām [śrīraudrināṁm-]* || SP 1/20.
[5] CMSS 8/11-13.
[6] CMSS 9/63.
[7] *kramadīkṣā samākhyātā [gh: samākhyā ] ājñāsiddhipravartikā [k gh: -pravartakaṁ; kh: pravartakaḥ] | CMSS 9/115ab.

transmissions reside. This process is symbolized by the triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala that represents the goddess's Yoni, which is said to be 'threefold, divided by the three traditions'.[1] The womb of the goddess contains all things – both consciousness and its absence. It is pure accomplishment (siddhi), the foundation of the Command that dispenses grace to the wise and chastises the wicked. There, in its source, it is at its most intense.[2] Thus both the Point and the Triangle are the Command. The former is the Divine Current and the latter the Current of Siddhas. Accordingly, each of these traditions and the corresponding transmission (krama) are embodiments of the Command, which, flowing through them, transforms them into its own nature.[3]

The Siddhas are aspects of the god embodied in perfected adepts who have 'accomplished their purpose' (siddha) and reached the goal. They possess yogic power (siddhi) and when they assume their primal, disembodied state, wander freely as liberated Skyfarers (khecara) in the limitless expanse of the one ultimate, divine reality. Although all Siddhas are the same in this respect, they each possess distinct forms of authority, some more extensive, others less so, according to their seniority. As the KMT says:

> By the Command, he gets the quality of lordship and from that he achieves everything if it is given as grace. The Command is enjoined by means of the transmission (krama). Those who known the infallible Transmission of the Command are the elders in the lineage of the transmission.[4]

In this context, the highest members of this hierarchy are the original teachers. They are the first to give initiation in a cosmic Age (yuga). As initiators of a lineage (oli), or sequence of teachers and disciples (krama), they are the progenitors of the family line (santati) associated with the sacred seat (pīṭha) in which they reside from where they transmit the Command and thus propagate the teachings. The Command imparts immediate experience (pratyaya) of the divine, and so the Command of the teacher is said to be its own light.[5]

---

[1] KuKh 3/19.
[2] CMSS 3/11cd-12.
[3] We shall see that this notion is carried over into the Śrīvidyā school, which has adopted the triangle as the nucleus of its maṇḍala, the Śrīcakra, with some modifications. Thus that school ignores the division into transmissions (krama), which are specific to the praxis taught in the Kubjikā Tantras. However, it retains the division into four sacred seats, including the one in the centre of the triangle. From these four, where the Siddhas who founded four traditions reside, are said there to be the places from where the 'group of four Commands' (ājñācatuṣṭaya) emanate.
[4] KMT 3/117cd-118.
[5] KuKh 4/20.

As the mother and leader of the family of these three lineages, the goddess is called Kaulinī, who is the Command in the form of the triangular Yoni. The radiant energy of Kaulinī, the Command, shines effulgent by means of the sequence of the series of masters.[1] At the same time the Command abides within the Absolute even as it flows through the three lineages by means of the transmission.[2] There the goddess, like those who maintain the energy of the Command, attains the plane of Nirvāṇa where she again unites with the god.[3] Thus the goddess is said to have attained the supreme state of Nirvāṇa and, with it, the authority to impart the Command to her male counterpart because she observed and maintained the Command the god gave her. Indeed, she herself, as the Transmental, has come forth from that Command (śāmbhavājñā).[4] It is through that that she becomes manifest in the world in all the ages.[5] By the power of the same Command, she also conceals herself in the Liṅga[6] from which she emerges to transmit the Command to the god. But although the essential nature of the goddess – and indeed also of the god – is the Command, they must both struggle to attain it. This is done by abandoning duality.[7] Once the goddess has it, it is no longer Śiva's Command (śāmbhavājṅā). It is hers (śāmbhavyājñā) and so the god must strive to get it from her, even though the empowering Command she gives to the god is the one she has received from him.[8]

Thus the goddess is the source of the Command in this tradition. Accordingly, Bhairava asks her to reveal the Current of the Transmission (kramaugha) when she comes down into the world. This is the entire transmission, both Divine and Human. It includes the three Siddhas who propagated the latter and the former that propagates the latter from the first seat (pīṭha), symbolically located in the Point in the centre of the Triangle. So the god implores the goddess:

> O Kubjī! I am impelled (i.e. commanded) by you who are the supreme (goddess), the mother of the great current (of the tradition). You are Kubjā, my Supreme Kubjinī. I (am guided by you), then you (are guided) by me. You have taught the Path of the Transmission and their transmission to the group of four (Siddhas who propagate the transmission from the sacred seats). O sinless one! You who possess

---

[1] KuKh 4/17cd–18.
[2] See KuKh 3/18-19.
[3] KuKh 3/63-64ab.
[4] KuKh 3/61.
[5] KuKh 3/69.
[6] KuKh 3/168-169.
[7] KuKh 4/1.
[8] KuKh 3/66cd-68.

> the Command – send forth the supreme Current of the Transmission (kramaugha) that is within you![1]

Up to now we have examined the energy of the Command from the perspective of the god, as it were. From his point of view, his consort, the goddess, is the source of the Command. Indeed, she is the Command. Thus for him, receiving the Command and union with the goddess is the same thing. From another point of view, he is the Command which, veiled by Māyā, has assumed an embodied form. In accord with his divine prototype and exemplar, the initiate regains the power inherent in his essential nature he appears to have lost but was always there, veiled by the impurity of ignorance. We have seen that this is removed by the teacher by means of the power of the Command that pierces and transforms the disciple like alchemical mercury. The mercury that has this power is the vital seed or vitality (vīrya) of the god who assumes the form of the teacher. So, as Bhairava explains in the following passage in the KMT, although the Command is the goddess, without the god it could not come into the world and operate there. Indeed, it is also the god for, as he says:

> As long as Śambhu does not come into the world of mortals with all his being (sarvabhāvena), bearing the form of the teacher, the Śāmbhava form of the 'descent (of power') does not take place. Just as my seed (vīrya), like (the alchemical) mercury (pārada), upon falling to the ground splits into (many) drops, similarly I wander around (in the world) in the form of the most excellent teachers. These teachers are born from my seed (vīrya). They are (my) sons (sūtaka). Purified, they achieve (the goal) by virtue of the fine condiment of the herb of devotion. [. . .] I, who am Kuleśa in the world, grace all things. Although one, I am many. In the condition of a teacher I have shown all things in accord with the intention (bhāva) with which I have been questioned. I am visible here (in this very world) in the lineage (santāna) of the Siddhas. I am constantly present in the form of the teacher whose Command issues forth and functions (saṁpravartate). One should know these teachers to be such. Born from the limbs of my Command, they are like the forms of gold that are of many kinds (only) because of (their) diverse names (such as) belt, bracelet, anklet, necklace, seal and ring.[2]

---

[1] KMT 25/186-188.
[2] KMT 3/91-93, 96cd-100ab.

Clearly, the Command belongs to both the god and the goddess. Indeed, it is initially the god's Command that is transmitted to the goddess when they are betrothed. Then she received the first form of the Command, which purified her, as it were, and gave her the first degree of initiation. It allowed her to see the power and activity of the god's Command operating in the earlier lineages of Siddhas. Although the doctrines concerning the Command are elaborated extensively only in the Kubjikā Tantras, the power of the Command functioned also in previous Kaula schools. Ultimately, the teacher is neither the god nor the goddess but the Command that gives them, as it does anyone who has received it, the authority to impart it to others. Moreover, it is not only the teacher in the lineages of the Kubjikā Tantras; it was also the teacher in the lineages of the Kaula traditions that precede it. This is the teaching the goddess receives from Bhairava who, having agreed to marry her and pleased with her devotion, imparts his Command by which everything was, as the KMT says, 'quickly accomplished' and the goddess was:

> (. . .) shown how everything in the purview of the earlier (Kaula) tradition (pūrvasantānagocaram) was mounted on the seat of the Command and burnt brilliantly with the quality of the bliss of the Command impelled by Śambhu, the endless one.
>
> Then Kuleśvarī, who is the Awakened State, said this: "O Kujeśvara, everything has been shown to me. What is (this) wonder? O Lord, I have come to know everything in the field of action and (its) cause. Tell me, Kujeśvara, how has it been brought about in this way? O Supreme Lord, the (divine) quality of Lordship has originated from the Command. Tell me truly the essence of the purport of the Tantras concerning it. (I have) seen the entire universe by means of your Command. O Kujeśvara, if you are pleased (with me) tell me everything according to the teaching. The essence of (all good) qualities comes from the Command. O god, tell (me) about the (manner in which all good) qualities arise just as everything has been shown (me) by means of the Command.
>
> O Lord, by means of the Command you have imparted the essence of (all) that has occurred in the past, all that has been heard in the previous recitation (of the scripture) (pūrvapāṭha) and the teaching (nirdeśa) of the previous age. O god, the Great Awakening (mahodaya) of the qualities of the Command has been revealed in the past; by falling from that there has been a (general) falling (from the Path), so tell (me) clearly about (that) reality. Mantra, Tantra, Kriyā and Yoga have been explained (but have) not been understood (nāvadhārita). Now, O Lord, tell (me) everything clearly about the > Great Awakening of the qualities of the Command and its power from which all things come into being." [1]

The god goes on to tell the goddess about the previous Siddha Path. Established as the Line of Siddhas hidden in all the Paths, it was revealed to her. The Command flows through the Transmission, that is, the Line of Siddhas who are established in the 'motionless' flow of vitality in the Emptiness of the supreme state, at the apex of existence above the head.[2] We shall have occasion to discuss the previous Siddha Path elsewhere. Here we focus on what this passage tells us about the Command Bhairava imparted to the goddess.

We notice that it functions in two ways, subjectively and objectively. Subjectively, the Command imparts the knowledge of all things. Enlightenment is according to this view the 'Great Awakening of the qualities of the Command'. Through this all things are known. Accordingly, the goddess asks the god what happens when this takes place. The god's answer will be the rest of the KMT. The essence of the teachings of the previous Tantras was revealed to the goddess in a flash by the power of the god's Command. All the mantras, their projections, the gestures (mudrā) and *maṇḍala*s were shown to her in all their forms and aspects. They all derive from the Command and are energized and revealed by it. But this was a preliminary revelation of the outer form of the teachings, as it were; moreover, there has been a fall from the Command and hence from the Path fashioned by the Command by means of which the initiate travels down it. Now the time has come to complete the previous revelation brought about by the god's Command by a thorough understanding of its purport. This is why the goddess wants to know about the Command, its qualities and power because it is through that that all 'good qualities come' and the revelation is completed and fulfilled.

The Command not only grants the omniscience of enlightenment; it empowers those who receive it by imparting, or to be more precise, restoring, the divine attributes of deity. Here they are collectively called 'the quality of lordship' of which the Command, as the power deity, is its source. These two, knowledge and lordship, are the inner subjective benefits of the power of the Command. Objectively, as the goddess says, 'all things come into being' by the power of the Command. From this perspective the Command is the cosmogenic will. The energy that generates the teachings and brings about their realisation is the same power through which the universe is created.

Emanating as the god's omnipotent will, the Command expands out initially into the triangular Yoni that is the matrix of energies from which the universe and the teachings are generated.[1] The lower, upper and middle regions of the world are sustained and pervaded by the energy of the Command in this tripartite form. The goddess tells the god:

---

[1] KMT 1/32-42.
[2] KMT 1/44-46.

> O god, when the moving and immobile (universe) was a void, there were (none of) the endless number of gods, heavenly musicians (gandharva), Yakṣas, Snake (divinities) or Rākṣasas, nor the moon, sun, planets, constellations, hermitages or the Ṛṣis. O god, I did not exist; neither did you. The host did not exist and there were no mountains and forests. In the (one) nondual, formless, and fearsome ocean of darkness (tamas), the Divine Command was impelled out of the Abode of the Supreme Goddess (parāsthāna), the Bliss of Stillness (nirānanda).[2] I am that Energy who emerged (thus). (I who am) Śivā and Śiva's will. This division is that of Śiva and (his) Energy. (In this way) I, the Crooked One (Kuṭilā), have come into being. This is the triple emanation (sṛṣṭi) and its shape is that of a triangle. Pervading it with (its) lower, upper and middle portion, all this exists. The goddess is (thus) on the Path of Kula and contemplates the plane of the Unmanifest. It is because the unmanifest (goddess appears) in manifest form that the emanation (of all things) has been made manifest. (Thus) the love between us which is the unmanifest Sound made manifest has come into being. Both these (the manifest and unmanifest) are (such) by virtue of the Lord's Command by which this universe is created. The entire triple world with all that moves and is immobile is emanated by (the Lord's) will.[3]

At first the god transmits the Command to the goddess that was transmitted through the previous tradition. In this way he gives her the samayā. The word samayā means 'a pledge' or 'rule'. The Initiation into the Rule

---

[1] How the Point is transformed into the Triangle and how both are the Command, is discussed further ahead.

[2] Cf.: Nothing came into being and all things were darkness wrapped in inertia (tamas). The divine Command arose there, in (that) formless ocean. Once again I emanated that (Command) beautiful with the earth and (the other principles of existence).

utpattir [k, kh: utpattiṁ] nāsti sarveṣāṁ andhakāraṁ tamāvṛtam || *tatrārṇave nirākāre [k: -rai; kh: nirākā (?)] divyājñā yā [kh: (?)] samudbhavā [kh: -va] |
*punar eva mayā sṛṣṭā sā [k, kh: ] pṛthivyādimanoramā || YKh (2) 15/12cd-13.

The Śāmbhava state, although dynamic and supremely powerful, is one of perfect stillness (nirācāra). The bliss of that stillness is called nirānanda. See KuKh 2/4cd-6ab and 68/71.

[3] KuKh 35/5cd-12.

(samayādīkṣā) admits the neophant into the Kula, that is, the spiritual family of the teacher, as an ordinary initiate who is entitled to practice the basic teachings and recite the root Vidyā (i.e. mantra) of the goddess which is accordingly called the Samayā Vidyā.[1] In this case, although the KMT does say that the god imparted the samayā to the goddess,[2] the Vidyā may not be meant here as the goddess at this stage has not yet undergone the process that transforms her into Kubjikā, the 'embodied', that is, the iconic form of her Vidyā. Even so, it is clear that she has been given the first form of the Command, the one that bestows authority (adhikārājñā) to practice and allows access to the path. However, it is not until she receives the second form of the Command, that of grace (prasādājñā), that she attains full realisation and, with it, the status of a teacher.

Although the goddess is said to be the 'Awakened State',[3] she is aware that her spiritual awakening is not yet complete. There is further to go. She has been shown and understands 'everything in the field of action and (its) cause',[4] that is to say, the full extent of the praxis of the Tantra, the Command from which it

---

[1] The goddess's Samayā Vidyā consists of thirty-two syllables. Newar initiates accordingly call it battisī vidyā which is a direct translation of the common expression found in the texts dvātriṁśākṣarikā vidyā i.e. the Vidyā of Thirty-two (syllables) (e.g. see KuKh 9/30-31ab). It is extracted in code in the reverse order in KuKh 8/42cd-85ab. In the forward order this variant of the Vidyā is:

BHAGAVATI GHORE HSKHPHREṀ ŚRĪKUBJIKE HRĀṀ HRĪṀ HRAUṀ ṄAÑAṆANAME AGHORĀMUKHI CHRĀṀ CHRĪṀ KIṆI KIṆI VICCE

Recited in reverse, it is the Vidyā of the dark lunar fortnight, that is, the sequence (krama) of the New Moon (ibid. 8/42cd). It is 'transformed into nectar' (amṛtīkaraṇa) by reciting it in the forward order together with five seed-syllables called the Five Praṇavas, that are added in the forward order in the beginning and the same five in the reverse order at the end. Then it becomes the Vidyā of the goddess in her aspect as the Full Moon (ibid. 8/91). It is presented in sixteen parts in the forward order in 9/30-36 and in eight parts in the reverse order in 10/9-12. The thirty-two syllables are extracted again, this time in the forward order in 11/2-10. More than half of chapters 8 (i.e. 42cd to the end) and 9 (i.e. 30 to the end) are dedicated to it. All of chapter 10 is also concerned with the Vidyā, its limbs and faces. The projection of the thirty-two syllables onto the body and their corresponding goddesses are explained in chapter 11 (11/1-17ab). The rest of that chapter is dedicated to the projection of the Vidyā and accompanying mantras into the maṇḍala, how it should be recited in conjunction with the fingers and the fruits it yields, a subject that is treated again in the short chapter 12 that follows. Permutations of the Vidyā appear throughout the Kubjikā corpus. One example is found in chapter 23 of our text (23/21 ff) called the Samayā Vidyā of the goddess of the sacred seat (pīṭheśvarī). It is an expanded form of the Vidyā consisting of 64 syllables (23/21).

[2] Then once the God had given (her) the Rule (samayā) and impelled the Great Goddess (with the words): "Go to mount Kaumāra!", he disappeared in an instant. KMT 1/54, quoted above on p. 12.

[3] KMT 1/34, quoted above, p. 230.

[4] KMT 1/35ab quoted above, p. 230.

originates and the means by which it is fruitful. Even so, she still does not understand how this vision has been transmitted to her. She still needs to realise the full extent of the Command, its true nature, how it operates and, above all, how the 'quality of Lordship has originated from the Command'.[1] Once this is known, her realisation will be complete. The path has been explained, but in order to achieve complete realisation she must follow the god's Command. She must go on a pilgrimage around the sacred land of Bhārata and then, as the god promised, she will attain complete fulfillment by uniting with him. This is both an outer journey and it also takes place within the subtle body. The first place in the inward journey is mount Kaumāra in the Cavity of Brahmā where, as we have seen, the yogi contemplates the Divine Light and thereby sets the Command into operation.[2] From there the goddess will go to the main sacred seats (pīṭha) from which the teachings will flow. In their highest form the seats are above the head at the End of the Twelve within the Triangle. This is the expanded form of the Command that flows out from the Point in the centre identified with Oḍḍiyāna, the first sacred seat (ādyapīṭha) where the Command abides in its original form.

But before she can do this, she must acquire the second form of the Command that empowers her to achieve complete realisation and so become a teacher. She suddenly finds herself alone and is as distressed as she is amazed by what has happened and by the god's disappearance. The first transmission of the Command had shown her what had gone before and empowered her to seek further. She was given some insight but now, without the god who is its source, she is not only separated from the god and feels the pangs of separation, she is also without the Command that imparts insight and knowledge. It is by the power of the god's Command that she is impelled to go to the Island of the Moon in the End of the Twelve and enter the Liṅga in the centre of it to receive the Command in its most complete form. In the Liṅga, the body she has fashioned for herself, she practices the Yoga of the Command. By piercing the Wheels with the energy of the Command as described above,[3] she merges into the energy of the Command. This is the highest form of Yoga through which the goddess and all who share in her achievement attain the omniscience realised in Śiva's state

[1] KMT 1/36ab quoted above, p. 230.
[2] ṢSS 19/70 ff. quoted above, p. 218.
[3] Cf.: The states develop in strength for those who have been pierced by the invisible piercing (parokṣavedha). Then the destruction of impurity (malakṣaya) takes place. This is the Supreme Goddess's Command. (Thus) the initiation that bestows the Yoga of the Command, which can be performed even at a great distance (yojanāśata) has been explained. KuKh 33/17-18ab.

The Sanskrit of the last sentence reads: yogadā kathitā dīkṣā ājñāyā yojanāśataiḥ |
Compare this with ŚM 13/260cd quoted above (p. 215, note 3,): tena vedho bhaved devi yojanānāṁ śatair api |

(śāmbhavāvasthā).[1] This is the supreme state of the Command, the attainment of which the Kubjikā teachings claim is their prerogative and unique pride. From this the goddess emerges in her differentiated (sakalā) iconic form, as the will from which the universe is emitted[2] that she has encompassed within herself when she withdrew into the Liṅga.

In the Liṅga the goddess stimulates herself to this supremely blissful condition. Out of the Liṅga, she is a Yoginī performing tiresome austerities. In both cases, she seeks the Command by herself. Bhairava is also alone while she is on her spiritual quest. But he has no success by himself and so he seeks to get it from her. The degree he has exerted himself to this end and his frustration has purged him of sexual desire for his mate. He wants the Command from her, nothing else. The texts allude that the god gave his Command to the goddess so that he may receive it. The god achieves and maintains his supreme status as the lord of creation, master (svāmitva) and teacher by giving the Command to the goddess. It is because she possesses this status that he can have it also.[3] Thus the god pleads:

> O goddess, is it because I have little intelligence and you consider me to be a dullard that you are confusing me? O mistress of the gods, why (are you doing this)? I am the omnipresent agent (of all action) and (yet) I am guided (avadhiṣṭhita) by your Command. Therefore, out of compassion (for me), O goddess, tell me the knowledge that is the great arising (of enlightenment).[4]

Of all the reasons the god advances to convince the goddess to do this, the most persuasive is his sincere devotion to her. Bhairava's intention is indeed purely spiritual and the measure of this intention is the degree of his devotion. Impelled by it he pleads:

---

[1] In the KuKh (31/88cd-89) we read:

O god, the knower of Yoga who has attained the goal in this yogic practice makes all things visible to the senses wherever they may be. O Great God, one who has accomplished Yoga becomes Bhairava Himself.

One who attains the liberated Śāmbhava state is said to gain the power to perceive all things (see KMT 13/57cd = ṢSS 19/56ab quoted above p. 210, note 2). Clearly the form of Yoga meant here is that of the Command (ājñāyoga).

[2] The KMT (16/104cd) declares: This Command is the energized (sakalā) goddess. The birth of this (universe) is from the Divine Command.

[3] Cf. KuKh 4/51cd-52ab.

[4] KuKh 35/74cd-76ab.

> There within (the Liṅga) (tatrodare) is the entire universe, the (individual) transmission (krama) as well as the Great Transmission (mahākrama). O great goddess, (I am the one who) desires the Command here in (this) life. O supreme mother! Having entered that (liṅga), give me, for the sake of (my) devotion, the knowledge that is the Great Transmission.[1]

The Command must be received with devotion. Ultimately, the sole criterion of the disciple's fitness to receive the Command is his devotion to the teacher, deity and the scripture. The Command descends into the world when there is devotion in the disciple and the Command,[2] that is, knowledge,[3] is in the teacher. Everything follows from that and is preceded by it. Devotion leads to the development of good personal qualities and moral values. It is only through devotion that one receives the Command. As the KMT puts it, 'the Command of devotees is transferred (from one to another); that of those who are not devotees is not.'[4] The devotee knows that whatever devotion he may have, it is not due to his own merit, however much he may have taken care to maintain and develop it. It is by the power of the deity's Command that he is devoted to the transmission (kulakrama), just as it is due to this that his consecration into the tradition took place and he received its fruits.[5] Accordingly, Bhairava says that he is guided by the goddess's Command even before he has received the full transmission of it. By the grace of the teacher's Command it operates constantly within the disciple.[6] It is a reciprocal process. Devotion evokes the Command and the Command feeds it. This is because both are essentially the power of the deity:

> He whose inner Self is triply pure and possesses devotion in all its limbs, should worship the Lord (nātha) with devotion (bhakti). (Thus) he obtains everything. Devotion is power.[7] It is by means of power that one understands the transmission (krama). By means of the transmission one understand Speech and by Speech the Command is set into operation. Some part of the teacher's Command is transmitted (to the disciple) with the same feeling (bhāva) with which he serves (upāsayet) the teacher (gurudeva).[8]

---

[1] KuKh 4/22-23ab.
[2] KuKh 4/23cd-24ab.
[3] KuKh 5/25.
[4] ājñā kramati bhaktānāṁ abhaktānāṁ na saṁkramet | KMT 19/31cd; cf. KMT 3/107.
[5] KuKh 31/90.
[6] KuKh 37/19cd.
[7] yā bhaktiḥ sā bhavec chaktiḥ |
[8] KMT 13/60-62.

Misplaced devotion is a defect. The teachings should not be given to one who is devoted to other deities.[1] But one who is pure by virtue of his deep, heart-felt devotion (bhāvabhakti) for the goddess and her consort is detached from the world (virakta) and hence fit to receive the teaching. Caste or social status is no consideration – only devotion. [2] Once the devout aspirant has received the teaching, in order to maintain his devotion and for it to grow and develop, he must take care to keep himself pure in what he does, thinks and says. This triple purity gives him the courage to pursue the spiritual path and face its many arduous trials. This is required of the teacher no less than the disciple. As the KuKh says:

> The triple purity abides by action, mind and speech in one who is the darling of devotion (bhaktivatsala).[3] The Command of (such a one) abides within (his) disciple. Otherwise the disciple will certainly fear the bondage of the fettered. One who is devoid of deep spiritual feeling (bhāva) is not successful.[4]

But this is not enough. In order to advance on the Path one must know the tradition, that is, the teachings and transmission (krama). True teachers possess the awakened consciousness of an intensely powerful Command and so can enlighten their disciples as to the meaning of the goddess's scripture – the Śrīmata.[5] The world is devoid of the transmission of the Command (ājñākrama) and that transmission (krama) is in the Kubjinīmata (also called Śrīmata), the scripture of the goddess. The teachings (jñāna) of the Tantras of other schools are only partial and so are erroneous. They are only found in this scripture, which is free of error. The 'entire ocean of Kula, which is the bliss of the Command', which is present only partly in the other scriptures, is imparted here completely and without error. [6]

Even after the teacher has initiated the disciple and imparted the Command, the disciple must continue to serve the teacher and learn all these things from him. In this way he abides by the Command he has received and it grows in power. He must be careful first of all to please the teacher who is the concrete embodiment of the deity and his link to it. Until one experiences the teacher's compassion, there is no success (siddhi).[7] Even so, the disciple must try

[1] KuKh 41/48.
[2] KuKh 32/66cd-67ab.
[3] This set expression appears as many as six other times in the KuKh (viz. in 28/119cd, 30/134cd, 30/143ab, 32/61cd, 33/35ab and 33/45ab) thus stressing the importance of this triple purity.
[4] KuKh 26/44-45ab.
[5] KuKh 32/34.
[6] KMT 20/79-81ab.
[7] KuKh 36/115.

to gain deeper insight into the scripture and cultivate the devotion and insight he has:

> If one has perceived everything by means of the teacher, scripture and oneself (gurutaḥ śāstrataḥ svataḥ),[1] then one is said to be a (true) member of the tradition (kramika) and he is equal to the transmission. There is no liberation when practicing the Command until one has known the tradition (āmnāya). O fair lady, one should satisfy the teacher and reality (artha) internally and externally.[2]

Again:

> (The disciple) should not leave the teacher's family (kula) when the bliss of the Command arises (within himself) to (acquire) the power (sāmarthya) (of being a teacher in his own right) until he has

[1] This line appears in several Tantras. Abhinava refers to the Kiraṇāgama and the Niśāṭanatantra as two such sources. The intended meaning is probably simply that liberating knowledge comes from these three sources of which the teacher is the most important, followed by the scripture and then one's own personal insight – and, the KMT adds, by implication, one's own faithful devotion to the teacher and the scripture. Abhinavagupta changes this order. His interesting interpretation is inspired by the intention to establish that in a few rare cases, it is possible that the same liberating insight (called 'sound reasoning' – sattarka – in the following passage), which comes from the teacher and scripture by means of initiation, develops spontaneously by itself (svataḥ). Those who become teachers in this way are, according to Abhinava, 'unformed' (akalpita) and 'spontaneously enlightened' (sāṁsiddhika). In the TĀ he explains:

> This sound reasoning (tarka) arises for some by itself. Such a one is in the scripture termed 'spontaneously enlightened' (sāṁsiddhika), his nature being such that the insight he has is his own (svapratyayātmaka) (independent of instruction). As is also said in the Kiraṇāgama: '(Insight cames) from the teacher, the scripture and oneself (in this order).' Of these that which comes later in this series is the (more) primary while that which comes before serves as a means for that which follows. TĀ 4/40cd-42ab

Further ahead Abhinava adds:

> That master who, even though unformed (akalpita), has by the confirmation (from other masters or scriptures) strengthened (his conviction as to the genuineness of his enlightenment) being thus further purified is Bhairava in person (sākṣāt). This is the case because the personal insight into the knowledge one gains by putting into practice the procedures laid down in the scriptures (śāstrakrama) and (attending) to the wisdom (prajñā) of a master who knows them, is full and perfect (pūrṇa) and so leads to the realisation of one's authentic identity as Bhairava (bhairavāyate). This is the reason why it is said in the Kiraṇāgama that this knowledge is born of the master, scripture and oneself and in the Niśāṭanatantra that it has three causes (pratyaya). Again (these three sources of insight), manifest (variously) according to whether (they operate) in unison, in reverse order or individually. TĀ 4/76cd-79.

[2] KMT 13/58-59.

> generated (all his yogic and spiritual) qualities. During the day he should be intent on (carrying out the teacher's) orders (preṣaṇa) and at night he should take up (the pursuit of) knowledge (jñānaparigraha). In this way he achieves all the power (sāmarthya) (he needs in his) teacher's family. He should not go anywhere unless he is sent there, nor should he do anything superfluous (ulbaṇa)[1] or the like.[2]

The disciple must take care in every way to keep the teacher's Command. This means literally that the disciple must do what the teacher tells him to do. It also implies being faithful to the spiritual power and grace he has received, maintaining it by reverent service of the teacher and the deity. A good disciple should always be intent on the inner practice of Yoga, attend to outer ritual (kramapūjā) and observe the teacher's Command. In this way he will attain the Kaula accomplishment (kaulikī siddhi), which is liberation.[3] One who knows the Command and its power and, well concealed, worships the teacher, quickly achieves success (siddhi).[4] The most intense form of the Command is the fruit of continuous practice and the observance of the vow to practice according to the teachings. Thus Bhairava teaches in the ŚM:

> O goddess, one should practice the (inner Yoga of the) Vow of Gesture (mudrāvrata) in this way. The wise man, one-pointed and firm

---

[1] One could also translate: make a show of his power.
[2] KMT 10/107-109ab
[3] yogābhyāsaparo [k, g, gh, ṅ, c: -parā] nityaṁ kramapūjārataḥ [ṅ, c: -ratat] sadā ||
ājñādhāraṁ guror vākyaṁ śailisaṁketalakṣaṇam [all MSs: saili-] |
tasya siddhir bhaved devi [k, kh, g: devī] kaulikī mokṣadāyinī [c: -dāyaṇīṁ] || CMSS 4/3cd-4.

Liberation is commonly conceived in the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras to be an accomplishment – siddhi. It is also understood to be the supreme accomplishment (parāsiddhi) by sophisticated Kashmiri Śaivites, although for them this may not necessarily imply (as it does in the Tantras) that it is an accomplishment – siddhi – like the others albeit the highest attained through the practice of mantras and other means taught in them. The Kaula Tantras and Kaula traditions attached to the Bhairava Tantras arrogate this accomplishment to themselves by referring to it as a specifically Kaula one. Abhinavagupta himself endorses this view in his commentary on the Parātriṁśikā. One of the reasons Abhinavagupta chose to write a commentary on it is because he finds there a reference to Anuttara – the absolute which literally 'has none superior to it'. This term which appears for the first time in Kashmiri Śaiva texts in Abhinavagupta's work, is very rare in the Śaivāgama, just as, conversely, it is quite common in the exegetical works of the Anuttarayoga Tantra division of the Buddhist Vajrayāna, where it denotes the Emptiness (śūnya) realised upon the attainment of Buddhahood. According to this text, Anuttara bestows kaulikī siddhi – for which Abhinava supplies several explanations in his long commentary (see Jayadeva's translation 1988: 31-35, 46-47, 49-50 and 97).
[4] KMT 25/184.

> in his Vow, who practices for twelve years, possesses the most intense form of the Command and he attains the (eight) yogic powers. Then he should exert (his) authority and take support in the strength of the Command. He should adorn (like an) ornament (the lineage) and observe the teacher's Command.[1]

However, success is only possible if the disciple is fit to practice. Thus the KMT warns the teacher that:

> Due to obstructions (and other limitations) the Command is not (transmitted) completely and is defective. When the right time comes, the disciple comes to know everything, just as ripe fruit is tasty. (A fruit) without juice is not tasty – (on the contrary, it tastes sour) like eating a wood sorrel (amlaphala); similarly the effort exerted to (impart) knowledge to immature students is useless. Even if (the teacher) does impart the Command by dint (of his own) power, the proud disciple, consumed by human infirmities (ūrmi),[2] is destroyed by pride.[3]

When the disciple is given the first initiation (samayādikṣā) he is told a number of rules (samaya), both prohibitions and injunctions, that he must observe.[4] Although a good number relate to the cult, more essentially they relate to the development and maintenance of his basic moral condition. The Command and its operation are intimately related to this. The Tantra unambiguously admonishes that:

> One who desires success (should not suffer from) greed, delusion or craving. He should not disobey (the teacher's) Command, (or be) haughty, suffer from greed (laulya) or be attached to the objects of sense.[5]

---

[1] anena vidhinā devi mudrāvrataṁ [g: -vrata] samācaret ||
dvādaśābdaṁ [g: -vdaṁ] cared dhīmān [kh: -mānn] ekacitto [kh: -cittā; g: -citta] dṛḍhavrataḥ |
ājñā tīvratarā [kh: -tarās; g: -tarī] tasya [k: yasya] aṇimādiguṇān labhet ||
tato 'dhikāraṁ [g: missing] kartavyaṁ [g: vatodhe] ājñābalaṁ [kh: -le; g: la] samāśrayet [kh: -śriyet] |
śāsanaṁ [k: bhūṣaṇaṁ; g: āsanaṁ] bhūṣayed [g: -ye] devi [g: devī] guror ājñāṁ prapālayet ||
ŚM 20/68cd-70.

[2] Lexicons list these as six: grief (śoka), delusion (moha), old age, death, hunger and thirst.

[3] KMT 13/63-66.

[4] Concerning these rules see chapter 37 of the KuKh where they are listed.

[5] KuKh 37/26cd-27ab.

The disciple should observe the rules with devotion, otherwise his practice will not bear fruit. True disciples possess both knowledge and understanding and carry out the teacher's Command. They are pure and thought-free, selfless and detached.[1] Those disciples who remain subject to the deluding power of obscuration (tamas) are those who have received the Command without the transmission (akramājñā) or to whom the Command has been revealed by force, that is, when they were not ready to receive it. They do not respect the rules nor follow the teacher's Command. They always delight in conflict and look for faults in others. Indifferent to the teacher's elevated spiritual state, they are in constant disagreement with him and seek to find defects in him and others. Once they have brought about discord, they turn away from him.[2] Seeing faults in the teacher is especially harmful to the disciple, because it is by realising that the teacher has attained the highest state that the disciple can attain it also. Although it is ultimately the deity that gives the Command, it is transmitted by means of the teacher who has realised it within himself.

If the disciple transgresses the Command of the deity and the teacher, it will progressively lose its potency. The flow of its energy from the deity through the teacher to the disciple is disrupted (ājñābhaṅga).[3] When this takes place the disciple is cut off from the blissful energy of the deity, and so is distraught and worried. Initially, he will forfeit his status as a member of the spiritual clan (gotra) and be as he was before he received initiation.[4] Then, like someone who has been expelled for some misdeed from his caste, other initiates should not talk to him and avoid his company on pain of themselves forfeiting the Command.[5] Condemned to hell after death and without any good fortune (kalyāṇa) in this life[6] and overcome with worry day by day,[7] he will be worse off than before. Like all those who are devoid of devotion he will be bound by Māyā, the goddess Kuṇḍalinī.[8] In short, just as the teacher can impart the Command to a disciple fit to receive it, he can also take it away from one who errs. Thus the authority of the Command is of two kinds, one is the power to restrain or punish (nigraha) miscreants and the other to grace (anugraha).[9] So, if he has erred, the disciple

---

[1] KuKh 32/35.
[2] KMT 12/2-6.
[3] See KuKh 4/28cd-31ab and note.
[4] KuKh 4/14-16ab.
[5] na tena saha saṁbhāṣaṁ [kh, g: saṁbhāṣyaṁ] teṣāṁ saṅgaṁ [g: saṁga] ca [k kh: tu] varjayet | kṛte tu cājñāharaṇaṁ [k: ājñā-; g: cājñāharaṇa] prāyaścittī [g: prāyaścittaṁ] bhavet tadā [kh: sadā] || ŚM 23/33.
[6] KuKh 32/29.
[7] KuKh 4/28cd-30.
[8] KuKh 14/107-108a.
[9] KMT14/61ab.

should make every effort to revive the positive power of the Command by repeating the goddess's Vidyā as a penance.[1]

The teacher, no less than his disciple, must take care to fulfill his obligations. He should impart the Command he has received to the disciple once he is fit to receive it. Just as his disciple practices the austerity of true devotion by serving him in every way, the teacher has done the same before him for his teacher. He should therefore understand his disciple's condition and the difficulties he has resolutely faced for the sake of the Command. Thus the KMT warns:

> If one's body is blissful by virtue of the means based on the austerity of serving (the teacher and the deity) (anuṣṭhāna), one should exercise one's authority. That is the post (pada) of one who has the Command.[2]

Similarly, the KuKh teaches:

> The disciple, who has the requisite qualities and has been variously tested, deserves initiation by means of the most intense Command (transmitted through the teacher's) gaze. Otherwise, if (the teacher) initiates a neophant who has opposite aims (to the correct ones), (then both) that teacher and student will go to the Raurava hell.[3]

The Command can be that of the goddess or that of the god, the teacher or the entire lineage of Siddhas. It is transmitted through the lineage of the Siddhas who are accordingly said to guard it.[4] The 'oldest lineages' (jyeṣṭhāvali) that are common to all the Western Tradition generate the Command of radiant expansion (saṁsphurājñā).[5] Accordingly, when the neophant receives the consecration, he

---

[1] lakṣajāpyena [g: -jāpena] saṁśuddhis [k: saṁśuddhiḥ] tataś cājñā pravartate | ŚM 23/34ab.

[2] KMT 10/111 read; tatpadam for tatpade in accord with the reading in ṢSS 17/128b.

[3] KuKh 32/64cd-66ab.

[4] After listing a series of teachers, the KuKauM declares that:

They will exert (their) authority in (each) town, village and city, (and) the cause (of this authority) is to guard the Command in order to grace the disciples.

adhikāraṁ kariṣyanti nagare grāmapaṭṭane | [gh: ?]
śiṣyām anugrahārthāya [k: śiṣyā ma- – - – pi; kh: śiṣyāṁ ya--yi] ājñāpālanakāraṇam ||

KuKauM 1/167.

[5] Referring to the teachings of the oldest lineage, the goddess says to the god:

should ask for the Command of all the Siddhas, not just that of his teacher and the deity.[1] Similarly, the Mothers bestow the accomplishment of the Command (ājñāsiddhi) in the lineage of the Kula of the accomplishment of the Command.[2] When the Yoginīs are pleased, the Command that the adept has received grows in intensity. This happens, for example, when he eats the sacrificial pap (caru) in the prescribed manner. This may also be a part of Siddhānta ritual. But in that case it is a vegetarian dish prepared from rice or boiled grains. Here it is meat or fish. If he eats it recollecting Bhairava's Command, then instead of polluting him, on the contrary, it:

> (. . .) quickly reduces the sin committed up to the end of seven lives and all the bad action that has been accumulated. [. . .] The Yoginīs are pleased with him and he certainly gets what (he) desires. He obtains all good fortune and the fruit of all desire. His Command is most intense. He acquires all the accomplishments. All his mantras are successful and they give him what he wants.[3]

The Goddess, the Liṅga and the Triangle

Now that we have had a look at the purpose of Kubjikā's presence in the world and the nature of her spiritual power and that of the teachings and the Siddhas who have transmitted them, we turn to its abode and source – the Liṅga and the goddess's Yoni, the Divine Triangle. We have seen that the later Kubjikā Tantras adds numerous additional details to the myth of the goddess narrated in the KMT. Amongst them are excursions into the symbolism the Liṅga of the goddess to which the Kumārikākhaṇḍa devotes a great deal of space in the course

---

O lord, by your grace, I have known the transmission that is common to all. Auspicious and appropriate, it impels the Command of radiant expansion.

sarvasādhāraṇaṁ nātha kramaṁ [ṅ: cakraṁ] caiva śubhocitam [g: śubhoditaṁ;ṅ: sūvoditaṁ] || tvatprasādena [ṅ: tvanprasadena] me jñātaṁ [k: sūtaṁ; ṅ: jāta] saṁsphurājñāpravartakam [kh: sasphurājñā-; g gh: sasphurājñā-; ṅ: saṁskārā jñāpravarttanī] | KuKauM 2/7cd-8ab.

[1] *ājñāṁ [kh g: ājñā] saṁprārthya [kh: * prārthya; g: prārthe] ca siddhānāṁ suvinīte suvatsale [g: suvitsale]* | ŚM 20/47ab.

[2] KMT 25/172ff. especially, 25/175ab.

[3] bhasmasāt kurute śīghraṁ [kh: śighraṁ] yathāraṇye hutāśanam [kh: hutāśana] |
saptajanmāntikaṁ pāpaṁ duṣkṛtaṁ [kh: duṣkṛta] yad upārjitam || [. . .]
yoginyas tasya tuṣyanti īpsitaṁ labhate dhruvam [kh g: dhrūvaṁ] |
sarvasaubhāgyam āpnoti survakāmaphalaṁ labhet ||
ājñā tīvratarā tasya sarvasiddhyāruho [k: -siddhayoruho; g: -siddhāruhon] bhavet |
sarve [kh g: sarva] mantrāḥ [kh: maṁtrā] prasiddhyanti kāmikaṁ [k: kāmaiva] ca dadanti [k: vadanti; g: dadasthi] te [g: teṁ] || ŚM 26/149, 154-155.

of narrating in its own way the myth in chapters three to six as well as elsewhere. This is primarily because the Liṅga is identified with the core of the goddess's maṇḍala, an association which, although quite natural, is entirely absent in the earlier Kubjikā Tantras, although we shall see that its basic features are already presented in some form in the KMT. Another point of divergence from the KMT concerns the context and manner in which the myth is presented, rather than its contents. The account in the KuKh is not just a mythical narrative. Woven into it are compact expositions of doctrine, particularly concerning the goddess's maṇḍala – which is the sole subject of the preceding two chapters of the KuKh. Shifting from myth to doctrine, the narrative is often hard to follow also because the language is dense with terminology that serves to denote features of inner yogic states of which the maṇḍala and its contents are understood, in this context, to be symbols. This is particularly true of the part of the maṇḍala to which these chapters are dedicated: its triangular core, which is both the goddess's Liṅga and her Yoni. The myth supplies the outer forms that function as symbols that compactly compress a wealth of doctrine into an image – the Liṅga and the Yoni – or a geometric figure – the Point and the Triangle. These are more than technical terms. The range of denotation of a technical term is limited and so may be explained in just a few words. But this not the case with a word like 'Liṅga'. It denotes much more than its literal meaning (a phallus) or its technical sense (a representation of Śiva). That is why the practitioner seeks to know what the Liṅga is, not just what the word (Liṅga) means. Such words denote the whole of reality and are, in a sense, what they denote. The Liṅga does not just symbolize a supreme spiritual reality – it is it. It is not the outer, physical stone. This is the Liṅga into which the goddess is transformed.

The narrative of the texts is set in three forms of discourse we may call mythical, mystical and metaphysical. The first refers to the world of the myth that unfolds in its own mythical space and time. This is the world in which the events take place that explain the origin of things. Specifically, the myth records the origin of the sacred realities that enshrine the ultimate principles of existence through which they can be experienced and attained directly. Amongst them are the origins of the goddess herself, her relationship with the god, the power through which the teachings are transmitted and made effective as means to their various goals, both mundane as well as the ultimate liberating realisation. The myth explains how the teachings were first transmitted, to whom and where. Thus it accounts for the sacred geography whose landmarks are the mythical places where this occurred, drawn from the physical and cultural landscape of the outer world and projected into it. It also explains how and in what form they are projected inwardly and the sacred, soteriologically effective realities to which they correspond. Foremost amongst them are the maṇḍala, the main deities and their divine attendants within it, their mantras and the corresponding ritual. In short the Krama, that is, the content of the transmission.

Mystical discourse is the language of religious experience. Drawing from the vocabulary used to describe sensory perception, emotions and states of being, it attempts, however inadequately, to articulate it. The attempts that mystics have made to tell others what they have experienced have resulted in some of the finest poetry and prose mankind has produced. In India, as elsewhere, it has also led to the third form of discourse, the metaphysical. The states of being the mystic (that is, the yogi and devotee) experiences are understood to be metaphysical entities or 'spheres of existence'. His progress through successively more elevated states of being is understood to be an ascent along a ladder of metaphysical principles or 'planes'. The rungs of numerous such ladders are listed and often described in the language of symbols – but also directly, in all Tantric traditions. Some of them recur frequently; others are uncommon or even unique, although generally even in those cases the rungs themselves are well known but their arrangement is unusual. The highest rung at the end of the ladder is thus at once the highest state of being, the supreme metaphysical principle and the most encompassing symbol.

Combining these three perspectives the Kubjikā Tantras refer to it in metaphysical terms as the Śāmbhava plane, which is the mystical state attained 'at the extremity of the energy that emerges from the Liṅga',[1] its symbol. Although the central and most important events in the myth narrated in the KMT are the goddess's assumption of the form of a Liṅga and her emergence from it, the KMT and its most closely related sources hardly refer to this Liṅga again, yet alone discuss its nature – except in the Mālinīstava, the hymn Bhairava intones to the goddess in the Liṅga. This is a startling fact considering the immense amount of attention it receives in the subsequent Kubjikā Tantras, especially in the KuKh and YKh of the MBT. Indeed, there it assumes a central role.

According to the MBT, this Liṅga is an aggregate of the goddess's energies and is the divine abode (āśrama) of the Command,[2] just as the maṇḍala is that of the deity. Indeed the Liṅga is a form of the Command which, free in every way of ignorance, is the authority of the tradition transmitted through the lineages of teachers.[3] The goddess resides there sustained by the most intense form of the Command.[4] Indeed, it is the essential nature of the goddess who resides within it in five aspects or forms of energy which embody the main modalities in which the goddess manifests as Mantra (for male deities), Vidyā (for

---

[1] MāSt line 124.
[2] KuKh 4/24.
[3] KuKh 4/25.
[4] KuKh 4/11cd-12ab.

female ones), Mudrā, Yoginī and the deity of the Kula.[1] Accordingly this, the Divine (divya) Liṅga, full of the energy of the goddess's austerity[2] which is her effulgent power (tejas), is called the Liṅga of Power (tejoliṅga). The body of the goddess is invisible, hidden in the Liṅga which, made of pure gold,[3] moves like the flame of a lamp[4] that burns in the centre of the maṇḍala. This flame is identified with both the entire Vidyā of the goddess[5] and her seed-syllable.[6] The Divine Liṅga is thus sustained by the most intense form of the Command, that is, the one enshrined in the goddess's Vidyā and seed-syllable. Thus, the goddess who resides within it[7] is the energy of Speech that shines with the light of the energies of the letters.[8] It is also called the Liṅga of Space (ākāśaliṅga) because it is the supreme plane of repose of the authority of the Command, the Supreme Nirvāṇa of Space, translucent and brilliant like pure crystal. [9] The goddess is the solitary Liṅga of the Space also because all manifestation merges into her, leaving behind the Void or Sky of the transcendent,[10] the womb of emanation replete with the potencies of manifestation.

The goddess must come out of the Liṅga to impart the Command which is her very being, and so generate the transmission (krama) and her spiritual family (kula), the tradition, along with all of manifestation. Even so, she perpetually resides in the Liṅga because the Liṅga is the abode of the Fourth State (turīya), beyond waking, dreaming and deep sleep, in which she experiences absolute reality;[11] this experience can never change or diminish. In the centre of the maṇḍala, the Divine Liṅga streams with the series of states that accompany the Yoga of Nirvāṇa.[12] This is Divine Current (divyaugha) that flows through the Void of ultimate reality. Thus this, the one true Liṅga, is said to be the Skyfarer (khecara) who moves in the expanse of transcendental reality.[13] As such it is the supreme principle, the current of consciousness and the very nectar of immortality.[14] Proceeding directly from the flow within the Liṅga of the

---

[1] KuKh 4/21.
[2] KuKh 5/22-23.
[3] The Liṅga is said to be made of gold to symbolize its luminous, igneous nature and its great value. For the same reason it is also said to be made of jewels (KuKh 3/53).
[4] KuKh 5/27.
[5] KuKh 7/51cd-52ab.
[6] KuKh 8/77.
[7] KuKh 4/11cd-12ab.
[8] MāSt line 124.
[9] MāSt lines 39 and 125 and note.
[10] KuKh 5/18.
[11] KuKh 5/76.
[12] MāSt 125.
[13] KuKh 5/22-23.
[14] KuKh 14/71cd-72abc.

Command, it streams out when the goddess who is the Command emerges out of it. Gracing first of all the god, who thereby becomes the first Siddha and thus 'supreme and divine, the Śāmbhava Command (śāmbhavājñā) was transmitted (krāmitā) unbroken'.[1] Thus the Liṅga is also identified with the first sacred seat (ādyapīṭha), where the essential nature of the deity and the maṇḍala is located.[2] It instantly brings about a divine state of penetration or possession (āveśa) by the deity of the recipient of its Command.[3]

The Devīliṅga – Precedents and Parallels

The concept of a Liṅga representing the goddess, however paradoxical it may seem to those who are familiar with it as the main representation of the god Śiva,[4] is not entirely unknown. Bonazzoli came across it in his research in the Purāṇas where he noticed the occurrence of the term 'Devīliṅga'. This term is rare in Sanskrit sources in general. It does not occur in the Kubjikā Tantras but even so, the concept the name suggests is very well represented there. Bonazzoli, who published a brief preliminary survey of this term, notes that:

' . . . At all levels – iconographic, cultic, philosophical, literary, mythical – Liṅga and Devī have often been directly connected and interrelated. . . . '. He supplies the following examples: '. . . when Liṅga means simply a mark, when it conveys the idea of divine image or more technically Śiva's Liṅga and finally when it implies the meaning pradhāna [Fundamental Nature]. The parallelism between them is so narrow that even at the practical level 'aniconic stones' can represent Śiva Liṅgas and stone blocks are venerated as '*devī's svayambhumūrti*s [spontaneously produced icons]. Devī is viśvasya bījam [the seed of the universe], like Śiva and together with Śiva she is the cause of all the Śiva Liṅgas in heaven, on earth and in the underworld. Devī can be represented by a Liṅga because she stands there [i.e. is present within it] – liṅgasthā – and she is Liṅga by nature – liṅgasvarūpiṇī. The identification seems perfect.'[5]

Indeed, according to the Skandapurāṇa,[6] for instance, Liṅga and Śakti are interchangeable. We may note, in a broader perspective, that the transformation of gender of sacred stones is not an uncommon phenomenon. A well know example are the stones at Khaṇḍoba in Maharashtra. After killing the demon Malla,

---

1 KuKh 3/165cd-167.
2 KuKh 3/52.
3 KuKh 3/53.
4 Accordingly, Dakṣa praises Śiva as the 'unmanifest God, Sadāśiva whose form is the Liṅga'. KuKh 3/85-86.
5 Bonazzoli 1978: 128-129.
6 Skandapurāṇa, Maheśvarakhaṇḍa. 10/44-46, 49.

Khaṇḍoba was praised by the Ṛṣis he had harassed. Khaṇḍoba was pleased with the Ṛṣis' devotion and so promised to return to Jejuri where he killed the demon on the sixth day of the bright fortnight of Mārgaśirśa (campāṣaṣṭhi). Then he returned to that place with his śakti Mhālṣā (who is considered to be an incarnation of Pārvatī), in the form of a 'self-generated' (svayambhū) Liṅga and Yoni.[1] Thus Sontheimer tells us: 'The Liṅgam is a common popular representation of Khaṇḍobā. Early in the cult before heavy sanskritization, these representations were called 'piṇḍī', and both male and female forms were the same – a round protrusion of stone that seemed to thrust itself out of the earth.'[2] Stones commonly represent goddesses. Vaiṣṇo Devī in Jālandhara in the Punjab is a well-known example. There we find a group of stones representing the śaktis of the main gods. Groups of three stones are common, representing the three energies (triśakti) of the three main gods. Examples can be seen under a tree in the compound of the Kālī temple at Kālī Ghāṭ in Calcutta. The same triad is represented in this way, again under a tree, in the compound of Agni Maṭha in Patan in the Kathmandu Valley. Similarly, groups of seven stones are common, representing seven sisters. Originally the Pleiades, six sisters with their 'Big Sister' (Hindi – baḍī bahan) are variously represented. In one variant, the Big Sister is the goddess Hiṅglā who is also the patron goddess of the Gorakhnāthīs. The best known one is Śitalā. The seven Mothers (mātṛkā) are commonly represented in Newar temples this way as they were probably very commonly over all of South Asia in the past. Nowadays we often see the seven stones, variously identified with local goddesses, under trees in villages all over India. Bhairava stones, occasionally called Bhairava Liṅgas, are no less common. The common form for both male and female stones accounts for the ease with which they can change gender or be 'neuter', even if the texts on architecture distinguish stones on the basis of gender. So, by extension, a goddess can possess the stony form of a Liṅga. Rādhā, for example, in the Kṛṣṇayāmala is said to have this form (liṅgarūpā, liṅginī)[3] as well as that of the female Yoni (yonirūpā).[4]

Moreover, the theme of the goddess emerging from the Liṅga is not peculiar to the myth of the goddess Kubjikā. In the Glory of the Goddess (Devīmāhātmya) section of the Markaṇḍeyapurāṇa (Pradhānikarahasya) the goddess as Mahāmāyā is said to have 'rent open the Śiva Liṅga and come out'. The basic notion that primordial energy comes from the male principle (puruṣa) is found even in the Bhagavadgītā.[5] The notion that Śiva's energy emerges from him

---

[1] Sontheimer 1989: 277.
[2] Sontheimer 1989: 294, n. 19.
[3] KY 24/276d.
[4] KY 24/265c.
[5] tam eva cādyaṁ puruṣaṁ prapadye yataḥ pravṛttiḥ prasṛtā purāṇī | BhG 15/4.

in the form of Kuṇḍalinī and is differentiated into the energies of his will, knowledge and action is basic to Kashmiri Śaivism which draws it, as the Kubjikā Tantras do, from the Tantrasadbhāva.[1] The idea is well known to the Śaiva Siddhānta according to which spheres of energy (kalā) emerge from the Liṅga in the form of Kuṇḍalinī who is symbolized, as in the Kubjikā Tantras and those of other schools, as a sprout. Banerjee refers to Bhattasall to report that a 'unique image was discovered in the ruins of Vikrampur, within the limits of the ancient capital of the Senas and their predecessors, in the quarter of the town known as Kagajipara.'[2] Banerjee goes on to describe it as follows: 'Four feet in height it shows in its lower part a well-carved Śiva Liṅga, from the top of which emerges the half-length figure of a four-armed goddess with her front hands in the dhyānamudrā, the back hands carrying a rosary and a manuscript. The Devī is profusely ornamented, and her beautifully carved youthful face with three eyes has a serene meditative expression.'[3]

Gopinātha Rao[4] refers to the image of the goddess Bhūtamātā (Mother of Ghosts) wearing a Liṅga on her person and a Kollapura Mahālakṣmī with a Liṅga in her hand. Similarly, a Yoginī is described in a Newar ritual manual as holding a Liṅga in the upper right hand (the other three hold, moving in a clockwise direction, a skull bowl, noose and a goad). There are numerous examples of Śrīcakra engraved on (often crystal) Śiva Liṅgas. One such is a large stone Liṅga in the Annapūrṇā temple in Benares that was installed in the 17th century by the famous Tantric scholar Bhāskara Rāya.[5] The three-dimensional projection of Śrīcakra, known as 'Meruyantra', is a multi-layered pyramid. Although made essentially of a heap of female interlocked triangles, they may be collectively treated as a Liṅga. The association with the male counterpart is also represented in the Śrīvidyā tradition by projecting Liṅgas into the parts of the central triangle of Śrīcakra.[6] Śrīcakra is not infrequently worshipped in conjunction with a Śiva Liṅga. One famous example is the occasional worship of Śrīcakra engraved on a metal plate suspended above the Liṅga of Paśupati in the Kathmandu Valley. Another possible example is found in the Rājarāṇī temple in Bhuvaneśvara, Orissa. A small bas-relief is sculpted there on one of the layers of the foundation

---

[1] See TS quoted in the comm. on TĀ 3/67. This passage corresponds to TS 1/215cd ff..
[2] Banerjee 1974: 508.
[3] It is reproduced as plate XLV, 2 of Banerjee's book. Banerjee identifies the goddess with Mahāmāyā probably on the basis of the reference noted above although, as Coburn points out, this is not, in actual fact, a common designation of the Great Goddess of the Devīmāhātmya and appears only in what are probably the later portions. Kubjikā is also occasionally identified with Mahāmāyā. See, for example, KuKh 5/73cd-74ab, and ibid. 9/28.
[4] Gopinātha Rao 1971: vol. 2 p. 362.
[5] See Khiste 1993: 528 for a photograph of this Liṅga.
[6] See below, p. 717-718 with reference to YHṛ 1/36ff..

slabs. It depicts two ascetics engaged in worship sitting on both sides of a Liṅga. Above the Liṅga is a triangular heap of round protuberances that appears to be a Meruprastāra, that is, a three-dimensional representation of Śrīcakra.[1] Although small, this relief may well be significant as there is a longstanding dispute amongst scholars as to whether the temple, now empty, originally contained a Śiva Liṅga. Bäumer[2] has argued convincingly that the temple is actually a three-dimensional Śrīcakra. The image may represent the worship of a Liṅga, real or imaginary, in the temple representing the point (bindu) in the centre of Śrīcakra around and above it. There are other examples of such temples. One is a shrine said to be dedicated to the goddess Gaṅgā that stands next to the steps leading up to the Paśupati temple from the Bagmati river. The spire (śikhara) of that temple is clearly in the form of a three-dimensional Śrīcakra. On the ridge on the other side of the river are rows of small shrines containing Śiva Liṅgas. When the top of the shrine to the goddess Gaṅgā is viewed from behind the Liṅga in one of these temples, it appears that its spire rests on top of the Liṅga, an image that is clearly reminiscent of the base-relief in the Rājarāṇī temple.

Apart from these examples, we come across a few passages in the Purāṇas and elsewhere that describe the emergence of the goddess out of the Liṅga. One such is found in chapter 76 of the Kālikāpurāṇa. Although there are several major differences, the correspondences with the parallel account in the KMT are

---

[1] The relief is sculpted on the south pīṭhagṛha below the niśā of the Rājarāṇī temple. See Bäumer and Das 1994, plates 25a and 25b, for photographs.

[2] Bäumer reaches this conclusion from references to types of Orissan temples described in the Śilparatnakośa. She writes in an article on the subject:

> The worship of the Śrīcakra can be performed on a flat surface – drawn on the earth or ground or on a piece of paper – called bhūprastāra, or in a three-dimensional form, called meruprastāra. The theoretical possibility of a temple representing the Śrīyantra as meruprastāra cannot be denied; but with the exception of monuments outside India like Borobudur, it is rare to find any temple identified with Śrīyantra. Only after working out the details could we be sure that our assumption was correct. In fact, it was possible to establish exact correspondences, as the text [Śilparatnakośa] says:
>
> > Covering the whole garbha there is a circle (maṇḍala) of *vimāna*s (miniature spires). These are twenty four in number, and they represent twenty-four Upaśaktis. (v. 391)
>
> Thus, the total number of cakras as well as *śikharika*s is twenty-four, but at the level of the miniature spires above the melana, the fourteen triangles of Śrīcakra (caturdaśāra) find their correspondence in the fourteen upper śikharika; the plinth (pīṭha) corresponds to the bhūpura enclosure of the yantra; the amlaka crowning the inner circle (vṛtta), and the kalaśa to the central point (bindu). Other details can also be identified. Bäumer 1994: 129 (I have added the diacritical marks omitted in the article). See Bäumer and Das 1994: 148 fig. 53 for a ground plan of the Rājarāṇī temple with Śrīcakra superimposed on it.

striking. Moreover, it contains one of the very few early references to the goddess Kubjikā outside of her Tantras and so the passage is worth examining in detail. The part of the story that interests us begins after Śiva, the Lord (bhagavat), has instructed Bhairava and Vetāla in the use of certain mantras. Then he says to them:

> (Now you two) go to the inner sacred seat (antaḥpīṭha) of Kāmarūpa called Nīlācala. This is the secret abode of the (the goddess) Kāmākhyā called the sacred seat of Kubjikā; there the heavenly Ganges (flows) (ākāśagaṅgā). (Bathe there and) sprinkle (yourselves) with its waters, O sons: worship there Mahāmāyā who is the universe. Pleased, the goddess will quickly bestow (her) boons on you.[1]

Śiva then disappears and the two go to mount Nīla where Kāmākhyā resides. After bathing, they draw a maṇḍala next to a Liṅga called Bhairava, reminding us of the Bhairava Liṅga the goddess enters called Udyāna Bhairava. They then recite various mantras and worship the goddess in the manner prescribed by the Uttaratantra for three years. The text continues:

> (They) worshipped Kāmākhyā, Tripurā and other (goddesses). Then they went once on pilgrimage to the sacred seat (pīṭhayātrā) in the prescribed manner. When the two sons of Hara had thus donned the Armour (of mantra) and had deposited (mantras on their bodies), Mahāmāyā was very pleased and graced them. Then whilst the two were immersed in meditation, engaged in repeating mantra and worshipping (the goddess) who is the universe, bursting apart the Liṅga, she then became visible.
>
> When she had come forth, the Śiva Liṅga became threefold as the three, Bhairava, Bhairavī and Heruka. Then Vetāla and Bhairava saw the goddess outside (in the physical world) as (they had) seen (her) in meditation.
>
> (She was) lovely in all her limbs and her breasts were fat and upraised. (Two of her four) hands made boon-bestowing and fear-removing gestures and (with the other two) she held a sacred thread (siddhasūtra) and a sword. Radiant like a red lotus, she was seated on a white ghost. When they saw her, Vetāla and Bhairava closed their eyes and said repeatedly: "Save (me)! Save (me)!”

[1] KāPu 76/73-75.

> Then the Great Goddess filled them with her energy (tejas). Vaiṣṇavī touched them with the tip of her boon (bestowing) hand. Then although the two had (merely) been touched, they were fulfilled and so in that way again attained divinity (devatva) and abandoned (their) human nature.[1]

There are several features to note here. The Liṅga, we are told, is in a cave[2] situated on a mountain that is the goddess's secret site – the Kubjikā pīṭha. The similarity here with the corresponding account in the KMT is so close, one wonders whether the redactor of this portion of the Kālikāpurāṇa knew the text.[3] Moreover, one of the devotees is Bhairava. But here, the goddess who emerges from the Liṅga is benign. She is red, the colour of love and passion, and is beautiful, not dark blue, red and fierce. She transmits her power, which transforms mortals into gods, by her subtle, gentle touch, not a fearsome look. This is because, unlike the goddess of the KMT, she is not the consort destined to ultimately couple with her devotee. Amongst the complex symbolic associations of Indian myth and iconography, ferocity is not uncommonly linked, as it is in the figure of the goddess Kubjikā, with intense sexual potency. The mildness of the goddess who appears out of the Liṅga in the Kālikāpurāṇa is derived from the different role she plays in relation to her two devotees. Towards them, she is not a lover but a tender mother. This role is well illustrated by the sequence that follows. Bhairava and Vetāla praise the goddess and ask her to remain forever as they are, that is, in the body. Then:

> She who protects the world, the goddess Śivā, having thus said "success (siddhi)" pressed the two nipples of her breasts and caused two streams of milk to flow. Then, O king, she made Vetāla and Bhairava drink the milk that had (thus) come forth and the two drank it. After they had drunk the milk they attained eternal divinity (devatva) and became immortal, free of old age, very powerful and auspicious.[4]

---

[1] KāPu 76/85cd-93.
[2] KāPu 76/109.
[3] It is unlikely that the KMT drew these mythical elements from the Kālikāpurāṇa although this Purāṇa refers to deities and sources that predate the disruption of the early traditions of the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras and so a part of it at least was redacted when these sources were still widely available. Moreover, the references to Tripurā in her form as Śrīvidyā, the goddess of Śrīcakra, indicates that part of it post-dates the main Kubjikā Tantras.
[4] KāPu 76/111-113. We shall see that Yoginīs also offer their milk to grace the adepts who seek them in their place of residence.

Let us now turn in our search for parallels to sources closer to home. Especially relevant is a work ascribed to Matsyendranātha, considered to be the founder of the Kaula tradition as a whole, with which the Kubjikā Tantras feel such a close connection as to refer to it as the 'previous tradition' (pūrvāmnāya) that preceded them and of which they are the final completion (paścima). Accordingly, we can expect to find doctrines there incorporated and elaborated in the Kubjikā Tantras. One of these concerns the goddess's Liṅga.

A few short tracts are ascribed to Matsyendranātha. Among those that have not yet been edited and published is the Kulapañcāśikā, the Guhyasiddhi and the Ūrmikaulārṇavatantra.[1] Amongst the published texts is the Kaulajñāna-nirṇaya. Although it is not fully established that this work (or indeed any) is by the original Matsyendra, it certainly appears to possess many features that indicate its antiquity.[2] One of these, which has not been examined up to now, bears upon the nature of this unusual identification of the goddess with the Liṅga. The following passage contains an important reference to the prototype of the Liṅga initiates of the Kubjikā Tantras worship in the goddess's maṇḍala which, as we shall see in detail later, is projected above the head. Bhairava begins by listing a series of lotuses in the body. They are arranged vertically in such a way that each succeeding one has a larger number of petals than the one before it. The last one consists of 30 million petals. The text continues:

> There, above that, is a pervasive, eternally manifest (nityodita), unbroken, independent, unmoving, all-pervasive and

---

[1] See bibliography. An Ūrmi / āgama / -śāsana / -śāstra / -mahāśāstra / -mahākaula is quoted by Abhinavagupta in his Tantrāloka and Ūrmikula by Jayaratha in his commentary (see Rastogi 1987: 263 and 280). However, although the subject treated in these references appears in the fragment of the Ūrmikaulārṇava in the MS I have consulted, I have not been able to trace the references. The Kulapañcāśikā is quoted by Kṣemarāja in his commentary on the NT 8/28 (= KP 3/7-8) and on ŚSū 3/26 (= KP 3/19). These verses have been traced in the two available manuscripts (see bibliography). The Guhyasiddhi is not quoted by these Kashmiri teachers and may not have been known to them.

[2] This tract, written in the form of Tantra with Bhairava as the main speaker, although attributed to Matsyendranātha, may not in fact be his work. Tradition considers Matsyendranātha to be the founder of Kaulism but the author of the KJN was well aware of the existence of specifically Kaula Tantras, which he refers to collectively as 'Kulāgama'. Moreover, he lists numerous previous adepts and their schools. Even so, the relatively crude form of the doctrines and practices presented in this text indicate that it may well belong to a Kaula school that precedes the Kubjikā Tantras. The manuscripts are dateable to the eleventh and twelfth centuries (Bagchi 1934: 5). Another sign of the antiquity of this text is that Bhairava is the speaker, even though this is a Kaula Tantra. It would appear, therefore, that the text belongs to an early period of the development of the Kaula Tantras when they had not yet broken away from their Śaiva counterparts, the Bhairava Tantras, sufficiently for the goddess to become the main speaker, as she is in the later Kubjikā Tantras.

> stainless lotus. Emanation takes place by its will and it dissolves away (laya) there itself. Thus it is called Liṅga and is where the mobile and immobile (creation) is established (līna). (Its) form is that of an unbroken circle. It is unchanging and undifferentiated (niṣkala). It is taught that bondage is ignorance of it and, once known, one is free (of all) bonds. Beyond mind and devoid of mind, it is free of concentration and visualization. Eternal, it is always visible and is (blue) like a cannabis flower. It is the god who consists of all the letters and (yet) is devoid of every letter. O goddess, it is always attainable by knowledge and it has come down through the lineage (of teachers). Thus, O goddess, (I have) explained how the goal of Kula (kulalakṣa) abides.[1]

Bhairava goes on to say that this is the true Liṅga not one made of stone or any other material. All the living beings ranging from the gods to ants and the entire universe have come forth from the middle of the Point (in the centre of the Liṅga), and everything is engulfed within it. 'That Liṅga', he says, 'is the author of creation and destruction and is worshipped by the Siddhas'.[2] Indestructible, it is the Kaulika Liṅga, also called the Liṅga of the Body (dehaliṅga) and the Mind (manoliṅga), that one should worship, if one desires success (siddhi), with the flowers of the mind.[3]

I have translated and summarized this passage at length because there are several features of this Kaulika Liṅga that we can recognize in the Divine Liṅga of the Kubjikā Tantras. Note first of all that the Liṅga here is essentially the undifferentiated Point (niṣkalabindu) to which the text refers as the 'unbroken circle'.[4] Here this Point is still the god but is ready, as it were, to be identified in the Kubjikā Tantras with the Transmental (unmanī), which is the Command and the metaphysical identity of the goddess.

The Point (bindu) and its companion Sound (nāda) are a common couple representing the polarities of Śiva and Śakti in the Tantras and the theologies they have inspired. They are variously explained in accord with the various conceptions of this polarity and their derivatives. A study has been produced on Sound by Beck.[5] We await a similar one on the Point. Suffice it here to say that

---

[1] KJN 3/9-14ab.
[2] KJN 3/21ab.
[3] One attains worldly benefits and liberation by worshipping the Liṅga in the body. O goddess, this is the Liṅga of accomplishment (siddhiliṅga) that is in the body endowed with the signs of attainment (pratyaya). One should always meditate on (this), the Liṅga of the mind (manoliṅga). KJN 3/27cd-28c.
[4] Concerning this expression see note to KuKh 3/7.
[5] See bibliography.

Bindu, which can be translated as both 'point' and 'drop', is a very ancient symbol. In the Veda it appears as the sacred white drop of Soma, the drink that gives vitality to the gods and people. When the Moon came to be identified with Soma, Bindu became the lunar orb, thus equating the vitalizing power attributed to the Moon with the Vedic Soma. Both white, fecund and potent, the association with sperm was but natural. Internalized, Bindu rains down lunar nectar. Finally, Bindu is also a dimensionless point. Marking the centre outside time and space where deity resides, it is the transcendental Void that pervades all things at all times. We are reminded of Augustine's famous saying that God is a circle that encompasses all things whose centre is everywhere and circumference nowhere. Accordingly Bindu is the centre of the maṇḍala, worshipped externally or inwardly, projected in the practice of Yoga.

We shall see that all these features are attributed to the goddess in the Kubjikā Tantras. In this passage from the KJN, Bindu is the god Bhairava. Monistic Kashmiri Śaivites, as usual, fill out this Tantric symbol with their phenomenology of consciousness. Bindu according to their view is more correctly written 'vindu' and is, they say, derived from the root vid that means to know. Thus Vindu is the knower who contains all knowledge and hence manifestation in a potential form, like a learned man who knows the scriptures contains them silently within himself.[1] Just as the Self of the Upaniṣads is said to be the light that illumines the sun, moon and fire, Bindu / Vindu is Śivabindu, the self-luminous light of 'I' consciousness that illumines the limited subject, object and means of knowledge symbolized by the Sun, Moon and Fire, respectively.[2]

To get an idea of how varied views on the nature of Bindu can be we may contrast these ones with that of the Śaiva Siddhāntin, Aghoraśivācāraya. He takes a much more extreme dualist position than most Śaiva Siddhāntins who are generally, one could say, tempered dualists or even in some cases, qualified monists. Aghoraśiva argues that although the Śiva principle is the highest of the series of principles, it is insentient and distinguishes this and the following principle – Śakti – from Supreme Śiva and his Śakti who are consciousness and its power beyond the principles. The Śiva principle, according to Aghoraśiva, is the

---

[1] Abhinava writes:

The cognizing subject (mātṛ) is a state of consciousness independent of the consonance of the instrumental means (upāya of knowledge) such as the object of knowledge and the rest (and is self-established in the immediacy of the awareness that:) ‘I am' (and so latently containing within itself all knowledge) is the knower (jñātṛ) like one who knows the scriptures (but having no desire to explain them remains silent). TĀ 3/125cd-126ab.

[2] Abhinava writes:

The pure light (of consciousness – prakāśamātra) present here when the three abodes (of subject, object and means of knowledge) manifest is referred to in the scripture as the 'Point' and is considered to be the Point of Śiva (śivabindu). TĀ 3/133cd-134ab.

'substance' (upādāna) of all the principles and as such identifies it with Mahāmāyā rather than Prakṛti, which is hardly the twenty-fifth principle out of the thirty-six. This, according to him, is Bindu, which, through a series of permutations, assumes the form of all the other principles, the first of which is that of Śakti, which he identifies with Sound (nāda).[1]

So, Aghoraśiva traveling by a very different path arrives at the same identification of Bindu with the goddess and this too via a transformation of gender. The reason for this is that from the perspective of the 'supreme nondualism' (paramadvaita) of the Kubjikā Tantras, the Goddess is the energy and substance of emanation (sṛṣṭi). Emanation takes place by the will of the Liṅga described in the KJN. This will is the goddess who, according to the KMT, assumed the form of a Liṅga and pours out into manifestation. As such it contains all things that are to be made manifest and those that have been withdrawn from manifestation into itself, not just as the Liṅga but also as the Yoni, the fertile womb of the goddess and source (yoni) of all things. Thus we find a new development has taken place. According to the Kubjikā sources, the 'unbroken circle' is encompassed by a downward-facing triangle representing the Yoni. It becomes in this way a 'Yoniliṅga', that is, a Yoni which is a Liṅga. This, in its turn, serves as the nucleus of the goddess's maṇḍala – the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala. It appears to be more than a coincidence that this maṇḍala is said to be, like the Liṅga of the KJN, the blue colour of a cannabis flower.[2] Another point to note is that the Liṅga of the KJN is said to be 'the god who consists of all the letters and (yet) is devoid of every letter'. The same is true of the goddess in general and in her form as the Yoniliṅga in particular which, as we shall see in detail when we come to chapter eight of our text, contains the fifty letters of the Sanskrit alphabet.

Finally, the Liṅga of the KJN, said to be both corporeal (dehaliṅga) and mental (manoliṅga), is above the head at the very apex of all the wheels / lotuses of the body that mark the ascent of Kuṇḍalinī. Although above the head, it is still part of the subtle body. But at the same time it is a mental Liṅga. The Kubjikā Tantras take up both these ideas and enrich them in their own way. The goddess's Liṅga is situated in the End of the Twelve, that is, at a distance of twelve fingers above the crown of the head. It is, moreover, not just a mental Liṅga, it is a Transmental one formed from the energy of the Transmental (unmanī), which is the goddess's deepest metaphysical identity.

Returning back to home ground, we find an interesting precursor of the Liṅga, which came to be extensively treated in the later Kubjikā Tantras. It is the one the KMT locates in svādhiṣṭhāna – the Self-supported, the second centre in the subtle body, and its pedestal which is located in the centre of the Foundation (ādhāra) below it. It is worth examining this Liṅga in some detail, as a number of its features are common with those of the goddess's Liṅga described in the later sources and projected into the End of the Twelve above the head.

---

[1] See Dviveda's Sanskrit introduction to the Aṣṭaprakaraṇa p. 22 ff. with reference to Aghoraśivācārya's commentary (vṛtti) on the Tattvaprakāśa by Bhoja.
[2] See KuKh 2/3cd-4ab and note.

The KMT refers to two systems of six centres. One is related to what it calls the Northern Path and the other the Southern.[1] The KMT deals with the Northern Path very elaborately compared to the southern one, which is hardly more than mentioned, although, out of the two, it was destined to become the successful one, both in the later Kubjikā Tantras and later Kaula traditions as a whole. Conversely, the first of these two systems remained confined to the KMT and so become redundant. But while the first model did not develop further, the second model allowed for changes and absorbed many features of the first one, which it variously adapted. The particular centre we are going to examine is an example.

The Self-supported is, like the goddess's Liṅga, a special Kaula Liṅga – although it is not her residence but that of Śiva, the Lord of Kula[2] and, by extension, that of the individual soul with which he is one. Bhairava defines it as follows:

> Thus, O goddess, (this centre is called) svādhiṣṭhāna because it is by this that the wise bearer of the Wheel (i.e. Śiva) was previously supported by himself (svādhiṣṭhita) in the Liṅga. This is the location of both Māyā and the Śāmbhava plane. It is the teaching concerning the support (adhiṣṭhāna) of the forces. It contains the individualized form of the Person (puruṣāṇu) and so is rightly called 'one's own support' (svādhiṣṭhāna).[3]

From our perspective, a significant feature of the Liṅga projected into the Self-supported according to the first model is that it is said to possess six parts (prakāra).[4] These are the corners of the hexagon of the Self-supported (svādhiṣṭhāna) located between the centre in the base of the spine and the one in the navel. This feature permits future identification with the goddess's maṇḍala and her 'Divine Liṅga' which dominates it from the centre that also has 'six parts'. A Liṅga like this, along with its pedestal, was modified in the later Kubjikā

---

[1] The ṢSS and its commentary (on ṢSS 18/54 ff.) explain the nature of these two Paths in relation to the sixteen energies of the End of the Sixteen (see below, p. 376 ff.) that also constitute the Wheel of Purity (viśuddhi). See chapter 3, p. 602 ff..

[2] The KMT (13/31ab) says: This is the Kuleśvara Liṅga, which is the cause of creation and destruction.

[3] KMT 13/1-2.

[4] See KMT 13/28, quoted below, p. 259.

Tantras and shifted to the summit of the six centres to become the composite Liṅga of Space (ākāśaliṅga) of the goddess. In other later and better-known Kaula traditions the Liṅga migrated down into the centre of the Root Foundation (mūlādhāra) at the base of the spine and served as the support for Kuṇḍalinī who, coiled around the shaft of the Liṅga, drinks its secretions.

Let us see what the KMT has to say. Bhairava begins by telling the goddess the myth of its origin:

> In the beginning, when all that existed was one fearful ocean and the Triple Universe was darkness (tamas), following the behest of the supreme will, I (Bhairava) bore the form of a Liṅga. I had six faces and, my nature Time, I was in the form of a Liṅga. Always encompassed by six forces, I sport in the centre of the universe. I possess (the Liṅga with) six sheaths (kauṣika). I am the body of the radiance of passion (anaṅgavarcas). O beloved, then emanation, my will, was started again. I was worshipped and praised by the Siddhas, Brahmā, Viṣṇu and everyone else. So when I was attained (by them) I gave them a boon according to their desire. And I offered myself (to them in the form) of a hexagon and a square.[1] Thus, as they are the (universal) causes, they became the Lords of the Causes who bring about emanation. They are free to create and destroy, their minds intent on my (essential nature and) form (as the Liṅga).[2]

The gods then began to praise Bhairava again. He offers them a boon and they ask him for the Liṅga that 'faces everywhere' (sarvatomukha) and the teaching that concerns the all-pervasive (vyāptibhūta) Liṅga. So he shows them the Path of Pervasion (vyāptimārga) after having fashioned the manifest Liṅga whose field are the qualities of the Six Paths. He showed them his body by means of the teaching concerning the Six Paths[3] along which the universe, physical, metaphysical, energetic and the corresponding mantras and phonemes are emitted. This the KMT identifies implicitly with the six parts of this Liṅga of which three are not destroyed and are changeless, namely, Māyā, Śambhu and Puruṣa. Then:

---

[1] Below we shall see that the Liṅga in svādiṣṭhāna consists of six parts. It is, in other words, hexagonal. The pedestal in the centre of the Foundation is triangular with a point in the centre. This is reckoned here to be the square (a four sided figure) (caturasra) that is the geometric shape associated with this centre. This composite Liṅga-Yoni is the form Bhairava assumes. It is presented to the gods so that they can worship it and thereby receive its benefits.

[2] KMT 12/71-76ab.

[3] The cosmic order and the corresponding mantras and sonic energies are arranged in six ascending series called the Six Paths or Sixfold Path. See Dyczkowski 1992 (a):101-103 and note to KuKh 2/29-30ab.

> He showed them his form, the Path of the Forces, the leader of Kula. It has arisen as a body with five faces and is born from the Kula of six sheaths (i.e. the Liṅga). "O Viṣṇu," (Bhairava said), "I have been attained by you whose inner Self is immobile by means of the Yoga of the Support of Being. By means of this I have revealed it. My (inner centre called the) Self-supported (svādhiṣṭhāna) is the (means to attain the) supreme Yoga – enter it in every way. O wise lady, enter the Liṅga by virtue of which you will be the object of worship."[1]

Bhairava's concluding words to the goddess, although possibly tacked onto the text later, confirm that the tradition did see in this Liṅga the one destined to become the goddess's Liṅga. Now let us return to the KMT to learn more about Bhairava's Liṅga in the Wheel of the Self-supported and the practice associated with it.

> One should think of one's own (svādhiṣṭhāna) as having six faces and the goddess who is greedy for (its fine) qualities. The mouth (of one) adheres to the mouth (of the other) which is on top of one's own Liṅga and is full of the juice of the bliss established by the swings of wanton sport (helādola). The cavity of the Liṅga is in the cavity (of the Void of the mouth). One should practice by that Path. (Thus) the circle of the faces (vaktramaṇḍala) of the Self emerges shaped like the creeper of light of a lightning flash. After (this takes place), one should practice regularly (nityam).[2]

The KMT goes on to describe the fruits of practicing the Yoga and reciting the seed-syllable of each face. The practice of the last face brings about the union of Śiva and Śakti by means of the outer union of the adept and his consort:

> The sixth place is above and is supreme. It is said to be the Door of Brahmā. (The yogi here) is intent solely on the 'swing of wanton sport' (helādola) by the little-known path (of Suṣumṇā). O mistress of yogis, to the extent that he practices again and again (striking at this door) with the force of a lightning flash, he attains the state of bliss. Then he should abandon everything that is natural within the sphere of the path of transmigratory existence. (Thus) the yogi (now) unconscious is as if dead and appears to be (inert and stiff) like a piece of wood.

---

[1] KMT 12/86cd-88.
[2] KMT 13/13-15.

> The yogi who has passed (through and so is beyond) the three states – (that is) when the sāttvika, rājasika and tāmasika obtain (and are transcended) – becomes one (sama) with the primordial (pūrva) Liṅga. He is worshipped by all the gods and the skyfarers and not others. He who knows this Liṅga with its six parts (prakāra) knows reality.[1]

This passage is reproduced in chapter nineteen of the ṢSS.[2] There the commentary explains:

> How is the visualization? 'One should think of one's own (svādhiṣṭhāna) as having six faces.' The six-faced (figure) is the Liṅga consisting of a hexagon. One should think of the goddess there, that is, the syllable of the Yoni (i.e. AIṀ). (The text says) 'the mouth (of one) is touched by the mouth (of the other)'[3]. Having touched, that is, blocked (avaṣṭabhya) the mouth, which is śakti by the mouth which is the Liṅga, one should think there of the Self in the middle of the Liṅga. In what manner? Whilst engaged in 'the swing of wanton sport (helādola)' that is, whilst churning (mathamāna) (engaged in sexual intercourse) that consists of entering in and (then) coming out (praveśanirgamana). The supreme nectar of the bliss of being is (produced by this) churning. Light is produced by churning (when engaged) in that (kind of) sexual intercourse (rati). How is that (light)? It has the form of a lightning flash and it has come by the path of the eye (i.e. it can be seen in the form of flashes of light). One should deposit the Self there. By practicing this all things are achieved.[4]

---

[1] KMT 13/24-28.

[2] ṢSS 19/10 ff..

[3] KMT 13/13c reads: mukhena mukham ālagnam – The mouth (of one) adheres to the mouth (of the other. ṢSS 19/14c reads: mukhena mukham ālabhya – The mouth (of one) is touched by the mouth (of the other).

[4] kathaṁ dhyānam || ṣaḍvaktraṁ ātmānaṁ cintya || ṣaḍvaktraṁ [kh: ṣaḍcakraṁ] ṣaṭkoṇamayaṁ liṅgaṁ ṣaḍakṣaraṁ ca || tatra devīṁ cintayet || bhagākṣam iti [kh: bhagākhyāmiti] || *mukhena mukham ālabhya [k: -lasya; kh: ālabdham] iti mukhena liṅgena mukhaṁ śaktiṁ [k: śaktiḥ; kh: śakti] ālabhya [k: -vya; kh: ālaṁvya] avaṣṭabhya [kh: * vaṣṭabhya] tatra [kh: + madhye] liṅgamadhye ātmānaṁ [k: -na; kh: -manaś] cintayet* || kathaṁ || helādolaṁ kurvamānam [k: + manaṁ; kh: + manaḥ] || *helādolaṁ praveśanirgamarūpaṁ mathamānam ity arthaḥ [k: * atha]* || mathanād [kh: -nāt] bhāvānandaparāmṛtarasam || tadratau [kh: tatra tathā] mathanāj jāyate jyotiḥ || kiṁ viśiṣṭaṁ [k kh: viśiṣṭhā] tat [k: sā; kh: missing] || vidyullatākāraṁ [k kh: -rā] tat [k kh: sā kh: + ca] cakṣumārgeṇāyātam [k: -tā; kh: -mārgeṇa āyātā] || tatrātmānaṁ [k: na] nyaset || tad abhyāsāt [k: ābhyāsāt] sarvaṁ siddhyate [kh: -ti] ||

This section concludes with the affirmation that this is Kuleśvara's Liṅga. Thus, because it is present within the body, the outer Liṅga should be worshipped and treated with respect.[1] Although the goddess is said to be the sole true Liṅga taught in the Kula scriptures, this does not mean that the Kula initiate should not worship the external Śiva Liṅga. Indeed, he should always worship it wherever he finds one.[2] He may also worship the internal 'natural' or 'self-generated' (sahaja) Liṅga or one generated by mantras. But even if it is a purely external one and so, in a sense, artificial (kṛtrima), he should worship it with special care.[3] The daily worship of the Liṅga renews his consecration (abhiṣeka). If he fails to perform it, he cannot attain perfection (siddhi) and will fall from the path.[4] The outer Liṅga is so important that it is amongst the things the initiate receives from his teacher and must be kept secret, no less than his mantra, rosary, and the Kula scripture.[5] Once he has learnt the practice of the inner unmanifest Liṅga, he should never make it public (prakaṭa).[6] The KMT teaches:

> Established in the secret practice (guptācāra), he should always adorn the Teaching. He may have an unmanifest or manifest Liṅga. Whatever his Liṅga is, he should not abandon it. Water falls from the sky and goes to the sea by means of ravines and streams. In the same way all (the teachings culminate) in the Kula tradition. All those who wear a Liṅga (liṅgin) (eventually) reach (the Kula tradition). The reality that is sure and certain (niścayārtha) is not otherwise. How is that? Because there the Command operates in a directly visible form.[7]

By worshipping the outer Liṅga, the initiate replicates externally the inner union of the god and the goddess. The pedestal of a Liṅga is commonly identified with the female Yoni. Indeed, this pair form what must be the most commonly seen conjunctio of Śiva and Śakti in India. The inner projection we are examining locates the Yoni in the Wheel of the Foundation, which serves as the base of the inner Liṅga. Just as the hexagon is the geometric shape of the Wheel of the Self-supported, the square is normally that of the Wheel of the Foundation. In the [1] See note to KuKh 5/66cd-68ab and also KuKh 5/68cd-69. For a different view, see above, chapter 1, p. 188.

---

[2] KuKh 5/67 and note to KuKh 4/21-23ab.
[3] KuKh 5/66cd-68ab.
[4] KuKh 5/68cd-69.
[5] KuKh 37/27cd-28.
[6] KuKh 37/66-67ab.
[7] KMT 10/134cd–137.

following account the four corners of the square are compressed into the corners and centre of the triangular Yoni which is the Liṅga's base:

> Listen, O dear one, to the foundation of the Liṅga of the venerable god Kuleśvara. Again, it is said that there is a circle in the middle of the square. There (in the circle) is the triple cavity in the form of an enclosure (as well as) the triangular pedestal (piṇḍikā) of the supreme Liṅga. O great mother! (The pedestal) is the Yoni of the universe.[1] It possesses four energies, four sacred seats and four Siddhas and bestows the fruit of the accomplishment of knowledge.[2]

There is no need to go into too many details here. In brief the texts explain that the three cavities are the spout of the base of the Liṅga from which the water that is poured onto it flows (jalapaṭṭa). This is represented by the letter Va and Khaḍgīśa Bhairava who presides over it. The second cavity is the one in the juncture (between the pedestal and the Liṅga). It is the letter Śa governed by Bakīśa whose form is that of a spout. Śveta, the letter Ṣa, is in the current (of water) in the conduit. Bhṛgu, the letter Sa, in the form of the enclosing ring (around the base of the Liṅga) is all around in the surrounding enclosure. These four components of the pedestal are projected into the triangular Yoni that contains the four sacred seats Oḍyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa. They correspond to the mind, intellect, ego and Nature (prakṛti) and are located in the centre, right, left and front corner of the triangle. In this way, the triangle is said to be a square (caturasramaya).[3] [1] I have chosen the version in the ṢSS which is clearer than the edited text of the KMT. This reads:

---

vṛttākāraṁ punar madhye caturasrasya kīrtitam |
trirandhravalayākāraṁ śṛṅgāṭākṛtis tatra [k kh: -kṛti] hi ||
piṇḍikā paraliṅgasya jagadyonir [k kh: -yoni-] mahāmbike | ṢSS 19/36-37ab.

[2] KMT 13/37-39 = ṢSS 19/35cd-38ab.

[3] The series of correspondences can be tabulated as follows.

1. Table of the Seats in the Wheel of the Self-supported

Sacred Seats	Principles	Locations	Ages	Letters	Accomplish-ments
Oḍyāna	mind (manas)	Middle	Kṛta	Khaḍgīśa – V	Pacification
Jalandhara	intellect	Right	Tretā	Bakīśa – Ś	Fulfillment
Pūrṇagiri	ego	Left	Dvāpara	Śveta – Ṣ	Control of others etc.
Kāmarūpa	Nature (prakṛti)	in front	Kali	Bhṛgu – S	All Siddhis

The configuration of the sacred seats in this Yoni is the usual one we find in the Yoni of the later Kubjikā Tantras that is projected into the End of the Twelve above the head. As is the case with the Yoni located there, the yogi who has received the Command is enjoined to meditate on the Triangle concentrating on its four parts, that is, the four sacred seats located in the corners and the centre. Each one gives him particular accomplishments (siddhi), including the magical powers of control and destruction (i.e. ṣaṭkarma).[1] Finally, another interesting parallel is that the Liṅga in the End of the Twelve is also 'churned' as is this one. But in this case, the sexual union this expression clearly implies is sublimated and so the churning takes place, as the texts frequently repeat, 'from above'. Another reversal takes place when the Liṅga moves up. The hexagonal Liṅga becomes the goddess's Triangle and its triangular base becomes the hexagon which emanates from the Triangle that is 'churned from above'.[2]

The Liṅga and the Maṇḍala

As in the example we have just examined, explanations, interpretations and the projection of other symbols relating to the Liṅga are so extensive and often, it seems, as willfully obscure as they are dense, that it is sometimes hard to understand what the texts mean. But many of the problems of interpretation are

---

[1] Thus the Foundation is four fingers in size and (is related to the) Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali (Ages), in due order. One who is endowed with the qualities of the consecration should practice there. He is one who has attained the Command and is the supreme devotee. He obtains the fruit of twelve years (practice). The god who is present in the drain (of the Liṅga) possesses the first sacred seat. If one visualizes him as white, one attains supreme tranquillity and satisfaction. If, abandoning him, (one visualizes) Bakanātha (Śa) who is in the southern seat then, by practicing there, one attains satisfaction, royal power, and freedom from disease. If he practices (the visualization of the god) Śveta (Ṣa) who is in the cavity of the channel in the northern seat by means of Krama Yoga, then (one attains the power) to control, attract, and kill (others). He conquers disease and sickness, (achieves) satisfaction and, progressively, attains the state of a Skyfarer.

Practicing (the visualization of) Bhṛgu (Sa) in conjunction with Kāmarūpa, he acquires (many yogic and magical) powers (guṇa). (These include) tranquillity, satisfaction, (the powers to) control and attract (others), (the power) to arouse the body (purakṣobha), extensive royal power, the destruction of grey hairs and wrinkles, mastery of speech, (the power) to extract the revivifying nectar, (the power to) drag trees (towards oneself), and (the power to) swim. One stops the wind, clouds, and rivers in their course. (One attains) the accomplishment of Speech, lordship and brings (avalanches) to a halt in the mountains and the like. The one whose attention is fixed on the Foundation can bring all armies to a halt. The Foundation is said to be the Krama. Without that there is no means (sādhana). As long as the tradition is not known, there is neither worldly benefit nor liberation. KMT 13/43cd-52.

[2] See below, p. 327.

solved if we have before us an image of the goddess's maṇḍala. The manner in which it is drawn and worshipped is described more than once in our text and elsewhere in the Kubjikā Tantras, as is the ritual.

The principle maṇḍala of a major Tantric tradition is a sacred cosmogram.[1] There the divine beings of that tradition which populate the universe and the metaphysical and bio-physical principles to which they correspond are represented, worshipped and ultimately experienced directly in the maṇḍala, in the body into which it is projected and the macrocosm it represents. The successive enclosures – geometric figures, lotuses and the like – around the centre of the maṇḍala represent the stages, as we move out from the centre, of the progressive manifestation of the universe as it is conceived by the tradition to which the maṇḍala belongs. They may be drawn on the ground, cloth, metal or other material. Occasionally we find three-dimensional *maṇḍala*s. But although they are more accurate representations, they are necessarily, like the others, static. The actual contents and configuration of the parts of the main maṇḍala of each tradition vary, but even so all Tantric traditions agree that the reality represented by the maṇḍala is dynamic and multi-dimensional, although some schools may maintain that this reality is not ultimate. Moreover, the centre of the maṇḍala is invariably understood to represent the source and ultimate end of the universe symbolically deployed within it. The universe, either actually or apparently, according to the varying metaphysical perspective of any given tradition, expands out from a non-dimensional point that lies at the centre of it. When it has expanded out to the full degree of its complete manifestation, it then retraces the same stages in reverse, contracting progressively back into the centre.

Again, all major Tantric traditions agree that their maṇḍala is also an outer representation of the inner maṇḍala which, along with the beings, metaphysical principles, forces, mantras and bio-physical energies, especially those associated with the vital breath, are experienced and manipulated through Yoga and ritual in the subtle body of the initiate. Thus the maṇḍala in this perspective is not only a diagram of the universe, it is also a map of the path the initiate treads through all the spheres of manifestation, sacralized with powerful theophanies. In this perspective, the centre of the maṇḍala is not only the location, as it were, of the ultimate core reality which is the ground, source and end of all things, it is also the liberating goal of the initiate's inner, spiritual journey. Accordingly, the Liṅga projected into the core of Kubjikā's maṇḍala represents the focal point of the fundamental principles that underlie and sustain the liberating and empowering insight into the ultimate nature of reality taught in the Kubjikā Tantras.

---

[1] All major maṇḍalas are cosmograms. However, the universe they represent may be understood to be on the model, for example, of a house, temple, monastery, cremation ground or other sacred site, city, country, or universal empire. Apart from the beings who inhabit them, they may contain sacred sites, rivers, mountains, and other geographical features as well as trees and vegetation of all sorts, houses, temples and the rest that they may also represent individually.

The Liṅga in the core of Kubjikā's maṇḍala is represented by a triangle with a point in the centre. The Triangle emerges from the Point and collapses back into it. The nature and dynamics of this relationship is complex, as is the reality it represents. They are not only the Liṅga, which normally represents the male polarity, they are equally the Yoni, the female one and both together. In other words this 'Yoniliṅga' is the Yoni which is the Liṅga, the Liṅga which is the Yoni as well as the composite Yoni and Liṅga. Moreover, we shall see in other contexts that they may also represent a range of other symbolic realities such as the cosmic Tree[1] and the sacred seats (pīṭha) where the teachings were originally revealed and transmitted.

The form of this maṇḍala is relatively simple. In the centre is a Point surrounded by a downward-facing triangle drawn within a hexagon. Beyond them is an eight-petaled lotus. Sometimes three concentric circles or 'girdles' (mekhalā) are drawn either around the lotus or the hexagon.[2] In some versions of the maṇḍala there may be other lotuses around the eight-petaled lotus consisting of sixteen, thirty-two or even sixty-four petals. We shall deal with the variant forms of this basic maṇḍala and its contents as we come to them. Kubjikā's maṇḍala may also be treated as a purely geometric symbolic representation of the dynamism of the cosmic process, the transmission of the deity's energy and the return to the godhead, as major *maṇḍala*s generally are, irrespective of its actual contents. By this I do not mean that the contents are not important; indeed, the maṇḍala is nothing apart from its contents. We have observed that in one context the maṇḍala is a liturgical map of sacred sites projected into its geometric layers.[3] In this context the maṇḍala is the visible geometric form of the Krama, that is, the Transmission of which the inner, essential nature is the Command that is transmitted through the lineages of teachers and their disciples. The deployment of the Krama in space, as much as its transmission in time, is significant in itself. The transmission of the Krama in time is the stream of mantras of which it is composed, generated by the union of the goddess and the god.[4] Its deployment in

---

[1] See Dyczkowski 2004: 279ff..

[2] According to the Saṁvartārthaprakāśa: The Yantra that awakens all is adorned with a Bindu (in the centre, surrounded by) a triangle, hexagon, an eight – petaled (lotus), three girdles and (four) doors.

bindutrikoṇaṣaṭkoṇāṣṭadalatrivalayadvāraśobhitaṁ yantraṁ hi sarveṣāṁ bodhanam | SP fl. 3a.

The doors remind us that the maṇḍala is a temple. The doors lend access to it. We move from the outside to the innermost sanctum where the deity's presence is marked by a point in the centre.

[3] See above, chapter 1, p. 111 ff..

[4] The KuKh (38/13c) declares that: The union (paripuṭa) of Kubjīśa and (the goddess) called Kubjikā is the current of the sequence (krama) of mantras and Vidyā.

space is the maṇḍala, which is the sacred geometric form of the deity, or the divine couple, just as mantra is the sonic.

The prime concern of any developed Tantric tradition is the worship of the deity. This is done externally by means of a series of mantras. Kaula schools refer to this as the Krama, which literally means 'sequence'. The most important or 'root' mantra is considered to be the core sonic body of the deity. There may be two such mantras – one for the male deity and the other for the goddess, his consort. The latter type of mantra is called a Vidyā. As the goddess is the main object of worship of the Kubjikā Tantras, it is her Vidyā that is considered primary out of these two. The seed-syllable Vidyā and its male counterpart are projected into the Point that marks the centre of the maṇḍala. The remaining mantras that constitute the main Krama are projected into the Triangle and Hexagon that surround them and then into the rest of the maṇḍala. Accordingly the maṇḍala of Kaula cults are all 'Kramamaṇḍalas' and the worship of the maṇḍala is the Worship of the Krama (kramārcana or, less often, kramapūjā).

Along with the Kramamaṇḍala, the texts require that another maṇḍala called the Gurumaṇḍala be drawn behind it, or projected onto it, in which the lineages of teachers are worshipped. In some cases, depending on the rite, subsidiary *maṇḍala*s may also be drawn close to the main Kramamaṇḍala into which additional groups or 'currents' – ogha – of mantras are projected. These may also be projected into the Kramamaṇḍala, depending on the particular procedure. At any rate, the main Krama of the Kubjikā Tantras is invariable projected into the Triangle and Hexagon that surrounds it in the core of the maṇḍala. In the enclosures around the core, goddesses and their consorts are worshipped who are, effectively, protectors and sustainers of the Krama. These are the Mothers (mātṛkā), worshipped on the eight petals of a lotus. Outside them are the thirty-two goddesses who govern the energies of the thirty-two syllables of Kubjikā's Samayā Vidyā. In some versions of the maṇḍala, sixty-four sacred sites, along with the Yoginīs and guardians (kṣetrapāla) who reside there, are worshipped on the petals of a third lotus. These three represent the Fire, Moon and Sun.

This Kramamaṇḍala is the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala. Saṁvartā is the fire that consumes the worlds at the end of a cosmic age and supplies the energy that sustains them in their period of persistence. This female Fire is one of the identities of the goddess Kubjikā. So Saṁvartāmaṇḍala effectively means Kubjikāmaṇḍala, which would be an apt name for it although, in fact, it never occurs in our texts.

We will deal with the mantras that are the concrete contents of the Krama in its parts, subdivisions and modalities and their variations in due course. Here we will deal, as the texts do themselves, with the evolution of the maṇḍala as a process analogous to the drawing of it from the Point that marks the centre out into the succeeding geometrical forms. This process, symbolized in this way, is that by which the deity presents itself in stages marked by the progressive emergence (or 'drawing') of geometric forms, thus evolving the template of manifestation and with it the cosmic order and the energies and metaphysical principles that constitute its basic depth structure.

Although similar sacred geometries are fundamental for the *maṇḍala*s, especially those of the great deities, of all the major Tantric cults, the Kubjikā Tantras focus on them in a special way. This is evident in the forms of the goddess herself. One of the reasons the goddess is called Kubjikā 'the Bent Over One' is because she assumes the form of the core Triangle, the Yoni in the centre of the maṇḍala. For the same reason she is called Vakrā – 'Crooked One'. She emerges out of the Point in the centre 'bent over'. Burning brilliantly with her divine fire, the Point in the centre of the Triangle is the 'Wick of the Command' (ājñāvarti) that has the bent shape of a plough (halākṛti).[1] The goddess, identified with Kuṇḍalinī, is commonly referred to, as is Kuṇḍalinī in other Tantric traditions, as 'crooked' (kuṭilā). This crooked shape (kuṭilākṛti) is related to the goddess's triangular form. This is the shape of her face when she bursts apart the Liṅga, which is the Point in the centre of the triangle.[2]

The Snake and the Triangle

All the major Kaula goddesses are identified with Kuṇḍalinī – literally the ‘Coiled One’ – but Kubjikā the 'bent over' goddess is especially so. She resides in the Triangle coiled like a serpent in three and a half turns around the Point in the centre. Thus in addition to the Triangle which is her 'body', and the Point which is her 'Self', she is also a Spiral. The serpent is a common symbol of the goddess. For example, it appears this way, Gimbutas tells us, in the religion of what she calls Old Europe, that is, prior to the fourth millennium preceding the common era. She writes concerning the snake and the coils commonly found in the megalithic art of Europe:

> The snake is life force, a seminal symbol, epitome of the worship of life on this earth. It is not the body of the snake that was sacred, but the energy of this spiraling or coiling creature which transcends its boundaries and influences the surrounding world. This same energy is in spirals, vines, growing trees, phalluses, and stalagmites, but it is especially concentrated in the snake, and therefore more powerful. The snake was something primordial and mysterious, coming from the

---

[1] KuKh 7/42cd-43ab. We have seen (above, p. 39 and 224) that the bent shape of the goddess is also equated to that of a sprout when it emerges from the seed.
[2] See KuKh 5/29.

depth of the waters where life begins. Its seasonal renewal, sloughing of its old skin and hibernating made of it a symbol of the continuity of life and of the link with the underworld. [. . .] The megalithic art of western Europe is replete with snake coil and double snake coil motifs, as independent units or as a part of an anthropomorphic figure.[1]

Kubjikā, the goddess Kuṇḍalinī, is represented in her raised form[2] as a spiral of energy consisting of the fifty energies of the letters arranged in this geometric pattern within the Triangle. Thus the Spiral generates the Triangle, a development that echoes an association of the two representations of the goddess that goes back to prehistoric times when she was represented in Old Europe by chevrons, zigzags, and Vs.[3] Gimbutas associates these geometries with the goddess's aquatic nature, one that is evident also in the image of the Ocean of the Yoni to which we will have occasion to refer, and in an aspect of the goddess in the Triangle called Nityaklinnā, the Perpetually Wet One. Gimbutas writes:

The primary aspect of the Old European goddess is that of the life-giving moisture of the goddess's body – her breasts, eyes, mouth, and vulva.[4] [. . .] In the iconography of all prehistoric periods of Europe as well as of the whole world, the image of water is zigzag or serpentine. The zigzag is the earliest symbolic motif recoded: Neanderthals used this sign around 40,000 BC or earlier. .... In the Upper Paleolithic, the zigzag is a common motif and appears in association with anthropomorphic, bird, fish, and phallic images. ... The zigzag alternates with the Ma sign, an abbreviated zigzag. In Magdalenian times and later in Old Europe, zigzags and Ms are found engraved or painted within uterine and lens [Yoni] shapes, suggesting the symbolic affinity between the zigzag, Ma, female moisture and amniotic fluid. [. . .] The aquatic significance of the Ma sign seems to have survived in the Egyptian hieroglyph /^^\ 'mu', meaning water and in the ancient Greek letter Ma, mu.[5] [. . .] Va and X are the signs of the Goddess. Nets, manders, and running snake/spiral bands (especially on water containers) link her with the cosmic waters that are her element.[6]

---

[1] Gimbutas 1991: 58-59.
[2] There are said to be two coiled forms of Kuṇḍalinī in the subtle body. One is below in the Wheel of the Foundation at the base of the spine that corresponds, one could hazard to say, to the snake of the 'underworld' to which Gimbutas refers. The other is the raised form of Kuṇḍalinī coiled in the Triangle above the head.
[3] Gimbutas (1991: 3) writes: Graphically, a pubic triangle is most directly rendered as a V. This expression and its recognition are universal and immediate.
[4] Ibid. p. 3.
[5] Ibid. p. 19.
[6] Ibid. p. 29.

In Old European ceramics the 'snake theme' grew constantly in importance, reaching its height around 5000-4000 BC.[1] Representations of snakes are known since the Upper Paleolithic and continue in the Mesolithic and Neolithic.[2] The association of the snake with water or stream symbolism is visible in ceramic decoration from about 5500 BC on wards. Many portrayals convey that, as a symbol of life energy, the snake emerges from the waters.[3] The snake motif in Old Europe combines with that of the Tree of Life. Gimbutas explains:

The snake is a transfunctional symbol; it permeates all themes of Old European symbolism. Its vital influence was felt not only in life creation, but also in fertility and increase, and particularly in the regeneration of dying life energy. Combined with magic plants, the snake's powers were potent in healing and creating life anew. A vertical winding snake symbolized ascending life force, viewed as a column of life rising from caves and tombs, and was an interchangeable symbol with the tree of life and spinal cord.[4]

Intertwined pairs of upwardly spiraling snakes are still commonly worshipped in India sculpted in stones placed under trees. The sacred Snake and the Tree fuse in the form of the goddess Kubjikā who is also a tree goddess. Accordingly, the Liṅga in the centre of the Triangle is said to be the Solitary Tree (ekavṛkṣa)[5] in which the goddess resides as the spirit of the tree and vegetation in general – the Yakṣiṇī who is worshipped in the Tree. The Sanskrit texts have generally paid much more attention to the goddess as Speech in deference to the primacy always attributed to it over the written word. Even so, we do find rare references to the goddess as the Line – Rekhā. The Line in its three forms – straight, slanted (tiryag rekhā) and 'raised up' (unnatā) that constitute the sides of the Triangle,[6] are the three energies and goddesses in which Kubjikā manifests as the Triangle and in which see rests as the Spiral. These are synthesized as aspects of the goddess manifesting progressively to assume the form of a Triangle set in three dimensions commonly represented by a water chestnut (śṛṅgāta). Accordingly, Kubjikā, coiled round the Point in the centre and hence 'crooked', is said to sit on the Water Chestnut.[7]

---

[1] Ibid. p. 121.
[2] Ibid. p. 122.
[3] Ibid. p. 125.
[4] Ibid. p. 121.
[5] KuKh 58/27-28.
[6] KuKh 7/13-14.
[7] KuKh 31/15cd-16.

Corresponding to two forms of Kuṇḍalinī, upper and lower, there are two such Triangles or Water Chestnuts, one above and another below. When Kuṇḍalinī rises from her lower seat she is represented as an upward-facing or moving line (ūrdhvarekhā). Conversely, moving down from the upper Triangle into manifestation she is the 'downward-facing' (adhomukhī) line. At both extremities she resumes her latent, potential state represented by her coiled form. So, from the point of view of the descending sequence, she is praised as being originally a straight line and then coiled like a sleeping serpent.[1] Although Woodroffe had no access to the Kubjikā Tantras,[2] the process to which we are referring was known to him from other sources. He describes it in the context of cosmogony as the development of 'the straight line' (ṛjurekhā) from the point which, when it has gone its length as a point is turned (vakrarekhā aṁkuśākāra) by the forces of the spiraling sack of Māyā[3] in which it works so as to form a figure of two dimensions which is again turned upon itself, ascending as a straight line into the plane of the third dimension thus forming the triangular or pyramidal figure called 'water chestnut' (śṛṅgāṭa).'[4]

A History of the Triangle and the Point

The Triangle that forms the core of this Kramamaṇḍala, identified with the Yoni, is a common symbol for any goddess in general. The dynamism we have been discussing is, moreover, common to most if not all the major Kaula traditions. At the same time they are not all understood in exactly the same way. The dynamism of this Triangle has certain special features that we will discuss in due course. Moreover, much of the extensive nomenclature associated with this Triangle and other parts of the Kramamaṇḍala is peculiar to the Kubjikā Tantras,

---

[1] See MāSt line 3. Kuṇḍalinī's straight form is acosmic. She enters and thereby generates the cosmic order by assuming the 'crooked' or bent form of the vital breath. As the Ṭ puts it:

> The 'crooked one' (kuṭilā) is Kuṇḍalinī. Sleeping, (her) form is that of a serpent. Awake, (her) form is (straight like a) stick. The Supreme Goddess, the Crooked One (kuṭilā) brings about emanation and withdrawal by the movement of the two breaths (prāṇa and apāna).

*kuṭilā [k: * ] iti [ *] kuṇḍalinī | prasuptā [k kh: prasupta] bhujagākārā prabuddhā daṇḍarūpiṇī | parameśvarī kuṭilā prāṇāpānagatyā [k kh: prāṇo -] sṛṣṭisaṁhāraṁ karoti | kuṭilākārarūpeṇety arthaḥ [k kh: * * * kāra-]* | Ṭ MS K fl. 173b.

[2] Woodroffe did have access to the Kubjikātantra that was published by Chatterjee in the end of the 19th century. Although this late, probably, Bengali (or Assamese?) Tantra has no relation to the earlier Kubjikā corpus, the goddess Kubjikā and her identification with Kuṇḍalinī was known to Woodroffe who in one place he refers to her as the 'hump-backed widow'.

[3] Cf. KuKh 40/19cd-20ab = TS 1/56.

[4] Woodroffe 1997: 35-36.

so much so that understanding it has been a major task. Before we proceed to outline the concrete contents of the Triangle and the Point, we should therefore take a look at the terminology we find in the texts and, in order to understand it better and what it refers to, the history of the development of the Triangle.

The Santānabhuvana – the World of the Lineage

One of the earliest forms of the Triangle described in the Kubjikā Tantras is the Santānabhuvana – the World of the Lineage (santāna). Unlike the Triangle that came to be accepted as the main one, this one is more specific to the Kubjikā tradition and developed within it with relatively few outer influences. Although it is described right at the beginning of the KMT, it was overshadowed in the KMT itself by the Triangle described repeatedly in the KuKh, other sections of the MBT and the later Kubjikā Tantras as a whole. This, I will argue, is essentially a modified and augmented form of the Trika Triangle described in the Tantrasadbhāva and related texts. One could hazard to say that the Santānabhuvana is an initial, aborted attempt to represent the Triangle in the End of the Twelve that was destined to become that of the goddess. This Triangle is the home of Bhairava.[1] It is a male Triangle probably because it belongs to an

[1] It is not clear in the KMT whether the Santānabhuvana is the home of Bhairava or Himavat whom the former goes to see at the beginning of the myth narrated in the KMT. A measure of the ambiguity of the text can be gauged by how Goudriaan and Schoterman have understood it. Summarizing the contents of the KMT they say that after the first verse of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍalasūtra 'a description is given of the Santānabhuvana, the realm of Himavant. To this place Bhairava comes and stands in silence for some time.' The edited Sanskrit text reads:

santānabhuvanaṁ divyaṁ divyādivyair niṣevitam |
tatra taṁ bhuvaneśānaṁ vyaktāvyaktaṁ sanātanam ||
kāryakāraṇabhāvena kiñcit kālaṁ apekṣayā |
tiṣṭhate bhairavīśāno maunam ādāya niścalam || KMT 1/6-7.

I translate as follows:

(Such is) the divine Santānabhuvana, frequented by gods and mortals. That Lord of the World (resides) there. Eternal, he is both manifest and unmanifest. As both cause and effect, Bhairavī's Lord abides there for some time maintaining an unwavering silence.

The editors of the KMT apparently understood 'bhuvaneśānam' – 'the Lord of the Worlds' to be an adjective qualifying 'santānabhuvanam'. This is as regular Sanskrit syntax demands. However, I take this to be an adjective of 'bhairavīśāno' – 'Bhairavī's Lord' with which it is in irregular concord. There are many examples of similar deviant concord in the Sanskrit of the KuKh, which along with the YKh, is the most deviant compared to that of other Kubjikā Tantras. This is because in the Sanskrit of these texts, male proper names are not infrequently (although not invariably) treated as neuter. It is not unlikely that this was the case with early stratum of the development of the Kubjikā tradition that placed greater emphasis on the god. The description of this place in the KMT, in just five terse verses,[1] is preceded by a eulogy to the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala with which the KMT opens. But although that maṇḍala is Kubjikā's Kramamaṇḍala, the KMT does not describe it anywhere with the detail it dedicates to the Santānabhuvana. It seems that the triangular Santānabhuvana was an important maṇḍala in an earlier phase of the development of the Kubjikā's cult. Indeed, it may have been the main one of an earlier Bhairava-centered tradition that was absorbed into that of the goddess. At any rate, it simply disappears from the scene in the later Kubjikā Tantras that are not directly related to the KMT, even though the ṢSS and the ŚM analyse the contents and form of the Santānabhuvana quite extensively.[2]

The expositions in these two expansions of the KMT are essentially the same. As a matter of convenience we will examine the one in the ṢSS, which is more detailed than the one in the ŚM. The Santānabhuvana and its derivatives occupy the space from the Cavity of Brahma on the crown of the head to the End of the Twelve and even beyond to the End of the Sixteen, which are located twelve and sixteen fingers distance above it, respectively.[3] The Santānabhuvana is within the three peaks of Trikūṭa – Triple Peak mountain that is 'on top of

---

'bhuvaneśānam' and if so should be understood to be the male proper name 'bhuvaneśānaḥ'. In the following line either a second redactor or a scribe chose the regular form. MS D reads 'bhairavīśānam' and J 'śaṅkarīśānam'. Both of these are early palmleaf MSs. MS D is fairly authoritative although J is generally corrupt (see Goudriaan and Schoterman 1988: 28-29). Admittedly this is slender evidence but it is supported by the KMT itself which says that the Santānabhuvana is 'behind the venerable Himavat' (śrīmaddhimavataḥ pṛṣṭhe KMT 1/2a) and so cannot be identified with it. The account is confusing because the KMT (1/8-10) goes on to say that:

> All the hosts of gods are present there along with the Kinnaras and great snakes and, coming near (to the Lord), they make a loud sound. Hearing the loud sound, Himavat, pleased, (wonders): “who is the venerable personage? Why has he come here? Let us go to search (for him).” As long as he looked with the sight of Śiva’s knowledge he saw Śrīnātha (Bhairava) who stood in that (place) (and thought to himself): “He has come to my hermitage!”.

It appears at first sight that Bhairava who is standing silent in the Santānabhuvana is in Himavat's hermitage and so they are the same place. But he may have moved from the Santānabhuvana or, more likely Himavat sees Bhairava in the nearby 'Santānabhuvana with the sight of Śiva’s knowledge' but is unable to locate him exactly. Anyway, if he were already in Himavat's hermitage, there would be no need to look for him.

[1] KMT 1/2-6ab.

[2] See Schoterman's translation and analysis of the description of the Santānabhuvana in the ṢSS (1/6-10), which is drawn verbatim from the KMT. Here I summarize the main points in the perspective of this discussion with the aid of a diagram and tables.

[3] See below, p. 376 ff..

Himavat.'[1] Himavat is the mind (manas) and the apex of the End of the Twelve (dvādaśānta) above the head. This is where the three peaks are located.[2] The KuKh confirms that Triple Peak mountain is in the End of the Twelve.[3] Schoterman explains:

The picture of the Himavat and the Trikūṭa [Triple Peak] above the Brahmarandhra [Cavity of Brahmā] is that of a pyramid. The distance between the top of the pyramid and its base is twelve *aṅgula*s [fingers]. The question is where the top of the pyramid is situated: in the centre of the Brahmarandhra [Cavity of Brahmā], or twelve *aṅgula*s [fingers] above it. Most probably we have to imagine a pyramid turned upside down, with its top on the Brahmarandhra [Cavity of Brahmā]. The Trikūṭa [Triple Peak] is situated twelve *aṅgula*s [fingers] above it, formed by the base of the pyramid, which marked out at the three corners by the three *kūṭa*s. The Santānabhuvana which is of triangular shape,[4] is bordered by the three peaks of the Trikūṭa [Triple Peak]. In other words, the Santānabhuvana is located between the three peaks.[5]

The ṢSS identifies this triangle with the whole of the Western Tradition (paścimāmnāya), as the House of the Moon (candragṛha).[6] It is also called Candrapurī[7] as is the Triangle described in chapter three of the KuKh.[8] But note that although they are similar, they are not the same. Both are made up of a series of triads.[9] The one described in the ṢSS has a few more compared to the one described in the KuKh, namely, the doorkeepers, Bhairavas, doors, and bolts. These triads are as follows:

---

[1] KMT 1/2a = ṢSS 1/6a.
[2] ṢSS 1/14.
[3] KuKh 6/211cd-212ab and note; also ibid. 6/169cd-170ab.
[4] ṢSS 1/7a.
[5] Schoterman 1981: 43-44.
[6] ṢSS 1/26.
[7] ṢSS 1/40.
[8] KuKh 3/11-12.
[9] ṢSS 1/15-25.

Diagram 3. The Santānabhuvana

On the corners:

3 Doorkeepers:	Tamo'ri	Niśāṭana	Kālānala
3 Bhairavas:	Lākulin	Bhṛgu	Saṁvarta

On the sides:

3 Doors	Wind (vāta)	Bile (pitta)	Phlegm (śleṣma)
3 Bolts	Pervasive (vyāpinī)	Equal One (samanā)	Transmental[1]
3 Energies	Will	Knowledge	Action
3 Deities	Brahmā	Viṣṇu	Maheśvara
3 Walls	Sattva	Rajas	Tamas
3 Paths	Iḍā	Piṅgalā	Madhyamā
3 Junctions	Exhalation	Inhalation	Retention
The ṢSS says that the Santānabhuvana (or, to be more precise, its base) is on the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head. From it emerges the Cave of the Moon, which is in the End of the Twelve and leads up from the centre into the End of the Sixteen above.[2] This makes it essentially the same in this respect, as we shall see, as the later Triangle that is identified with the core of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala and, sometimes, the whole of it. The ṢSS leaves the door open for this association of which it is clearly aware. Indeed, the Santānabhuvana figures there as a form of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala.[1] Others are projected into different parts of the body.[2] The ṢSS appears here to be integrating these two *maṇḍala*s, as is but natural. The ŚM confirms that the Santānabhuvana is in the End of the Twelve above the summit of mount Himavat (himavadpṛṣṭha) which is the top of the head.[3] However, the ŚM implicitly distinguishes this place from Bhairava's world which it describes in the beginning of the first chapter and calls Candrapura, the City of the Moon.[4] The rest of that chapter consists of a prose commentary on the Saṁvartāsūtra, which also circulates independently in several manuscripts.[5] In this, the first verse of the KMT, the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala is described.

[1] These three are the higher transformations of passion, anger and greed, respectively.
[2] ṢSS 1/29-32.

The KuKh, like the other, later Kubjikā Tantras, omits all reference to the Santānabhuvana, which is replaced by a similar triangle representing the goddess's Yoni. These two, although quite distinct, are comparable in several ways, if nothing else because of their common triangular shape and common location at the apex of the subtle body in the End of the Twelve. Moreover, they suffer from similar ambiguities in relation to the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala, probably because they were originally distinct maṇḍalas that came to be identified with the S*aṁvartāmaṇḍala*. The latter assumed the status of the main, most complete, form of the Kramamaṇḍala of the Kubjikā school, into which the essential elements of [1] Schoterman (1981: 49) notes that the commentary on the ṢSS ends its explanation of the Santānabhuvana with the statement that it is also called Saṁvarta.

---

[2] See Schoterman's translation and exposition of chapter two of the ṢSS.

[3] himavataḥ [kh: himavāṁstu; g: himavantaṁ] śiro [g: śiraṁ] devi tripathaṁ pṛṣṭha [kh g: pṛṣṭa] ucyate ||
trikūṭaṁ ca bhaven nāsā santānaṁ dvādaśāntagam [kh: -taṁ] | ŚM 2/6cd-7ab.

The KMT presents the Santānabhuvana in the 'outside world' of myth. Its three peaks, arranged in a triangle, enclose an idyllic land behind (or on top of? pṛṣṭhe) the Himalayas (KMT 1/2a, ṢSS 1/6a) to the west or 'behind' (paścima) Meru (ṢSS 1/27a). The Western direction noted here may possibly be connected with the characterization of the Kubjikā cult as the Western Tradition but more likely means 'behind' in the sense of 'above' Meru. As Meru is said to be the head in this context, Santānabhuva would be above the head, which is indeed its location.

[4] This is an interesting identification because, as we shall see, this is the name given to the goddess's Triangle. Moreover, despite the constant reference to the City of the Moon both as a geographical place and its inner equivalent, it is not mentioned at all in the KMT and never again in the ŚM. We may reasonably assume, therefore, that these verses were added after the initial redaction of the ŚM.

[5] This long prose section running into several pages is quite anomalous in its form and style in relation to the rest of the ŚM. It can be studied independently and was, as the large number of manuscripts of just this part of the ŚM testify. This may be taken to be a sign that this part of the first chapter was also, like the description of Bhairava's residence, an interpolation.

the Transmission – Krama – are projected in the form of mantras and worshipped. Thus, in one place the ṢSS says that the triangular core of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala and hence, by implication, the entire maṇḍala, is emitted from the Santānabhuvana or, according to another reading, is identical with it. Similarly, the triangular Yoni can be treated either as a condensed form of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala or its triangular core, and so the two may be sometimes identified or distinguished. Moreover, these common features also imply an identification of the Santānabhuvana with the triangular Yoni in the End of the Twelve to which the KuKh and the later tradition devotes great attention. In one place, at least, it seems that the ṢSS does indeed make this connection, which implies knowledge on the part of the ṢSS of this development.[1] Even so, like the

---

[1] I am referring here to ṢSS 1/29-30. Schoterman's edited version, with the relevant variants, reads:

brahmarandhrasya santānaṁ bhāvagamyaṁ trikoṇagam । saṁvartāmaṇḍataś cakraṁ tatra candraśilā sthitā* ॥ sā ca candraguhā proktā visargasthānam āśritā । yogapīṭhaṁ ca vijñeyaṁ kathitaṁ mayā sphuṭam ॥
 C – maṇḍalāt tac ca; B – maṇḍala tac ca*

Schoterman translates: The Santāna(-bhuvana) of the Brahmarandhra should be regarded as a triangle. From the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala [originates] a circle; there the Candraśilā is located.

This is called the Candraguhā, associated with the visargasthāna. It should be known as the Yogapīṭha – thus I have told clearly.

I propose an emendation to 29c based on the readings of MSs B and C. Instead of saṁvartāmaṇḍataś cakraṁ I read saṁvartāmaṇḍalaṁ tac ca. I would translate the two verses as follows:

The Santāna(-bhuvana) of the Cavity of Brahmā that can be realised by meditation is present in the Triangle. That is the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala. The Mountain of the Moon is located there. And that is said to be the Cave of the Moon (candraguhā) which is located in the Abode of Emission (visargasthāna). And one should know that that is the Seat of Yoga (yogapīṭha) that I have clearly explained.

The Santānabhuvana 'of the Cavity of Brahmā' is distinguished from the one in the 'outside' world of myth as the one that is reached by meditation. The Cavity of Brahmā here refers not just to the place at the crown of the head but the entire area that extends from there to the End of the Twelve. Thus the first of four forms of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala is said to be located 'above the Cavity of Brahmā' (ṢSS 2/5) while the commentary on the ṢSS says that this is the Cavity of Brahmā itself (Schoterman 1986: 70). According to the ṢSS, the other three forms are located in the heart, below the navel and in the Wheel of the Foundation, that is, in the Sphere of Birth (janmamaṇḍala) in the genital region. The commentary locates them in the heart, the Wheel of the Foundation and the Transmission – Krama (ibid. 73). There is no need to go into details here. It is clear that the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala, Santānabhuvana and the triangular Yoni are in the same place and hence are essentially the same. This is the case also with the other symbolic ciphers to which these two verses refer namely, the Mountain of the Moon which, as we shall see, is also called the KMT and the ŚM, it ignores the rich and complex dynamic relationship between the triangular Yoni of our text and the Liṅga we shall discuss in the following pages.

The Triangle, the Island, the City, the Cave and the Mountain of the Moon

The Triangle and its parts are given several meaningful names, pregnant with symbolic implications.[1] One is the City of the Moon (candrapura). Externally, the City of the Moon figures in the later Kubjikā Tantras as the capital of the land of Koṅkaṇa from where the teachings spread in the second period of the development of the Kubjikā cult. Inwardly, it is the Triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala in the End of the Twelve. Its name suggests the lunar nature of the Triangle, which is a major feature of the goddess. An alternative spelling of this name – Candrapūrṇa[2] – that literally means 'Full of the Moon' underscores this association clearly. The Triangle is full of the sixteen energies of the Full Moon, which is the Point in the centre. The goddess, who is represented by this Point is said to be '(. . .) the pure shade (i.e. energy) of the Moon who assumes a body made of energies (kalāṅga) called the City of the Moon'.[3] The City of the Moon is not known to the KMT whereas another place with which the Triangle is identified in the later Tantras is, the Island of the Moon. The identification is but natural. This is where the goddess assumed the form of a Liṅga. We shall see further ahead that the Island of the Moon is also said to be the place where Śiva taught the goddess the Kulāgama which Matsyendranātha managed to acquire by deceit. The Island of the Moon, where the Kulāgama was revealed for the first time on earth, is the appropriate place for the goddess to go to receive the Command through which the scripture is revealed. It is even more appropriate that the final – paścima – Kulāgama, and with it the Command, be transmitted from there again and definitively.

Other identifications at first sight appear to be more strange. The most common and indeed the most basic identification of the Triangle is as the goddess's Yoni. It is sometimes referred to as the Ocean of the Yoni

---

Island of the Moon. The Cave of the Moon is the cavity of the Triangle in the End of the Twelve. The Abode of Emission is at the apex of the Suṣumṇā, its foundation in the End of the Twelve. The Seat of Yoga is an alternative name for the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala especially the Yoni which is its triangular core (see Schoterman 1986: 51 with reference to ṢSS 28/15cd-16ab).

[1] See below, appendix III.

[2] This name is found in two places in our text. See KuKh 7/57a and 7/61a (candrapūrṇapure). See also note to KuKh 1/11.

[3] KuKh 58/69cd-70ab. We shall discuss the rich lunar associations and dynamism at length further ahead.

(yonyārṇava).[1] The clue as to why it is given this name is found in another similar one, that is, the Ocean of the Mothers (mātṛkārṇava). The Mothers are both the metaphysical Principles (tattva), which are the fluctuations of the waves of the ocean of the divine energy (kalā) of the goddess, formed into the triangular Yoni, as well as the sacred sonic energies of the letters.[2] As the Ocean of the Yoni, it is Kula, the aggregate of energies.[3] So the Triangle is both the Ocean and the Island – one of the many identifications that represent the essential paradox of the identity of the container and the contained – deity and the universe it emanates. The churning of this ocean generates the mantras of the Krama and, indeed, the entire scripture.[4]

Another pair of opposites, the Mountain and the Cave, represents the same paradox. The Triangle is called the Stone[5] and is identified with the Stone or Mountain the goddess ascends in the myth to assume the form of a Liṅga. The original model for this 'stone' is probably the base of what, according to the Siddhānta, consists of the seats (āsana) on which the upper portion of the Liṅga is placed. The Liṅga and its seats extend for the entire series of thirty-six principles. The seats, according to some texts, reach up to Śakti and according to others, Śiva. There is no need to describe the entire complex symbolic structure of this composite 'throne' and its variant forms.[6] What interests us here is the energy at the base of the seats. This is called the energy of the foundation (ādhāraśakti) and it inheres in the foundation stone (ādhāraśilā) of the Liṅga, which corresponds to the Earth principle. The Siddhāntin Śomaśambhu says that 'one should worship the energy which is the foundation whose form is that of a sprout from a seed (bījāṅkurākārā)'.[7] In her exposition of this statement, Brunner explains:

The first to be invoked is Ādhāraśakti [the energy of the foundation], which is present in the ādhāraśilā [the foundation] stone in the form of a tortoise (its other name is kūrmaśilā) at the base of the worlds. Its form as a circular sprout is explained subsequently as being such because it is the support of the seed of the impure worlds. (This seed is Māyā), the primary cause (seed) of the pure worlds, thus she [the goddess who is the energy of the foundation] sustains all manifestation, which is the reason for the form attributed to her. This form of meditation is presented by several texts and even when she happens to be imagined to be in human form, one finds an allusion to her role as the support [by

---

[1] The correct form of this compound is yonyarṇava. See note to Sanskrit text of KuKh 4/63d.
[2] KuKh 57/89.
[3] KuKh 58/27-28.
[4] KuKh 57/90-91ab.
[5] KuKh 3/3 and note to 5/77cd-78ab.
[6] Brunner 1963: 154-177.
[7] SŚP 3/47cd.

saying that] 'she has on the top of her head the form of a sprout (that emerges) from a seed' as well as four arms etc. Notice that in this passage she is called kriyāśakti [the power of action]. Nirmalamaṇi makes the following point in this regard: 'A commentator on Somaśambhu says Ādhāraśakti [the energy of the foundation] is none other than Kuṭilā [the Crooked One] or Kuṇḍalinī. She is under the dominion of Śakti of Śiva, so why is she invoked first? (The answers is) because she is the support of all things. (This is a reasonable and) understandable (reply) as the world cannot exist as such without this, the first manifestation of power. (Thus) it is fitting that the rite of the seat should begin with homage to the coiled śakti [Kuṇḍalinī].' But one may doubt the identification of Kuṭilā with Ādhāraśakti, which does not seem to be admitted by all the authorities. The Suprabheda, for example, identifies Ādhāraśakti [the energy of the foundation] with icchāśakti [the power of the will] and the aforecited passage with kriyāśakti [the power of action]. [Even so] they are (all anyway) forms of Śiva's Śakti and not aspects of bindu [which is related to Śiva]."[1]

Abhinavagupta expounds a sophisticated explanation of this energy from the perspective of his phenomenology and a yogic practice in consonance with it in the following passage of his TĀ:

> At the root of the relationship between the sustainer and sustained which obtains progressively between the gross and subtle elements and the rest in serial order is Śiva's power (śakti), which is at the end (of the series) and is the consciousness that sustains (everything). Thus perception (pratīti) is in this way the sustaining and creative (energy which is one with) Śiva. From that existing things (bhāva) (come forth) and there existing things (subsist). Thus Śakti is the sustaining foundation (ādhārikā) (of everything). An imagined object, although without support (nirādhāra), does not fall because it rests on a power that is its own foundation (ādhāra). This is how one should contemplate all things.[2]

Viewing the symbolism of the goddess's maṇḍala from all these perspectives helps us to understand it better. The Triangle is, essentially, Kuṇḍalinī. Coiled within it she encompasses the phonemic energies that sustain and generate manifestation. As the Moon Stone, she is the foundation and ground of the transcendental god into whom she merges with in the Liṅga, which is the Point in the centre. There she abides as the energy of bliss within the god. When she issues forth from there she is the energy of the god's will (icchāśakti) – his passionate desire (kāma) to emit the Triangular Yoni below him and then out from it, the sphere of emanation.[1]

---

[1] Cf. introduction to vol. 1 of the SŚP pp. 12 and 17.
[2] TĀ 11/106-108.

This Triangle is also said to be in the 'cave hermitage (guhāśrama) on the peak of the temple of Meru'[2] that is, the head. The goddess is reborn in this, the temple of the Himalayas. In the middle of this Cave, that is, in the Point in the centre of the Triangle, is the Śāmbhava state. Thus, here in 'the temple of the God of the gods, on great mount Kailāśa', the god entered the tradition (anvaya).[3] Although the KMT does not mention this Cave, the later tradition makes much of this as the place where the goddess assumed the form of a Liṅga and so became the Command (śāmbhavājñā) transmitted through the tradition.[4] The goddess lives here in the 'abyss of the Cave of the lotus of Kula'.[5] In this Cave the goddess 'became silent' i.e. assumed her highest unmanifest form 'beyond mind' (unmanī) and, in the Liṅga, separated from her consort the god, practiced 'ecstatic celibacy', that is, experienced the divine bliss of the Command. There, immersed in the darkness of the Cave, she induces mystic flight in herself and those who, like the god, come to worship her.[6]

The Cave of the Moon is the Void of the Point in the centre of the Triangle. The Cave may also be the entire Triangle, just as the latter is also the Stone, Island and the City of the Moon. As such it is the Cave of Kula, which is the 'secret place of the Siddhas (siddhaguhya)'.[7] This is the Cave Dwelling – the Kadamba Cave – to which the goddess sends the god to receive the grace[8] she received there in the Liṅga. One is reminded of the Cave to which the first Siddha summoned the Siddhas who founded the lineages (oli) of the Kubjikā tradition. There they received the Command and were sent out to propagate it. From another point of view, the Siddhas are the lords of the energies of the letters (to which we have referred to above as Mothers) who reside, as it were, in this Cave.

Here, where the Command originates, in the Cave of the Śāmbhava plane (śāmbhavājñā) situated on the Peak of Kailāśa in the End of the Twelve above the head, the first Siddha sits absorbed in the contemplation through which he receives the Command.[9] Thus he follows the example of the goddess who is in the Cave and by its power, 'filled with hundreds of nets of lightning flashes and

---

[1] See KuKh 5/18 and notes.
[2] KuKh 3/1 and 3/30.
[3] KuKh 3/162-164ab.
[4] KuKh 3/165cd-167.
[5] MāSt line 126.
[6] KuKh 6/3-4ab.
[7] KuKh 13/111.
[8] KuKh 3/162-164ab.
[9] KuKh 3/1.

beautifully illumined by the lights of effulgent energy (tejas), assumed the form of the Divine Liṅga'. Thus she is established in authority in the divine House, that is, the Cave of the City of the Moon, the maṇḍala.[1]

As the source of the transmission in this way, the Triangle is also commonly said to be the abode or 'hermitage' (āśrama)[2] of the Kubjikā tradition. As such it is called the House (gṛha, ve*śman)* of Kula or House of the Lineage (anvaya) of Kula[3] because, from this point of view, it is the ultimate source of all the Kula traditions.[4] This source is implicitly identified with the Kubjikā tradition by referring to the Triangle as the Western House (paścimagṛha, paścimaveśman). Also called the House of the City of the Moon,[5] it is the House, that is, the family (kula)[6] or lineage, into which the goddess is born.[7] Here, as in other contexts, the play on words is significant. The Triangle and the tradition of which it is the supreme embodiment and source is the last (paścima) and final (paścima) one in the ascent of Kuṇḍalinī through the subtle body who traverses the lower traditions and their corresponding states (= 'houses') as she does so.

The Triangle is filled with letters. These are governed by Rudras or Bhairavas, called Siddhas and, occasionally, yogis.[8] They are also said to be Liṅgas. These Liṅgas are replicas of the main Liṅga in the centre of the Triangle which, as a whole, is also considered to be a Liṅga. Again, each of them is placed in a triangular compartment that also replicates the entire Yoni. In this way, each Siddha or god (that is, Liṅga) governing a letter is accompanied by a Yoginī or goddess, that is, a Yoni, who represents the energy of the letter and is his consort. In this way the Yoni is a hologram in which each part replicates the whole. Analogously, the sides are lined with the letters imbedded in the energizing seed-syllables, considered to be male and female, of a mantra called the Twelve Verses.[9] Thus it is a supremely fertile Yoni within which *conjuctio*s take place at every level from the centre where the main god and goddess unite out to the parts

---

[1] KuKh 3/168-169.
[2] Āśrama – literally 'hermitage' – is a common term in our texts used to denote the 'place' in which spiritual realities are located. See note to KuKh 5/21.
[3] KuKh 58/69cd-70ab.
[4] It is also the House of Kula because it contains the aggregate (kula) of the energies of the goddess. The goddess who resides there in the centre is Kulakaulinī, who is the female head (kaulinī) of the family (kula) of energies.
[5] KuKh 3/168-169.
[6] Kubjikā is very closely identified with the goddess Mālinī and so the family of which she is the head is the Mālinīkula where she is said to operate as the Command (KuKh 3/165cd-167).
[7] KuKh 3/164cd-165ab.
[8] KuKh 38/7.
[9] See KuKh 3/31-32 and notes.

within it, all around it with the letters that line its sides, each individual Liṅga representing the letters with the Yoni[1] and finally, the entire Yoni with the god.[2]

We shall see in detail when we come to chapter eight of our text that the Triangle filled with letters is used as a grid (called prastāra or gahvara) from which letters are extracted to make mantras. Such grids were well known to earlier Tantric schools. This one in particular was drawn wholesale from the Trika school which, as we shall see, was the source of virtually all the major features of this Triangle (but not the Point in the centre of it) except those most specifically related to the Kubjikā cult. We may begin to briefly trace these developments from this feature of the Triangle. We can identify the context and manner that they took place by comparing the form of this Triangle as it appears in the Trika sources and the KMT.

The so-called Trika school is an important predecessor and source of the doctrines of the Kubjikā Tantras in general. A particularly important Trika source for the Kubjikā Tantras, including our own text, is the Tantrasadbhāva. Chapters 3, 6 and 8 of the TS are reproduced in the KMT with variants as chapters 4, 5 and 6. The contents of these chapters tell us much about what the Kubjikā tradition has adapted from the Trika. We shall now examine a few small and yet very significant modifications of the text of the TS that occur in chapter four of the KMT that are particularly relevant to our enquiry into the history of the goddess's Triangle, filled with the energies of the letters.

The TS knows nothing of the goddess Kubjikā whose presence had to be, therefore, inducted into the chapters drawn by the KMT from the TS.[3] In her place we find other goddesses, notably Mālinī, who is treated as a form of the goddess Parā ('the Supreme One'). The following passage in the KMT, drawn from the TS, describes her form when she is independent of the god as Ekavīrā, literally 'the Solitary Heroine' who is the 'supreme Yoni'. The reader will recall that the hymn Bhairava intones to the goddess in the Liṅga, where she is temporarily separated from the god, is addressed to her as Mālinī. Note how the goddess undergoes three transformations in the myth. In a previous life she is Śiva's wife. One could call this the goddess's exoteric form. She is reborn as Bhadrakālikā, a form of the goddess of the Kālīkrama. In the Liṅga she is the Trika goddess Mālinī from which she emerges as Kubjikā. Thus her transition from one form to another, all of which are incorporated into her ultimate form, mark the phases of her development in the earlier traditions that are summated and completed, as it were,

---

[1] See Dyczkowski 2004: 183-186; also KuKh 7/15cd-16ab and note.
[2] See note to KuKh 7/16cd-17.
[3] Thus, for example, just before KMT 4/29 and 4/38 we find śrīkubjikā uvāca, 'the venerable Kubjikā said', the TS reads the nondescript devy uvāca, 'the goddess said'.

in the figure of the goddess Kubjikā. A similar transition is taking place in the case of the Triangle, her geometric form, and its sonic contents.

Mālinī is an embodiment of the energies of the letters of alphabet arranged in a different order from the normal alphabetical one. Her male counterpart is Śabdarāśi Bhairava who embodies the same letters arranged in the normal order. These two and the Vidyās of the three goddesses Parā, Parāparā and Aparā, which the Kubjikā Tantras consider to be the main features of the Trika teachings, are liberally incorporated into that of Kubjikā.[1] We also find the triad Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava as aspects (corresponding to the energies of will, knowledge and action) of the one energy embodied in the goddess and her Triangle.[2] Concretely, they are the three parts of the mantra Tadgraha, which are understood to be forms of Rudraśakti who, tripartite, deploys herself as the Triangle. This triad is one of the focal concepts of Abhinavagupta's Anuttara Trika school. There it stands for the triad of Śiva (śambhu), Śakti and the Individual Soul (aṇu also called nara) and all the basic Trika triads. More specifically, they are fundamental to Abhinavagupta's eschatology who, inspired by the Mālinīvijayatantra, denotes with these terms the three categories into which he classifies spiritual practice. All these elements drawn from the TS and its Triangle also appear, in various contexts in the Kubjikā Tantras, duly modified to accommodate their specific teachings. Let us see how this works.

The following description of the Triangle of letters concludes chapter four of the KMT, the second half of which is dedicated to the drawing of the triangular grid (gahvara) of letters.[3] Making use of this grid, the Mālinī order of the alphabet is presented along with the places on the body of the goddess Mālinī to which they correspond.[4] The KMT concludes saying:

> Mālinī is the one supreme source (parā yoni) of the seventy million mantras and Vidyās with unlimited power. She is called

---

[1] We read in the KRU that:

(The deity) will fashion the Trika Tantra endowed the limbs major and minor of the three Vidyās and (it will) also (consist) of Śabdarāśi along with Mālinī.

śabdarāśiś ca mālinyā vidyānāṁ tritayasya [g: tritayaṁsya] ca |
sāṅgopāṅgasamāyuktaṁ [kh: sāṅgau-; k kh g: -yuktā] trikatantraṁ kariṣyati || KRU 10/15.

See Dyczkowski 1988: 187, n. 188 where this passage is quoted. Chapter eighteen of the KuKh deals with Mālinī, chapter nineteen with Śabdarāśi and twenty with the three Vidyās, collectively called the Triple Vidyā. Clearly, the Kubjikā tradition understood these three sets to be intimately related just as the Trika tradition did.

[2] KuKh 58/27-28.

[3] KMT 4/75-80.

[4] KMT 4/81-106.

> Mālinī because she abides having strung the countless (mantras) that have been in the past and will be in the future (together) in a garland (mālayitva). O fair-faced lady, she is immeasurable. She is said to be the mother of the Rudras and Yoginīs (who govern the letters and their energies). O lady with auspicious eyes, she who is without letters (avarṇā) is conjoined with (all the) letters.[1] Mantras consist of all the Rudras, and the Rudras, O beloved, are energies by nature. Energy should be known to be Mātṛkā and she should be known to be Śiva.
>
> Thus, O fair lady, the measure of mantras has been explained to you. This is said to be the first (of all the teachings) and should be kept secret with effort. (This is) the prescription concerning (the worship of the deity) alone (without companion) (ekavīravidhāna) that has been discussed in a previous Āgama.[2]

These lines have been drawn directly from the TS and so characterize the unmodified Trika triangle as much as they do the Kubjikā one, apart from one major addition to the latter. This is the projection of the sacred seats into it, which is completely unknown to the TS. The TS knows of the existence of the basic four sacred seats – Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa – but it does not treat them as a specific group.[3] In due course we shall deal in some detail with these and the other sacred seats. Here, in the context of an exposition of the goddess's Triangle, we may simply note their presence there. The Kubjikā Tantras

---

[1] Bhairava in the Liṅga described in the KJN is similarly not a letter and yet contains them all. But there he is represented by the Point. Here the Point has developed, as it were, into the Triangle. This is another way in which the Point is identified with the Triangle, both of which are the Liṅga.

[2] KMT 4/107-112.

[3] Jālandhara, Oḍiyāṇa and Pūrikā (= Pūrṇagiri?) appear juxtaposed in a long list of sacred sites with their residents in chapter sixteen of the TS. The relevant verses says:

> Viśālākṣī is in Jālandhara. Śiṣṭimā (?) is in Oḍiyāṇa. Mahākāyā is in Pūrikā and Vīranāyikā in Āyodhyā.

jālandhare viśālākṣī oḍiyāṇe ca śiṣṭimā |
pūrikāyāṁ [-kāyā] mahākāyā āyodhyāṁ vīranāyikā [-kāḥ] || TS 16/100.

We notice the omission of Kāmarūpa in the long list of places of which these entries are a part. It is mentioned only three times in the TS (in 6/72d, 16/63, 88b) and does not appear to have any special importance or form part of any group. This is surprising as the TS is one of the sources Abhinavagupta refers to in chapter 29 of his Tantrāloka that deals with the Kula modality (prakriyā). This was said to have been revealed by Matsyendranātha in Kāmarūpa and so should be considered a sacred place. Moreover, even though the TS regularly refers to the 'Kula tradition' (kulāmnāya) and reports on its contents, Matsyendra is not mentioned in the TS. This may well be because it precedes him.

constantly refer to them as they are the residences of the first Siddhas who established the lineages (oli) through which the Krama of the goddess was transmitted. Thus Kubjikā's Triangle is not only the source of the 'seventy million mantras and Vidyās' it is also, and more specifically, the source of the Krama and the lineages of teachers.

All this is achieved by just a few changes and additions to the text of the TS. After having briefly described how the triangle is to be drawn, the next thing to do is to place the letters in it. The TS explains the procedure simply as follows:

> Deposit the group of vowels in due order (progressively) beginning from the north-east onwards. Then at the end of that (series of vowels, deposit) the consonants until they reach the centre. The god (there) of the great soul is called Haṁsa and is located in Brahmā's place.[1]

The KMT, modifying these lines, says instead:

> One should write the (letters) beginning with the letter A from Kāmarūpa (onwards) in due order in this way. (First) the vowels and (then) the consonants as is the normal manner (yathāvṛttyā) until they reach the centre. (There) the god called Haṁsa, the great soul is located in Oḍḍiyāna.[2]

We know from the Kubjikā sources that the letters are arranged within the triangle in a spiral.[3] That is the case also with the earlier Trika triangle. The TS enjoins that the spiral should begin from the north-east. Assuming that it begins in one of the corners of the triangle, as it does in its Kubjikā equivalent, the most convenient orientation that allows for a corner in that direction and a downward-facing triangle is for it to have its lower corner facing south. This arrangement differs from the one in the Kubjikā sources according to which the spiral begins from Kāmarūpa projected into the lower corner of the triangle. Although this change of orientation makes no difference to the position of the letters in the grid

---

[1] īśānādikrameṇaiva [k, kh, g: īśānyādi-] saṁnyaset [k, kh, g: sabhyaset] svaramaṇḍalam ||
tasyānte tu tataḥ [k, kh, g: tata] sparśā yāvan madhyam upāgatāḥ [kh: -tā] |
brahmasthānagataṁ devaṁ haṁsākhyaṁ tu mahātmanaḥ || TS 3/100cd-101.

[2] kāmarūpād akārādau likhed evaṁ krameṇa tu |
svarāḥ sparśāḥ yathāvṛttyā yānan madhyam upāgatāḥ ||
oḍḍiyānagataṁ devaṁ haṁsākhyaṁ tu mahātmanam* | KMT 4/79-80a.

* The edited text reads devi but I prefer the reading of MSs CFHJK which agrees with the TS.

[3] The reader is referred to chapter eight of our text and related notes for a detailed exposition of this grid.

with respect to one another, it is significant from the point of view of the Kubjikā Tantras. Firstly, the corner in which Kāmarūpa is located is in the west,[1] the direction associated with the Kubjikā tradition. Again, Kāmarūpa is the seat from which the teachings are said to originate in this, the Kali Age.[2] They pour down, as it were, from this corner down into the sphere of manifestation. Thus the texts tirelessly repeat that the Kubjikā teachings of this Age belong to the 'division beginning with KĀ' (kādibheda).[3]

Again, the texts emphasis that the spiral of letters (commonly identified with Kuṇḍalinī) is an anticlockwise one. The clockwise direction is normally that of emanation and the anticlockwise that of withdrawal. However, in this case the situation is reversed because the triangle is facing downwards. From the perspective of the Kubjikā Tantras, which is 'in accord with the pattern of emanation',[4] the centre is especially emphasized as the place from which emanation proceeds. Starting from there the spiral of letters, in the reverse serial order, moves in a clockwise direction to emerge out at the letter A which, in the bottom corner of the triangle, spills out into manifestation.

The place in the centre is allocated in the TS to Brahmā, the god responsible for creation. It is where Haṁsa, who presides over the letter Ha, is said to reside. The KMT places the sacred seat of Oḍḍiyāna there. Oḍḍiyāna is the first sacred seat (ādyapīṭha) where the teachings are revealed in the first Age. It is also the place where the Command, the energy of the goddess, is located from which both the teachings and emanation originate.

The two triangles may be represented graphically as follows:

[1] The texts never tire of repeating that the seats in the other two corners, Jālandhara and Pūrṇagiri, are in the south and north, respectively. That means the Kāmarūpa must be in the west.
[2] See, for example, KuKh 6/134cd-135ab.
[3] This formula appears in virtually all the long colophons.
[4] See KuKh 1/1. The perspective of the Kālī Tantras is, on the contrary, that of withdrawal.

Diagram 4. The Trika Triangle
Diagram 5. Kubjikā's Triangle
These then are the two new cardinal features projected into the Trika Triangle: it is endowed with the inner projection of the sacred sites and it enshrines the Command (a concept unknown to the Trika). Thus it is transformed into the Triangle of the goddess Kubjikā who takes over the role of the Supreme Yoni that her Trika predecessor, the goddess Mālinī, enjoys. We find both these features combined in another augmentation of Trika doctrine brought about by manipulating Trika teachings transmitted through the TS in another passage in the first half of chapter four of the KMT.

The first half of chapter four of the KMT is concerned with explaining what makes mantras effective – how, that is, to use the expression found there, they are 'endowed with life' (jīvayukta) and so are successful.[1] A part of the answer is that effective mantras are made of letters drawn from the Mālinī grid and others like it. Moreover, manipulating the manner in which syllables are combined and repeated can energize mantras. Various types of such combinations are listed and briefly described, as are other vitalizing permutations. But although the actual form of a mantra may account for its effectiveness, its 'life' is more essentially derived from the inner activity of the energy of the deity within the one who recites it. This is described in various ways in appropriate places throughout the account. In that context we read the following passage. The god is teaching the goddess how to make mantras effective:

> Contemplate the Void that is the Self at one with you and, established in the lotus of the heart, (shines) like pure crystal, motionless (cāra) and devoid of utterance (uccāra), burning with its own radiant energy (tejas). (Contemplate it) rising like the solar orb by means of (the rise of Kuṇḍalinī which is) the Yoga of the practice of Suṣumṇā.
>
> Piercing through the sequences (of the sacred seats) Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa (o-jā-pū-kā)*[2] it is located on the plane of Kubjā's Vidyā (vidyākubjapada); thus the yogi shakes (in the course of this penetration) and at that very moment (when he has pierced through) he is paralyzed (stobha) .*[3]

The sentences marked with an asterisk in the TS are quite different. It says: 'then, piercing through Brahmā's place, (the yogi) abides on the plane of

[1] KMT 4/14ab.
[2] These are common abbreviations of the names of the sacred seats. See note to KuKh 2/28.
[3] KMT 4/17-19. See above, chapter 2, p. 211 ff. for the following part of this reference and discussion.

Viṣṇu and Rudra'.[1] The TS is describing a progressive rise through the worlds of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Rudra. Following these three, according to the TS, comes the world of Īśvara[2] and then, finally Śiva. The text has been modified and supplemented in the KMT in such a way as to transform it into a description of what takes place when the sun-like Self has risen to penetrate the Cavity of Brahmā, which is normally said to be located on the crown of the head. This is the plane of the goddess's Vidyā and so is also called the Cavity of Kubjī[3] which is [1] brahmasthānaṁ tato bhittvā viṣṇurudrapade sthitaḥ – TS 3/18cd. Cf. o-jā-pū-kā-kramān bhittvā vidyākubjapade sthitam – KMT 4/19ab.

---

[2] Thus the KMT (4/20c) reads: kubjīśānapadaṁ prāptaṁ i.e 'once the plane of Kubjīśāna has been attained'. Instead the TS (3/20a) reads: īśvaraṁ tu padaṁ [kh: pada] prāptaṁ [k, kh, g: prāptaḥ] – 'once attained the plane of Īśvara.'

[3] This term appears in the following passage that relates five places in the subtle body to the way in which the transference (saṁkrānti) of the deity's energy takes place:

Touch is located in the heart. The Gaze is in the throat. Conversation is in the palate. Vision (of the deity) (darśana) is in the middle of the Point (between the eyebrows) while, O goddess, spontaneous possession certainly (takes place) in the cavity of Kubjī (kubjirandhra) (at the top of the head). KMT 4/71-72ab (derived from TS 3/92-93ab).

The last quarter verse in the KMT reads: kubjirandhre na saṁśayaḥ – certainly (takes place) in the cavity of Kubjī. The original reading in the TS is: śivasthāne bhaved dhruvam – (this) certainly (takes place) in Śiva's abode. The term 'śivasthāna' occurs in only one other place in the TS, where it denotes a stage in the ascent of sonic energy in the form of the Point which takes place in the course of uttering certain letters. The first four members of this series – Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Rudra and Īśvara – reach up to the end of the palate (talvanta) where the uvula (lambaka) is located. Then comes the energy Raudrī that blocks the passage to the next stage. Once overcome that blockage, audible sound ends to give way to a series of transformations that mark stages in the development of silent spiritual Sound. The following passage in the TS refers to this stage as Śiva's abode:

Above that is the centre born from Sound (nādaja). The letter Ma goes there. That is said to be Śiva's abode where Sound (nāda) originates. O beloved, above the uvula, where your two Points are (located) is said to be the End of Emission (visargānta) and, O fair lady, the End of the Twelve.

tasyordhve nādajaṁ lakṣaṁ makāras tatra gacchati ||
*śivasthānaṁ tu taṁ proktaṁ [kh: ?] yatra [kh: ?] nādasamudbhavaḥ [kh: * vaḥ]* |
lambakasyordhvataś caiva dvau bindvau [k: divyau] yatra te priye ||
visargāntaṁ tu taṁ proktaṁ dvādaśāntaṁ ca bhāmini | TS 1/80cd-82ab.

We are not concerned here with the End of the Twelve which is also said to be the 'Abode of Emission' (visargasthāna) in the Kubjikā Tantras. Although the text is not explicit, it is unlikely that Śiva's abode, 'above the uvula', is the End of the Twelve above the head. We may reasonably suppose that it is the Cavity of Brahmā (brahmarandhra) situated on the crown of the head. This is where Śiva resides in this series and so the common name cannot be used in this context as where the 'plane of Kubjīśāna',[1] i.e. Śiva or Bhairava in the garb of Kubjikā's consort, is located. The name 'Cavity of Kubjī' is appropriate because it denotes the goddess's Triangle which here appears with attributes unknown to the TS. Moreover, this is where, instead of Śiva, the initiate into the Kubjikā Tantras attains the Command which is the essential nature of the goddess.[2]

The KMT takes special pride in being the Tantra where the goddess's Yoni has been revealed. This is why the Tantra has been kept secret,[3] reminding us of Brahmā already appears as the first member in it. So, by extension, we may reasonably suppose the 'Cavity of Kubjī' to be the same Cavity of Brahmā.

---

[1] KMT 4/20.

[2] The KMT (4/21cd) reads: brahmarandhragatā cājñā kāṣṭhavat tiṣṭhate sadā | And when the Command (ājñā) is present in the Cavity of Brahmā, (the yogi becomes stiff) like a piece of wood'. Instead the TS (3/21ab) reads: śivāntaṁ tu [k: śivāṁ tatra] yadā [k: mayaṁ] prāptaṁ [k: prāptāḥ; kh prāptaḥ] kāṣṭhavat tiṣṭhate tadā | 'If the extremity of Śiva is attained (there), (the yogi) then (becomes stiff) like a piece of wood.'

[3] Referring to the Kula teachings (kulaśāsana), the KMT (16/29ab) says: taṁ tu yonyārṇave līnaṁ yoniḥ śrīkubjikāmate. Heilijgers-Seelen translates: 'this latter is absorbed in the Yonyārṇava and the Yoni[-arṇava] again in the sacred Kubjikā tradition.' Heilijgers-Seelen supposes that 'yonyārṇava' is the name of a Tantra. But although a Tantra by this name is mentioned in the ŚM (19/271cd, 20/174ab) the expression is a common one for the goddess's Yoni and should, I believe, be understood this way. Moreover, the Śrīkubjikāmata is, in my opinion, the Tantra. Thus the very next line refers to the Tantra. It says: ato 'rthaṁ gopitaṁ tantraṁ na kaścin mayoditam. Heilijgers-Seelen translates: 'Therefore this doctrine is kept very secret; I did not proclaim it to anyone' (KMT 16/29cd). Heilijgers-Seelen does not translate the word 'tantraṁ'; instead she treats it simply as a synonym of 'artham'. The noun artham (normally masculine neuter) may be translated as 'doctrine'. The word 'tantra' is not normally understood this way. Monier-Williams lists the meanings of the word 'tantra' as: 'the leading or principle or essential part, main point, charateristic feature, model, type, system, framework'. However, the sources Monier-Williams lists where this usage is attested are Vedic. While it is instructive to note how the word 'tantra' is used in late Vedic literature, the word is not commonly used with these meanings in Tantric sources. Moreover, the ṢSS inserts the following line just before this one, which leaves us with no doubt as to how the redactor of the ṢSS understood this sentance. Referring to the 'yoniḥ' mentioned in the line we are examining, the ṢSS says:

It is unclear (avyaktā) in the (KMT) of three and a half thousand (verses, but is) is clear and well established here (in the ṢSS).

avyaktādhyuṣṭasāhasre [k kh: -dvyaṣṭa-] vyaktā [k: – ktāś] cātra pratiṣṭhitā [k: -tāḥ] ||
ṢSS 25/57cd

Moreover, it is clear that the ŚM has also not understood the line in question the way Heilijgers-Seelen does because it substitutes it with:

Kubjikā of the Path of Kula abides (there) as the Yoni.

kubjikā kulamārgasya yonibhūtā (g; -rūpā) vyavasthitā | ŚM 20/176cd.

the oft-repeated admonition the god makes to the goddess in Tantric texts in general that she should keep what she has learnt from him secret or hidden 'like her own yoni' (svayonivat). The KuKh proclaims that this Triangle, called the Island of the Moon, with these sacred seats from which the Siddhas were said to have promulgated the teachings, is a specific feature of the Final Tradition (paścimāmnāya), that of the Kubjikā Tantras:

> The goddesses (mudrā),[1] the Siddhas and the four sacred seats have (all) been brought down (to earth) onto the Island of the Moon. Little known to (any) other school (darśana), they are the main (features) of the Final Tradition.[2]

In fact, the triangular Yoni complete with the sacred seats is a major concern of the Kubjikā tradition as a whole. So much so that of all the teachings redacted in the *sūtra*s[3] of the MBT the one concerning this was given pride of place as the Root Sūtra (mūlasūtra), of which there are as many as three versions in the KuKh.[4] The teachings concerning the Yoni and this sūtra were considered to be so characteristic of the Kubjikā Tantras that Śrīpuṇḍarīka, the author of the commentary called Vimalaprabhā on the Buddhist Kālacakratantra, quotes a part of it. In the usual derisive manner of Buddhist commentators, Puṇḍarīka refers to those who accept the authority of this text as demons to be devoured (bhakṣyadaitya). They have not known the supreme secret and their body is like that of the demon Māra who tormented the Buddha.[5] This body is the triangular Yoni (bhaga) of the goddess that the Kubjikā Tantras teach the adept should project into his own body. This the Root Sūtra describes as follows:

> The Energy called the Yoni (bhaga) moves along three paths, it is made of the three letters (AIṂ HRĪṂ ŚRĪṂ) and is of three kinds. Located in the centre (of it), along with the Supreme Power

---

I would therefore translate the version found in the KMT (16/29) as follows:

> That (Kula teaching) is absorbed into the Ocean of the Yoni and the Yoni (is taught) in the venerable Kubjikāmata. Thus (this) reality has been hidden (and) I have not told the Tantra (i.e the KMT) to anybody (before).

[1] For clarity's sake I translate the word mudrā here as 'goddess'. Kubjikā herself is sometimes referred to as mudrā.

[2] mudrāḥ siddhāś catuḥpīṭhāś candradvīpe 'vatāritāḥ |
pradhānāḥ paścimāmnāye aprasiddhānyadarśane || KuKh 60/70.

[3] We will discuss the structure of the MBT and the prominent place *sūtra*s have in it in the last chapter of this introduction.

[4] See chapters 26, 38 and 42. See also chapter 58 where the Root Sūtra is explained.

[5] Vimalaprabhā, vol. 3, pp. 146-148. Here the Root Sūtra is called Kulasūtra.

> (parakalā), is the venerable (seat called) Uḍḍiyāṇa that is beautifully luminous (sudīpta).
>
> In the right-hand corner is the venerable (seat) called Jālandhara. It is located in (the Supreme Reality) that has been made manifest. In the left (corner) is the venerable Pūrṇapīṭha that arouses fear in the fettered and by which the universe is filled (pūrita).
>
> In front of that is Kāmarūpa. Endowed with the energy of passion, it is the abode of all the yogic powers (siddhi). The entire troupe of yogis, adorned with the energy of Supreme Śiva, resides within the Triangle.[1]

Further ahead we shall have occasion to discuss the outer location of these seats and other sacred sites. Here we focus on other major features associated with Kubjikā's Triangle inspired by the Trika. These can be accurately traced to the TS by turning to chapter 40 of the KuKh, which is essentially drawn from the first chapter of the TS.[2] This important Trika Tantra is a major authority for Kashmiri Trika Śaivites who refer to it, as do the Kubjikā Tantras, to explain the nature of Kuṇḍalinī and how she functions in terms of the activity of the energies that line the sides of the goddess's Triangle.

There we find the geometric shapes we have described above. These are related to the energies, or aspects of the one energy, that constitute the Triangle. The first is the spiral of the sleeping Kuṇḍalinī. For the ignorant she is deluding Māyā.[3] For the awakened she is the Transmental energy beyond mind (manonmanī). Also called Anāmā (Without Name) or Ambikā (Little Mother), she possesses the three energies of will, knowledge and action[4] hyposthetized in the three goddesses who form the sides of the Triangle. The first of these is Vāmā. She is the slanting line on the left (vāma) of the triangle. As Māyā she is Kuṇḍalī, turned towards the left (vāmāvarta).[5] The word for left is vāma. Vāmā is therefore Kuṇḍalinī 'turned towards the left'. From this perspective this means that the line

---

[1] KuKh 42/3-4ab.

[2] Chapter 40 (1-165) of our text corresponds, apart from several omissions, to TS 1/11cd-321. The reduced version in the KuKh is also found, with omissions and variants, in the AS as verses 20/21-190ab. For details refer to the edition of chapter 40 of the KuKh and the concordance.

One of the reasons this passage was considered so important that it has been incorporated into two different places in the Kubjikā corpus is because it describes, amongst other things, the formation of this Triangle.

[3] KuKh 40/19cd: Māyā is said to be the sleeping snake whose (coiled) form (is circular like) an earring (kuṇḍala).

[4] KuKh 40/78cd-79ab.

[5] KuKh 40/20-21ab.

on the left side of the triangle represents her. She is said to emit (vamayati) nectar.[1]

The second is Jyeṣṭhā (the Eldest One). She is the awakened, straightened Kuṇḍalinī. Extremely subtle like a lotus fiber, she emerges 'on the path of emanation'[2] to generate the worlds. The third is Raudrī who is the completed Triangle. Her shape is triangular like a water chestnut (śṛngāta). She is an obstructing force (nirodhikā)[3] who can operate in two ways. Although Raudrī is the most intense form of the energy of the Command, she blocks the way to realisation for the ignorant. However, she also restrains or 'blocks' the impurity of those who are the object of the deity's grace.[4] These three, along with Ambikā, can be understood as phases in the development of Kuṇḍalinī, marked by moments of the unfolding of Speech or the energy of divine Sound (nāda).[5] The three energies can also be understood to form the sides of the Triangle as the energies of the letters, sixteen for each side, that line it[6] and are said to be the enclosure (parigraha) of the House of the Yoginī, that is, the goddess Kubjikā. From this perspective, Jyeṣṭhā is the straight line at the top of the downward-facing triangle. Vāmā the line on the left and Raudrī the rising line, as it were, on the right.[7] In between, the remaining two letters represent the god and the goddess. Thus the Triangle looks as follows:[8]

---

[1] KuKh 38/22.
[2] KuKh 40/21cd-22ab.
[3] KuKh 40/22cd.
[4] KuKh 38/22.
[5] See MāSt lines 3 and 4. In the notes there the energies are presented as phases and aspects of the dynamism and states of Kuṇḍalinī with whom Kubjikā is identified.
[6] See KuKh 7/8 ff.
[7] KuKh 7/13-14ab.
[8] See also appendix III.

The Triangle of Letters
These three energies are the consorts of the gods Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara[1] and manifest as a series of triads. At the microcosmic level they engender exhalation (equivalent to creation brought about by Vāmā), inhalation (equivalent to persistence brought about by Jyeṣṭhā) and retention of the breath (equivalent to withdrawal brought about by Raudrī).[2] They are located in the corresponding channels in the body where these three forms of the vital breath function: namely Iḍā, Piṅgalā and Suṣumṇā, respectively. These three exemplify several triads with which these three energies are associated. They may be equated, in the same order, with the dawn, midday and the evening.[3] They are also the energies that bring about the initial coming into being (udbhava) of the universe and an expanded state of consciousness followed by emission (viśleṣa) and merger (laya).[4]

These energies and their symbolic geometric representations are all individually and collectively identified with the goddess whom Bhairava praises as such in the Mālinīstava, the hymn he intones to evoke her out of the Liṅga.[5] The collective triadic nature of this triple energy (triśakti) is also summed up in Tripurā, the goddess of the Three Cities whose triadic nature is apparent even in her name. The Nityāṣoḍaśikārṇava (also called Vāmakeśvarīmata), her root

[1] KuKh 7/14cd-15ab.
[2] KuKh 40/132cd-133ab.
[3] KuKh 40/131cd-134ab.
[4] KuKh 40/141.
[5] MāSt lines 3 and 4.

Tantra, inspired by Trika doctrine and reinforced by the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras, expounds how these three energies are perceived within her:

> O dear one, Tripurā, the Supreme Power is the first-born here (in this world) . . . Once she has assimilated all the seed letters (into herself), Vāmā abides (in the form of) a sprout. Then Jyeṣṭhā (assumes the form) of (a straight line which is like a) flame (śikhā). O Supreme Goddess, (when) she assumes the (triangular) form of a water chestnut, (she is) Raudrī, whose nature is to devour the universe. She is that Supreme Power who is the one Supreme Goddess (Parameśvarī), the threefold Goddess Tripurā who is Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Īśa. O beloved, she is the power of will, knowledge and action. She emanates the Triple World and so she is called Tripurā.[1]

The triads that form the Triangle emanate from the centre. As the source of the triad from which emanation proceeds, the centre is not part of it and so is, in that sense, empty. Thus the goddess is also the Point that marks that transcendental space in the centre.[2] At the same time, from a different perspective, it is the First Seat and is worshipped together with the other three. Thus the triad is complete and self-sustained as a quaternary, each part of which is no less important than the other. Accordingly the KMT teaches that the consecrated yogi who has received the Command should meditate on the Triangle concentrating on its four parts. Each one gives him particular accomplishments (siddhi), including the magical powers of control and destruction. This is called the Sequence of the Foundation (ādhārakrama).

This Triangle, with its triads and encompassing quaternaries, has been absorbed by the Śrīvidyā tradition and been given pride of place as the central triangle of its famous maṇḍala, the Śrīcakra. As the Śrīvidyā tradition certainly post-dates the inception of that of Kubjikā, the high degree in which the two triangles coincide is certainly because the Śrīvidyā tradition has borrowed and adapted this triangle from the Kubjikā Tantras. Indeed, Vidyānanda, a commentator on the NṢA, who probably lived in South India sometime between the 12th and 14th century,[3] appears to have been aware of this or, at least, he knew that the triangles in the centre of Kubjikā's maṇḍala and Śrīcakra are essentially the same.[4] When we come to discuss the major seats and the lineages of teachers

---

[1] NṢĀ 4/4ab, 9-12ab.
[2] MāSt line 4.
[3] See Dviveda's introduction to the NṢA p. 21-22
[4] Vidyānanda comments on the following line which is part of the reference quoted above: she is that Supreme Power who is the one Supreme Goddess (eṣā sā paramā śaktir ekaiva parameśvarī – NṢĀ 4/10cd). He quotes the first quarter of the Saṁvartāsūtra and attributes it to the Śrīmata i.e.

said to originate from them, we shall observe that these details coincide very closely. Moreover, the essential symbolic associations, goddesses, geometries and the rest with relation to the Triangle that were taken over from the Trika by the Kubjikā Tantras are clearly recognizable in the Śrīvidyā tradition. In short, in this case at least, the Kubjikā Tantras have served as a channel for the input of Trika doctrine into Śrīvidyā.

The important role the Kubjikā Tantras have played in this respect has been obscured by the extensive Kashmiri Śaiva hermeneutics, which Abhinavagupta would say is the highest development of Trika doctrine. In the following passage from the YHṛ in which the formation of the first triangle of the series of triangles that constitute the main part of Śrīcakra is described, we find all these inputs combined. The goddesses of the energies of the Triangle are drawn from Trika, the sacred seats from the Kubjikā Tantras and their relation to the four levels of Speech from the Pratyabhijñā school of Kashmiri Śaivism. Moreover, certainly later than the TS and probably also the KuKh, it serves to clarify the Root Sūtra quoted above:

> If that supreme energy beholds the radiant pulse (sphuraṇa) of its own nature, she assumes the nature of Ambikā and is said to be Supreme Speech.
>
> If she is propense (unmukhī) to make the universe, which is in a seed state manifest, she is Vāmā, (so called) because she vomits out (vāmana) the universe and assumes the (curved shape of an elephant) hook (aṅkuśa).[1] She is then the power of the will that abides in the form of the Speech of Vision (paśyantī).
>
> In the same way Jyeṣṭhā, the power of knowledge, is said to be the Middle Speech (madhyamā). She is a straight line and her form is experienced in the persistence of the universe.[2] In the state in which that (universe) is withdrawn, she assumes the form of a Point (baindavaṁ rūpam) by a process of reversal.[3] the KMT. Then, refering to the triangle described in the NṢĀ, he says that it is the saṁvartayonimaṇḍala which is the 'middle place' of Śrīcakra (saṁvartayonimaṇḍalaṁ madhyasthalam iti yāvat ibid. p. 205).

---

[1] Amṛtānanda comments that this is the left line of the triangle and that Vāmā's nature is emanation.

[2] According to the commentary this is the line 'in the front of the triangle'. Viewing the triangle, which faces downwards, from its lower corner, this line is the upper horizontal one.

[3] The commentary explains that Ambikā abides tranquil in the state of unity (sāmarasya) of the Point in the centre and, having given rise to emanation and persistence, propense to withdrawing it, she enters the Point again.

> Raudrī, the power of action and Corporeal Speech whose body (vigraha) is the universe possesses, by a process of reversal, the radiant form of a triangle (sṛṅgāta).[1]
>
> These are the four energies. They are Kāmarūpa (KĀ), Pūrṇagiri (PŪ), Jālandhara (JĀ) and Oḍḍiyāna (O), respectively because the universe is made manifest (by them) within one's own nature as well as outside.[2]

The source of Śrīvidyā doctrine in this case is quite clear. Amṛtānanda, an early commentator on the YHṛ explains, just as the TS and the Kubjikā sources do, how the successive functioning of the three energies is represented by the progressive formation of a downward-facing triangle. He tells us that Vāmā is the left line of this triangle, Jyeṣṭhā is the line on top and Raudrī is the right line. The triangle is thus finally fully formed when Raudrī emerges and so her shape is that of the entire triangle itself. These four energies are transformed, according to Amṛtānanda, into the four sacred seats.[3] Amṛtānanada was probably from South India where the YHṛ may well have been written. While it is clear that he was deeply conversant with Kashmiri Śaivism, one wonders how much contact he had with the Kubjikā tradition, which must have been known to the redactors of the NṢĀ and the YHṛ.

The Play of the Triangle and the Point, the Yoni and the Liṅga

Now that we have examined the sides or 'enclosure' (parigraha) of the Yoni, the goddess's Triangle,[4] let us see what happens in the centre of it and try to penetrate some of the complexity built into the dynamism of the Triangle and the Point, the Yoni and the Liṅga. This pair represents the archetypal opposites. Ontologically both are the energy Beyond Mind, the highest in the ascending energies leading to the transcendental union of Śiva and Śakti. Theologically, they are both the goddess. Dynamically they are the two poles at the extremity of the perpetual pulse of the one reality re-generating itself even as it merges back into itself, emanating and withdrawing all things as it does so. This holistic, fractal geometry of the play of the Triangle and the Point is the dynamism of the Transmental (unmanā).

---

[1] Raudrī is the line on the right of the triangle. This is formed by reversing the downward movement of the first line that forms the left side of the triangle. Her emergence marks the completion of the Triangle which she encompasses.

[2] YHṛ 1/36-41.

[3] See comm. on YHṛ 1/41, p. 58. See below, p. 718-719 for a chart of the contents of the triangle in the centre of Śrīcakra.

[4] This is described in KuKh 7/8 ff. See there and the accompanying notes for further details.

We may note in passing that the 'Play of the Energy of Passion' (kāmakalāvilāsa) described in the Śrīvidyā tradition is another representation of the same dynamism expressed through similar geometric symbolism. This is most succinctly and eloquently expounded in the Kāmakalāvilāsa of Puṇyānanda. That is also concerned with the symbolism associated with the formation of the central triangle in Śrīcakra. In the case of the Kāmakalāvilāsa, however, the main focus of attention is not the triangle as much as the dynamism of the Point. The Great Point (mahābindu), which represents the pre-cosmic, transcendental unity of Śiva and Śakti bursts apart, thereby forming two points that represent emission (visarga). In the timeless present of this perpetual cosmogony in which cause and effect abide as one, the original point is not lost but abides along with the other two to form the Triangle. In this way the polarities of reality that is 'two-in-one' is fully established even as it is resolved in the same timeless present as aspects of the original Great Point.

Moreover, apart from this formal difference with respect to the approach in the Kubjikā Tantras, the ontology represented by the Triangle and the Point in the Śrīvidyā tradition differs, as it has been drawn from the Pratyabhijñā school of Kashmiri Śaivism. From that perspective, the Point is the pure light of consciousness (prakāśa) and the Triangle is its innate reflective awareness (vimarśa). Together they constitute pure 'I' consciousness (ahaṁbhāva). By means of its power of reflective awareness the Light of 'I' consciousness, wills, knows and acts to fashion and destroy its own phenomenal manifestations. This is the 'energy of passion', which, as we shall see, is also known to the Kubjikā tradition as the energy of the Point through which it evolves into the Triangle. But here it is entirely free of Pratyabhijñā projections, as is its Trika predecessor in the TS.

Before we proceed with our exposition of the Triangle and the Point and their identification with the Liṅga, let us examine an interesting precursor of this symbolic association. Although KMT does not discuss the nature of the Liṅga, the common notion that the goddess is present within the god is represented in the KMT. I will argue that in the following passage of the KMT the goddess is understood to be present within the god in the form in which she is represented in the later tradition, that is, as the triangular syllable AIṀ which, along with the Point, is her form as the Liṅga. Her presence there transforms the Liṅga, which is the body of the god and, for obvious reasons, his most characteristic representation, into a female Liṅga – the triangular Yoni. The passage reads:

> This body of Kuleśvara should be contemplated attentively, it should be listened to[1] and taught (deśya).[1] What else could be superior

[1] The edited text reads: nididhyāsyaṁ śrutaṁ deśyam. Normally 'śrutam' means 'it is heard'. This makes no sense. It seems that the past passive participle has replaced the nominal imperative > to that which is within him? (His body) is in the form of a seed-syllable (kūṭabhūta). As she (the goddess) is in the middle of that she is made crooked (kuṭilitā) and so she becomes divided into many Kulas.[2] This is the will of the Supreme Goddess (Parameśvarī). Thus (says the god) you are called Kubjikā (the Crooked One), the Supreme (Parā) (goddess) within all things.[3]

First of all, notice that the Liṅga located in the Wheel of the Self-supported that we have examined above is also Kuleśvara. Although the 'body of Kuleśvara' mentioned here that 'should be contemplated attentively' is not identified with the Liṅga, it does contain the goddess's Triangle. The passage we are examining is part of an exposition of the Wheel of the Skyfaring Goddesses (khecarīcakra). This is the highest of five Wheels described in the KMT and related texts. There is no need to go into many details here concerning these Wheels.[4] We shall focus on the highest of them – Khecarīcakra – which is the one relevant to our discussion. The texts are not very clear exactly where it is located, whether on the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head or above, but we may reasonably assume that this, the Wheel of Space, is in the End of the Twelve. Although there is no reference to suggest that this may be associated with the triangular Liṅga localized there by the later tradition, nonetheless it shares a number of features in common with it, despite the differences in several details.

In brief, this Wheel consists of three concentric circles. The outer one is the Circle of the Sun. It contains a lotus of twenty-four petals upon which twenty-four sacred sites are projected along with the consonants from Ka to Bha. Next comes the Circle of the Moon with sixteen petals on which are projected the sixteen vowels. Two goddesses or Yoginīs are associated with each petal. The third one is the Circle of Fire consisting of the remaining consonants up to Sa. In the middle of the Khecarīcakra is a downward-facing Triangle that contains the letters Ma and KṢa omitted in the other wheels and so makes up the full compliment of fifty phonemic energies related to as many Skyfarers. The Triangle

---

'śrotavyam' which is too long for the metre. The corresponding ṢSS 25/52c reads: niḥsaṁdigdhaḥ [k kh: -digdhaṁ] śucis [k kh: śuciṁ] which literally means: its purity is without doubt (i.e it is certainly pure).

[1] Deśya literally means 'pointed out' but, clearly, the sense here is 'taught'.

[2] We may understand this statement in at least three ways. One is that the goddess in the body of the god is the source of the many Kula schools formed from aspects of herself. Secondly, the Kulas may also be the letters – the sonic energies of Speech. A third meaning could be that she diversifies herself into the many aggregates – kula – of beings and principles which she, in various forms, governs.

[3] KMT 16/25-27ab = ṢSS 25/52cd-54.

[4] The reader is referred to Heilijgers-Seelen's detailed study of these Five Wheels described in chapters 14-16 of the KMT. See bibliography.

is called the First Maṇḍala overtly because it is said to be the first of twenty-four maṇḍalas i.e. petals of the Circle of the Sun. The implication here, it seems to me (although, again, the text is not explicit) is that this is the triangle which contains the four main sacred seats in relation to which the twenty-four places projected into the *maṇḍala*s of the Circle of the Sun are secondary. They are also derived sacred sites in the sense that the first transmission of the teachings takes place in the sacred seats and then moves out, as the goddess does in her tour, from there. The Triangle is thus as the KMT explains:

> The maṇḍala consisting of the Skyfarers is located in the city of the Primordial (ādi) Yoni. By means of the (proper procedure) by which it is worshipped, one obtains the fruits of (this) Yoni of the Command. This is the First Maṇḍala, it is the best and the most excellent. All the maṇḍalas are born here in (their) many ways.[1]

All the phonemic mantras in the other Circles are born from the body of the goddess who 'comes forth as the maṇḍala (maṇḍalodbhavā)'.[2] We have here, it seems, a precursor of the Triangle in the End of the Twelve. That too is surrounded by the three enclosures of Sun, Moon and Fire. This Wheel of the Syfarers is lost in the later literature or not further elaborated. Even so, much of it, reduced and modified, is retained as the Triangle, which is the core of the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala at the End of the Twelve. This is then further molded by identification with the goddess's Liṅga. Note, for example, the order of the letters in the three Circles. In some versions of the Triangle, this is the order of the series of letters projected onto its sides, which thus represent the Sun, Moon and Fire that enclose the Point in the centre.

The main problem this passage presents is the seed-syllable to which it refers. The core of the problem is the neuter gender of the expression 'kūṭabhūtam' which agrees with the neuter noun tanu – 'body', the subject of the previous sentence. What the KMT is saying is actually quite clear. The goddess is present in the seed-syllable of the god that is in the middle of his body. Moreover, this is why the goddess is crooked or bent (kuṭilā). The play on the similar sound of the words 'kūṭa' -'seed-syllable' – and 'kuṭilā' – 'crooked – reinforces this idea. The previous verses supply us with the context and confirm that we have understood correctly. The god is explaining why the goddess is called Kubjinī – the Bent Over One:

---

[1] KMT 16/37-38.
[2] KMT 16/44ab.

> O Kuleśvarī, you are the one (goddess) and (your) name accords with reality (anvartha). The goddess pervades everything within the gross, subtle, and supreme reality, which, faultless, is both manifest and unmanifest, and she is you. Do you not know that? Just as someone with a big body who moves in a small house must enter it with the body bent, such is she, the Great Goddess (maheśvarī).[1]

The commentary does not explain whose body the goddess enters. It simply refers to her pervasive presence in all things. There we read: 'How is it that she bent over (kubjikā)? Just as one who bends over (kubjo bhūtvā) enters everywhere, similarly, as her form is contracted, she pervades everywhere. Then she is Kubjikā (the Bent Over Goddess)'.[2] It seems, therefore, that the commentator assumed that the body meant here is the universe. At first sight we may also think that the human body is intended and that the goddess, as Kuṇḍalinī, rests 'bent over' or coiled like a snake, within it.[3] No doubt, these meanings are also implied.[4] But the primary sense here is that the goddess is in this bent form because she is present in the seed-syllable within the god's body. Indeed, the commentary, not only posits the presence of the goddess within the seed-syllable, it directly identifies her with it:

> Or else, (one can say that) she is crooked in all circumstances (sarvatra) and (as such) is the seed-syllable.[5] Or else (one can say that) she is in a condition of oneness (aikyabhūtā) or, she pervades everywhere (sarvagati) in (her) contracted state (saṁkocavṛtti). She who possesses (all these states and forms of being) is Kubjikā.[6]

---

[1] anvarthasaṁjñakā nāma ekā tvaṁ tu kuleśvarī ||
sthūlasūkṣmapare tattve vyaktāvyakte nirāmaye |
sarvaṁ vyāptaṁ tvayā devi sā ca tvaṁ kiṁ na buddhyase ||
bṛhatkāyo yathā kaścit svalpe saṁcarate gṛhe [k kh: grahāḥ] |
kuñcitāṅgo viśed yasmāt tadvad eṣā [k kh: natvad eśā] maheśvarī || ṢSS 25/47cd-49 = KMT 16/21cd-23; see Heilijgers-Seelen 1992: 260 n. 22.

[2] kubjikā katham | *kubjo bhūtvā sarvatra praveśam āyāti tadvat sā sarvatra saṁkocarūpatvena [kh: -rūpeṇa ] vyāptiṁ karoti || tadā kubjikā || Comm. ṢSS 25/47cd-49

[3] Cf. Schoterman 1981: 11.

[4] Cf. above, p. 41.

[5] The commentator who may either have had a variant reading in his manuscript, or intentionally altered the text to suit his understanding of it, reads a feminine kūṭabhūtā instead of the neuter kūṭabhūtam.

[6] athavā sarvatra kuṭilībhūtā atha kūṭabhūtā iti aikyabhūtā iti vā sarvagatiḥ saṁkocavṛttyā vā yasyāḥ sā kubjikā || Comm. ṢSS 25/47cd-49.

The seed-syllable of the goddess, like that of any deity, is her sonic body. One might say it is her iconic form made of sound. Moreover, a deity's seed-syllable is, in a sense, a condensed form of that deity's mantra (or Vidyā if the deity is a goddess). Although the texts do not normally express themselves in this way, one could say that the goddess's Vidyā is her gross sonic body in relation to her seed-syllable, which is the subtle one. Kubjikā has two such seed-syllables, probably due to changes and developments in doctrine. One of these is mentioned in the extended form of the Saṁvartāsūtra with which the KuKh and ṢSS begin. This is the syllable HSKHPHREṀ.[1] The letters are written vertically above one in such a way as to form a kūṭa, which literally means a 'peak' or 'heap' of letters. This is why such syllables are called *kūṭākṣara*s – literally 'peak or heaped syllables'. The KMT does not refer to this syllable, and nor is it a part of the version of Kubjikā's Vidyā taught in the KMT[2] – whereas it is considered a particularly important part of the goddess's Vidyā in our text and other later sources.

The other syllable is AIṀ, which is well known to the KMT and all the other Kubjikā Tantras.[3] No doubt AIṀ is the seed-syllable meant here.[4] It is triangular and so indeed 'crooked' and, as this is the mantric body of the goddess, she is similarly crooked. This seed-syllable is also called the 'seed of emanation' (sṛṣṭibīja). Moreover, emanation takes place through the energy of the will with which the first passage identifies the seed-syllable. Finally, a little further ahead, the KMT implies that it is the goddess who is the Yoni.[5] This is indeed, the way she is represented in our text where we read:

> In the midst of the three energies is the deity whose form is a sprout and her body the shape of a Yoni (bhagākāra). I praise (the goddess) present in the sacred seat of the Triangle (triṣkoṇapīṭha).[6]

---

[1] The syllable HSKHPHREṀ is explained at the beginning of chapter nine of our text (KuKh 9/1-19ab), thus marking the beginning of a long section that extends up to the end of chapter twelve in which the goddess's Thirty-two syllable Vidyā is taught.
[2] See KMT 7/19-30.
[3] See above, p. 107.
[4] It is not likely that the KMT is referring to the seed-syllable of the god knows as Navātman. Heilijgers-Seleen (1994: 261 n. 27) speculates on this possibility but rejects it. KuKh 2/9cd-10 explicitly identifies the goddess in the form of the Yoni (bhaga) as the syllable HSKHPHREṀ. But in view of the fact that in other places in the text it is the syllable AIṀ and the KMT does not know the other syllable, there is every reason to believe that this is a new development.
[5] See above, p. 289 note 3 with reference to the Yoni as the hidden teaching of the KMT (ibid. 16/29).
[6] KuKh 3/119.

The goddess in the centre of the Triangle is said to be in the form of a Liṅga. The Liṅga in the centre of the Triangle is another Triangle, namely, the triangular syllable AIṀ. The seed-syllable AIṀ within which the goddess is 'bent over' is her sonic form. Kubjikā not only possesses a divine form that is 'seen', she is also 'heard'. To the sonic form corresponds a geometric one. She is visible mantric sound. This aspect of the goddess is technically called 'established in the (sonic) body' (piṇḍastha). Projected into the centre of the maṇḍala the goddess burns, as it were, in the form of the blissful Doomsday Fire that resounds with her 'bent over' – kubjā – seed-syllable. There the goddess performs 'austerities' – tapas – which literally means 'heat' – heated by this, the fire of Yoga that rises up through the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head. Heilijgers-Seleen explains that the yogi:

. . . seated on this fire, i.e. letting himself be brought upwards with the internal fire, realises a still higher level of consciousness which is symbolically designated as the supreme state of the Vaḍavā [Doomsday] Fire and which appears to be located above the Brahmarandhra [the Cavity of Brahmā]. Being the abode of the supreme Śakti [energy], it is the source of the creation; the vaḍavā [Doomsday] fire is said to be the womb of the world. Here the yogin is absorbed into the Supreme.'[1]

Fire combines light and sound, accordingly the name of the goddess who is at once the inner, spiritual Fire and 'the womb of the world' is derived both from her 'visible' form and her sonic one – AIṀ, the seed-syllable of Kubjikā, the Doomsday Fire:

> (The yogi) attains omniscience by the Yoga of the Doomsday Fire. Bearing the form of bliss and established in the 'bent over' (kubja) (seed-syllable) of the Doomsday Fire (AIṀ), she makes indistinct sounds (kūjate). Thus the subtle Khañjikā (the 'Lame One')[2] in the form of the Jewel (of Kuṇḍalinī)[1] is called Kubjikā.[2]

---

[1] Heilijgers-Seleen 1992: 179-180.

[2] Khañjikā literally means 'a girl who walks with a limp'. Although the texts do not say this expressly, we may suppose that this name refers to the progressive upward movement of Kuṇḍalinī through the centres in the body that takes place in halting steps like one who walks with a limp. The texts define her differently, referring instead to her pervasive nature – implicitly deriving the name from the word 'kha' which denotes the 'sky', 'space' or 'void' that generates and withdraws the universe within the goddess and in which she resides. Thus Bhairava says to the goddess:

The goddess, who is in the centre of the maṇḍala, is said in more than one place to be 'mounted on the seat of the syllable AIṀ' (aiṁkārāsanārūḍhā).[3] Newar initiates into the cult of the goddess Kubjikā do in fact draw the Kramamaṇḍala in this way with the syllable AIṀ in the middle of the Triangle. Kubjikā as Kaulinī, the mistress of the Kula, resides in the centre of the triangle.[4] She is the Divine Liṅga (divyaliṅga) in the middle of the Triangle. The Divine Liṅga is said to 'face downwards'[5], which suggests that it is triangular. The expression 'vakraliṅga' – 'crooked liṅga' with reference to it[6] appears to confirm this, although it can also be understood to refer to the goddess Vakrā in the form of a Liṅga.[7] Similarly, Kauleśī, who is in the centre of the triangle, 'faces downwards'.[8]

However, in other places we are told that the Divine Liṅga is the Point (bindu) in the centre.[9] This equation is confirmed in the CMSS where we read:

> In the middle of that (triangle) is the Divine Liṅga that generates supreme bliss, (its) form the Point and (its) nature the Void (kharūpa).[10]

The Liṅga is symbolized by the Point to represent, amongst other things, that it is without dimension, like a geometric point. Thus the infinitesimally small Point that escapes spatial limitations symbolizes the omnipresent energy of

---

I have told you about Khañjinī repeatedly, again and again. Khañjikā, who is in the subtle (reality) within the subtle reality (vastu), is so called because the universe is within her and she is in the midst of the universe. KMT 16/19cd-20 = ṢSS 25/45cd-46.

The commentary on the ṢSS adds:

How is it (that the goddess is called Khañjinī)? 'Kha' is like space. 'Ji' means that (that space) generates (janayati), that is, gives rise to the emanation and withdrawal etc. of the universe. She is then Khañjī. This is (the meaning of the name) Khañjikā.

.

khañjinī tu katham || khaṁ ākāśaṁ tadvat || ji iti janayati utpādayati viśvasya sṛṣṭisaṁhārādau tadā khañjī iti khañjikā ||

[1] Concerning Kuṇḍalinī as the 'Jewel' in the navel centre – the City of Jewels – see note to KuKh 3/120-121.

[2] KMT 17/29cd-30.

[3] This expression appears in KuKh 5/72cd-73ab, see note there for more examples.

[4] KuKh 35/18.

[5] KuKh 26/14cd-15.

[6] KuKh 26/4.

[7] KuKh 3/51.

[8] KuKh 11/31c.

[9] KuKh 42/4.

[10] tanmadhye divyaliṅgaṁ [all MSs: -liṅgaḥ] paramasukhakaraṁ bindurūpaṁ kharūpaṁ

CMSS 1/6b = KuKh 42/4c.

consciousness and so is said to be the Sky[1] or the surface of the Sky. From here the Triangle emerges and, inwardly experienced, here it returns. This entry – āveśva – is mystic absorption or penetration – āveśa – into the Self which is the bliss of the Point. As our text says:

> Then (the triangular Liṅga), perceived by the Inner Self, enters the cavity (suṣira). He who is established in contemplation (samādhi) sees the surface of the Sky, which is in the form of the Point. (Then) penetration (āveśa), which is the arising of the bliss of consciousness, takes place. The experience of the proclamation (of the scripture – āśravaṇapratyaya) is that that is one's own nature.[2]

The arising of this bliss is the attainment of the liberated state, which is the freedom to course through the Sky of the Point. This power, the goddess proclaims, is the Command she transits to the god:

> Today I will give (you the liberated) state of flight (khecaratva); grasp the Liṅga as it is in reality! Initiation, the explanation (of the teachings) (vyākhyā) and the capacity (to apply them) (sāmarthya): this is the Command that bestows upon you liberation.[3]

The liberating experience of the Liṅga is the knowledge of what it is in reality. This is the bliss that is the energy of Śiva and Śakti that spreads out from the centre of the maṇḍala even as it generates it. The blissful and powerful Void of the Point in the centre is called the Circle of the Moon. Both the container and the contained, it is both the bliss that envelops the maṇḍala and is contained within it. In this way, the maṇḍala and its cosmic and psycho-physical counterpart is not only generated; it is maintained active and functional, and experienced in a state of profoundly blissful and creative stability of mind:

> The aggregate, enveloped in bliss, functions within bliss. (Thus) there comes about the equilibrium (samatva) of the mind, which is the bliss of emission (udbhava). In the middle of that is the subtle Liṅga, the Divine Liṅga that faces downwards. It stands in the centre of the Supreme Sky, in the middle of the Circle of the Moon.[4]

---

[1] KuKh 38/7. Also ibid. 42/4 where the Divine Liṅga is equated with the Point which is said to be the Void.
[2] KuKh 26/16cd-18ab.
[3] KuKh 5/64cd-65ab.
[4] KuKh 26/14cd-16ab.

The round form of the Point which the texts commonly refer to as an 'unbroken circle' (akhaṇḍamaṇḍala),[1] like its sky-like 'emptiness', similarly symbolizes the all-embracing nature of the core energy. The circle is a universal symbol of wholeness. It is the appropriate shape of the Liṅga that enshrines the energy through which the universe is generated, sustained and into which it is ultimately withdrawn.[2] The symbol is a powerful one, drawn from nature and our own human world; it is spontaneously understood. Far from the Indian subcontinent, in North America, the Sioux Indian visionary Black Elk expresses the wisdom of his people in similar terms:

Everything the Power of the World does is done in a circle. The sky is round, and I have heard that the earth is round like a ball, and so are all the stars. The wind, in its greatest power, whirls. Birds make their nests in circles, for theirs is the same religion as ours. The sun comes forth and goes down again in a circle. The moon does the same, and both are round. Even the seasons form a great circle in their changing, and always come back to where they were. The life of a man is a circle from childhood to childhood, and so it is in everything where power moves. Our tepees were round like the nests of birds, and these were always set in a circle, the nation's hoop, a nest of many nests, where the Great Spirit meant for us to hatch out children.[3]

But how can a Point without dimension or, indeed, a circle that has no directional orientation, 'face downwards'? The following reference comes to our aid here:

> In the middle of that (triangle) is the Crooked Liṅga that generates supreme bliss, (its) form the Point divided into three.[4]

The Point that is 'divided into three' (tribhinna) is, it seems, both the one Point in the centre and the three points that surround it in the corners of the triangle of which it is the centre. The Point is the Command which is threefold because of the three lineages that emerge from it.[5] So the goddess who resides in the Yoni (bhagodarā) in the centre of the Triangle exerts her threefold authority[6]

---

[1] See note to KuKh 3/7.
[2] Cf. the definition of the Liṅga in KJN 3/9-14ab quoted above on p. 253.
[3] Black Elk quoted from the book Black Elk Speaks in Arguelles and Miriam 1972: 60.
[4] tanmadhye vakraliṅgaṁ paramasukhakaraṁ bindurūpam tribhinnaṁ | KuKh 26/4c. Above, Cf. CMSS 1/6b (= KuKh 42/4c), quoted above, p. 303 note 10.
[5] KuKh 3/19.
[6] KuKh 3/45.

and is called the 'triple goddess' (bhagavatī).[1] Thus the Command spreads out by means of the sacred seats from where the Siddhas who founded the lineages reside.[2] This Command is the Liṅga that arises in the centre from the Yoni.[3] So the goddess is both the Divine Liṅga and the Yoni which is the 'inner sanctum'.[4] She is both the Liṅga and within the Liṅga.[5] So, the Liṅga is a Yoni in the Yoni. Thus it is a 'crooked' – vakra – Liṅga as the triangle which is the goddess herself who is Vakrā 'the Crooked One' whose form is the Yoni (bhagākṛti)[6] as well as the 'Circle of the Point'.

The texts are telling us in their own cryptic way that the Point spontaneously deploys itself or radiates out as the three sides or corners of the central Triangle to then spontaneously collapse back into a Point. Beyond time and space, it pulses in such a way that, in temporal and spatial terms, it is both phases simultaneously. The goddess can in this way be both the Point and the Triangle. Thus we are told the goddess resides in the Triangle, which is represented by the triangular letter E, 'facing downwards in the shape of a Liṅga'.[7] The 'shape of a Liṅga' in this context is the goddess's Triangle representing the Yoni. The presence of the goddess in the Liṅga transforms it into a Yoni. This is represented in the maṇḍala by the triangle set in the centre of the hexagon. In one variant not only four sacred seats are projected into the Triangle, a set of six (the same four plus two) are also worshipped in the corners of the hexagon.[8] But even then, as the KuKh says:

> There is (only) one mistress of (all) the sacred seats. Within the group of six divisions, she is the giver of light. One without a second, she is stamped (with the seal) of the plane of nonduality. She resides in the six sacred seats and arises successively (in due order) within the lineage (santāna). Wet, she is the Yoni consisting of one letter and, by virtue of (her) aspects (prakāra), she is in (all its) six (parts). Again, she is (vast and empty) like the sky and her form is the letter E.[9]

---

[1] KuKh 38/23.
[2] KuKh 38/24.
[3] KuKh 3/59.
[4] KuKh 3/18.
[5] KuKh 4/47cd-48.
[6] KuKh 26/6d.
[7] KuKh 3/13-14ab.
[8] The major sacred seats, their symbolism and deployment in the maṇḍala are discussed in the following chapter.
[9] KuKh 61/2cd-4.

The six sacred seats in the corners of the hexagon may house the six letters of the goddess's extended seed-syllable HSKHPHREṀ. Thus she is enveloped in her own emanation. In another parallel set up, she is conjoined with the god within the Triangle who is the Liṅga. This is a common open possibility. These two options are sustained by the ambiguity of the myth, which in some places says that the goddess enters the Liṅga, and in others that she becomes it. The god, like the goddess, is in a sonic form as his seed-syllable. This is Navātman, which in its most common variant is HSKṢMLVRYŪṀ. As the KuKh explains, the two unite:

> There, in the centre, is a Liṅga. It is the ninefold (navātmaka) Bhairava. Beyond the energies (kalā), he is endowed with (all) the energies. He is conjoined with Parā (the Supreme Goddess) and he conjoins (the fettered to her).[1]

Parā in this context is the syllable AIṀ. The goddess merged in the Bhairava Liṅga is thus the conjunction of Navātman and AIṀ. Repeated one after another they merge together and the divine couple fuse to form the two aspects of the inner breath HAṀSA, that is, Unstruck Sound.

If you are confused, don't be surprised. The symbolism of this maṇḍala is highly complex precisely because of its ambivalent nature as a whole as well as that of the centre and the beings, single or in couple, who reside there. The texts are a dense maze of identifications of opposites based on these ambivalences derived from the holistic paradox that the centre is the whole and vice versa. So we have a Point which is a Triangle within a Triangle, and a Triangle which is a Point within a Point. The centre and the circumference replicate each other in the vortex of the Void from which all things come forth.

We have already noticed some examples of how this paradox is represented in the sources. One is the image of the goddess who resides in the Liṅga situated in the Cave. In this perspective the Liṅga is in the centre as is the goddess who resides in it alone, without the god. Then we are told that the whole triangular maṇḍala is the Liṅga, so she actually resides in the Liṅga that is within the Liṅga. Again, the triangular maṇḍala and its centre are not only a Liṅga, they are also the Yoni. Just as the identification of the maṇḍala with the Liṅga involved a union of opposites in terms of the container and the contained, the centre and the circumference, the same takes place with its feminine counterpart. The triangular Yoni is in the centre of the maṇḍala that is itself the Yoni. Accordingly we are told that the energy in the middle of the Yoni is called

[1] KuKh 39/40.

'bhaga'[1] which is a synonym for Yoni. So the goddess in the middle of the Yoni is in the form of the Yoni. Generated from the bliss of the Yoni (bhagānanda), she is the bliss that pervades it. Similarly, the goddess is both on the Stone on the Island of the Moon and is the Stone itself.[2] Thus, more internally as it were, the deity and its dwelling place are identified to add yet another layer to the kaleidoscope of reversals. Anyone of these polarities may combine with any other to form complimentary opposites identifiable with one another. The Liṅga is in the Yoni and the Yoni is in the Liṅga. We have already noted that the Liṅga is in the Cave and the Cave is in the Liṅga. The Cave is in the Yoni, the Yoni is in the Cave and so on. Passages can be cited that correspond to each of these situations and virtually all the other combinations. For example in YKh (1) we read: 'once penetrated the plane in the Void of the Liṅga, the Liṅga (becomes) the Yoni whose form is a Yoni (bhaga)'.[3] The same principle applies to the further outward expansion of the triangle into the hexagon.

These transformations are not real changes or, for that matter, illusory ones. It is the one reality seen from different perspectives like a drawing that viewed from one side appears to be that of an elephant and seen from another, a bull.[4] In this way Śiva can also have a Yoni. His Liṅga may be a female one. Just as the goddess's Liṅga may be male. Drawing from the TS the KuKh declares:

> (Concealed within Śiva) like the power to burn is within fire, she has assumed the form of the Yoni. In the same way, Śiva is also secondarily said to possess that attribute.[5]

Paradoxically the opposites are the same and yet each is distinct, representing in its own way an aspect of the oneness of the opposites, the tension between them and a modality of its resolution either accomplished or in the process of accomplishment. Similarly, the same is true in reverse, namely, the separation of opposites and the emergence of their individual identities. Both series are similarly complimentary, churning one another, as it were, to generate the fire of a passionate and divine union of opposites through which the world is created and the seed of the Command (ājñā) is transmitted through the lineage of the spiritual offspring born of their union. This is the 'practice of bliss'

---

[1] KuKh 63/75.
[2] See note to KuKh 5/77cd-58ab.
[3] liṅgākāśe padaṁ bhittvā liṅgaṁ yonir bhagākṛtiḥ [g: yoni bhagākṛti] | YKh (1) 29/35ab.
[4] Maheśvarānanda gives this example in his Mahārthamañjarī (verse 28) to represent the two-in-one relationship of Śiva and Śakti. It is illustrated in Silburn's French translation and exposition (see Silburn 1968: 113).
[5] KuKh 40/13 = TS 1/26cd-27ab.

(sukhopāya) by virtue of which the goddess possesses the authority i.e. the power to transmit the seed-like Command.[1]

The Neuter Liṅga of the Absolute

For this play of opposites to be effective in this and other myriads of ways, the opposites cannot be simply relative to one another or even mutually generative. They must be grounded in an ultimate, absolute reality without this compromising, that is, relativising their reality. This too is the Liṅga. The Liṅga, originally an unfashioned stone, represents not only the god – and in this tradition, also the goddess – it also represents the formless, unconditioned Absolute. The normal neuter gender of the word 'liṅga' itself reflects the pure, indeterminate nature of the transcendent Absolute which, devoid of all possible phenomenal characterizations, is neither male nor female.[2] But this Absolute is not the Brahman (also a neuter word) of the Upaniṣads. It is, as in all theistic Sanskritic traditions, the godhead, the absolute ground of deity – its essential, unqualified nature, to which the Kubjikā Tantras refer as the Neuter (napuṁsaka). The Neuter is the Divine Liṅga within which the goddess resides. It is the deity's essentially blissful nature, beyond the opposites:

> That bliss is the Neuter (absolute). It is neither female nor is (its) form (ākāra) male. Its nature (rūpa) is the Liṅga that possesses authority and is not subject to (any other) authority (niradhikaraṇa). Located in the Void (khastha), unmanifest and form annulled (nivartitākāra), it is Bhairava. In the same way (evam), the power of bliss is the divine (female) Liṅga (divyaliṅgā) that has emerged within the Transmission (kramoditā).[3]

The union of Śiva and Śakti is pure. The goddess who is the Yoni (bhaga) sits next to the god. Their union takes place because their relationship is free of lust. Indeed, she is intimately close to the god because of her austere chastity. This is how she has attained the highest state of Nirvāṇa in which all passion is extinguished[4] and is united with him. Similarly, Bhairava is pure bliss. Although this bliss is not, of course, simply the pleasure of sex, it is equated with the blissful experience of sexual union, an equation that has a long history in the

---

[1] KuKh 3/13-14ab.
[2] KuKh 3/46.
[3] KuKh 3/46-47.
[4] KuKh 3/63-64ab.

Indian tradition.[1] It is not possible to deny the essentially blissful experience of the ultimate principle. To do so would be to affirm its impotence. It would be an absolute from which nothing could manifest. The god reminds the goddess that through their passionate lovemaking they both came into the world and, indeed, the world of transmigration, full of passions and desires, exists.[2] We are reminded of the biblical Adam and Eve. But this is not a fall from paradise. It is an essential condition for creation to take place, although, to rise beyond it, this passion must be abandoned. But this must take place without loss of power and the deity's spiritual power derives from its essentially blissful nature. Male and female must retain their gender and yet become 'neuter'. They must assume that pure chaste condition of perfect transcendence and yet retain the bliss of union. This is the condition of the Liṅga which is the Neuter absolute and here we are told is, for that reason, bliss. But this bliss – ānanda – is not male, which is the normal gender of the noun ānanda. Just as the gender of this word has been changed in this passage to neuter, so too is that bliss. It is the 'neuter' chaste, continent, spiritual bliss of the deity's essential nature, which is formless, void and transcendent. This is the Liṅga, powerful and supreme in its universal authority over all things, an authority it possesses by virtue of what it is. It is not received from outside, nor is it subject to anything outside itself. This is the god – the genderless male. This Liṅga is the Point in the centre of the Void of the Yoni. It is a Bhairava Liṅga. This is the Liṅga the goddess enters that in the myth is called Udyāna Bhairava.

But what about the goddess? She is similar to the god but not the same. The goddess says of herself that she is the female Neuter (napumsakā). Neither male nor female, she is the power of the will.[3] The strange change of gender from napuṁsakam (neuter) to napuṁsakā (feminine) is mirrored here by the change from liṅgam (neuter) to liṅgā (feminine). In a sense, the goddess is within the god who is the Liṅga. From another point of view she is herself the Liṅga. The relationship between the Yoni and the Liṅga is an attempt to represent symbolically a union of opposites that cannot be fully conceived. Deviant changes in gender of words in the Sanskrit of this and other Tantric texts is used here with the purpose of mirroring a deep philosophical problem that cannot be fully resolved by the binary logic of reason. To aid our understanding, the model of ultimate reality is dynamic. The texts talk about 'emerging out of' and 'entering into', that is, moving out from within and entering in from outside. But from the perspective of basic oneness obviously there cannot be an 'inner' or an 'outer'. For [1] The reader is referred to an interesting paper on the subject by Olivelle (1997). See bibliography.

---

[2] KuKh 5/8-11ab.
[3] KuKh 67/17cd-18.

this to be possible, the outer container must differ from the inner content even if the latter is 'nothing'.

Nonetheless, the text attempts in many ways to awaken that intuitive insight which somehow manages to grasp the two-in-one, which is the union of Śiva and Śakti. Here they appear in the form of two Liṅgas – one a male that has become neuter, the other a female that has become neuter. They are one and yet distinguishable. The Liṅga is the goddess herself who has assumed this form. Thus she says[1] that she had previously abandoned her gender, implying that she did this when she entered the Liṅga. Outside it, she is the sexuated goddess. This is why she is said to be continent and a virgin within the Yoni / Liṅga. The power of bliss is the (feminine > neuter) Liṅga in the (male > neuter) Liṅga. The god is the Void and the goddess, the energy of the Void. They are one as space is one with the sky. But although one, they are also distinguished from one another. One Liṅga is the Point in the centre, the other the triangle that surrounds it. The Point in the centre is, in that condition, 'not subject to (any other) authority – niradhikaraṇa' – because being 'one without a second' (advaita), there is none other who could exert it. Moreover, by the same token, it is 'without authority' – niradhikaraṇa – because there is no other reality over whom to exert it. The female, 'neuter Liṅga', on the other hand, which is the energy of 'neuter' bliss, possesses 'threefold authority'[2] once it has 'emerged within the Transmission (kramoditā)', that is, within the three lineages that originate from the Triangle which is the goddess herself as the Divine (female) Liṅga (divyaliṅgā). Thus the attributive compound kramoditā (she who has) 'emerged within the Transmission' may be variously analyzed to mean she who 'emerges sequentially' (krameṇa)' or 'by means of', or 'with' the Transmission (krameṇa). It may also mean 'from the Transmission (kramāt)', 'for the Transmission (kramāya)' or 'within the Transmission (krame)'. All these possible meanings make sense and, indeed, probably all of them are intended.

The Liṅga's neutrality is a symbol of the absolute and supreme status of the Śāmbhava plane that it enshrines just as it contains its energy. As our text explains: 'the energy called the Yoni (bhaga) is the mother of universe . . . [it is] the Command, Kaulinī who abides on the plane of the Neuter One (napuṁsakapada)'.[3] Taught only in the most excellent scriptures, it is the highest teaching concerning the ultimate and final form of liberation.[4] The Neuter Liṅga is the bliss which is the inner nature equally of both the god and the goddess. The deity is deity by virtue of the empowerment it receives that bestows upon it its

---

[1] KuKh 3/69.
[2] KuKh 3/45.
[3] KuKh 3/17.
[4] KuKh 68/126-140.

status and authority (adhikāra). But the Neuter, which is the bliss that is the ground of both deity and its empowering Command, inherently possesses its own status. The Neuter is the Absolute because none bestows its absolute status upon it (niradhikaraṇa).[1] It is free, in other words, of the play of the opposites that inwardly transfer to one another their identity. One of the meanings of the word 'liṅga' is 'gender'. The word 'strīliṅga' means 'female gender', 'puṁliṅga', the 'male gender' and 'napuṁsakaliṅga' is the neuter (lit. 'not male') gender. The goddess who is praised as both the Yoni and the Liṅga[2] embodies in her essential transcendental identity the supreme Śāmbhava state, the Neuter[3] which, because it is without gender, is free to be both genders, male and female – the god and the goddess. The Liṅga is not in this context a marker of gender, it is a 'sign'[4] of the deity's presence. The Neuter, devoid of gender, is the 'sign' of both the male deity and the female. As the Tantra teaches:

> The form of the Śāmbhava (state) is (pure) consciousness devoid of female and male gender. For this reason, O Śrīnātha, you are the Lord (nātha) and so your nature is Śakti.[5]

Thus the Sūtra of the Aggregate of Principles (tattvasaṁghātasūtra) teaches that the Neuter is Bhairava, the apophatic absolute. It is the highest of an ascending series of fifty principles each of which dissolves progressively into the one above it until:

> The Transmental goes to Bhairava and there everything dissolves away. This Principle by which everything (samasta) is pervaded is the Lord of the Transmental (Unmaneśvara). It is the divine plane of the Neuter (napuṁsaka), free of merit and sin, loss and worldly benefit, white and black, coming and going, what is to be taken up and rejected, Being and Non-being, and ritual. Free of loss and worldly benefit – that is the supreme (reality) in (this) Krama teaching. The (ultimate) conclusion of the scripture is that there is nothing higher than this.[6]

---

[1] KuKh 3/46.
[2] KuKh 3/18.
[3] KuKh 68/125.
[4] In a non-technical sense the word 'liṅga' means 'sign' in the sense of a 'characteristic feature'.
[5] śāmbhavaṁ cinmayākāraṁ [k: vin-] strīpuṁliṅgavivarjitam |
tena śrīnātha nāthas tvaṁ atas [k: athas] tvaṁ śaktirūpiṇam || YKh (2) 33/20.
[6] bhairavaṁ conmanā [ṅ: -naṁ] yāti tatra sarvaṁ vilīyate |
*yena vyāptaṁ [k, kh, gh: -pta] samastaṁ vai tattvedaṁ [ṅ: tatvaṁvau] conmaneśvaram [gh: conmanośvaraṁ; ṅ: * nmanaiśvaraṁ]* ||

The goddess is, as we have seen many times, the Transmental, which is the Command. Just as she is the last to dissolve into the Neuter, she is the first to emerge from it:

> Kubjikā in gentle garb (saumyavāsasā) is the supreme Command that has arisen in the foundation of the Neuter, which is supreme bliss.[1]

This transcendence in the sophisticated phenomenology of the Pratyabhijñā that permeates Kashmiri Śaiva hermeneutics is characterized as a state beyond the triad that characterizes all phenomenal experience namely, subject, object and means of knowledge. The Kubjikā Tantras, although ignorant of these parallels, indicate the transcendental ground of this energy in their own terms as the Neuter. There, on the plane of the Neuter, the goddess who is the Transmental feeds and generates the energies that emerge from it to form the universe beginning with the Triangle of will, knowledge and action.

> Residing on the plane of the Neuter, (the Transmental) is (the one) energy (kalā) and her form is (made of all the) energies. She is threefold (as) will, knowledge and action and abides (permanently) having pervaded the universe.[2]

The Neuter that contains the Triangle of the goddess from which creation proceeds is not only the source of the universe but also of the transmissions and the teachings:

---

napuṁsakapadaṁ divyaṁ [ṅ: vāvyaṁ] puṇyapāpavivarjitam |
hānabhogavinirmuktaṁ [k, kh, gh: dāna-] śvetakṛṣṇavivarjitam || [This and the following two lines are missing in MS Ṅ]
gamāgamavinirmuktaṁ heyopādeyavarjitam |
bhāvābhāvavinirmuktaṁ kriyākāṇḍavivarjitam ||
hānabhogavinirmuktaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: dāna-] taṁ [gh: missing] paraṁ kramaśāsane [k, kh, gh: -śāśane; ṅ: -sāsane] |
asmāt parataraṁ [gh: parattaraṁ] nāsti iti śāstrasya [k, kh, gh: sā-] niścayaḥ [k, kh, gh: -yaṁ] || YKh (1) 8/21-24.

[1] napuṁsakapadādhāre [kh: -raṁ] parānandasvarūpake ||
uditā [kh: uḍitā] tu [k: rū] parā ājñā [k, kh: ājyā] kubjikā saumyavāsasā [k: -vāsasa] | YKh (2) 28/31cd-32ab; cf. KuKh 3/46 and 29/13.

[2] napuṁsakapadāntasthā [ṅ: napuṁsarupadāta-] sā [ṅ: sa] kalā kalavigrahā || [g: ?]
jñānakriyecchā [kh: -kṛpesthā; ṅ: -kūpecchā] trividhā [ṅ: tṛvidhau] vyāpya viśvaṁ vyavasthitā |
[g: ?] KuKauM 4/10cd-11ab; see KuKauM 4/7cd-8ab, 4/9cd, 4/10cd-14a quoted below on p. 386.

> I praise the form of the Neuter, devoid of female and male gender. It is with form and without form. It has one form and is the supreme plane. Everything has come forth from its will, (namely, the transmissions) of the Child, Youth and the Aged. And it comes to an end there itself where that energy (kalā) plays. I praise (that) beginningless power whose form (i.e. the Triangle) consists of the Twelve Verses.[1]

The goddess present within the god or, to use the terms we are examining, the Transmental within the Neuter absolute is the bliss of the transcendent at one with it. And so, that bliss is also said to be the Neuter.[2] This 'neuter' condition is not only a symbol of its transcendent supreme state. It represents the realisation and fulfillment of the energy of the 'austerity' of the godhead which is two-in-one, neither male nor female and yet both simultaneously. The goddess herself contemplates this energy of austerity and is elevated thereby.[3] She practices continence and so she is Kaulinī, the goddess of the Kula. She is the female Neuter because of her vow of celibacy (brahmacarya) and yet, for this very reason, she enjoys the blissful privilege of union with her consort.[4] Similarly, the god can only manage to reach the goddess by the unrelenting practice of continence he observes when separated from the goddess. Indeed, when she emerges from the Liṅga, even though she has become very powerful by her stay in it, she is almost overwhelmed by the intensity of the power the god has acquired by his austerities. These, presumably, are those that she also practiced, even though he feels that, compared to her immense power, he is as weak as one who has fallen from his observance. Their power, which is essentially the energy of the Command, derives from the Neuter, which is such because it contains all the energies within itself in the one energy that is the goddess. Just as the continent man preserves the energetic and creative seed within himself, so the Neuter withdraws the outer energies and they are fused into the Point:

---

[1] vande napuṁsakākāraṁ strīpuṁliṅgavivarjitam [g: strīpulliṁga-] ||
sākāraṁ tu nirākāraṁ ekākāraṁ paramaṁ [k kh: paraṁ] padam ||
tasyecchānirgataṁ [g: -tā] sarvaṁ bālaṁ [g: vāla] kaumāravṛddhakam ||
nidhanaṁ yāti tatraiva yatra sā ramate kalā ||
vande anādiśaktiṁ [g: -saktiṁ] tu ślokadvādaśavigrahām || SKh 23/12cd-14.

Concerning the mantra called the Twelve Verses that lines the sides of the Triangle see note to KuKh 3/31-32.

[2] KuKh 29/13.

[3] KuKh 6/3-4ab.

[4] KuKh 3/63-64ab.

> Even though he has attained the state of the Point (bindu) by the practice of continence (brahmacarya), he attains the imperishable nature, the Unmanifest that is consciousness (bodha). His Command is terrible (bhīmā). (It is the Vidyā) that begins with Bha and ends with Ca.[1] That bliss is the Neuter; it is neither female nor is its form male. His body is the First Principle. The Command is Bhairavī. Everything is pervaded there. That pervades the universe. Divine, it pulses radiantly (sphurita) with an intense Command by virtue of the power of (his) fierce austerity.[2]

Just as the male polarity of the unpolarised absolute is also the female one, similarly the female polarity is also the male one because both are the Neuter which, beyond conception, defying the principle of contradiction, is at the same time both and neither. The Divine Liṅga is the Neuter[3] and yet its form is AIṀ,[4] the goddess's Yoni. The goddess who contains the Yoni and is contained within it[5] is the Female Neuter (napuṁsakā), the plane of Nirvāṇa.[6] Indeed, she proclaims herself to be 'established on the plane of the Neuter'[7] as Śiva's Command.[8] As such she is Rudra's energy, the Female Neuter[9] that is the Yoni in the middle of the wheel of the female energies of the Skyfarers (khecarīcakra)[10] at the highest station of ascent. She is the mother of the phonemic energies within the Yoni and so, just as they are the verbal substance of all the teachings, she is the mother of all philosophies and Tantric systems:

---

[1] This is a common way of referring to Kubjikā's Samayā Vidyā which does indeed begin with the syllable BHA but ends, to be precise, with the syllable CCE.

[2] brahmacaryavaśāt [vaśā sā] sa tu bindutvaṁ [viṁdustvaṁ] prāptavān api [vāny api] ||
prāpnoti avyayaṁ rūpam avyaktaṁ bodharūpakam |
tasyājñā vartate bhīmā bhādicāntāvadhir yathā [vādivāntā-] ||
na strī na puruṣākāram ānandaṁ taṁ napuṁsakam | (= KuKh 3/46ab).
tasya dehaṁ āditattvaṁ ājñā bhairavarūpiṇī ||
vyāpitaṁ [-te] sakalaṁ tatra vyāpitaṁ tena tu [vyāpitena tu yo] jagat |
tīvrājñāsphuritaṁ divyaṁ tapanograbalena [tapanāgra-] tu || AS 27/81cd-84.

[3] KuKh 59/10.

[4] KuKh 26/58.

[5] KuKh 3/45.

[6] KuKh 3/63-64ab.

[7] KuKh 3/60.

[8] KuKh 67/16.

[9] KuKh 22/10.

[10] KuKh 29/11.

> His will has come forth as the energy Kaulinī in the form of the (first) sprout (of emanation). She is the mother of (all) the systems (darśana). She is the goddess Parā, the Female Neuter (napuṁsakā).[1]

The strange ambiguity implied in the unusual term 'female neuter' (napuṁsakā) is emblematic of a perception of reality as self-sustaining and self-regenerating. The androgynous goddess, unlike the androgynous god, can procreate independently of the god because, as the Female Neuter, she is both the Yoni and the Liṅga. Both the Point in the centre and the Triangle – the seed and the womb – are the goddess.[2] In this way the goddess, who is the Command, transmits herself. Her propensity to transmit herself is symbolized by her orientation. She is the goddess Vakrikā who is the Command that faces downwards within the Yoni.[3] This, then, is also the Liṅga – the triangular 'crooked goddess' (vakradevī) who is 'facing downwards' in the centre of the maṇḍala.[4] She is the god's will (icchā) who emerges there as his energy (śakti).[5] Identified with the goddess Parā, who is Mahāmāyā, she emerges from the god in the form of a straight line facing downwards.[6] Thin and straight like a stick, she is 'stamped'

---

[1] tasyecchā [k, kh, gh: tasyachā] nirgatā [gh: nirgatāñ] śaktir [gh: caktir] aṅkurākārakaulinī [k, kh, gh: -kolinī] |
darśanānāṁ ca mātā sā parā devī napuṁsakā || YKh (1) 4/180.

[2] But while the texts support this complex vision and represent it in numerous ways, the term napuṁsakam and even more so the feminine form napuṁsakā in the technical sense outlined above, is rare in the Kubjikā Tantras. It is totally unknown to the KMT and the ṢSS. Referering to Kuṇḍalinī, the following passage is the only place in which the Neuter is mentioned in the ŚM:

> (Kuṇḍalinī has the curved) form of a plough. She is very subtle and subtle, (her) nature is the Point (bindu). She is said to be the nectar of the Half Moon and resides on the plain of the Neuter.

halākṛtiḥ [k: dalā-] susukṣmā [k: suṣumṇā] ca sukṣmā [k: sūkṣmā] bindusvarūpiṇī ||
ardhendur amṛtā proktā napuṁsakapade sthitā | ŚM 15/9cd-10ab.

It appears therefore that the concept was a newly emergent one at the time of the redaction of that part of the ŚM. It is totally unknown to the texts that are independent of the KMT such as the KRU, KnT, and KRP. This is another possible indication of their relatively early date although it must be admitted that the term does not appear in the CMSS, which with its developed conception of four Kaula traditions (āmnāya), is probably not amongst the earliest Kubjikā sources. Contrasting sharply to the paucity of references in these sources is the relatively elaborate conception of the Neuter we find in the MBT, especially in the KuKh and in the two versions of the YKh.

[3] KuKh 7/43cd-44ab.

[4] KuKh 3/43 and 3/51.

[5] KuKh 8/4.

[6] KuKh 13/80cd-81.

with the triangular form of the Yoni.[1] In terms of the imagery of the goddess's myth, we are told that the goddess who emerges out of the Liṅga has the Triangle as her face (she is triṣkoṇānanā).[2] Indeed, she herself is the goddess Triangle (trikoṇā)[3] whose form is the Yoni (bhagarūpiṇī). In other words, using the geometric analogy of the maṇḍala, the Point is the goddess's formless, unmanifest aspect and the Triangle her manifest form.

Similarly, in cosmological terms, the goddess who is the Command and Śiva's will emerges out of the abode of the goddess Parā. When this takes place, Śiva and Śakti are separated, as it were, and the goddess manifests as triangular in shape.[4] We are told that 'when the goddess assumes three parts, the triple world is emitted in an instant'[5] and with it a series of other triads collectively called the 'triple division' (trikabheda). Conversely, we can infer that when the goddess remains one, no creation takes place and she abides merged in the absolute. But although we are constrained to describe the process in temporal terms, the previous unmanifest state – when the goddess as Parā is in her own abode – and the subsequent – when she becomes the triadic womb (yoni) of emanation – abide simultaneously. So from this point of view also, the Triangle and the Point are one.

The following passage gives us some insight into the peculiar transformations of these polarities. After describing the Triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala with the sacred seats in the three corners and the centre, the CMSS continues:

> In this way Rudra's energy, the mother of persistence and destruction has encompassed (vyāpta) all things with (the sides of the Triangle, her) three divisions. Blissful with that (tanmada), the primordial and free God of gods who is (both) Kula (the immanent aggregate of energies) and Akula (the transcendent without parts) resides in the centre of it. His Command in the form of the Point (bindubhūtā) is consciousness that bestows accomplishment and removes the fear of the fettered. (The Command is the goddess) Nityaklinnā (Perpetually Wet) who, free and desirous of herself (svaraktā), bestows the perpetual bliss, which is delighted by phenomenal existence.

---

[1] KuKh 13/61cd-62.
[2] KuKh 5/29.
[3] MāSt line 4 and KuKh 38/32a.
[4] KuKh 35/1-9.
[5] KuKh 35/14cd.

> In the middle of that (triangle) is the Divine Liṅga, which is eternal bliss that generates supreme bliss, (its) form the Point and nature the Void (kharūpa). Churned by both, it is divided by the six parts. I salute the venerable (goddess) called Kubjikā whose beautiful body is aroused and who makes love there (kurvantī tatra kāmaṁ).[1]

The goddess in this passage appears as Rudra's energy identified with the goddess Nityaklinnā (the Perpetually Wet One). She is the Command in the form of the Point in the centre, which is the Divine Liṅga that 'faces downwards'.[2] So it would seem that the Triangle is exclusively feminine. But this is not the case. The god is said to be in the centre. But note that he is both polarities here represented by Akula – which is normally male – and Kula – which is normally female. His Command is the Point, the white seminal Drop in the centre, which is the goddess. Thus he is in the goddess and the goddess is within him. In other words, the god is androgynous. And so is the goddess. She is not only the Triangle, the female Yoni; she is also the normally male Liṅga which is the white seminal drop of the Point produced by the god. While the Point splits spontaneously into three, it needs to be 'churned from above' to unfold further into six.[3]

> In the centre of that (Triangle) is the crooked Liṅga (vakraliṅga) in the form of the Point that gives supreme bliss. It is divided into three and its nature is eternal bliss. By churning it from above, the sixfold authority (is established).[4]

This Point – i.e. the goddess who is the god's vital seed and Liṅga is 'churned' by both, that is, herself and the god. In this aspect, these two, Śiva and Śakti, with which the universe is woven like a cloth, warp and woof,[5] are the Churning Bhairava and the Churning Bhairavī in the centre of the Triangle.[6] First

---

[1] evaṁ vyāptaṁ samastaṁ sthitilayajananī rudraśaktis tribhedaiḥ *tanmadhye devadevaṁ akulakulamayaṁ [kh: -devaḥ sakula-; c: * * vamakula-] tanmadādyasvatantram* ǀ yasyājñā bindubhūtā paśubhayaharaṇī [c: -daraṇī] siddhidā bodharūpā nityaklinnā svaraktā [c: svaraktāṁ] bhavamuditasadānandadātrī svatantrā ǀǀ tanmadhye divyaliṅgaṁ [k, kh, g, gh: -liṅgaḥ] paramasukhakaraṁ bindurūpaṁ kharūpaṁ nityānandasvarūpaṁ tadubhayamathanāt [-naṁ] ṣaṭprakārair vibhinnam ǀ kurvantīṁ [k, kh, ṅ: kurvantī, g: kurvati; c: kurvanti] tatra kāmaṁ [ṅ: kāmāṁ; c: kāmā] kṣubhitavaratanuṁ [c: kṣyabhitavacatanuṁḥ] śrīkubjikākhyāṁ namāmi ǀǀ CMSS 1/5-6.

[2] KuKh 26/14cd-16.

[3] KuKh 26/20, 38/8 and 42/4.

[4] KuKh 26/4. Virtually the same lines recur in KuKh 38/7 and 42/4; cf also ibid. 2/10.

[5] KuKh 3/20, 24/27-29.

[6] KuKh 3/50.

the churning of the two divides reality, as it were, into a supreme, transcendent aspect and an inferior, immanent aspect.[1] The two then unite and 'churn' each other and so the goddess 'makes love there'. Thus the Point is said to be 'churned by passion' (smaraṇa) which splits and melts it.[2] This, the Energy of Passion (madanakalā) is present within emanation. It is the Passion that is 'the destruction of desire (kāma)'.[3] It belongs to the goddess who, endowed with this energy, churns Bhairava, the Churner (manthāna).[4] It is also called the power of bliss[5] because it is the Point in the form of the 'crooked Liṅga', that is, the Divine Liṅga that generates supreme bliss.[6] Indeed, the power of bliss is the female Divine Liṅga (divyaliṅgā).[7] It is Rudra's energy who, as the energy of the Void moving within it in an anticlockwise direction (vāmāvartā), assumes the 'crooked body' of the Triangle and is herself the female Triangle (trikoṇā).[8] Thus, by this inner churning within the centre, the one energy becomes threefold. Then, by the same strange process of reversal, which allows the container to be the contained, the churning of the three energies of the Triangle again generates the Liṅga in the centre. And once this has been produced, it again generates the Ocean of the Yoni.[9] In a sense, as the god is the goddess, she is uniting with herself. The texts do in fact depict this situation. In one place we are told that the Point in the centre, which is the goddess as 'female sperm', arouses the Triangle. Explicitly, she is depicted as licking her own Yoni and thereby fertilizing herself to generate the first Siddha.[10] So we are left with no doubt that this peculiar ambivalence is intended.

Through this union or 'churning' of opposites, each the nature of the other, the Triangle-cum-Point develops into the hexagon that surrounds it in the maṇḍala. Just as we find several triads projected and worshipped in the Triangle, in the same way the texts describe many groups of six that are projected and worshipped in the hexagon according to the requirements of the ritual. For example, the hexagon may be occupied by a set of six Yoginīs representing the constituents of the body (dhātu).[11] In chapter 144 of the Agnipurāṇa, which is drawn from various Kubjikā sources, these are presented as the basic content of

[1] KuKh 24/27-29.
[2] KuKh 26/20.
[3] KuKh 24/27-29.
[4] KuKh 38/24.
[5] KuKh 3/47.
[6] KuKh 26/4 and 38/7.
[7] KuKh 3/47.
[8] KuKh 38/32.
[9] KuKh 58/27-28.
[10] KRU 9/134cd-139ab.
[11] This and other important groups of Yoginīs will be described in chapter four of this introduction.

the hexagon.[1] Much space is devoted in our text, and the Kubjikā Tantras as a whole, to these six parts of the hexagon, just as it is to the core Triangle and Point. The apogee of this method is a projection of six groups of six said to constitute the Sextet of the goddess as Parā (parāṣaṭka). The 'Sūtra of the Teaching concerning Parā's group of Six, which is a part of YKh (2), explains:

> (There are) six sacred seats and bliss is sixfold. (But there is really only) one sacred seat, which is sixfold (i.e. the hexagon). The awakening of (this) sixfold reality takes place by contemplating the four states (represented by the four seats in the inner triangle). (There are) six sacred seats, six Siddhas, six goddesses and six paths (of manifestation). (The one reality possesses) six aspects, (it is) the sixfold gesture and the six-faced one (denoted by) the term 'group of six' (ṣaṭka). The knowledge of the group of six has been revealed by means of the thirty-six divisions of (these) six. (This) teaching, the essence of the sacred seats, has been explained as it truly is.[2]

Indeed, all these groups of six are the goddess who is frequently said to be 'divided into six parts' (ṣaṭprakāravibhinnā).[3] Again, from another point of view, the expression 'six parts' refers in a general way to the main maṇḍala of the Kubjikā Tantras in its developed form, just as the Triangle represents the same maṇḍala in its more essential form. Although the parts of this maṇḍala are in actual fact more than six, the hexagon that surrounds the central triangle is treated as specifically emblematic of the whole maṇḍala. Accordingly, the maṇḍala is said to consist of six parts[4] and as such it is within the body.[5] The sixfold nature of the maṇḍala reflects the division into six, which characterizes the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras as a whole[6] and is exemplified by the numerous groups of six we find mentioned throughout them. All of them are the goddess herself who, as the embodiment of the teachings, is also said to consist of six parts (ṣaṭprakārā).[7] The groups of six, deployed and worshipped in the six corners of the hexagon in the [1] See de Mallmann 1963: 206.

---

[2] ṣaṭ pīṭhāḥ [k, kh: pīṭhā] ṣaḍimānandāḥ [k, kh: -nandā] pīṭhaikam iti ṣaḍvidham |
ṣaḍvidhārthaprabodhanaṁ [k: -na; kh: -nāt] catuḥpādavicāraṇāt ||
ṣaṭ pīṭhāḥ [k, kh: pīṭhā] ṣaḍisiddhāśca ṣaḍdevyo [k: ṣaṭdevyo] ṣaḍadhvaram |
ṣaṭprakāraṁ ṣaḍimudrā ṣaḍvaktraṁ [k: ṣaṭvaktra; kh: ṣaḍvaktra] ṣaṭkasaṁjñayā ||
ṣaḍiṣaṭtriṁśabhedaiś ca ṣaṭkajñānaṁ [k, kh:-jānaṁ] prakāśitam |
nirṇayaṁ [k, kh: nirnnayaṁ] pīṭhasadbhāvaṁ kathitaṁ paramārthataḥ || YKh (2) 32/29-31.

[3] See, for example, KuKh 2/9c-10a and ibid. 5/74cd-75ab.

[4] maṇḍalaṁ ṣaṭprakāraṁ KuKh 1/5c.

[5] ṣaṭprakāraṁ tu dehastham KuKauM 2/156a.

[6] KuKh 58/96cd-97ab.

[7] KuKh 29/35b.

core of the maṇḍala, are primary emanations of the goddess who 'spreads herself out' (vikāsikā, vikāsinī) from the centre of the Triangle. There, in the dimensionless point (bindu) in the centre, she abides formless (nirākārā) and undifferentiated (niṣkalā) as the genderless absolute (napuṁsakā) both as and within the transcendent which, as the very absence of phenomenal existence (abhāva), is void (śūnya) like space (ākāśa) or the sky (kha). When the goddess emerges from this transcendent state, becoming manifest within and as the Transmission (krama), she 'becomes the six parts' (ṣaṭprakāragatā). The goddess, who is the embodiment of the Command, emerges from the centre, which is the Wheel of the Foundation, to manifest both the sixfold Transmission deployed in the Six Wheels in the body and to illumine and make manifest the universe. Thus her one transformation into six parts is at once cosmogenic and salvific. The following reference, drawn from a hymn, describes this process as a powerful kratophany:

> Her Command has six parts. The abode of many qualities and, omnipresent, (its) form is horrifying (ghora). [. . .] Having emerged from the Wheel of the Foundation (ādhāracakra) (she), like a circle of lightning flashes, illumines the sixfold (ṣaḍvidha Transmission) and encircles the (entire) universe. She, having become dense and extensive, fills it with (her) rays.[1]

The 'six parts' are described in the texts from various perspectives according to differing doctrinal contexts and ritual needs. Worshipped in the six corners of the maṇḍala's central hexagon, they are like coverings (acchādaka) that envelop the deity in the centre.[2] The main ones may be briefly classified as follows:

1) The Six Wheels (ṣaṭcakra) are the six parts.[3] The inner body of all living beings is modeled on that of the deity. Consisting of the Six Wheels, it is the Body of Thunder (vajrapiṇḍa) or the Self of Thunder (vajrātman) and is said to be the 'Kula with six parts' of all embodied beings.[4] Also called the six sheaths

---

[1] yasyājñā [ṅ: yasyāha] ṣaṭprakārā [ṅ: ṣā-] bahuguṇanilayā sarvagā ghorarūpā | *[. . .] niṣkrāntādhāracakrāt [k, kh, gh: -vaktrā; g: -caktrā; ṅ: -krānta] taḍivalayanibhā ṣaḍvidhaṁ [kh g: ṣaṭ-; ṅ: * ḍivalayanibhāṣadvidhaṁ] dyotayantī [ṅ: dyotayaṁti]* | viśvaṁ cāvartayantī [k: vāvartta-; kh: vāvartayaṁti; gh: vādantaryaṁtī; g ṅ: vāvartayaṁtī] ghanavipulagatā [k: -latā; kh, gh: -ratā; g: ghonavipulalatā; ṅ: ghanavipuratā] raśmibhiḥ [k: raśmibhi; ṅ: rasmibhiḥ] pūrayantī [kh, g, gh, ṅ: -yaṁtā] || KuKauM 21/35a, 36ab.
[2] KuKh 2/10a.
[3] KuKh 39/23.
[4] KuKh 30/67cd-68.

(kośa),[1] these six are 'the great ocean of the six parts (ṣaṭprakāramahārṇava)'.[2] The CMSS calls them collectively (the reality with) six parts (ṣaṭprakāra) and lists where they are located in the body.[3] It is an aspect of the Transmission, which is 'pure and universal manifestation'.[4] Having assumed this form in six parts, the goddess who is Māyā, the pervasive energy of consciousness, is present in the bodies of all living beings.[5] In this way the six parts of the inner maṇḍala are worshipped by means of the Six Wheels[6] and, conversely, the Six Wheels are projected into the maṇḍala. Traveling through them in the maṇḍala parallels the movement through them in the body up to the goddess's transcendental abode in the middle of the triangle above them in the body, just as it leads to the centre of the triangle within the hexagon in the maṇḍala.

Various entities are coupled with projections of the six Wheels. These include six sacred seats with their six goddesses and Siddhas,[7] six Liṅgas,[8] six Yoginīs[9] and the six lineages said to have been founded by Matsyendranātha through his six disciples.[10] These lineages constitute the 'prior' Kaula tradition (pūrvāmnāya) in relation to this one that follows after it and is the last (paścimāmnāya) represented by the inner Triangle. As Kuṇḍalinī rises through them, the adept comes to acquire the spiritual knowledge of that lineage and so attains the corresponding degree of authority (adhikāra)[11] through that teacher. Thus the teacher's Command, like that of the goddess herself, also has six parts.[12] It comes from the highest point (viz. the centre of the Triangle) where the goddess resides and is called the Teacher's Mouth (guruvaktra).

2) The Six Parts denote the Six Paths (ṣaḍadhvan) of manifestation, that is, the Path of the Worlds (bhuvana), Principles (tattva) and Energies (kalā) and their

---

[1] KuKh 39/24.
[2] KuKh 30/68cd and 53/13ab.
[3] CMSS 6/18-19.
[4] ṣaṭprakāraṁ [ṅ: -kāra] kramabhedaṁ vimalaṁ sarvatodayam | ibid. 9/35ab.
[5] māyā [mayā] tu vyāpinī śaktiḥ sarvadehāntare sthitā | ṣaṭprakāragatā sā ibid. 8/18abc.
[6] KuKh 50/11.
[7] This is the subject of Chapter 61 of the KuKh.
[8] KuKh 58/43cd ff. The six Liṅgas together form the hexagon which is the sixfold Meru Liṅga (KuKh 58/59-60ab).
[9] These are described in KuKh 63/16 ff. The passage is introduced with the words;

> The teaching concerning the Cave emerges in this way from Saṁvarta (maṇḍala). Their sacrifice takes place within the maṇḍala in (each of the groups of) six in accord with (its) parts (prakāra). KuKh 63/15.

[10] KuKh 39/68-71ab.
[11] KuKh 39/102.
[12] gurvājñā ṣaṭprakārā KuKh 26/5d.

corresponding phonemic counterparts the Paths of Mantras, Parts of Mantra (pāda) and Letters (varṇa).[1]

3) The sixfold nature of the goddess and her maṇḍala, emphasized so frequently in the texts, has led to a proliferation of groups of six. It is not possible or necessary to mention them all here. Important amongst them is the expansion of the three or four sacred seats, projected into the central triangle into six by the addition of two more.[2] Six groups of six are the result of taking this format to its logical conclusion.[3]

4) The Six Parts are also aspects of the goddess's iconic form. The most basic are the goddess's six limbs and six faces. These are, as usual, parts of the goddess's Vidyā, each worshipped as a goddess.[4]

5) Aspects of the goddess's form as the Transmission (krama). The teaching is said to be of six kinds in the six sections of the maṇḍala.[5] This, the 'sequence of the six parts (ṣaṭprakārakrama)',[6] is so basic that the entire Transmission of the Kula (kulakrama) is said to be, by its very nature, in this form.[7] The Krama is the basic paradigm for this division into six. The texts describe many forms and variants of the Krama; even so the main part of it invariably consists of six groups of mantras that represent as many entities.[8] Sometimes the Krama is represented in the hexagon collectively. In one set-up an aspect of Kubjikā called Vajrakubjeśvarī is worshipped in the middle of the hexagon surrounded by the six groups of the Krama. Alternatively, she may be worshipped in conjunction with the six Yoginīs who constitute the so-called sextet of restraint (nigrahaṣaṭka).[9]

---

[1] See KuKh 33/134 and 33/158-159.

[2] See chapter 61/2cd ff.

[3] For example, one such is described in the ṢSS (17/62 ff.) and two in our text (see KuKh 39/123cd-124, which is described in chapter 60, and ibid. 39/162 ff.).

[4] See KuKh 10/14-42 and 29/45-50.

[5] KuKh 60/10cd-12.

[6] KuKh 26/21c.

[7] KuKh 39/80.

[8] The most basic are the Sequence of Twenty-eight and that of Twenty-seven (ibid. 3/54). These are most commonly divided into groups of 4-5-6-4-5-4 and 4-5-6-4-5-3. See KuKh 26/20 ff.; 28/39 ff., 39/46, 53/5-6, and 58/96cd-97ab. There are other groupings of these sequences into six. See for example KuKh 39/73 ff..

[9] According to the ṢSS:

He should worship Vajrakubjeśvarī who resides in the Sequence of Twenty-eight within the group of six in the middle conjoined with ḌĀ (Ḍākinī), RĀ (Rākinī), LĀ (Lākinī), KĀ (Kākinī), SĀ (Śākinī), and HĀ (Hākinī) (This is group of the six restraints – nigrahaṣaṭka). He should worship (this) with the Kula Peak and the aforementioned seed-syllable of each one.

The Circle of the Point in the centre of the maṇḍala, churned by its innate energy, which the texts call passion (kāma, madana) or the power of the Void (khaśakti), splits up to form the six parts of the Krama.[1] This too, like the Point and the Triangle, is said to be the Liṅga.[2] So we have a three-layered Liṅga or one Liṅga with three aspects, or better still three Liṅgas, one within each other, each distinct and yet the same.

6) It is important to note that although the Krama in the form of these sequences consists of six series of mantras that are quite different from the thirty-two syllable Vidyā of the goddess, they are nonetheless considered to be emanations of it. For this reason, the goddess, who is identified with her Vidyā, is said to be in six parts.[3] Thus in this case also, although not in a directly apparent way, the Vidyā remains the basic phonemic form of the goddess. The same sixfold development takes place in relation to the goddess's seed-syllable AIṀ.[4] But while the sixfold character of this seed-syllable is not immediately apparent,[5] it is clearly so in the case of the other 'condensed' form of the goddess's Thirty-two syllable Vidyā. This is the Single syllable (ekākṣarī) Vidyā HA-SA-KHA-PHA-RA-EṀ. It is the potential, sonic form of the groups of six, particularly the six parts of the Krama that are housed, as it were, in the six letters of the seed-syllable, each of which represents a sacred seat.[6] Thus, after describing the parts of the Krama, the KuKh continues:

> The venerable (goddess) Kubjī possesses six modalities (ṣaṭprakārā). She is the energy (E) of HA SA KHA PHA RA and, pervading (all things), is called the Yoni (bhaga). When she who is Rudra's power, the treasure of Supreme Bliss, is aroused and has entered within (the god), then the six modalities (prakāra) that are (her) (Thus he should worship) the goddess who is mounted on the seat of AIṀ and is on the thunderbolt lotus (vajrapadma), she who has assumed six aspects (ṣaṭprakāra) and is said to be the one who is called Samayā.

aṣṭāviṁśakramāntasthāṁ vajrakubjeśvarīṁ yajet |
madhyaṣaṭkāntarāle tu ḍa-ra-la-ka-sa-ha-susaṁyutām [k, kh: -taṁ] ||
kulakūṭena pūrvoktasvabījaiḥ saṁprapūjayet |
aiṁkārāsana-m-ārūḍhāṁ [k kh: -ḍhā] vajrapadmoparisthitām ||
ṣaṭprakāragatāṁ devīṁ samayākhyām udāhṛtām | ṢSS 40/71-73ab.

[1] KuKh 26/20-21.

[2] bhedaiḥ [g: bhedeḥ] ṣaḍbhiḥ [gh: ṣadbhiḥ] kramaṁ liṅgaṁ [g: liṅga] | YKh (1) 32/94cd.

[3] KuKh 12/19cd-20ab.

[4] See KuKh 5/74cd-75ab and note.

[5] See below, chapter 3, p. 698.

[6] KuKh 9/3cd-4.

> enclosures (āchādaka) are again merged into the Root Lord (Mūlanātha).
>
> The divine Liṅga, churned from above, is divided into six parts (prakāra). These are the Sacred Seats (pīṭha) and the rest (of the parts of the Krama). The (goddess) called Vakrikā (resides) there. She is the bliss of the Command (ājñā), pure with blissful intercourse (sukharati). She creates all things and destroys (them). She is consciousness and, abiding in the supreme state, she bestows both (worldly) enjoyment and liberation.[1]

Mūlanātha (lit. the Root Lord) is the name given to the Siddha who founds a lineage. The first Root Lord is thus the founder of all the lineages. He is the first teacher or 'lord' – Ādinātha and so is also called 'Venerable Lord' – Śrīnātha. Identified with Bhairava, the goddess's consort, the first teacher is the god even as they are both the disciples of the goddess. In the Saṁvartāmaṇḍalasūtra, he is called Vṛkṣanātha[2] and is said to be the 'bliss of Navātman'[3], which, in its most common form in the Kubjikā Tantras is the syllable HSKṢMLVRYŪṀ. The goddess is the pure, divine will (icchā) of the god. Creation begins from her emergence out of him, which takes place, as does a mantra, from the one who recites it. Her mantric form is the seed-syllable HSKHPHREṀ. The energy of this syllable extends out first into the emptiness of the innermost triangle of the maṇḍala, which is theYoni. This is the letter E, the shape of which is triangular. Out of the emptiness of the vortex of energies that make up this triangle emerges the hexagon that encloses it. The six corners of the hexagon form six more triangles. This replication symbolizes the pervasive state of the inner triangle. These modalities (prakāra) of the central triangle are the enclosures that surround it, as do the walls that enclose the central sanctum of a temple. In this case, within these six triangles are the six letters of the seed-syllable – HA SA KHA PHA RA E – each representing one of six sacred seats (pīṭha), namely, Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri, Kāmarūpa, Trisrota (also called Tisra) and Candra.

The nasalizing anusvāra (Ṁ), written above the syllable, is the point in the centre. The subtle sound energies that lead to it and emanate from it resonate in the emptiness of the inner triangle. When this sixfold energy, which deploys itself spontaneously in this way in the maṇḍala, is 'aroused' and like a passionate woman craves union with her partner the god, she returns to her original source. Just as the birth from the male god reverses the normal order of the world in which it is the female who gives birth, similarly, by the same logic of reversals, when entering back

---

[1] KuKh 2/9c-10bcd.
[2] KuKh 2/9ab.
[3] KuKh 2/29-30ab.

into the source, the female penetrates the male. Thus her six aspects are withdrawn back into their source. Concretely, this symbolism is based on the repeated utterance of the two syllables in succession, which thereby unites and separates the two, god and goddess. The male Navātman – HSKṢMLVRYŪṀ – comes first. This culminates, as do all seed-syllables, in the nasal anusvāra, the male aspect of the point (bindu) in the centre of the maṇḍala. This issues out into the female HSKHPHREṀ. This too culminates in the anusvāra, which contains the energy of the Command that is the goddess herself who merges into the sonic energy of the following Navātman. In this way, the maṇḍala, which consists in this context of the deployment of the sonic energies of the goddess, is emitted and withdrawn as the goddess expands out into her symbolically hexagonal form to then contract back down into the Point which is the summit of the god's sonic being.

Graphically the same process is represented by the generation and retraction of the maṇḍala. The passage quoted above describes the self-perpetuating dynamism operating in the core of the maṇḍala, beginning with the phase of withdrawal in which the goddess unites with the god – the Root Lord. The goddess is Rudra's energy, the god's omnipotent will who, desiring him rather than creation, reverts to the original oneness of their union. She emerges from the god who is the transcendental Void to then unite with him. Beyond the confines of time, successively and yet simultaneously, there is both separation and merger in perpetual stillness.

The goddess emerges in the 'pattern of emanation'[1] through which the maṇḍala and the world, its macrocosmic counterpart, is generated, thus actualizing the inner, unmanifest reality of the Krama (kramārtha), which in its manifest form is geometrically represented by the hexagon. Just as the triangle with its triads and quaternaries represents the potential state, the hexagon with its groups of six represents the active, expanded energy of the goddess in six parts (ṣaṭprakārā). They are exemplified by the six groups that constitute the Krama, the first of which are the four sacred seats,[2] echoing the Saṁvartāsūtra that declares that the maṇḍala has six parts and 'consists of the entire Krama with all its parts (sakalapadakrama)'.[3] Deployed in this way in her manifest form she radiates out into it through the waves of energy generated by the Divine Liṅga in the centre. There the goddess is independent (svatantrā)[4] in the sense that she is alone, free of the god, and acts stimulated solely by her own impulse.

In the phase of withdrawal, she is aroused by her self-stimulation and, charged with the energy of her passion (mandanakalā), she 'churns' the Churning

---

[1] KuKh 1/1.
[2] Cf. KuKh 26/20-21.
[3] KuKh 1/5c.
[4] KuKh 38/9.

Bhairava.[1] When she penetrates him, he passively accepts her, as it were, into himself. This too, like the dynamism of the Triangle and the Point, is the goddess's own independent activity. Although, the texts do not explicitly say this, we would not be wrong to say that the god in this case is 'churned from below'. The goddess is the Command, that is, the Transmental, which is the last and highest in the ascending series of principles that constitute the Kula or aggregate of her energies. Above, at the summit of this ladder that leads up into the absolute beyond them, she merges into the pure, partless – Akula – oneness of the god. Conversely, in order to issue out into her full sixfold form she, the Divine Liṅga, must be 'churned from above'. In the previous phase she is said to be 'the treasure of Supreme Bliss'; in this phase we are told she is 'pure with blissful intercourse (sukharati)'. In both phases she is the same bliss of the Command. All this is the goddess's activity, whether internal – as the play of the Triangle and the Point – or external – as the outer projection of the hexagon. The goddess resides in the centre of this maṇḍala, engaged in union with her partner. She is the Command (ājñā), which is the power of the god's omnipotent will (icchāśakti) through which the universe is created and destroyed. So, from this perspective, it is she, not the god, who is said to create all things and destroy them, even as she continues to abide as pure, still consciousness in her supreme state.

Moreover, the goddess 'creates all things and destroys them' and in so doing bestows worldly enjoyment through the former and liberation by means of the latter even as she abides in the supreme state and does not fall from it. The unfolding of the maṇḍala from the centre and its re-absorption into it is the outpouring of the self-regenerating dynamism of the centre. The projections into the central triangle are the immediate, most direct manifestations of the goddess in the centre, that is, within the Liṅga. They arise when the Liṅga is 'churned from above' and the goddess thereby emerges from the transcendent, supreme state symbolized by the Point in the centre. Her initial, active manifest state is her first emanation. These are the sacred seats projected into the Triangle, which are also the first of the six groups and so are her most intimate form, the most basic and original. This is true, both in terms of the intricate symbolism of the Kramamaṇḍala, of which this is the core, as well as in 'concrete' mythical historical terms, for it is from here that the original triadic transmission of the goddess's Command is said to have taken place.

How then is the Divine Liṅga churned from above? We will find these or analogous expressions repeated throughout our text because they describe in their own cryptic way the manner in which the maṇḍala, the most primary symbol of any Tantric tradition, is formed. The maṇḍala is actually a three-dimensional figure. The triangular core is accordingly also called Meru, the mountain in the centre of the world. We are told that it faces downwards. It is therefore an inverted three-sided pyramid. The closer we get to the centre, the further up this sacred mountain we travel. In other words, the inner parts are 'above' the 'outer' parts. 'Above' is the state that is 'higher', that is, closer to transcendence. It is more 'internal', closer to the unmanifest that is the source of manifestation. Thus 'churning from above' means 'churning from within'. The Liṅga that is 'churned from above' is the triangle that is churned from within by the point in the centre which is accordingly frequently described as a sphere rotating in three dimensions.

[1] KuKh 38/24a.

The goddess emerges out of the Divine Liṅga of Space in the centre as the triangle. Once it has been externally established by the deployment of its inner sacred sites in the outside world, the god is ready to unite with the goddess. This is the outer 'churning from above'. The goddess, engaged in union, becomes crooked again. This 'churning' process brings about the outer flow of the transmission in the six parts located in the corners of the hexagon that surrounds the inner Triangle and emerges from it. The womb of energies, the Yoni, which by the reversal and conjunction of polarities is known as the Yoniliṅga, is in this way 'churned from above'. The inner, unmanifest power is aroused by its own spontaneous inspiration. The upper part is the male principle – the Liṅga – the lower part the female – the Yoni. The drop of the vital seed that is generated thereby is the empowering Command (ājñā), which is both the source of the universe and the means to attain the supreme state.

From a different perspective, the principle that churns from above is not male. Rather it is the goddess herself. She penetrates herself. As our text says: 'She who is Rudra's power, the treasure of Supreme Bliss, is aroused and has entered within.'[1] Theoretically, when Rudra's energy is not aroused, she rests within but is not blissful. However, this never happens because she is perpetually aroused (nityodita), although in her potential, unmanifest state she is within the god. She, not the god, is divided into six parts and it is in this sixfold form that she emerges from the Liṅga. This male Liṅga is Mūlanātha within which these six parts abide in a potential form prior to manifestation. At the same time, these six parts are aspects of the goddess that emerge out of HER when she, as the Divine Liṅga, is 'churned'. Thus the male aspect is implicitly considered in this context to be basically female. The goddess, who has six parts, emerges from the Divine Liṅga which thus represents the aspect within which they exist in a potential form. Out of the Liṅga, they are deployed around it as the six 'modalities' or parts of the maṇḍala that form the pedestal of the Liṅga.

In this way the emergence, which at the microcosmic level, is the drawing of the maṇḍala, symbolizes the deployment of the goddess in the time and space of her eternal, pervasive state. It is the process of emanation marked by the emergence of the individual energies or aspects (kalā) of Kula, the universal energy with which Kubjikā is identified. Our text explains:

[1] KuKh 2/9.

> Thus, (reality), supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent), is divided by the division (brought about by) the churning (manthāna) (of power and its possessor). In this way, Passion is present within emanation, the Passion that is the destruction of desire (kāma). And that is Haṁsa (the Gander), the Great Soul which is the nectar generated from the (primordial) fire. These two are called Śiva and Śakti. The triple universe is woven warp and woof (with them). This is the secret called the 'Great Churning' (mahāmanthāna).[1]

Here we notice an ancient association between the 'churning' that takes place in sexual union and the churning that generates fire. Probably linked since fire was first produced in this way, it is an important part of the rich Vedic symbolism associated with the fire. The fire that is required for the Vedic sacrifice may be stored in an appropriate place and transported. Alternatively, it may be produced by rubbing two fire sticks together, a process called the 'churning of fire' (agnimanthana).[2] The Ṛgveda[3] compares mathana – 'the kindling of fire by friction' to procreation: Agni is hidden in the kindling sticks (araṇī) as the seed (garbha) is well kept inside pregnant women (garbhin). The Veda declares: 'Put it down supinely stretched, you attentive (priest). When impregnated she gave birth to the male (Agni)'.[4] One of these sticks is laid flat on the ground and has a small cavity in which the upper stick is placed. A rope is wound around the upper stick. Pulling at each end alternately, the upper stick turns back and forth in the cavity of the lower one.[5] The upper stick is compared to the mythical Vedic king Purūrvas and the lower stick to Urvaśī, a celestial nymph (apsaras) who was his lover.[6]

---

[1] KuKh 24/27cd-29. Note that 'pondering' (i.e. 'reflection') is an additional sense of the term 'churning' implied in this passage. We find an example of the same usage in KuKh 4/31cd-32:

> Then the god, having deeply pondered (mathitvā lit. 'churned') the Supreme Principle, began (to intone) with divine praise and blissful voice, a divine hymn.

[2] The procedure in the case of the Agnicayana is described in Staal 2001: vol. 1, 313-7.

[3] ṚV 3/29/1-3. The pressing of Soma, like the churning of the firesticks, is understood to be symbolic of coitus in the Ṛgveda (see ṚV 1/28/2-3).

[4] Staal 2001: 76.

[5] For a photograph of this procedure see Staal 2001: vol. 1, 43.

[6] When Puru was abandoned by the apsaras Urvaśī, the gandharvas, sympathizing with his plight granted him a boon. He chose to be one of them, thinking no doubt, that he would in that way be re-united with his beloved as gandharvas are normally in the company of the apsaras. In order to

Tinder is placed around the junction smeared with clarified butter, which symbolizes the seminal fluid produced by the churning. This kindles the fire that is the passion of the ultimate outpouring of their union. Once the fire is produced the sacrifice can be performed through which the world is created. The evident sexual symbolism here becomes even more explicit in the later texts. In the Bṛhadaranyakopaniṣad, the Self that has split into male and female is portrayed as uniting sexually to produce the creatures:

> He knew: "I, indeed, am this creation, for I emitted it all from myself." Thence arose creation. Verily, he who has this knowledge comes to be in that creation of his. Then he rubbed thus. From his mouth as the fire-hole (yoni) and from his hands he created fire (agni). Both these (i.e. the hands and the mouth) are hairless on the inside, for the fire-hole (yoni) is hairless on the inside.[1]

The discovery of the production of fire by friction or percussion (which is not used in India) was truly momentous. The fire, which for millennia man could not produce, had to be gathered from natural sources and transported with great care to keep it lit. Keeping him warm and cooking his food, fire protected and nourished man who in return worshipped and tended him. The discovery of the inner fire was of even greater importance for him. The warmth of the body must have been known very early on to be a sign of life. Man lives because of the fire of life that burns within. When it is extinguished he dies. Conversely, by stoking the inner fire it burns more intensely and generates more life, more light and with it the bliss of consciousness, which is the very life of each living being. Techniques to develop the inner fire and internalize the outer fire precede the Buddha. Centuries later the Kubjikā Tantras, as do the Śaiva Tantras in general, explain how this is done by the inner union and churning of Śiva and Śakti. These two encompass the Self – the living soul – thus forming the triad, which in the following passage is called HAṀSA. It is the seed-syllable mantra formed from fulfill his wish, the gandharvas gave him directions for the performance of the appropriate sacrifices. These are briefly described in the ŚB after the narration of the myth. The account ends:

---

> He then made himself an upper araṇī of Aśvattha wood, and a lower araṇī of Aśvattha wood; and the fire which resulted therefrom was that very fire [of their passion]: by offering therewith he became one of the gandharvas. ŚB 9/5/17 (Eggeling's translation).

According to the TaiS (3/9/5) Urvaśī, the lower stick, is Speech and Puru, the upper one is indicated by the word 'asi' i.e. 'you are'. In other words, the two form a couple (maithuna) who proclaim to the fire that is being kindled: "you are Speech". See Kosambi 1992: 42ff..

[1] BṛUp. 1/4/5-6, Hume's translation.

Ha, which is Śakti, Sa, which is Śiva and the central Point Ṁ, in the centre between them, which is the Self enveloped in the subtle body, the City of Eight (puryaṣṭaka).[1] United, the triad is in the Heart, the abode of the Deity and the Self. In dynamic interaction, when Śiva and Śakti churn one another, they are inwardly distributed in the body. Śakti is in the lower part of the body, like the lower fire-stick and Śiva – the Churning Bhairava – in the upper. Their axis is the individual Self that is located in the navel, the Wheel (cakra) in the centre between them where the fire of Kuṇḍalinī rises.[2] Śakti below contracts. Bhairava above expands. Pulsing in alternation they stir up the inner Fire. This is the Yoga of the Churning of Śiva and Śakti. It is called the Abandonment of Power – Śaktityāga – because Śakti, i.e. Kuṇḍalinī abandons her place of rest, and also because it leads to the realisation of the supreme state beyond Śiva and Śakti, to which Śakti leads. The following passage, drawn from the KMT, tells us covertly that this practice can be done alone or with a partner:

> That supreme seed-syllable called Haṁsa is located in the heart. Without that there is no perception (upalabdhi) (of ultimate reality) and one knows nothing. O fair lady, it has three forms, Sound (nāda), Conjunction (saṁyoga) and Disjunction (viyoga). O fair-hipped lady, one should pay attention to it with effort. Again, the threefold consciousness (caitanya) is present here, which is that of the Self (ātman), Power (śakti) and Śiva. The threefold consciousness abides in a state of invariable union. Thus, O fair lady, it is secondarily said to be (upacaryate) the god Haṁsa who is supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent). Śakti is in the (phase of) contraction (while) Bhairava is said to be in (the phase of) expansion. The Self abides constantly in the middle (between them) endowed with the City of Eight. The expanded state is the upper channel (nāḍī). Contraction is said to be the lower one. The navel is said to be in the middle. This triad is hard to attain.
>
> By checking the upper channel, contracting the lower one and placing the mind (citta) in the middle, practice there the act of churning (manthana). The Liṅga is in the middle of the Yoni and is encapsulated by it. In the centre is one's own nature, which one should > attend to again and again. This is called 'the act of churning' (mathana) that destroys the impurity of ignorance.

[1] The City of Eight is the subtle body the individual soul inhabits in the physical body and is its vehicle when it transmigrates. There are various views concerning its nature. According to the most common one, it consists of the five sensations of form, sound, smell, taste, and touch and the internal mental organ consisting of the mind (manas), intellect (buddhi) and ego (ahaṁkāra). See note to KuKh 13/6.

[2] According to the Kubjikā Tantras, the place from where Kuṇḍalinī rises is the Wheel of the City of Gems (maṇipuracakra) in the navel.

>
> Indeed, the fire of knowledge burns by means of the Yoga of the Churning of the Centre. Then, when the fire is burning, the Light increases. By its increase, the bliss of the Great Light arises. Just as bliss arises by churning with the Yoni and the Liṅga, similarly bliss arises by the churning of Śiva and Śakti. O goddess, (in this way one attains) realisation (niścayatva) by the unity of Śiva and Śakti. O beloved, that is said to be the churning that generates nectar. One should think that by (means of) that the Self is flooded with that nectar. This is the supreme state (vṛtti). This is said to be the Supreme Principle. This is that Supreme Brahman, the mark of which is supreme bliss. That bliss, the supreme bliss, is said to be the 'Abandonment of Power' (śaktityāga). (Thus) the City of Gems (maṇipura) (the Wheel in the navel) has been revealed to you along with its secret.[1]

Churning makes what is hidden manifest and effective. It is a way of extracting the essence from that which is churned, like butter from milk.[2] Interiorized, this process is not only an analogy for the production of fecund seminal fluid but also for realisation and the discovery of one's own spiritual potential. The Upaniṣads say as much with respect to the Vedic syllable OṀ as the Tantra does concerning the Tantric syllable HAṀSA:

> As the material form (mūrti) of fire when latent in its source (i.e. the fire-wood) is not perceived – and yet there is no evenishment of its subtle form (liṅga) – but may be caught again by means of the drill in its source, so verily, both (the universal and the individual Brahma) are (to be found) in the body by the use of OṀ.
>
> By making one's own body the lower friction-stick and the syllable OṀ the upper friction-stick, by practicing the friction of meditation (dhyāna), one may see the God (deva) who is hidden, as it were.

---

[1] KMT 12/54-67.

[2] Cf. the Kulārṇavatantra (2/10) where the god (īśvara) says:

> O goddess, I, who am the knower of the essence, having churned the great ocean of the Vedas and Āgamas with the stick of knowledge, have extracted Kuladharma.

Note, by the way, that the expression 'Kuladharma' is very rare, if it appears at all, in the early Kaula Tantras and their precursors, the Bhairava Tantras.

> As oil is in sesame seeds, as butter is in cream, as water is in river-beds, and as fire is in fire-sticks, so is the Soul (ātman) apprehended in one's own soul, if one looks for Him with true austerity (tapas).[1]

The Upaniṣadic analogy is easily transposed into Tantric terminology. Being, deity, the Self, indeed whatever exists in any form, including illusory (i.e. mental) entities and their potencies, constitute a unity with two aspects – Śiva and Śakti. This unity is a condition of potency in which entities, even deity, abide as latent causes, and hence are unmanifest as what they are, that is, as what they can do, until their potential is applied. Application in this context is the arousal of this potency. The 'act of churning' is the arousal of latent inner power, and its outer projection to make it active and fruitful is a major concern of the Tantras. Thus our text declares that: '(The act of) churning is said to be emanation itself, which is the arising of the aspects of the (energy of) Kula'.[2]

Maheśvarānanda, writing in South India during the twelfth or thirteenth century, was an exponent of the Kālīkrama. The following passage is quoted from the Kramakeli[3] in his Mahārthamañjari. It not only tells us that the basic dynamism through which the universe is generated is understood in the same way in both the Kālīkrama and the Kubjikā Tantras, but also that the name of the god – Manthānabhairava – 'the Churning Bhairava' is the same and for the same reason:

> God is capable of churning this reality and so is the Lord of Kula who is the ultimate fixed ground (pratiṣṭhāsthāna) of all things. It is he who, churning his own energy, brings about creation and the other (cosmic processes). And so, I salute the venerable Churning Bhairava who is such.[4]

Moreover, by the same process, Bhairava 'churns' the ocean-like currents of the teachings to extract the essence of their aesthetic savor (rasa) – that is, of course, the system Maheśvarānanda is expounding.[5] The analogy is with the well-known myth of the churning of the ocean by the gods and demons, which thus

---

[1] ŚvUp 1/13-15 Hume's translation. Cf. Amṛtabindūpaniṣad 20-1 and Kaivalyopaniṣad 11.

[2] KuKh 17/35cd.

[3] This important work by Abhinavagupta on the Kashmiri Kālīkrama has unfortunately been lost. Maheśvarānanda's reference to this and numerous other other works of this tradition, tell us that it had reached South India from the North by that time. The same passage is also quoted by Kṣemarāja in his commentary, the Spandanirṇaya (p. 6), on the Spandakārikā.

[4] MṀ. p. 172.

[5] MM p. 171.

yielded milk, butter, wine, poison, and finally Soma, the elixir of immortality.[1] Prior to the emergence of the Kālīkrama Manthāna Bhairava was a major aspect of the god of the Brahmayāmala. His cult is set in the cremation ground where the initiate (called 'avadhūta') is engaged in sexual union – 'churning' – with his consort (dūtī) through which he produces the sexual fluids offered to Manthānabhairava and his energies.

The symbolism and dynamic interaction of the polarities is similarly represented by the Śaiva Siddhānta in relation to the outer Liṅga. In that context also, the energies of the Liṅga are believed to emerge from it and, deployed around it, unite with it. These the Śaiva Siddhānta conceives to be the 'limbs of enjoyment' of Sadāśiva. He is represented by the Liṅga in the centre of these limbs of which he is the 'enjoyer' (bhoktṛ). Here too the analogy is sexual. The Śaiva Siddhānta views the process of manifestation and 'enjoyment' from a strongly dominant male perspective. Brunner explains:

> The term bhogāṅga [the limbs of enjoyment] are counterposed to the layāṅga [the limbs of merger] that denote his limbs insofar as they are in their natural location, in the body of Sadāśiva (layasthāna). They are worshipped first there, then one asks Śiva's permission to 'extract' them from his body and to place them around him, each on a petal of an imaginary lotus that is the throne and opens out at the base of the Liṅga. [. . .] The aggregate of five or six . . . constitute the first enclosure (āvaraṇa) of beings that encircle Śiva, like courtesans a king.[2]

The union of opposites on the analogy of sexual union and, indeed, its concrete realisation through it, is also represented by a sonic hexagon in Kashmiri Śaivism as it is in the Kubjikā sources. In this context the female polarity is, as usual, represented by the downward-facing triangle. However, the feminine is so powerful in the Kubjikā Tantras that it assumes the role of both polarities to form an entirely feminine hexagon. This one has a male component, which is represented by the upward-facing triangle.[3] According to Abhinavagupta the sonic

---

[1] See, e.g. Gonda 1954: 128-129 and Doniger O'Flaherty 1975: 273-280. For an interiorized Kashmiri Śaiva version of the churning of the ocean of consciousness and the production of the nectar that is the very essence of realisation, see Dyczkowski 1992: 61-62.

[2] SŚP vol. 1 p. 208.

[3] As the vowels represent Śiva according to this system (just as the consonants represent Śakti), one would expect this hexagon to be dominantly male, but this is not the case. In fact it illustrates how transformations of gender are essential. If this union is to take place successfully (i.e. spiritually) the male must realise his participation in the feminine. This is because in spiritual terms the male is an inversion, as it were, of the female. Moreover, although the male partner is essential, the woman is the embodiment of the emissive state (visargāvasthā) that arises by the expansion of spiritual consciousness in the centre (technically called madhyavikāsa) where the two equivalent of this hexagon (ṣaḍara) is the letter AI.[1] In accord with the normal rules governing the conjunction (sandhi) of vowels in Sanskrit, the letter E is formed by the fusion of A, which represents Anuttara, the male Absolute, with I the cosmogenic Will (icchā) that issues from it through the force of its inner emission (visarga). Thus letter E is said to be 'beautiful with the fragrance of emission' and is represented by a downward-facing triangle that symbolizes the Yoni,[2] AI is formed by the addition of A or Ā, which represents the Bliss (ānanda) of the Absolute, to the vowel E. The letter A is understood to be the upward-facing triangle filled with the energies of the Triangle as described above.[3] Thus AI symbolizes the unfolding of the Bliss and the Will of the Absolute through the union of opposites represented by the two triangles of the hexagon.[4]

Jayaratha explains in his commentary that, in the context of ritual sexual union (caryākrama), '(. . .) the state consisting of the Gesture of the Hexagon unite. Swami Laksmanjoo explained in one of his lectures I was fortunate to attend in the summer of 1976:

---

> The woman cannot reach the Śāmbhava state without the man, He must reflect in her as she must reflect in him in order for him to experience the state of madhyavikāsa she is in. The man has no madhyavikāsa on his own. It is the woman who experiences madhyavikāsa right from the beginning [of sexual union], moving from unclearly expanded to completely expanded. He must however be immersed in her state if he is to experience that state. Man must become woman to reach the heights of sexual ecstasy that woman by her very nature enjoys.

[1] TĀ 3/95cd-96ab.

[2] TĀ 3/94cd-95ab. Jayaratha quotes a verse in his commentary that says:

> The triangle is the eleventh (vowel). It is is called by (various) names (including) the Abode of Fire, (the triangle of the) Yoni, the Water Chestnut (śṛṅgāṭa) and the letter E.

[3] See above chapter 2, p. 291.

[4] When the consciousness of the absolute (A) and of bliss (Ā) are applied to the power of the will (I) that is said to be the Triangle (E) beautiful with the fragrance of emission. When the powers of the Absolute (A) and bliss (Ā) become firmly established there, it assumes the condition of the hexagon (wheel – ṣaḍavasthiti AI) brought about by the union of two triangles (A and E). TĀ 3/94cd-96ab.

Jayaratha adds:

> In the manner explained previously, Anuttara (i.e. the letter A) consists of the three energies Raudrī and the rest (i.e. Vāmā and Jyeṣṭhā)* and Ānanda (i.e. the letter Ā) is nothing but its expansion, and so (both are) in the form of a triangle. Therefore, a hexagon (is formed) by the conjunction of the two triangles, namely, the letters A and E.

* Cf. KuKh 7/13-15ab. The letter A is shaped like an upward-facing triangle and the letter E a downward-facing one. This is why the explanation of the unfolding of these energies in the Tantrasadbhāva relates it to both the triangular letter E and the letter A.

(ṣaḍaramudrā) also arises by encapsulation of the two triangles, namely, Siddha and Yoginī'.[1] The letter E is the Foundation of Birth, also called the Mouth of the Yoginī,[2] in a state of emission. This is the triangle of the female partner. The male partner is the upward-facing triangle of Anuttara (the Absolute) and Ānanda (Bliss) that is implicitly identified with the male organ. Moreover, the sides of the two triangles are formed from the three channels of the vital breath – Iḍā, Piṅgalā and Suṣumṇā – of each partner that are equated with the energies of will, knowledge and action. Their union brings about the emission of the Drop (bindu) that rises up through the centre of the conjoined triangles transported upwards by Kuṇḍalinī, the energy of emission (visargaśakti).

This practice, with its corresponding theory, presented here in brief on the basis of Kashmiri Śaiva texts is well known in some form or other to many Tantric schools. The meaning of the hexagon with a point in the centre – so commonly seen on the walls of temples and elsewhere in the Kathmandu Valley, for example – was explained to me in a similar way there by a learned initiate into the Kubjikā cult as symbolizing ritual sexual intercourse imitating the union of Śiva and Śakti. According to the Kubjikā sources the union of the two polarities first takes place internally when the six aspects are merged in the god. This is the source of the bliss that is within both the god and the goddess. The union of the two also takes place externally in the course of the goddess's emergence from the male principle and descent into manifestation. This union, internal and external, is a dynamic, rhythmic and blissful process, aptly symbolized as sexual intercourse, that is, 'churning', which takes place 'from above'.

Here is one example of many of the increased dominance of the feminine with respect to the earlier Kubjikā Tantras. The goddess asserts her independence from the god and self-determination in numerous ways in the KMT, but she does not repress and relegate the god to the same degree of transcendence and subordination as happens in the later texts. According to the KMT it is Bhairava who 'churns' the goddess after their marriage. She must bear the force of his passion in the act of union in which he is clearly dominant. She too is blissful. Her limbs have 'melted' in the union of love and she flows with the 'nectar of Kula', that is, with the sacred juices of the Yoni. Even so, she ultimately protests that she has had enough because she is pained by the 'crooked form (kubja)' she must assume to please him, although from his point of view she is the 'bliss of the sport' of love making.[3] She is Kubjikā, in this context, because she submits to the god's dominance, which she accepts both to generate the bliss that comes from their union and to create the world.

---

[1] Comm. on TĀ 3/95cd-96ab.
[2] See Dyczkowski 1988: 63-65.
[3] KMT 3/40-42.

In this section (khaṇḍa) of the Tantra of the Churning Bhairava, which is concerned with the most sacred part of the Virgin Goddess, the perspective has changed. The goddess has assumed a more dominant role. She is now also the 'churner', not just the 'churned'. In one of the sacred sites Bhairava goes to seek her, it is he who is 'churned'; and not even by her. There, in the assembly where Siddhas and Yoginīs gather to worship in union, Bhairava's genitals are 'churned' causing him to ejaculate.[1] Bhairava's seed is worshipped, a sign that it is nonetheless potent but, instead of falling into a fertile womb, it is kept in a jar. By itself, the god's seed is infertile. This is not the case with the seed of the goddess, the Command. Even when she produces her seed alone, it is fecund and creative, although it is more fecund when generated by uniting with the god. Their union, that is, their 'churning', generates the Command from which are born the scriptures and the whole of the tradition. Accordingly, it is called the Path of the Great Churning (mahāmanthāna). Thus, the scripture of the Command, which is the epitome of this Path, is called the Tantra of the Churning Bhairava (manthānabhairava)[2] that has been produced by churning of the ocean of the divine energy of the letters (mātṛkā) contained in the goddess's maṇḍala.[3]

It appears at first sight that Bhairava is again here the 'churner', but this is not so. Our text expounds in its own concise cryptic way this process from the perspective of the goddess, not the god. It is she who, full of the 'energy of passion' (madanakalā), that is, the divine, omnipotent will of the Command, churns the Churning Bhairava. Bhairavī, the abode of Bhairava's energy of Speech (bhāratīpura), churns the god with the aggregate of her sonic energies represented by the letters. In this way, the Command is in the divine abode or 'hermitage' (āśrama) of the Point in the centre, which is the inner counterpart of the land of Koṅkaṇa, the sacred site of the higher revelation of the teachings propagated by the MBT. From there the Command spreads out by means of the sacred seats[4] just as it does in the triangular land of Bhārata, the macrocosmic form of the same sacred triangular part of the Virgin Goddess (kumārikākhaṇḍa) within which her energy of emanation unfolds, impelled by the inner dynamism with which she 'churns' the god and her own energies.

Kubjikā, the Goddess of the Moon

At this point, in order to deepen our understanding of the goddess, her Triangle and the Liṅga, we turn to the rich lunar symbolism with which they are

[1] KuKh 6/87cd-88.
[2] KuKh 7/3-5ab.
[3] KuKh 57/89-91ab.
[4] KuKh 38/24.

permeated. Although the other two major Kaula goddess, Kālī and Tripurā (and, indeed, many others), have extensive lunar associations, Kubjikā is related to the moon in an exceptional way. The moon alternates progressively between light and darkness. It both bestows and withdraws its light. Similarly the lunar goddess shines darkly, as it were. Kālī, who as her name tells us with its double meaning, is both Lady Time and the Black Lady, is in an apparently paradoxical manner described as radiant light (bhāsā). Kubjikā also possesses these two aspects. In her case however, although she is also sometimes said to be dark blue (śyāmā) or dark blue and red (śyāmāruṇā), her brightness, rather than darkness, is more frequently emphasized in the forms, myths and sacred geography associated with her. We have seen that she resides on the Island of the Moon in the Liṅga in which she is immersed in blissful contemplation and is consecrated there with the lunar nectar of the Command. The foundation of the Liṅga is the white Stone in the centre of the Island symbolizing the lunar Point (bindu). There the goddess sits in meditation. She lives on the triple peak of the Mountain of the Moon that is identified with Meru, the mountain at the centre of the world. It is where the Cave of the Moon is located, in which the goddess and the god who is the Siddha of this Age received the teachings. The goddess herself declares that she is the Moon.[1] Her abode is the City of the Moon and her house is the House of the Moon, where Siddhas and Yoginīs reside. Indeed, one of the names for the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras is the Tradition of the Moon (candrārtha).[2] By entering this tradition, the initiate becomes a sacred person in a sacred land, mountain or island in the company of perfect beings. It is a secret inner world – the land of the City of the Moon, the goddess's maṇḍala.

In metaphysical terms, 'churning' is the process of emanation of the universe from its ultimate source.[3] This takes place progressively in stages marked by the systematic emergence of energies (kalā) that are differentiated (or 'churned') from the one universal energy as parts or phases in its manifestation. An apt and, indeed, common analogy for this process is the progressive growth of the moon, digit (kalā) by digit, one after another on successive nights. These lunar energies are symbolically projected into two places at the extremity of the subtle body, namely, the End of the Twelve and the End of the Sixteen, which are located respectively twelve and sixteen fingers above the head. The former is the location of the Triangle and the Point identified with the Full Moon (pūrṇimā) and the latter the New Moon (amavasyā). The interplay between these two polarities, their 'churning', generates the inner bliss of the deity in which the initiate participates to the degree in which he approaches and finally merges into this divine dynamism.

[1] KuKh 7/55-56.
[2] KuKh 5/51cd-53ab and note.
[3] KuKh 17/35-36ab.

The beings in the sky are celestial beings. The yogis who become Skyfarers thus take their place with the shining celestials. As celestial bodies the Sun and Moon are pre-eminent. They are the two major sources of light in the sky. Fire, the third source is on the earth and, according to common Indian mythology, it is also in the depths of the ocean, which is believed to explain why it slowly evaporates, giving rise to rain clouds. The goddess partakes of the character of all three in her various modalities and aspects. Even so, Kubjikā is basically a lunar goddess. Indeed her lunar nature is so prominent that the solar god and even the solar goddess have been virtually forgotten. This tendency is common to the other two major Kaula goddesses. The goddess Tripurā, who developed after Kubjikā, is associated with the sixteen Nityās – the goddesses of the sixteen digits of the moon. Kālī of the Kālīkrama, like Kubjikā who succeeds her, is linked to both the waxing and the waning moon. The Cidgaganacandrikā ('the Moonlight of the Sky of Consciousness'), is probably a South Indian work of the late Kashmiri Kālīkrama. There we read that Kālī is the Full Moon when she merges the universe filled with light into herself, and the New Moon (kuhū) when she empties herself out, as it were, to emanate it.[1] In between these two phases, which mark the passage of time, the goddess persists in the Eternal Present:

> O Kālī! You abide between fullness and emptiness when you abandon succession. There, O Kālī, you desire to absorb the Present that is your play of division and change made manifest (by You).[2]

The Jayadrathayāmala is one of the earliest and most extensive sources of the emergent Kālīkrama. One of the main forms of Kālī worshipped in the JY is Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī – the Attractress of Time. Her profound association with the moon is clearly apparent in her Vidyā which, consisting of seventeen syllables,[3] represents her implicitly as containing the sixteen energies of the Full Moon with herself as the seventeenth, the energy of the New Moon. This association (but without the Vidyā) has carried over, it seems, into the Kubjikā tradition, which, as we shall see, extensively identifies this energy with the dark goddess Kālī.

Commonly, the polarities are represented as the Sun and Moon, Night and Day. Accordingly, the solar character of the goddess Kālī, despite her obvious dark

---

[1] CGC 20-21.

[2] CGC 22.

[3] The Vidyā of Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī is presented in code in a quotation from the Devyāyāmala in Jayaratha's commentary on TĀ 29/68-70ab. It is HRĪṀ MAHĀCAṆḌAYOGEŚVARI ṬHṚ ḌHṚ THṚ PHAṬ PHAṬ PHAṬ PHAṬ PHAṬ. See Dupuche 2003: 226.

colour, is also apparent in the Kālīkrama especially in the symbolism of the Twelve Kālīs, who represent the solar year of twelve months, Abhinavagupta expounds as the culmination and essence of the Kālīkrama.[1] Kubjikā's lunar symbolism is sufficient by itself to represent both polarities – the entire dynamism of reality and its unchanging ground. The Full Moon is the Sun and the New Moon is the Moon itself.[2] The former symbolizes the self-sustained and all-sustaining Being, the permanence that replenishes transience. The latter symbolizes becoming, the cycle of perpetual return. Fully real, it is sustained by the authenticity of Being. As Eliade notes:

> The sun is always the same, always itself, never in any sense 'becoming'. The moon, on the other hand, is a body which waxes, wanes and disappears, a body whose existence is subject to the universal law of becoming, of birth and death. The moon, like man, has a career involving tragedy, for its failing, like man's, ends in death. For three nights the starry sky is without a moon. But this 'death' is followed by a rebirth: the new moon. The moon's going out, in 'death', is never final. One Babylonian hymn to Sin sees the moon as 'a fruit growing from itself'. It is reborn of its own substance, in pursuance of its own destined career. This perpetual return to its beginnings, and this ever-recurring cycle make the moon the heavenly body above all others concerned with the rhythms of life. [3]

In the body, the 'rhythms of life' are most clearly apparent in the movement of the vital breath, and it is in this movement that the goddess's lunar nature is most clearly, externally perceived. The 'filling' and 'emptying' of the breath are the outer forms of the two inner aspects of Kubjikā, the energy of consciousness (citkalā). One is the energy of plenitude – the Full Moon (pūrṇā). The other is the energy of emptiness – the New Moon (amā). Thus the god praises the goddess saying:

---

[1] The Twelve Kālīs represent the 'twelvefold condition' of the cycle of the Inexplicable (anākhyacakra) that contains all the other cycles of the Kālīkrama that, according to Abhinava's exegesis, arise in the domains of the perceiver, the means of perception, and their object. These are creation, persistence, withdrawal and the inexplicable fourth state that contains them in one consciousness. They are also twelve because they are linked to the activity of the twelve senses (five of knowledge, five of action, mind (manas) and ego (ahaṁkāra). Just as these are twelve aspects of the one consciousness, so the Twelve Kālīs are aspects of the one Goddess who, as Abhinava (TĀ 4/146) says: 'resides (within the sphere of) objectivity in the form of the (twelve) months (of the year), the signs of the zodiac and the like'.

[2] KuKh 38/32.

[3] Eliade 1974: 155.

> I praise (the goddess) in the bright lunar fortnight who is called the Full (Moon) (pūrṇā) and is nectar. Her form (spherical as) the bud of a Kadamba tree, she is present at the end of the sixteen (lunar digits).
>
> I praise the goddess New Moon (amā) whose form is moonlight (candrikākāra)[1] in the midst of that (Full Moon), she who is the lioness of the nectar of union (utsaṅgāmṛtakesarī) and the original form (bimba) of (the goddess) Kālikā.[2]

The New and the Full Moon are the two extremities of the movement of vitality and the inner energy of the goddess's divine consciousness. Escaping time and space, they are within one another. Internally, the fullness empties out until, exhausted, it reverts to its original potential condition, which is the source of all energies. The light turns to darkness and the darkness turns to light as Kubjikā reveals her dark aspect and Kālī reveals her radiance. The perpetual transformation of these polarities constitute the inner dynamism of the deity's divine energy of consciousness (citkalā), which the Kubjikā tradition identifies with the Transmental (unmanī), the deepest metaphysical identity of the goddess. Externally, this transcendental cycle is mirrored in the movement of the breath which is the intermediary between the rhythm of the deity within and the outer world generated and withdrawn in consonance with it. Thus, mindful breathing is the epitome of time. Its ceaseless recurrence, which is life itself, mirrors within the creation and destruction of the world. Between these two phases, represented by the Sun and Moon, is the inner lunar breath that rises and descends along the central path filling the body and the universe mirrored within it, with its divine vivifying nectar. The breathing to the left and the right is discontinuous. Night changes to day and day to night. It is a process that is external (that is, outside the centre) and must be kept going from outside. And, despite its cyclic nature, it comes to an end. But within the stillness of the channel of Suṣumṇā, a different, higher breathing flows – the breath of the inner Moon. The outer breath alternates between the two channels to the right and left. The inner breath waxes and wanes like the moon along the central vertical axis.

The symbolism is apt in many respects. According to common belief, the moon is the visible form of the divine source of life-giving nectar (soma, amṛta) which, as it gradually wanes, empties out to outwardly feed the universe and, internally, the breath, body, senses and mind. During the bright fortnight, as the moon waxes, it gradually reabsorbs into itself from its hidden source what it had lost in the dark fortnight. In this way, the moon increases and decreases. This cyclic process of nourishment and self-regeneration is grounded in an unchanging, underlying reality that persists as the permanent element that guarantees the continuity and regularity of this process. The Kubjikā Tantras conceive the permanent underlying element to be the Energy of the New Moon (amākalā). This is the seventeenth energy of the Moon. The sixteenth is the energy of the Full Moon. This conception, and the complex, intimate interaction between these two energies which we will now examine, is derived from an ancient model. It is a natural model derived from the common observation that the moon waxes and wanes in approximately thirty days.

---

[1] See above note to 3/44.
[2] KuKh 3/115-116.

The Moon is not only the natural symbol of the cycle of time, it is also the sacred vessel of the nectar of immortality. The association of the Moon with nourishing nectar that falls from heaven is a very ancient one. In Vedic times it was associated with the Soma which became in later times one of the names of the moon. Soma was offered to the gods as the supreme spiritual drink, drunk by both the gods and those who worshipped them for nourishment, both physical and spiritual. Talking about early Vedic religion, Hillebrandt points out that: 'The moon is a drop of the golden Soma in heaven, or a bowl containing the drink of the gods. This concept is original to this name Soma, while several other forms of manifestation and activity of the moon inspired the imagination in other directions and created new personifications.'[1] He also notes that: 'Indian ritual has preserved an ancient tradition; the rare phenomenon that a concept of the early Aryan period continues almost without change up to the classical writings of India can be observed here; the only difference is that in the Vedic period one believed that one drank 'the nectar of the moon' itself when one had pressed Soma.'[2]

The notion that the fifteen visible phases of the moon are grounded in an invisible sixteenth lunar energy which sustains this process by inwardly replenishing the lunar energies that spill out as vivifying nectar into the universe is already well established in the later Vedic period. The Moon, which in this period is considered to be male, reflecting the general dominance of the male gender in the Vedas, is identified with Prajāpati – the Lord of the Creatures. Prajāpati emerges in the later Vedic period as the prototype of the one supreme God of classical Hinduism. Prajāpati's claim to his unique supreme status lies in his completeness, and his completeness is denoted by his identification with the Year. The Year encompasses all of creation and its perpetual renewal in and through the fire sacrifice of which Prajāpati, as the Year, was worshipped as the embodiment. The sacred, liturgical and hence cosmic integrity of the Year, and the god who embodies it, is marked by the regular performance of sacrifices offered on the days of the new and full moon. So although Prajāpati as the year is represented as having

[1] Hillebrandt 1980: vol. 1, 216.
[2] ibid. p. 210.

720 parts which are the days and nights of the year (which Vedic Indians reckoned for convenience was 360 days long), he is, more fundamentally, divided into sixteen. These are the fifteen days of the lunar fortnight to which a 'hidden' sixteenth is added which is the source of the others. Prajāpati is already said to be sixteenfold in the Yajurveda[1] as he is in the later Śatapathabrahmaṇa[2] where he is explicitly said to possess the sixteen energies of the moon.[3] The same text even talks of a seventeenfold division,[4] which, as we shall see in the following discussion, also contended for recognition in Tantric traditions centuries later. The following passage from the Bṛhadāraṇyakopaniṣad eloquently summarizes for us the teachings concerning Prajāpati and the Moon:

> That Prajāpati is the year. He is composed of sixteen parts. His nights, truly, are fifteen parts. His sixteenth part is steadfast. He is increased and diminished by his nights alone. Having, on the new moon night, entered with that sixteenth part into everything here that has breath, he is born thence on the following morning [as the new moon]. Therefore on that night one should not cut off the breath of any breathing thing, not even of a lizard, in honor of that divinity.
>
> Verily, the person here who knows this is himself that Prajāpati with the sixteen parts who is the year. The fifteen parts are his wealth. The sixteenth part is his Self (ātman). In wealth alone [not in Self] is one increased and diminished.[5]

Although in what follows we shall concentrate on the lunar symbolism of the goddess, we should note that the Kubjikā sources do not forget the older, co-existent male counterpart. The following passage presents a form of Bhairava who governs the energies of the Moon as did his Vedic predecessor, Prajāpati. In this case, however, he is not alone. Seated in the 'primordial maṇḍala', that is, within the Point (bindu), he is enveloped by the feminine Yoni. Just as the deity is male so are the surrounding attendants, the Siddhas who embody his sixteen lunar aspects:

> Asitāṅga, who is the Lord of Kula, abides in Bhairava's power of bliss. He is in the primordial maṇḍala, surrounded by the sixteen Siddhas. The maṇḍala whose nature is the Skyfarer is located in the abode of the primordial Yoni. One obtains the fruit of the

[1] Vāj. Sam. 8,36
[2] ŚBr 7/ 2/2/17.
[3] ŚBr 9/2/2/2 – ṣoḍaśakalāḥ prajāpatiḥ
[4] ŚBr 2/2/2/3.
[5] Bṛ Up 1/5/14-15 Hume's translation.

> accomplishment of the Command by worshipping it. This is the primordial (ādi) maṇḍala, the most excellent of all. All the diverse maṇḍalas originated here.[1]

Out of the thirty lunar nights, three were considered in Vedic times, as they still are today, to be the most important. These are Amāvāsyā – the New Moon and fifteenth day of the dark fortnight, Paurṇamāsī, the Full Moon and the eighth night (aṣṭaka), the Half Moon days. According to the Brāhmaṇas, all the nights are concentrated in two nights. Those of the waxing moon are all in the Full Moon and those of the waning moon in the New Moon.[2] Purified by the gods, these are auspicious days to perform sacrifices.[3] Most important amongst them is the Darśapūrṇamāsa iṣṭi, performed on these days.[4] Dange[5] explains:

The name touches two concepts – (1) Darśa iṣṭi (sacrifice); and (2) Pūrṇamāsa iṣṭi. The first is to be performed to coincide with the New-moon day (amāvāsyā), while the other with the Full-moon day (paurṇimā). The word darśa is generally taken to indicate the day on which the moon is 'seen' only by the sun; hence it is not seen at all by the creatures on the earth. This concept corresponds to the name amāvāsyā, which word indicates 'stay' (vāsa; hence, vāsyā is the day for such stay) and 'near' (amā), the belief being that on this day the moon stays in close proximity with the sun. This concept is well explained by the ŚBr.[6] It says that in the dark half of the month the moon draws gradually near to the sun; and on this day of amāvāsyā she (he, here) is totally near the sun who swallows him and places him in himself. The next day, he is cast out by the sun, and seen as the first digit in the western sky. This is symbolic of temporary death and rebirth. Hence, for whomsoever one desires that he should be immortal (by renewal of birth), him should the other take in himself, and cast forth a fresh one.[7]

---

[1] bhairavānandaśaktisthaṁ [kh: -stha] asitāṅgaṁ [kh, g: asitāṅga] kuleśvaram |
ādimaṇḍalamadhyasthaṁ [kh: -stha] siddhaiḥ ṣoḍaśabhir vṛtam ||
ādiyonipurasthaṁ tu maṇḍalaṁ khecarātmakam |
tasya pūjāvidhānena ājñāsiddhiphalaṁ labhet ||
ādimaṇḍalakaṁ hy etat pravaraṁ [g: pravam] uttamottamam |
atrotpannāni sarvāṇi [kh: -ṇī] maṇḍalāni [kh: -ṇī] anekadhā || ŚM 19/278-281.
[2] ŚBr 11/1/7/4.
[3] TaiS 2/5/6/4-6.
[4] For summaries of these rites see Kane 1974: vol. 2, pt. 2, chapter 30 and Dange 2000: vol. 1 p. 78 ff.
[5] Dange 2000: vol. 1, 78.
[6] ŚB 1/6/4/4 ff. etāṁ rātrīṁ iha āvasati tasmād amāvāsyā nāma | Ibid. 1/6/4/5.
[7] Kāṭhakasaṁhitā 37/14

Unknown as a deity in the Ṛgveda, an entire hymn is dedicated to the goddess Amāvāsyā, the New Moon, in the Atharvaveda.[1] There she declares that the people of good deeds like Indra dwell in her. Amongst them are mentioned, perhaps for the first time, the Siddhas, the mythical precursors of Tantric adepts. She has generated the universe and gives men nourishing food (puṣṭa) and wealth (vasu).[2] The ŚB supplies a fanciful etymology of the name. On one occasion, Indra hurled his thunderbolt at the demon Vṛtra, but fearing that he had not killed him, fled in fear. Agni, who dwelt – vas – together – amā – with him on that, the darkest of nights, found him.[3] On the night of Amāvāsyā, the moon, which is identified with Soma the food of the celestial gods,[4] comes down to this world and enters the waters and plants. Thus in this sense also she 'lives together' – in this case not with the gods, but with men. The cows that eat and drink on this day produce milk imbued with wonderful, nourishing and curative lunar energy. In this way the performer of the sacrifice reproduces the moon that becomes visible in the western sky,[5] the quarter later associated with the goddess Kubjikā. The Full Moon, also not mentioned in the Ṛgveda as a deity, is praised in the hymn following the one to the New Moon in the AV.[6] There she is praised as the foremost amongst those who are to be worshipped (prathamā yajñīyā) and makes heaven accessible to those who do so and bestows inexhaustible wealth.[7] We may note finally that Amāvāsyā was already considered in the AV, as it is in the later literature, including the Tantras, to be the night in which devouring demons are abroad. It is a night especially well suited for black magical rites.[8] This is because Amāvāsyā can fulfill all desires[9] including those that are 'black' like her.

This lunar symbolism provides the images that represent both the abstract metaphysical and soteriology doctrines of the Kubjikā Tantras. They are concretely represented in many of the rituals and the Vidyās and mantras that either accompany them or are practiced independently. But before we focus our attention on what the Kubjikā Tantras teach, let us first see what the Kashmiri Śaiva masters tell us and the Tantric sources that inspired them. In this way we will not only acquire the fundamental notions at the root of this symbolism, but also be in a position to understand how it has been extended in the course of the development of the Kubjikā tradition.

---

[1] This is AV 7/79.
[2] AV 7/79/4.
[3] ŚB 1/6/4/1-5.
[4] ŚB 11/2/5/3.
[5] ŚB 1/6/4/15.
[6] AV 7/80.
[7] AV 7/80/2.
[8] KauśīBr 47/23 which refers to AV 1/16.
[9] KauśīBr 59/19 which refers to AV 7/79.

We may begin with a reference from Abhinavagupta's TĀ reminiscent of the passage we have just quoted from the Upaniṣads. The sixteenth part (kalā) of Prajāpati is now the sixteenth energy (kalā) or digit (kalā) of the Moon called Amā (derived from the word amāvāsyā). As if hidden in a dark cave, it is never visible. Secretly it feeds the waxing moon in the bright lunar fortnight, feeding it with the nectar that it releases at it wanes in the dark fortnight. This nectar Abhinava tells us is 'drunk by all the gods', the celestial 'shining ones'. One is reminded of the old Siberian shamanic belief that, as the moon decreases, the stars that progressively become more visible are born from fragments of the moon's celestial light. Inwardly, the gods are the energies of the senses and mind:

> Nectar (amṛta) in the form of the moon is divided into sixteen, then again into two. All the gods drink the other fifteen digits. The energy of the New Moon (amā) hidden in the cave (of the Heart[1] in the End of the Twelve) is the remnant that fills and satisfies the universe. The fifteen digits of the moon empty themselves out in this way one after the other. But this is not the case with the empty sixteenth (digit), which nourishes as does water and nectar.[2]

Jayaratha explains that:

> Nectar in the form of the Moon is divided into sixteen and then again into two as the fifteen digits that are perceivable in a white form and as the digit in the form of very pure water which serves as their substratum. . . . That (lunar energy) nourishes the universe as it

---

[1] The Heart in this case is not the centre in the chest. It is the Supreme Principle which is the ultimate source and end of all the others. According to Abhinava this is the Goddess. Transcendental Śiva is the thirty-sixth principle. Immanent Bhairava is the thirty-seventh. He is the 'supreme' beyond which is the Goddess who, totally free of all objectivity, is the Inexplicable – Anākhyā. She is the Heart of consciousness whose pulsation generates the waxing and waning of the breath in consonance with the unfolding and withdrawal of aspects of her nectarine energy. As Abhinava says:

> Creation and absorption rest in this way together in the vital breath (prāṇa). This (rests) in cognitive consciousness (saṁvit) and that in pure consciousness (cinmātra) free of objectivity. And pure consciousness is the goddess who is Parā and the Supreme Goddess (Parameśvarī). She is the thirty-eighth principle, the Heart that is beyond the supreme. Therefore the essence of cognitive consciousness is, by its very nature, this (perpetual) pulsation (spandamāna).
>
> TĀ 6/179cd-182ab.

* In place of tatparāparam read: parāt param.

[2] TĀ 6/95cd-97.

> includes the play of the (other) fifteen (lunar) digits. Thus this (digit called) Amā should be taught to be the New Moon (amāvāsyā) because it resides (vasanāt) together simultaneously with the fifteen (visible) digits (of the moon).

Abhinava identifies the sixteenth energy of the Moon with visarga. Visarga literally means 'emission' and has clear sexual connotations. It is also the sixteenth and last of the series of vowels. In various places throughout his exegetical works, Abhinavagupta develops the key notion of the power of emission (visargaśakti). According to the tradition Abhinava follows, the sixteen vowels are considered to be male seeds (bīja) and the thirty-four consonants are the female wombs (yoni) fertilized by them. This is the reverse of what we most commonly find in the Tantras of most schools.[1]

According to the Kubjikā Tantras, which are typical in this respect, the sixteen vowels are female. This is because they represent the sixteen energies of the female Moon. In Abhinava's set up they represent stages in the expansion of energy within transcendental Śiva consciousness which is also lunar, but the Moon in this case retains, as it were, the more ancient masculine gender. The consonants, ranging from Ka to KṢa, are the series of principles (tattva) below Śiva. The consonants are 'empowered wombs' (śāktayoni) formed by the 'condensation' of the vowels. The energy of emission extends down through them spreading out in this way through the entire series of principles below Śiva. Śiva's divine consciousness courses through the first fifteen vowels that contain all that is to be emitted through the energy of emission, which is the sixteenth vowel. The energies within Śiva develop progressively, as it were, compounding one with the other until they reach the fullness of their development in the energy of emission through which the inner contents of Śiva pour out into outer manifestation through and as the remaining principles. And so this energy is said to vitalize the universe. As Abhinavagupta explains:

> The Lord (ever united with his power of emission) emanates the universe. The power of emission (visargaśakti) extends from the Earth to Śakti and from (the consonant) Ka to KṢa. This is said to be (amā

---

[1] Speech embodied in the sound of the Vedas has been venerated as sacred since early Vedic times. The notion that the phonemes of which Speech is composed are also sacred and hence deities in themselves goes back at least to the earliest Upaṇisads, although initially there was no distinction between male and female phonemes. In the Chāndogyopaniṣad (2/22/3) we read:

> All vowels are the embodiements of Indra; all spirants are the embodiments of Prajāpati; all consonants are the embodied. If one should reproach a person for his vowels, he should tell that one: "I have taken refuge in Indra. He will answer you."

> kalā) the sixteenth energy (ṣoḍaśakalā) in the following verse: "With the Person made of consciousness, that is, Śiva who consists of the sixteen energies (kalā), the sixteenth energy is known as the 'energy of nectar' (amṛtakalā)." This is not the view of either the Sāṁkhya or the Vedānta, but only of the Śaiva scriptures (śāstra). The supreme Lord's power of emission (visargaśakti) is the seed of the highest beatitude.[1]

Abhinava devotees a great deal of space in his works to an exposition of the metaphysical status and activity of the power of emission (visarga). This insight into the dynamism of the one ultimate reality receives relatively scanty attention in the scriptural sources and so should be largely, but not entirely, credited to Abhinava's genius. It is not possible, nor necessary in this context, to present a full exposition of Abhinava's complex and profound conception; we will limit ourselves to a brief analysis of the following passage in his Mālinīvijayavārtika, where he outlines a number of its essential features and relates them to the lunar symbolism of the energies of the vowels which concern us here. He is discussing, as he often has occasion to do, the phases of the cycle of perception. He has talked about the twelve phases of the cognitive consciousness engaged in the operation of the means of knowledge and the unfolding of subjectivity symbolized by the Sun and Fire, respectively. Next he proceeds to an exposition of the sixteen phases of the cycle of cognitive consciousness in relation to the sphere of the object (meya), symbolized by the Moon. This begins with a list of these phases. Note that the 'object', which in Sanskrit is called meya, which literally means 'that which is to be known', is ultimately Śiva, the pure conscious nature. Abhinava teaches that it is 'I' consciousness and is 'that which is to be known'. Accordingly, the sixteen phases leading to the perception of any object, if correctly and fully experienced, culminate in the liberated condition of the sixteenth phase, which is equated with the sixteenth energy of the Moon, as it is in the Kubjikā Tantras and those of other schools, although from a quite different perspective. The passage is long; even so the exposition is so masterly and insightful that it amply warrants full quotation:

> First (come) 1) manifestation (prakāśa) and 2) perception (ālocana) and then 3) intention (saṁkalpa) and 4) concent (abhimati) followed after by 5) certainty (niścaya) and 6) confirmation (anudṛśa). Then come the two, 7) discernment (viveka) and 8) detachment (āsaṅgitā), (then) 9) the state of agency (kartṛtāsthā), 10) (the experience of) non-distinction (avyvaccheda) (between objects), 11) the manifestation of the common (ground of all objectivity), 12) (a state in which there is) no disturbance from the many acts of reflective > awareness (nānāvimarśāprakṣobha), 13) complete experience of (the sphere of) the object (pūrṇameyapravedana), 14) complete subjectivity (pūrṇapramātṛtva), 15) (pure cognitive) consciousness (saṁvitti), (and finally) 16) (the liberated) condition of Bhairavī (the power of consciousness) (bhairavībhāva).

[1] PTv p. 63. All references to the PTv are from Singh's edition.

>
> To the degree in which objectivity (meyamaya) is made manifest in this way, sixteenfold, that is said to be the Moon of consciousness (vijñāna) considered to be the basic state (sthiti) of the sixteen energies.[1]

Abhinava then goes on to list the first fourteen energies symbolized by the vowels he describes in detail in the third chapter of his TĀ. Then he presents in his usual brilliant manner an exposition of visarga, the sixteenth. Once the inner flow of energy within Śiva has traversed through the first fourteen transformations, Abhinava explains:

> Then, by attaining (the pure) consciousness of (Śiva's and one's own) essential nature, the basic state of Bindu (the fifteenth vowel, is established). Then within (that consciousness of Bindu), whose form is filled with the entire aggregate (of energies), the empowered emission (visarga) (takes place) that is called 'ejection' (vikṣepa) (of the energies within Śiva into the outer domain). The release (viśleṣa) of (that) emission itself (which impels the outpouring of these energies) is the seventeenth energy. The eighteenth (energy mentioned) in some places (in the scriptures) is that same (seventeenth energy that develops) due to (its) association with the (cosmogenic) arousal (prakṣobha) (of its energy).[2]
>
> This, the excellent and supreme Kaulikī energy of Akula, whose form is the absolute (anuttara) and nature supreme Bhairava, is this emission (visarga). From that this universe is born. [. . .] And that (emission) itself is God (bhagavat) whose nature shines perpetually within and is endowed with the energy of the centre, which is full of the current of all the things within (him). Beautiful with Cosmic Bliss (jagadānanda) generated from (his own) essential nature (that he has)

[1] MVV 1/880cd-884.

[2] Similarly, Abhinava says in his PTv that certain scriptures admit an eighteenth energy which, transcendent, represents the condition beyond all differentiation:

> At some places in the Mata Śāstra, etc., there is assumed to be 18th kalā or phase in the state resting on anuttara or the transcendental by means of the viśleṣa or separation of visarga, i.e. by means of the second dot, viz. the half of visarga (:). So the phenomena of the fifty phonemes or in other words the entire universe is 'one' without succession. PTv p. 69 translation by Singh, 1988: 188.

> aroused by (his) own will, he shines perpetually, beautiful with the juice (rasa) (of the aesthetic savor) of complete emission. That is the (pulsing) union (saṁghaṭṭa) of Śiva and Śakti said to be (their) love (sneha).[1]

Now Abhinava has outlined the cognitive, metaphysical and theological dimensions of the power of emission, he proceeds in his usual allusive manner to indicate how it functions in its microcosmic counterpart at the individual embodied level of consciousness.

> Once one has attained entry here into the plane of full (and perfect) emission, one (truly) practices the teaching which says that by 'kissing (lehanā) and sex (manthana) and the like (one attains the supreme state)'.[2] In this way, having laid hold of (Suṣumṇā) the (common) Channel in the Centre (between the partners identified with Śiva and Śakti), the supreme radiant energy (tejas) (of consciousness) vitalizes the entire body (of both). Then (when) (the female consort's) sexual energy (ṛtu) has been aroused from the start, one should proceed to the state (induced by orgasm), which is ejaculation (visṛṣṭi), the (spiritual) wonder of bliss. That (wonder experienced) alone is incomplete, but (when it is) complete, it is God (himself). Thus the one energy of emission (vaisargikī śakti) itself unfolds (in this way).[3]

Abhinava next goes on to describe succinctly how the energy of emission travels cyclically through all the phases marked by the progressive display of the energies of consciousness embraced in the encompassing dynamism of pure 'I' consciousness – AHAṀ:

> The same emission is aroused by the double exertion (of the two partners). The letter Ha (symbolizes) the (energy) that generates the consonants (symbolizing the sphere projected outside Śiva's consciousness). And then again Sa, by union with the Point (Ṁ) brings (all things) to rests in Absolute (A) which is the plane of one's own (essential transcendental nature) (all of which) is here considered to be the state of 'I am He' (so 'haṁbhāva).[4] [1] MVV 1/887cd-891ab, 893cd-895.

---

[2] See VB 70.
[3] MVV 1/896-899ab.
[4] MVV 1/899cd-901ab.

This then is how the energy of emission operates on two levels simultaneously: inwardly it flows through our own ultimate identity. Outwardly, it flows as cognitive consciousness and, at times, as seminal fluid. This is the sixteenth energy of the Moon that flows through the seventeenth, which releases it, and the eighteenth, which is the aroused state of the seventeenth. This way the sexual union Abhinava describes here culminates in emission. The seed is not retained. This possibility finds support in the Tantras of several schools. The product of this union, ideally between Siddhas and Yoginīs, is collected and offered as a sacred substance (dravya) to the deity by ingestion.

Let us now return to the 'inner nature' of this, the sixteenth energy, taught in Abhinavagupta's Trika. We have seen that it is the emission, that is, the dynamic, creative energy of Śiva through which he manifests as all things. United with his emissive energy that generates and absorbs the universe, and animated by it, Śiva rests in himself even as he contains in a potential form all manifestation, just as the splendid, multi-coloured peacock is present in the juices of its egg (mayūrāṇḍarasavat), or the banyan tree in its seed.[1] The highest principle is Śiva in union with his energy identified in the following passage with Speech (vāc). The fifteenth energy is the Point. This represents the perceiver, the individual living being resting in himself. The sixteenth energy represents the dynamic aspect of the Point when it moves, ascending and descending, resonant with the inner 'unstruck sound' that permeates and sustains the dynamism of the vital breath. As Abhinava says:

> This (Point) is the (Absolute) Word (śabda), the Sound (nāda) (that resounds as the vitality of life) in all living beings. Divided into the downward (movement of apāna) and the upward (movement of prāṇa), it abides (constantly in its own nature), free of action.[2]

Jayaratha explains:

> Here (in this case), the Point (is the perceiver) who intends to bring about each specific act of awareness. It is the Word of the nature of Sound. The meaning is that it manifests as being of that nature. 'Word' is that which resounds (śabdayati) that is, reflects on the universe as one with itself. (It is) reflective awareness, which is Supreme Speech. And its nature is Sound. It 'resounds' (nadati) in the sense that it manifests as the (vital) energy of the individual soul

[1] MM p. 75 and PT verse 25.
[2] TĀ 3/113cd-114ab.

> (jīva). Sound is (said to be) the energy of the New Moon (amākalā) that is the 'half of half of H' everywhere taught to be basically devoid of vowels (asvara).

'Half of half of Ha' is one of a number of terms used to denote the 'unstruck sound' of the energy of consciousness which Kashmiri Śaivism identifies with the power it possesses of self-awareness (vimarśa), that is, self-consciousness. 'Half of Ha' is visarga. Visarga is the last of the sixteen vowels. It is a hard aspirate that comes within or, much more commonly, at the end of a word. It produces an aspiration of the preceding vowel, projecting it out, as it were, into a final aspiration as, for example, the sound ah(a) or ih(a). The name of this vowel, which literally means 'emission', accords with its phonetics. It is represented graphically by two dots, written one above the other. So half of that is the Point (bindu). A purely nasal sound, it is not articulated by the air striking the vocal cords and so aptly denotes this 'unstruck sound'. The Kubjikā Tantras refer to the energy in the New Moon, (called the Half Moon in the following passage), in the same way. In the KuKh we read:

> There is an all-pervasive and subtle energy (kalā) of Unstruck Sound that rains down (nectar). Known that that is the Island of the Moon sustained by the State beyond the Fourth (turīyātīta). White as the moon, snow or the jasmine flower, (it is as fine) as a hundredth part of the tip of a hair. . . . The measure of Half of Half of Ha, (it is) located in the centre of the Half Moon.[1]

This lunar energy is roundly identified in the Kubjikā Tantras with the seventeenth one beyond the sixteenth, which is emission, as it is in the Kashmiri Śaiva texts. Abhinava repeatedly describes in various perspectives in his Tantrāloka how the phases of cognitive consciousness – subjective, perceptive and objective – arise within consciousness and through it. These three are symbolically identified with three natural 'lights', namely, Fire, Sun and Moon, respectively. Referring to the Moon in one place, Abhinava teaches that the perception of objects is a sacred activity like the offering of oblations in a fire. This is because they are imbued with the sacrality of the divine, inner Moon whose spiritual power is its seventeenth energy loaded with lunar nectar:

> Now the Moon (of objectivity), consisting of sixteen energies, shining radiantly, desiring to devour (its) emission (visarga), (its seventeenth aspect known as) the Vivifier (saṁjīvanī) emits the nectar of immortality (amṛta) into the fire of (individual) consciousness

[1] KuKh 35/35cd-38.

(bodha). That indeed is the divine nectar (that drips from) the tip of the sacrificial ladle made of the powers of will, knowledge and action (that flow through) the subtle channels (of the senses) as a libation to the goddesses of consciousness, (the sacred powers of the senses).

If the nectar of emission (visargāmṛta) is thus emitted into the fire called (individual) consciousness (bodha), the entire cosmic order is offered as oblation. For the emission of the Lord of the Absolute (anuttaranātha) is the Mistress of Kula (kulanāyikā) and its arousal (kṣobha) is the (letters of the Sanskrit alphabet) ranging from Ka to Ha whose expansion (prasara) is the sequence (paddhati) of metaphysical principles (ranging from Earth to Śakti).

The letters AṀ and AḤ are the Lord and Mistress of Kula, while the universe is said to be the supreme release (viśleṣa) of (their) emission. In this way this, the vitalizing energy (saṁjīvanī kalā) (of the Moon), consists of the intellect, vital breath, the qualities (guṇa), body and the internal and external sacrificial substances. It should be worshipped, offered as oblation and contemplated.[1]

Jayaratha explains that: 'the sixteen energies are the (vowels) beginning with the letter A as well as the senses (buddhīndriya) and the rest'. A little further ahead he quotes the following line from the Triśirobhairavatantra,[2] reminiscent of the Bṛhadāraṇyakopaniṣad quoted above.[3]

(The wise) say that there is a part (kalā) that is nectar within the Person (puruṣa) consisting of sixteen parts. Accordingly he explains that the Vivifier (saṁjīvinī) is: the seventeenth (lunar) energy (kalā) called Amā (the New Moon) that is the cause of the life (saṁjīvana) of the universe. It emits 'the nectar of immortality' which is a special vital constituent (dhātu) that nourishes the one who possesses sixteen parts.

Notice that there is some confusion here concerning the identity of this 'vivifying energy'. According to the first reference we examined from the TĀ,[4] the energy of the New Moon is the sixteenth digit. This accords with the usual astronomical reckoning of the phases of the moon. But in this passage, according to Jayarartha, the New Moon is the seventeenth digit that 'vivifies' the other sixteen.

---

[1] TĀ 5/64cd-69.
[2] The source is not identified in this place. However, in the commentary on TĀ 3/137cd-141ab, where this line is quoted, we are told there that it is from the Triśirobhairavatantra.
[3] BṛUp 1/5/14-15.
[4] TĀ 6/95cd-97.

However, he may be mistaken. Abhinava himself, as we have seen, considers the seventeenth energy to be the 'release' (viśleṣa) of emission, which is the sixteenth.[1] In the passage we are examining, what is 'released' is the emitted universe. Kashmiri Śaiva sources generally understand the sixteen energy to be the New Moon (amākalā). This is followed by the transcendent, seventeenth energy, which is merged in the Heart, the pure 'I' consciousness that is the core of reality and the core ground or 'abode' (ālaya) of all manifestation. It is within transcendental Śiva dominating all the aspects of His creative and self-delimiting power. It is the energy of consciousness (citkalā) of the absolute (anuttara) and is also called the 'energy of nectar' (amṛtakalā). Transcendent, it contains in a potential form the other energies. Swami Lakṣmanjoo explains:

> In Śaiva philosophy the world of experience is likened to the moon which has fifteen phases. There is also a sixteenth phase and this sixteenth phase is known as the sixteenth kalā. It is called amākalā that is ever-present even during the dark phase of the moon. The seventeenth kalā is even above that. The seventeenth kalā refers to the flowing out of the universal nectar of God Consciousness. It is called the seventeenth because it has nothing to do with the objective world, the cognitive world or the subjective world. It is above all these.[2]

The Triśirobhairavatantra, an important Trika scripture that has unfortunately been lost, contained a substantial passage concerning the energy of the New Moon.[3] Abhinava quotes the following from there:

> It is said in the Triśirobhairavatantra at the end of the section discussing the pervasion of power (kalā): "Therefore, the form of the seventeenth energy (kalā) is in the form of nectar. It has emerged by the activity (gati) of the (two) points that are (symbols of) one's own essential nature that is (both) supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent) (aparāpara).[4] This (power), the light of all things,[1] when

---

[1] visargasyaiva viśleṣa iti saptadaśī kalā | MVV 1/889ab.

[2] Hughes 1997: 97, n. 5.

[3] Abhinava introduces his reference from the Triśirobhairavatantra (TĀ 3/137cd) saying that he is drawing from the end of a section discussing the pervasion of power (kalā) (kalāvyāptyantacarcana). Jayaratha explains that in the section to which Abhinava refers, the Triśirobhairava discusses the 'doctrine concerning the unfolding of the essential nature of the energy called Amā' (amākhyakalāsvarūpasphārasiddhānta).

[4] Jayaratha understands 'parāpara' here to refer to the intermediate form of emission which is active between the supreme (para) and inferior (apara) form. But there is no reason, it seems to me, to introduce this distinction here, which Abhinava deals with elsewhere. A less forced interpretation is that the two points of visarga represent immanence and transcendence. This accords with an explanation Swami Laksmajoo once gave of the two points of visarga. These, he > devoid of emission (in its supreme, transcendent aspect), is the Kuṇḍalinī of Power (śāktakuṇḍalinī). (Then, in its immanent aspect, it assumes the form) of the Kuṇḍalinī of the Vital Breath (prāṇakuṇḍalinī) and (then), at the extremity of emission (visarga) (when it has been fully exhausted), (it is) the Supreme (parā) Kuṇḍalinī. (This power) is called (variously) the 'Sky of Śiva', 'the Supreme Brahman' and the 'Abode of the Self".[2]

Jayaratha explains:

> 'Consciousness initially assumes the form of the vital breath (prāṇa)'. According to this dictum, (consciousness) initially manifests in the form of vitality (prāṇarūpatā). Then, through progressive reversal (pratyāvṛttikrameṇa), it assumes the form of supreme pure consciousness, which rests in itself as Supreme Kuṇḍalinī in the innate nature, which is the final, ultimate extremity of the propensity to internalization. In this way, this, the seventeenth (lunar) energy (kalā) which is pure consciousness (saṁvinmātrā) is called 'the Sky of Śiva' and so on.

So from one point of view, the seventeenth energy is the transcendental energy of the supreme form of Kuṇḍalinī, that is, in the raised state in which she is the energy of transcendental Śiva fused within him. A passage quoted by Jayaratha in his commentary from the Triśirobhairavatantra explains that this aspect of Kuṇḍalinī is the 'Void of Consciousness (cidvyoman), the final and supreme plane beyond the gross, elemental vacuum. It is the Void of Śiva that is the supreme state, Non-being,[3] which is the pulse of the experience of Being'.[4] But we have seen that the energy of the New Moon (amākalā) is also the sixteenth one, laden with nectar. So here too there is some confusion as to exactly which is the New Moon, the sixteenth or the seventeenth digit, and how they relate to one another, despite the general distinction made between them.

In what follows we shall see that this confusion is resolved in the later Kubjikā tradition by assigning the Full Moon to the sixteenth digit and the New said, represent the paradox that while, on the one hand everything is emitted from Śiva (which is the immanent aspect of visarga), nothing is ever outside Śiva (which is the transcendent aspect of visarga).

---

[1] Read prakāśaḥ for prakāśyaṁ.

[2] TĀ 3/137cd-141ab.

[3] Concerning Non-being as the supreme state, see Dyczkowski 2004: 51ff. and below, chapter 2 p.394 ff..

[4] Comm. on TĀ 3/137cd-141ab.

Moon to the seventeenth. This appears to be a novel concept. The symbolic coupling of the two is not common, even though the symbolism of the energy of the New Moon (amākalā) is well known to most, if not virtually all Tantric traditions. Abhinavagupta in his extensive survey of the Tantras refers only to the energy of the New Moon as the source of the other lunar energies. He never refers to the Full Moon, even though both these phases of the Moon are considered to be particularly important times in the liturgical calendar. The confusion between the sixteenth and the seventeenth energies of the Moon we find in the Kashmiri Śaiva sources reflect a common ambiguity in the Tantras as a whole which has also been carried over to the earliest Kubjikā Tantras, to which we now turn.

First we must focus on a surprising fact. There are, as we have seen, numerous lunar associations evident in the goddess's myth narrated in the KMT. There are, moreover, numerous references to the common lunar association with the inhaled breath (apāna) in relation to the solar exhaled breath (prāṇa). However, there are very few references there to this inner Moon. The energy of the New Moon is mentioned in only one place where the Tantra explains that it 'transports the flux of nectar'[1] while its counterpart, the Full Moon, never appears. The same is true of the expansions of the KMT, the ṢSS and the ŚM. Although, as we shall see, developments do take place in the ṢSS and ŚM and most of the ingredients of the later conception are found in these sources, we do not find the crucial one, namely, the identification of the inner form of the goddess with the Moon.

Let us see how the way is paved in these sources for the later conception, which came to be a major feature of the Kubjikā tradition. An important early influence on the cult of the goddess Kubjikā that contributed to her lunar associations came from the cult of Svacchandabhairava, otherwise called Aghora. Aghora is in various contexts identified as Kubjikā's consort. Moreover, his lunar character is clearly evident. Thus he is said to have the form of the moon and one should think him in this form in the calyx of the lotus of the heart.[2] Aghora is, amongst other things, a medicine god. His consort, an embodiment of his curative powers, is named appropriately Vyādhibhakṣiṇī – 'Disease Eater'. This attribute of the god and his consort is derived from their lunar character which is more clearly evident in another form of Śiva, Mṛtyuñjaya, from which both have drawn. Mṛtyuñjaya, otherwise known as Amṛteśvara (lit. 'the Lord of Nectar' which is also a name of the moon), is white and pours jars of lunar nectar onto himself. His close association with the moon, the lord of medicinal herbs, is evident in the prescription that one should recite Mrtyuñjaya's mantra[3] thinking the soul

---

[1] amā nāma parā sūkṣmā kalā cāmṛtavāhinī KMT 25/128cd. The passage to which this line belongs (i.e. KMT 25/128-130ab) is reproduced in our text as KuKh 14/105cd-106.
[2] KMT 9/10.
[3] This is: OṀ JŪṀ SAḤ

(pudgalātmā) to be immersed in the nectar of the rising moon.[1] Similarly, Aghora is white 'the colour of cow's milk, like snow, jasmine or the moon'.[2] While the practice described in this passage from the KMT is typical of those associated with Mṛtyuñjaya and so implies Aghora's identity with him, Aghora is also explicitly identified him Kujeśvara, the goddess's consort who thus inherits their strong lunar character:[3]

> While he eats, the adept should think that the mantra he has deposited with all its limbs (onto the body) and is established in Bhairava's form, is in (his) plate. As he eats, he should contemplate the full moon (and so) he eats the nectar that is in the Full Moon, encapsulated above and below (by this mantra). (Doing this) the adept may wander around constantly and gets all that is most excellent and the success (siddhi) he desires, having placed in (his) heart Kujeśvara who is in the middle of the lunar orb, sanctified with freedom (svacchandagati). He should think (of him) as having entered that (Moon) and, the end of the end, supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent), think (how he and the god are) mutually (related) until he reaches the Cavity of Brahmā.[4]

Similarly elsewhere in the KMT we read:

> One should first energize (mantrya) the body well purified with Aghora (mantra). He can eat without fear, for that (mantra turns all he eats into) nectar. Having invoked (the deity) of a (particular) direction, he should go (in that direction) placing the left foot forward first. He should wander even established in the middle of the Moon of both. When eating and (lying) in bed, he is always established in the middle of the Moon. O best of ladies, she should always be mounted on the Moon.[5]

Svacchandabhairava has the same five faces as Sadāśiva. The upper face is that of Īśāna which is pure white. This is the face of emanation. It fills the entire universe with its moonrays and rains nectar.[6] It is but natural that the lunar

---

[1] KMT 23/79-82.
[2] ŚM 11/50cd.
[3] We have seen that in the KRU (9/22cd-24ab, quoted above p. 141) the goddess is explicitly said to be Amṛteśvara's consort.
[4] KMT 8/101-105ab.
[5] KMT 9/75cd-78ab.
[6] īśānam [kh: īśānām] ūrdhvavaktraṁ [k: pūrva-] tu [g: ca] sṛṣṭirūpaṁ [g: śṛ-] parāparam | attributes of the god Aghora be also found in the goddess, his consort who is by implication also Kubjikā. This is apparent in the following rite described in the ŚM. After meditating on Svacchandabhairava (i.e. Aghora) in the centre, the adept should meditate on the thirty-two Dūtīs who embody the syllables of Aghora's mantra and worships them mentally with food, flowers and the rest. Then:

> In the middle he should think of (the goddess) who is oozing nectar in all directions. He whose body has been satisfied by eating (that nectar) becomes the cosmic man (viraja). When he has practiced this mental Yoga (sufficiently) and meditated on (this) perfectly full maṇḍala called Aghora, who is not successful? He himself becomes (Svacchandabhairava) the Protector of the Eight (aṣṭakapāla) who pervades all the principles of existence. He himself becomes of the nature of the Moon and should be contemplated in the calyx (of the lotus of the Heart).[1]

We have already noticed that in Kashmiri Śaiva sources an association is made between the New Moon and Unstruck Sound. This link, which is common to other Tantric traditions, is also, as we shall see, firmly established in the later Kubjikā sources. Although no mention is made of this in the KMT, the ground is prepared by the identification we commonly find there between the goddess and Kuṇḍalinī, who is the essence of the vital breath on the one hand and the Unstruck Sound on the other. The latter is the subtle, inner counterpart and source of the 'struck' sound of gross breathing, just as Kuṇḍalinī is its vital essence. We see these identifications in the following passage in a hymn to the goddess found in the penultimate chapter of the KMT. This hymn, which may not be a part of the earliest redactions of the KMT, also contains the germs of the later complex formulations concerning the New Moon, here called the Half Moon. The KMT is well acquainted with the Half Moon that: 'oozes the divine nectar of the entire universe in order to flood it completely, and which is intent on emission himakundendusaṁkāśaṁ [kh: -kuṇḍendu-] śuddhasphaṭikanirmalam ||

---

āpyāyantaṁ [kh: āpyāyanaṁ] jagat sarvaṁ candrāṁśunikareṇa [kh: -kiraṇena] tu |
varṣantaṁ sumahaughena [kh: samaho-; g: sumaho-] dhārāṁ [k kh g: dhārā] pīyuṣasannibhām [k, kh: -bhaṁ; g: peyūṣasaṁnnibhaṁ] || "SM 12/100-101

[1] sravantīṁ [kh: śravaṁtīṁ; g: sravaṁtī] cintayen madhye [kh: -dhya] amṛtaṁ sarvatomukham |
tenāpyāyitadehas [g: tena vyāpitadehes] tu bhakṣaṇād [kh: tatkṣaṇād; g: taścakṣulod] virajo bhavet ||
yāgaṁ [g: yogaṁ] tu mānasaṁ kṛtvā kasya siddhir na [g: siddhiḥ kalpena] jāyate |
saṁpūrṇamaṇḍalaṁ dhyātvā aghoraṁ nāmanāmataḥ [kh: -ka] ||
so 'ṣṭakapālapravaras [kh g: sāṣṭā- -raṁ] tattvavyāpī [kh g: -vyāpi] nirantaraḥ [kh: niraṁjanaṁ; g: -raṁ] |
sa eva candrarūpī syāt karṇikāyāṁ vicintayet || ŚM 12/114-116.

(visarga)'.[1] But, although it appears at the end of a series of states as one of the polarities, along with the Sun, it is not associated directly with the goddess:

> I salute you O Mahāmāyā, of subtle body, both supreme and inferior, solitary, pure, Bindumālinī, called Sound. You are born from the bodiless, unmoving one! Support of the universe! Great Kuṇḍalinī! Nityā established in the centre of the Gander (Haṁsa – the Unstruck Sound)! Established in the centre of the Sun, Moon and Fire! All – pervasive! Supreme and inferior! Established in the form of the letter OṀ! Support of the half of the half of Ha! A hundred times subtler than the tip of a hair! Endless, undecaying and imperishable! Support of the energy of half of Ha! Established on the stamens of the lotus! Mahāmāyā called 'empowered' (sakalā)! Bestower of boons, worshipped by the world! Established in each single channel (nāḍī)! Who pierces through every vital point (marma)! [. . .]
>
> Located in the middle of Iḍā and Piṅgalā, shaped (like) a lotus fibre! You are in the centre of the Point, O goddess! Crooked One! Half Moon! You look like a Snow Flake and reside at the End of the Twelve (finger space)! You are called Umā! Gaurī, you are in the Heart! You shine with the brilliance of twelve suns! Void! You reside within the Void! You are called the Gander and support the vital breath![2]

The goddess in the Liṅga (i.e. 'in the centre of the Point . . . at the End of the Twelve') is Mālinī who is similarly said to be the Unstruck, silent Sound of consciousness. As such she is said to be 'asvarā' lit. 'she who is without vowels'.[3] This is the supreme form of Kuṇḍalinī, rising and descending like a fine straight line from the centre of her own matrix of energies, the Triangle in the End of the Twelve which is 'Śiva's seat':

> First of all, (one should recall) the Supreme Goddess (Parā). Beautiful and blissful (cārunanditā), she is thin and (straight like) a stick (daṇḍinī). She is Mahāmāyā, the silent (sound of consciousness, (svarahīnā), who burns in Śiva's seat. She is straight and clear.

---

[1] KMT 11/86.

[2] KMT 24/114-118, 121-123ab.

[3] Although not an unusual term in other traditions, it appears only twice in the KuKh (in 5/76cd-77ab and 17/24) and hardly anywhere else in the Kubjikā literature. In the following reference the goddess is said to be svarahīnā which means the same.

> Recollect her, she who is stamped (with the triangular form of) the Yoni, along with the great current (of bliss) (mahaugha).[1]

Another term is anackā (lit. '(she who) is without ac'). Ac in the nomenclature of Pāṇini's grammar denotes the vowels. So like asvarā it denotes a kind of sound that, devoid of vowels, cannot be articulated. This unarticulated or 'unstruck' (anāhata) sound is the sonic analogue of the photic vision of deity. Deity as this sacred sound is 'heard' by advanced yogis just as it is 'seen' as Divine Light. The feminine form of the word is not intrinsic. The male form asvara is also attested with reference to Bhairava.[2] Similarly, the term anackā may also be masculine; indeed, this is its most common form. Another term for Unstruck Sound, which relates it especially to the sound of the movement of the breath, is haṁsa that also occasionally appears in the feminine form haṁsī or haṁsā. The masculine forms denote Unstruck Sound; the feminine, its energy. Within the Liṅga, the energy of the goddess who is the Unstruck Sound rests in a 'silent' potential form. As such she is Mālinī in which the letters are not arranged systematically according to phonemic principles into vowels and then consonants as they are in her Mātṛkā form. Within Mālinī, the vowels and consonants, symbolizing the opposites, are mixed together, that is, conjoined in a state of fertile potential. The goddess within the Liṅga is absorbed in silent contemplation, like a Yoginī in a cave. She herself is the embodiment of her 'silence'.[3] When she emerges out of the Liṅga, she is the same silent source of all cosmogenic sound and speech. But then she actively impels the stream of sound, which is represented by the normal order of the alphabet, through which all that can be named is generated and known.[4]

The flow of the goddess's energy in the centre of the Yoni-cum-Liṅga fills it with bliss. In the centre of the Yoni the goddess is the source of her own bliss and, as the triangular Yoni itself, she receives it. In the centre she shines as formless Divine Light, symbolized by the Point (bindu) and radiates as Divine Sound. Moving out from the centre to the edges of the Yoni, to then return to the centre, she is the blissful vibration of divine Sound (nāda, asvarā). These are the forms in which elevated adepts 'see' and 'hear' her within their own yogic body and the Liṅga.

---

[1] KuKh 13/61cd-62

[2] It occurs, for example, in a hymn addressed to Bhairava: I salute you, O all pervasive one, you who are devoid of vowels and very tranquil.

asvarāya [g: aśvarāya; ṅ: asverāya] suśāntāya [g: stu śāṁtāya; ṅ: susānnāya] sarvavyāpi namo 'stu te | KuKauM 17/2ab.

[3] See note to KuKh 5/1.

[4] KuKh 17/24.

But just as Divine Light is not an object to be 'seen', Unstruck Sound is not an object of hearing. Both are aspects of a direct experience of the deity that transcend the sphere of manifestation and the distinction between subject and object. This sound 'without vowels' is an aspect of the goddess in her supreme, undifferentiated (niṣkala) and unmanifest form:

> Unmanifest, the Great Void, endowed with the plane of the Nectar of the Void, the radiant energy which is Śiva and Śakti, she is Śavarī, the abode of (unmanifest speech) without vowels (asvarālaya).[1]

The supreme form (parāmūrti) of the goddess is not amongst her visualized forms (dhyānamūrti); rather, it is her essential, abstract, metaphysical essence. Transcending the conflict of duality, she is both the opposites. She is both 'with vowels' and 'without vowels', that is, both manifest and unmanifest:

> Śāmbhavī, the supreme (goddess) Khañjī is ever active (nityoditā) and without defect. Disembodied (akāyā), she is both devoid (of manifestation) and full (of it). She is (both) (articulate speech) with vowels (sasvarā) and (unmanifest speech) without vowels (svaravarjitā). Unmanifest (nirābhāsā), formless, without (phenomenally definable) appearance (nirlakṣā) and in the field of (that) appearance (lakṣagocarā). O Lord of the gods, she who is auspicious and supreme is attained by the teacher's grace (prasāda). The crooked (Kuṇḍalinī), the milch cow of passion, she is the supreme energy who oozes (nectar). She is light, (perfectly white like) cow's milk, snow and a jasmine flower and, full of the supreme nectar, she fills the triple world along with all that moves and is immobile. O sinless one, (she is) the Transmental who abides having pervaded the universe with the force of the mind (manovega).[2]

---

[1] nirābhāsaṁ [g: -bhāśaṁ] mahāvyoma [g: -vyomaṁ] vyomāmṛtapadānvitam [g: vyamā-] ||
śivaśaktyātmakaṁ tejaṁ śavarī asvarālayam | YKh (1) (MS G) 35/22cd-23ab.

[2] śāmbhavī [sarve: -vā] paramā khañjī nityoditā [k, kh, gh: dityaudita; ṅ: -dita] anāmayā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: manāmayā] ||
akāyā hīnapūrṇā [ṅ: pūrṇahīnā] sā sasvarā [kh: saśvarā; gh: nasvarā] svaravarjitā |
*nirābhāsā nirākārā nirlakṣā [ṅ: nirlajjā] lakṣagocarā [ṅ: -goca ] ||
guruprasādād [k, kh, gh: -do] deveśa labhyate sā parā śubhā [k, kh, gh: śubhāṁ] |
anaṅgadhenukuṭilā [ṅ: anantavai tu kuṭilā] sravantī [sarve: śra-] paramā kalā ||
gokṣīrahimakundābhā [ṅ: -kundāṁbhā] paramāmṛtanirbharā [k, gh: -niptarā; kh: -nirptarā] |
*pūrayantī jagat [k, kh, gh: tsagat] sarvaṁ [gh: sarva] trailokyaṁ [k, kh, gh: triloṣṭaṁ] sacarācaram [kh: sa * racaraṁ]* ||
*unmanā manavegena [k: manu-; kh: -vege ] vyāpya viśvaṁ sthitānagha | YKh (1) 19/59cd-63ab.

The complex dynamism between these polarities manifest / unmanifest, 'with vowels' / 'without vowels', Sun / Moon, Full Moon / New Moon etc, which are described extensively in varied terms in the later Kubjikā Tantras, is not explicitly expounded in the KMT. However as one would expect, the association between the breath, Kuṇḍalinī (i.e. the vital energy within Suṣumṇā) and lunar nectar is well known. In the following rare reference in the KMT these elements combine. Again, although lunar symbolism is implied, it is not explicit:

> (Kuṇḍalinī) in her straight form (ṛjvī) is in the little-known (aprasiddha) place. Once she has filled the lake of nectar in the end of the sixteen (vowels) (ṣoḍaśānta), she who is the living being (jīvarūpiṇī) fills everything right up to the living being. In the form of the well-known senses (akṣa), she measures out time. She acts within the world of transmigratory existence and regulates the path to liberation. She is endowed with the 21,600 (breaths) enumerated in relation to the fettered soul in accord with the (Yogic) teaching concerning night and day.[1]

In this passage the goddess identified with Kuṇḍalinī is understood to be the vital breath which manifests concretely in the 21,600 times a person breaths every twenty-four hours. The 'lake of nectar' is located in the End of the Twelve above the head. Located there are the sixteen vowels, which in the latter Kubjikā sources and generally in the Tantras of other schools, symbolize the digits of the Moon. Once straightened and active, Kuṇḍalinī, the energy of the vital breath, which is the lunar breath of inhalation (apāna), having filled these sixteen travels down the body filling it with vitality 'up to the living being (jīva)', which is Kuṇḍalinī in her lower form within the body. In the light of our enquiry we notice

---

[1] KMT 18/116cd-119ab = ṢSS 28/27cd-30ab. The commentary on these lines in the ṢSS explains that:

> Thus she is the one at the 'end of the sixteen', that is, she is at the end of the sixteen vowels. The meaning is that she is the supreme (energy) of Unstruck Sound (anacka) and is without (phonemic) measure (nirmātrā). Here itself she is the living being because (she) fills (the body).

iti ṣoḍaśāntā [k kh: -ntāḥ] ṣoḍaśasvarāntā [k kh: – ntāḥ] anackasya [kh: anackāsya] parā nirmātrarūpiṇīty arthaḥ || atraiva jīvarūpiṇī āpūrakatvāt ||

The doctrines concerning projections of time spans into the breathing cycle is the 'teaching concerning night and day'. This topic, treated by many major Tantric systems, is the subject of chapter six of the TĀ. The night in this case is the inhalation of apāna and the day the exhalation of prāṇa.

that this process is essentially the same as the one ascribed in the later Kubjikā Tantras to the energies of the New and Full Moon.

In another rare reference in the KMT the goddess is praised in the Mahāmāyāstava: 'O goddess! you bind and liberate (or, you liberate from bondage) and reside at the End of the Sixteen!'[1] So clearly, this 'place' enjoyed a special prestige as the abode of the goddess already in the KMT. Moreover, the following passage from the KMT shows that it knew the practice of collecting the lunar nectar that drips from the uvula, but in a more basic, unsophisticated form as yet not over-coded with the complex lunar symbolism of the later texts:

> First one must contract the anus (mūlacakra, lit. root wheel) and, established in the sexual centre (janmastha), hold (dhārayet) (the breath there) for a moment. Having contracted (the muscles in the genitals) when union (saṁghaṭṭa) (of the breaths) takes place (at the extremity of the descent of apāna), break through the uvula (with the energy of the vital breath rising in the centre). Satisfied with the nectar (that drips from the) uvula, he certainly conquers death. O fair lady, by this (means) through repeated practice he should get rid of high fever and the surprising paleness (of severe illness). Placing the tongue in the emptiness (of the oral cavity raised in such a way as to have) no support, the teeth and lips must not touch. Abandoning the contact (between) them, he should, without a doubt, conquer death.[2]

Several configurations of sixteen energies are described in the KMT most of which are associated with lunar nectar. An example is one of a series of five Wheels called the Wheel of the Female Attendants (dūtīcakra). The following are relevant excerpts of the description of this Wheel found in the KMT. It is located in the cosmic waters which, shaped like the crescent moon, are evidently lunar fluid – the nectar out of which the attendants of the goddess emerge:

> On all sides of the shell of Brahmā's Egg [i.e. the universe], globular and extended over a thousand koṭis [of yojanas], is the great site of Viṣṇu in the waters. It has the pointed form of the crescent [moon] and abounds in ships and boats. [There is also a lotus] [. . .] where the Dūtīs amuse themselves with manifold pleasures by their innate temperament, and where this eminent Highest Spirit [i.e. Viṣṇu] continuously delights, that place is called supreme, where the Dūtīs rise out of amṛta [lunar nectar]. When aroused at the proper time and > stimulated, they drop the amṛta (onto the Wheel of Brahmā on the crown of the head) [. . .] Residing together with the Dūtīs on the great sixteen-petalled lotus which floats on heavenly amṛta [lunar nectar], He [i.e. Ananta] causes Brahmā's abode to flourish.[1]

[1] KMT 24/129ab.
[2] KMT 23/158cd-162ab.

The situation in the ṢSS and ŚM, which are closely related to the KMT, is practically the same. But note an important variant view in these texts with respect to the KuKh is that the energy of the New Moon is the sixteenth digit of the Moon, not the seventeenth. This is the older view we find also in earlier pre-Tantric sources as, for example in the passage from the Bṛhadaraṇyakopaniṣad quoted above. This is how it appears in a list of names of the sixteen digits of the moon found in the ŚM.[2] These along with another thirty-two energies, presumably those of the syllables of the goddess's Vidyā, are said to be full to overflowing with lunar nectar:

> (These energies) are (white) like the foam of a stream of milk and their light is like the lustre of the moon. They rain down in a great stream onto the body with drops that are (like) streams of milk. One should think that the Self is there in middle (of the body) and its colour is (white like) milk. O goddess, this is the Wheel of the Moon.[3]

Another configuration of sixteen energies implicitly associated with the Moon in the KMT is that of the Wheel of Purity (viśuddhicakra). Located in the throat of the subtle body, it is considered to be the lower counterpart within the body of the End of the Sixteen outside it. As the KMT says:

> (The Wheel of) Purity (viśuddhi) is the mother of awakened consciousness (bodha). It is the End of the Sixteen above (the head) and below (in the throat).[4]

---

[1] KMT 14/62-67, translated by Heilijgers-Seelen (1994: 239-240) to whom the reader is referred for details.

[2] amā vai ṣoḍaśī kalā ŚM 11/164d.

[3] kṣīradhāraughaphenābhā [k: -dhārodyataphenā] jyotsnādyutisamaprabhāḥ [k kh g: -prabhā] || varṣantyas tāḥ [k: varṣatyante; kh g: varṣantyete] mahaughena [g: mahoghena] kṣīraughair vipruṣais [k: kṣīrādyair vipruṣais-; kh: kṣīrorghai vipluṣais-; g: -vipraṣais-] tanum | tatra madhye sthitātmānaṁ [k kh g: madhya sthitaścātmā] kṣīrābhaṁ ca vicintayet || somacakram idaṁ devi [g: devī] . . . | ŚM 11/168cd-170a.

[4] KMT 11/17ab.

More explicitly related to the Moon in the KRU, there the Wheel of Purity (viśuddhicakra) is clearly said to contain the sixteen digits of the moon 'born from nectar.'[1] Their names are listed in chapter ten of the KRU. According to the manuscripts consulted, the sixteenth and last digit there is called Umā. But this may be a mistake for Amā – the New Moon (amākalā). It is hard to say, as the names listed there are different from the ones listed in the ŚM. But even if this emendation is inappropriate, the KRU itself establishes, as we have seen, the connection for us between Umā, Śiva's wife and Dakṣa's daughter, and the digit of the New Moon which it says is the form she assumed after giving up her body.[2]

The experience of Nectar dripping down from the seat of the Moon is considered so important in the KuKh that it equated with the goddess in her liquid, lunar form as the Command that flows down in streams of nectar to consecrate the god. All the KMT says is that the god is empowered by the goddess's gaze. The KuKh adds that the goddess's gaze is the occasion for this flux of lunar fluid.[3] There is very little about this Lunar Yoga in the KRU also, which can be taken to be another indication of its relatively early date. But in the following verse from the Ādisūtra, that is, chapter thirteen of the KRU, we find a reference to the inner Moon. We are told that it is above the Cavity of Brahmā but not exactly where. In the same vague terms the KRU says that the lunar nectar is within 'the moonlight' (candrikā) and this, according to the KuKh,[4] is the form of the goddess Amā. Emerging from the body of the god, the goddess, free of impurity (amala) is divine, radiant (sphurat) awakened consciousness (avabodha).[5] The KRU continues:

> After that, O Kuṇḍalī, (you enter) the plane (pada) of the Moon that floods (the world) with divine nectar and is contained in the centre of (the rays of) moonlight (candrikā). (Then) once attained the Cavity of Brahmā, you are on the path below that and (enter the centre) called Lambikā (the glottis) and the Drop (of the Wheel of the Command). After the Drop, you enter into (the Wheels of) Purity (viśuddhi), the Heart, the City of Gems (maṇipura) and the Self-supported (svādhiṣṭhāna), which is said to be born of the support of the Root (centre) (kandanālambaja). (Thus,) residing on the plane

---

[1] viśuddhau ṣoḍaśākhyātāḥ [g: ṣoḍāśā-] kalā hy amṛtasaṁbhavāḥ | KRU 8/8ab.
[2] See KRU 9/22cd-24ab quoted above p. 141.
[3] see KuKh 5/61cd-64ab.
[4] See KuKh 3/116.
[5] divyāvabodhasphuradamalamahāratnasandohamātā [kh: -sphudamala-; g: divyā ca vodhasphur-adasalamahā-] * * || KRU 13/4d.

> (where the energies of the body are) churned (mathanapada), (you) have gone forth.[1]

In the following passage[2] the ṢSS virtually bridges the gap between the scant presentation in the KMT and the later teachings. Here we notice that an advance in the doctrine regarding the inner Moon has taken place in the ṢSS, which, in retrospect, can be said to be a precursor of the later developments. For this reason, although long, the passage is worth quoting in full, as are parts of the commentary:

> Mālinī of the Void (vyoman) abides (both) as one and as many divisions (vibhāga). The End of the Twelve is the Void which (is the abode of Mālinī that, as) the Self, is the nectar (Mālinī showers down below). (Thus Mālinī) resides in the midst of the ocean of nectar and, residing in the movement (cāra) (of the vital breath), she is the one who impels (its) motion (cāravāhinī). 'Movement' is said to be the activity of the vital breath (prāṇagati). Thus she who, residing there, impels (it, is said to be) the one who impels (its) motion (cāravāhinī).
>
> Commentary: (The goddess) abides in many states of being up to the location of the void (vyoman) of the End of the Twelve, within which she causes nectar to fall if she is there in the form of the Self. Thus she 'resides in the midst of the ocean of nectar'. What is nectar? It is the juice of the Void (vyomarasa). Thus she is Mālinī of the Void. She abides (there) having pervaded the Void. What does she do there? How does she abide? 'Established in movement (cāra), she is the one who impels (its) motion'. She abides in the movement and she transports it.
>
> The form she bears is desire and, tranquil, (she) is you, Kubjinī the mother of Kula. Mantras originate from that and so her nature is

---

[1] *paścād divyāmṛtaughaplavanaśaśipade [k kh: -mṛtogha; kh: -plava * śaśipade]* candrikāmadhyagarbhe [g: -garbha] saṁprāptā brahmarandhre tadadhapathagatā [g: tadanupa-] lambikākhye [kh: ram-] ca bindoḥ [kh g: vindau] | bindoḥ [k: missing] paścād viśuddhau hṛdayamaṇipure kandanālāmbujākhye [k kh: -nālāṁvajākhye; g: -khya] svādhiṣṭhāne [g: -dhisthāne] niviṣṭā [g: -ṣṭo] mathanapadagatā kuṇḍalī [k kh: kuṇḍali] tvaṁ prayātā || KRU 13/5.

[2] The passage is part of ṢSS 28/41cd-62 which is inserted between the equivalent of chapter 18 and 19 of the KMT.

desire. And as her form is (coiled like an) earring (kuṇḍalī), she is said to be Kubjinī ('bent over'). She is the goddess with two arms and one face, or with many arms and faces. She should be thought of at all times as being in accord with the form of passion (kāmākāra). Established in movement, she is in the midst of movement. The mistress of motion (caleśvarī), her body is movement. Motion is said to be the wind. She is said to be its mistress.

This is the Moon (candrā)[1] of the Womb of the Moon, the moonlight of the plane of the Doomsday Fire (vāḍavīpada). Fire is within the Womb of the Moon. She has arisen out of the middle of that (Fire). That is the sacred seat and she is in the middle of it possessing the Womb of the Moon. O mistress of the gods, the Womb of the Moon is said to be the left channel. The bestower of every desire and located in the midst of the sixteen-spoked (Wheel), she should be worshipped and fulfils all desires (artha).

Commentary: That is the energy of the New Moon (amākalā) and is called the sacred seat of the Moon. If the goddess is conceived to be the Moon, she is then in the form of the left channel, emanation, the entry (of the breath), and the north. How is she when she is otherwise? She is 'located in the midst of the sixteen-spoked (Wheel)'. The sixteen vowels are the energies of the Moon. Thus, anackā, the sixteenth energy, is Kubjinī, in the form of Kuṇḍalinī. This is the meaning.[2]

---

[1] Note the feminine form of this normal masculine noun.

[2] ekānekavibhāgena saṁsthitā vyomamālinī ||
dvādaśāntaṁ bhaved vyoma [k kh: vyomaṁ] yadātmā amṛtaṁ bhavet |
amṛtāmbhodhimadhyasthā cārasthā cāravāhinī ||
cāraṁ prāṇagatiḥ proktas tatrasthā vahate tu yā |
cārasthā tena sā proktā vahate cāravāhinī || ṢSS 28/42cd-44.

(vyākhyā): *nānābhāvena sthitā [k kh: -tāṁ] yāvad [kh: yāva] dvādaśāntavyomasthāne tatra ātmarūpatayā tāvad [k kh: yadā] amṛtasravaṇaṁ [k kh: – śravaṇaṁ] karoti || [kh: + atra eva |] ata eva amṛtāmbudhimadhyasthā || amṛtaṁ kiṁ vyomarasam ata eva vyomamālinī || vyoma vyāpya tiṣṭhati || tatra kiṁ karoti || kathaṁ tiṣṭhati || cārasthā [k: cārā ] cāravāhinī tathā cāre tiṣṭhati cāraṁ vāhayati ||

icchārūpadharī śāntā kubjinī tvaṁ kulāmbikā |
yasmān mantrāḥ samutpannā icchārūpā tu [k: tuṁ] tena sā ||
kuṇḍalyākārarūpeṇa kubjinī tena sā smṛtā |
dvibhujaikamukhā devī athānekabhujānanā [k kh: āṣā-] ||
cintanīyā sadā kālaṁ kāmākārānurūpataḥ [k kh: kāma] |
cārasthā cāramadhyasthā cāradehā careśvarī ||

The commentator is here referring to a symbolic projection of the movement of the breath commonly found in all the traditions that teach the use of the breathing as a support for meditation. The basic features of this symbolism are outlined for us elsewhere by the commentator:

> There are fifteen digits beginning from the first day of the dark fortnight up to the New Moon. '(The Moon) increases until it is full. (The wise) know that the New Moon is decay', that is, withdrawal – this is the meaning. 'Beginning with the lotus of the heart and ending with Power', that is, the End of the Twelve. This is the movement of the Sun of exhalation (prāṇa) on the right. Entry takes place on the left and is the current of the Moon, which is inhalation (apāna). (Now comes) the division of the lunar days (tithi). There are fifteen lunar days, beginning with the first day of the bright fortnight up to the Full Moon. There is increase until (the Moon) is full and is (in the phase of) emanation. This is the meaning. Thus the left is the (side of) the movement of the Moon of inhalation (apāna) beginning with Power up to the Lotus of the Heart. This is the meaning.[1]

Clearly the commentator distinguishes between the lunar current of the breath of inhalation (apāna) and the inner breathing of Kuṇḍalinī's rise and descent along the central channel. He also distinguishes between the two breaths. He resolves the problem that naturally arises as to the relationship between the lunar

---

caro [k: calo] vāyuḥ samākhyātas tasya sā īśvarī smṛtā |
candragarbhasya candreyaṁ vāḍavīpadacandrikā ||
candragarbhe sthito hy agnis tasya madhyāt samutthitā |
tat pīṭhaṁ tasya madhyasthā candragarbhasamanvitā ||
candragarbhaṁ ca deveśi vāmanāḍī prakīrtitā |
ṣoḍaśārakamadhyasthā pūjyā sarvārthadāyikā || ibid. 28/45-50.

(vyākhyā) tad eva amākalā candrapīṭham ucyate || yadā devyā [k kh: devyaś] candratvena [k kh: -tve] kalpitā tadā vāmanāḍīrūpā sṛṣṭirūpā praveśarūpā uttararūpā ca || sā anyā ca kīdṛśī || ṣoḍaśārakamadhyasthā [k: ṣoḍaśārdhaka-; kh: ṣoḍaśārddhaka-] iti || ṣoḍaśasvarās ta eva [k kh: -rāḥ tad eva] candrakalāḥ || tasmāt ṣoḍaśī [k kh: ṣoḍaśamī] anackakalā kubjinī kuṇḍalinīrūpā ity arthaḥ || breath of apāna and the one that travels through the central channel by simply identifying them as two modalities of the same breath. One wonders why this tradition does not posit the existence of a third form of the breath other traditions call udāna – the 'rising' breath. The reason for this appears to be the strong emphasis placed on the lunar qualities of the central upward moving breath.

[1] kṛṣṇapratipadārabhya amāvāsyāṁ [k kh: -syaṁ] yāvat tithayaḥ pañcadaśa [k: -śaḥ + 15] | amāvāsyā kṣayaṁ viduḥ saṁhāram ity arthaḥ [kh: ādi] | iti hṛtpadmād ārabhya śaktyantaṁ dvādaśāntam iti dakṣiṇe [k kh: dakṣiṇa] prāṇasūryacāram | vāmapade [k: -daṁ; kh: -pādaṁ] yathā candrapravāhaṁ praveśam apānabhūtam [kh: -aparānabhūtaṁ] | tithivibhāgaḥ | śuklapratipadārabhya pūrṇimā yāvat tithayaḥ pañcadaśa [k: -śaḥ + 15] | *vṛddhiḥ [k: vṛddhi] syād [kh: syādā] yāvad āpūrṇā [kh: * vadāpūrṇṇā] sṛṣṭir [kh: sṛṣṭim] ity arthaḥ* | *iti śaktyārabhya [k: śaktyādārabhya; kh: śaktyāṁtārabhya] hṛtpadmaṁ yāvat vāmaṁ [kh: -ma] apānacandracāram ity arthaḥ [kh: apānacandra * * mityarthaḥ]* | Comm. on ṢSS 10/50ab.

The ŚM knows nothing of the Full Moon in this context. Indeed, there is only one original reference in the ŚM to the New Moon and that is just its name in a list of the names of the digits of the moon.[1] Nonetheless, like the ṢSS, the ŚM also knows about this process, although it is not explicitly linked to the dynamism of the inner Moon. In the following passage it is presented in the context of a common procedure taught in some form by most, if not all, major Tantric traditions as a means to purify the gross elements (bhūtaśuddhi) that constitute the body.

> Then, O goddess, one should prepare the inner (mental) organ. Having exhaled the breath and then having drawn it in again into one's own body, retain it. Once (it has) entered the Root Wheel, it should be checked below and above. (Kuṇḍalinī, the energy in the body) whose form is that of a sleeping snake and (which is) shaped (round like) an earring, awakes and moves quickly following the path of the Channel of Brahmā (brahmānāḍī). She moves by the Path of Brahmā (and advances) progressively piercing through the body (liṅgabhedakrameṇa) and, having penetrated into the Supreme Place, that is, the supreme limit (parāntika) at the end of the Transmental, (the adept experiences) the oneness of Śiva and Śakti which is the 'churning' that is like wonder. The one who has entered within the Circle of Principles by means of the union (yoga) of 'churning' and 'that which is churned' (mathyamanthānayogena) neither hears, sees nor exhales at any time. He should lead (the breath) back again by that very path into the middle of the heart. He should expand it out by means of the upper channel. Purification takes place in the middle of the Secret Place (guhya) (the Yoni). He should check the inhaled breath (apāna). He should check the exhaled breath (prāṇa) there. By checking (the two breaths, Kuṇḍalinī) straightens and should enter the Circle of the Moon. The Supreme Energy (kalā), whose form is (subtle and straight) like a spider's thread, rains down (nectar). Thus, one should recollect that the Self is flooded with the drops (of that > energy) blazing with rays (of power). (One should recollect) that it is sprinkled by means of that Yoga of Nectar (amṛtayoga).[1]

---

[1] amā vai ṣoḍaśī kalā | ŚM 11/164d.

Now we have examined the precedents of the teachings concerning the inner Moon, we may turn to them directly. We have seen that according to the Kashmiri Trika, the New Moon is the source of the other digits and hence the one which ultimately nourishes the whole universe. Accordingly, it is identified with the divine energy of the emission (visarga) of the energy of consciousness, which is the goddess who incessantly renews all things. The teachings of the later Kubjikā Tantras agree essentially with this view but add that this is only one aspect of this process. The Kubjikā Tantras envisage a twofold dynamism. One is the cycle of the inner inhalation of the vital breath and the other that of exhalation. This former is the process of destruction that culminates in the 'dark' aspect of the goddess, namely, Amā – the New Moon. Accordingly, in this aspect she is said to be fierce (ghorā) and 'the Devouring One (grasanī)'. The inner process of exhalation is that of creation. Rising through the channel of Suṣumṇā, the goddess Kuṇḍalinī, who is the energy of the Void of transcendental consciousness, gathers together her lunar energies to become Pūrṇā – the Full One, that is, the Full Moon (pūrṇimā or pūrṇimāsī) replete with its sixteen digits. Then it makes the transition to the New Moon – the seventeenth digit. YKh (1) explains:

---

[1] tato 'ntaḥkaraṇaṁ [kh: tato.anta-] devi kartavyaṁ tu prayatnataḥ |
recya [g: cirecya] vāyuṁ [g: vāyu] svake [g: svako] dehe [g: ṭehe] punar ākṛṣya [kh: -kṛsya] dhārayet ||
ākramya mūlacakraṁ tu adha ūrdhvaṁ nirodhayet [g: nivodhayet] |
prasuptabhujagākārā [g: prasūpta-] kuṇḍalākṛtivigrahā ||
prabuddhā [kh: pravuddho] calate [g: calaṭe] kṣipraṁ brahmanāḍīpathānugā [kh: vrahmaṇā-tripathā-; g: -gaṁ] |
gacchate brahmamārgeṇa liṅgabhedakrameṇa tu ||
bhittvā caiva paraṁ [kh: ca vaikharaṁ] sthānaṁ unmanyante [k: unmanantya] parāntike [kh g: parāntikaṁ] |
śivaśaktyoś [k, kh, g: śakti sa] caikatvaṁ mathanaṁ [k: manthanaṁ] cādbhutopamam ||
mathyamanthānayogena [k: madhyamadhyānta-; g: mathyamantrāna-] praviṣṭas tattvamaṇḍale |
na śṛṇoti na paśyeta nocchvaset [kh: nocchvase; g: nochase] tu kadācana [g: kadācanaḥ] ||
punas tenaiva mārgeṇa ānayet hṛdi madhyataḥ [k: ddhādimadhyataḥ] |
vikāsed ūrdhvanālena [k: vikāśayedū-; kh g: vikāaśedū-] śodhanaṁ [k, kh: sādhanaṁ] guhyamadhyataḥ ||
apānaṁ rodhayed [kh: rodhayad] vāyuṁ prāṇaṁ [kh: pāṇan] tatra nirodhayet [g: nivodhayet] |
rodhanād ṛjutāṁ [k: vodhanāgṛhvatā] yāti [g: yāṁti] praviśec candramaṇḍalam ||
ūrṇātantunibhākārā varṣayantī [kh: varṣantī] parā [kh: paramā-] kalā |
tena [g: tenā] plāvitam ātmānaṁ [k: śodhitamā-; g: syāpitamā-] vipruṣaiḥ [k: tṛpti; kh: vipluṣaiḥ; g: viplūṣaiḥ] kiraṇojjvalaiḥ [k: laukikalaukikam; g: -lai] ||
tenaivāmṛtayogena [k: tena cā-] sicyamānam anusmaret [g: sevyamāna-] | ŚM 23/16-24ab.

> There are sixteen energies of the Moon and the seventeenth is called the New Moon. On the plane of skyfaring, she is fierce (caṇḍikā) and devours time.[1]

The following passage describes this process. Initially divested, as it were, of her energies, and hence formless, like the New Moon, Kuṇḍalinī rises as the energy of the Void through the psychic centres of the body within the emptiness of the union of the two breaths – solar (prāṇa) and lunar (apāna). Rising through the navel centre, she emerges beyond it as Unstruck Sound. When she reaches the throat centre she is filled with her sixteen energies that abide in a potential state within her. She is now Kuṇḍalinī – the Snake Goddess – fully formed and rising with great force up to the Cavity of Brahmā at the top of the head where all the lower, grosser forces are merged within the one energy. Once Kuṇḍalinī, the Unstruck Sound of the vital breath that rises in the central channel of Suṣumṇā, exits the Cavity of Brahmā, it expands out into the Full Moon, the Transmental energy of the Will in the form of the Triangle of energies in the End of the Twelve to finally merge into the New Moon in the centre:

> Within the conjunction between the Sun (of prāṇa) and Moon (of apāna), (her) form is the Void (kha), the seat of the Elements. Penetrating into the middle of the lotus of the navel, she has emerged as Unstruck (Sound). O God, contemplate the subtle Supreme (Energy) within the channel of the throat in the form of a snake until she enters the Cavity of Brahmā. Once one has developed that (degree of) merger, the Self should perforate the Door of Brahmā. (Then) the Full Moon in the form of (the divine) will (kāmarūpeṇa) becomes the New Moon.[2]

The reason for this is that:

> Once one has generated the last radiant pulse of the Full Moon, the New Moon begins. Free of the two polarities (pakṣa), it is said to be the first lunar day (and it occurs) in the centre (between the two).[3]

---

[1] *kālabhakṣī ca [k, kh, gh: ] caṇḍikā [k, kh, gh: + ca] kalāś candrasya [k, kh, gh: kalācandrasya] ṣoḍaśa ||
saptādaśī amā nāma [k, gh: nīma] khecaratvapadānugā [k: -yadānugā] | YKh (1) 1/43cd-44ab
[2] KuKh 31/38-40.
[3] KuKh 48/59cd-60ab.

The previous reference tells us that the New Moon is outside the body, above the Cavity of Brahmā and so the Full Moon is still within the body. But where? The following passage implies that it is in the sixth and highest Wheel within the body – the Wheel of the Command (ājñācakra):

> (The yogi) whose form has been energized (sakalīkṛta) with the (lunar) current of the nectar (of the goddess's) Command should, first of all, after abandoning the five Wheels, deposit (his) consciousness (jñāna) in the sixth, flawless one. Once he has achieved this, these five pervade it.[1]

This takes place beyond the Six Wheels in the body where the yogi attains liberation in the state Beyond the Fourth where the New Moon is located:

> The seventh place (attained) by abandoning the six (Wheels) is repose, the union of (all) seven (states). It is the abode (of all things) and supreme bliss. (The first of all, it is like) the letter A, it is Śiva's consciousness. Then that energy of action is the New Moon, the unmoving (acārā) and final (energy of the Moon).[2]

In the following passage, the identification of these lunar energies with Unstruck Sound, an important aspect of Kuṇḍalinī's nature, is established. Haṁsa – the Gander – is the vital Self. This is suggested by the form of the name, HAṀ being the sound of exhalation and SA that of inhalation. His energy – Haṁsā or Haṁsī – is the New Moon. Beyond the six Wheels, she pervades them:

> The state of the Gander (arises) when all the energies (of the Moon) have dissolved away. The container of the world of the Gander is the first energy (of the Moon). Fierce (caṇḍā) she is Umā, the New Moon who illumines consciousness. The awakening of Kaula is its manifestation (udaya) (as) the deity of the group of six (Wheels). The

---

[1] KuKh 48/60cd-61.

[2] *ṣaṭtyāgāt [k, gh: * yogān; g: ṣaṭtyāgā; ṅ: yogā * n] saptamaṁ sthānaṁ viśrāmaṁ [k, gh: miśrāmaṁ; g: -ma] saptamelakam* ||
ālayaṁ paramānandam akāraḥ [g: -ra] śivacinmayaḥ |
tadā sā [k, gh: mā] tu kriyā śaktir amācārā [g: avavāmo] ca antikā [k, gh, ṅ: amvikā] ||
YKh (1) 29/248cd-249.

Note that although three of the four MSs read amvikā in the last line, which is not a bad reading, I have chosen the one in MS G. This is the oldest MS; moreover, the reading has more meaning.

> deity is in the Tradition of the Cave and it is she who, by means (of her) modalities, is in the six (Wheels).[1]

When the yogi reaches the highest plane of repose that, supreme, is both beyond the lower six states and consists of all of them, he attains the energy of the New Moon that is:

> The supreme energy called the Female Gander (Haṁsā) (attained) by fixing the abode of the Gander. The Female Gander (Haṁsinī) is in the middle plane and, the beginning of the Gander, she is within it.[2]

The Gander – Haṁsa – is the Full Moon and his mate – Haṁsī – is the New Moon within him. This inner state above, or on top of the Six Wheels, is explained in the following passage as a series of forms of Voidness. The discerning initiate will perceive that an allusion to the inner maṇḍala is also clearly implied. The Void in six parts is the hexagon in the corners of which are the six Wheels. Kaulinī, the New Moon, is Haṁsī beyond the Void 'established in the Void'. The latter is the Point in the centre of the Triangle that represents the emptiness of the Triangle. It is the Full Moon.

> The Śāmbhava Command, very blissful, has entered the Western House. The mobile and immobile (universe) is Stillness (nirācāra), the essence of which is bliss and consciousness. (Bhairava the) Skyfarer is beyond the energy of the Void (khakalā). Within the Skyfarer is the Mistress of the Skyfarer (Khageśvarī). She is the skyfaring of the Skyfarers. (She is) Kaulinī who, beyond the Void, is established in the Void. (The goddess continued): I (the goddess) am the (energy of Unstruck Sound called) the Female Gander of the Void (khahaṁsā), present in the Gander (of Unstruck Sound) and residing in the Void: I am the supreme energy in the world of transmigration. I am the Void

---

[1] kalāśeṣavilīnatvāt [g: -tvā] tadā haṁsagatir bhavet । bhuvanasya [g: bhavanasya] tu haṁsasya udaraṁ prathamā [k, g, gh, ṅ: -maṁ] kalā ॥ sā ca caṇḍā amā nāma umā bodhaprakāśinī [g: rodhaprakāśinī] । saṁbodhanaṁ [gh: -na] tu kaulasya udayaṁ ṣaṭkadevatā ॥ devatā ca guhāmnāye [k, gh: guhātmānaṁ; ṅ: guhātmāyaṁ] sāpi [k, gh: soṣi; g, ṅ: sopi] ṣaṭsu [gh: ṣatsu] prakārataḥ । YKh (1) 31/99-101ab.

[2] *haṁsasthānanirodhena [k, gh: -nirodha *; ṅ: -nirodhasthā] haṁsākhyā [k, gh: * * sthā; g: hasākhyā; ṅ: missing] paramā kalā [k, gh, ṅ: missing]* । haṁsādir [k, gh, ṅ: nāsti; g: -di] haṁsamadhyasthā [k, gh, ṅ: nāsti] haṁsinī madhyame pade ॥
YKh (1) 29/250.

> and I have six parts. Completely full I am the Full Moon. In the middle of the lunar orb, beyond destruction (kṣara), (I am) Kaulinī (the New Moon). [1]

Thus the following three schematic representations are equivalent.

6. The New Moon, the Full Moon and the Yoni
The gross forms of consciousness pervade the lower principles that range from Earth up to the individual soul (puruṣa) and beyond to the principles

---

[1] śāmbhavājñā susaṁtuṣṭā praviṣṭā paścime gṛhe ||
ānandabodhasadbhāvanirācāraṁ [kh: ānadavodha-] carācaram |
khecaraṁ khakalātītaṁ khagamadhye khageśvarī ||
khagānāṁ khagatiḥ [kh: khamalī] khasthā khagātītā [k, kh: kharātītā] ca kaulinī |
khahaṁsā haṁsagā khasthāhaṁ saṁsāre [k, kh: saṁsāve] parā kalā ||
ṣaṭprakārā kharūpāhaṁ saṁpūrṇā pūrṇimā hy aham |
candrabimbasya madhyasthā kṣarātītā hi [k, kh: ti] kaulinī || YKh (2) 19/51cd-54.

associated with Māyā that condition it. Above, subtle consciousness pervades the pure principles beginning with Pure Knowledge (śuddhavidyā)[1] which is the Transmental 'with parts' (sakala) that sustains them all. It contains the six phases of Unstruck Sound, beginning with Pure Knowledge. These extend up to the transcendental aspect of the Transmental which, 'without parts', is the seventh beyond them in the End of the Twelve:

> Consciousness (caitanya) is said to be (of three kinds) gross, very subtle and Unstruck Sound. The Body (piṇḍa) made of these principles is the differentiated (sakala) (aspect) whose form is the ghost (which is the goddess's vehicle). Complete and made of the six parts (noted below),[2] it is sustained by Pure Knowledge (śuddhavidyā). Above it is the measure (called) Sound (nādamātrā), which is just a straight (line) (ṛjumātrā). The End of Sound is the 'crooked measure' (tiryagmātrā), (while) Śakti who bears (the shape of) a hook (aṁkuśa) is another. After that comes the coiled (kuṇḍalī) Pervasive One (vyāpinī) who transports the Equal One (that has the shape of a) swastika.
>
> The Śiva principle is the first. Sound is another and is the second. The third is the End of Sound. Śakti is another and is the fourth. The Pervasive One is said to be the fifth. The sixth is the plane of oneness (samarasa). By abandoning (these) six, there is liberation in the seventh (plane) where she, the Transmental, is the supreme (goddess – Parā). Liberation is the plane beyond (the differentiated) energies (kalātītapada). One should contemplate it constantly at the end of power (śaktyante, that is, the Transmental). (The reality) beyond being (bhāvātīta) is incomparable. It is the great ocean within the End of the Twelve. It is taught to be the Western Tradition, the House that is said to be the City of the Moon (Candrapura).[3]

---

[1] The Śiva is here called Pure Knowledge which should not be confused with the principle with the same name.

[2] The 'six parts' are enumerated in the following paragraph. They are all part of the Transmental which is here called Pure Knowledge and the Śiva principle. See below, chapter 2, p. 455-456.

[3] caitanyaṁ [g: cetanyaṁ] sthūlam ākhyātaṁ mahāsūkṣmam anāhatam [k, gh: -śūkṣmama-; ṅ: -manohataṁ] ||
tattvair ebhiḥ [ṅ: tatvairaṁbhiḥ] kṛtaṁ piṇḍaṁ sakalaṁ pretavigraham |
ṣaṭprakāramayaṁ pūrṇaṁ [g: pūrṇa] śuddhavidyāsvadhiṣṭhitam [all MSs: -hyadhi-] ||
tasyordhve nādamātrā tu [k, gh: nādayātaṁtra; g: -mantraṁ tu; gh: nādayāṁtaṁtra; ṅ: nādayātrantu] ṛjumātrā [k: ṛkṣamātra; g: jhajamātra; gh: kṣamātraṁ; ṅ: -mātra] vidhīyate |
tiryaṅmātrā [g: tiryanamātrāṁ] tu nādāntā [k: -ntaṁ; g, gh: -nta] śaktir yā [k, g, ṅ: śaktiḥ sā; gh: śaktiḥ sāṁ] sāṁkuśāparā [gh: sākuśā-] ||

There, in the End of the Twelve, is Mahāmāyā which, 'beyond Śiva, is the New Moon (amā) that is within emission (visarga) and which is subtle and stainless (nirañjanā)'.[1] We notice that the texts seem to vacillate between two symbolic locations for this, the highest state symbolized by the New Moon. This passage teaches that it is in the End of the Twelve. Elsewhere we are told it is in the End of the Sixteen. Now the time has come to see where and what these symbolic locations are, why they are confused and how they are related.

The End of the Twelve and the End of the Sixteen

The End of the Twelve is both the summit of the subtle yogic body and that of the sphere of immanence. As the former it is the upper Foundation of Suṣumṇā. As the latter, it is the Plane of the Transmental where the emission (visarga) takes place through which all the lower spheres and principles of existence are emitted. As the source and abode of all the scriptures it is called the Seat of Yoga (yogapīṭha) where the scriptures are kept and venerated. Here the maṇḍala is deployed in its highest form, in the centre of which reside the divine couple, Kubjikā and her consort. Kubjikā sits there enthroned in the centre surrounded by the sixteen vowels that represent the energies of the Moon. As the Ṭīkā says:

> Everything arises out of the End of the Twelve and merges (into it). [. . .] It is has many different names such as Supreme Void (parākāśa), the Cavity of Brahmā (brahmarandhra), the Abode of the Lord of the Fettered (paśunāthāśraya), the Plane of the Transmental (manonmanapada), Emission (visarga), the Foundation of Suṣumṇā (suṣumṇādhāra)[2], the End of the Twelve (dvādaśānta), the sacred seat

---

*kuṇḍalī vyāpinī tasyāḥ [k, g, gh: tasmāt; ṅ: tasmā] svastikā [k, gh: svastraikā; ṅ: svastraikāt] samanāvahā [k, gh: * manā-]* ǀ śivatattvaṁ tu prathamaṁ nādam anyad [k, g, gh, ṅ: -nya] dvitīyakam [k, gh, ṅ: -kā] ǁ tṛtīyaṁ caiva nādāntaṁ [k: nācāṁtaṁ; gh, ṅ: nāvāṁtaṁ] śaktir anyac caturthakam ǀ vyāpinī pañcamaṁ [k: paṁcake; g, ṅ: pañcakam; gh: paṁcakai] proktaṁ ṣaṣṭhaṁ [g: ṣaṣṭaṁ] samarasaṁ [g: samaraṁsam] padam ǁ *ṣaṭtyāgāt [k: ṣagadhyāgāt; gh: ṣa * dhyāgāt; ṅ: yadvyāgāt] saptame [k, gh, ṅ: sa * me] muktir yatra [g: -yatra] sā unmanā parā* ǀ kalātītapadaṁ mokṣaṁ [g, gh: mokṣa] śaktyante [g: śaktānte] bhāvayet sadā ǁ bhāvātītam [g: bhāva-] anaupamyaṁ dvādaśānte [k, gh: -śāṁti] mahodadhiḥ [k, gh: -dadhi; ṅ: mahaudadhi] ǀ nirdiṣṭaṁ [k: nirdiṣṭhaṁ; g: nirddiṣṭa] paścimāmnāyaṁ [g: -ye] gṛhaṁ [gh, ṅ: gṛha] candrapuraṁ [k, g, gh, ṅ: -ra] smṛtam ǁ YKh (1) 43/20cd-26.

[1] śivasyordhve visargasthā amā [gh: āma] sūkṣmā [k: śūkṣmā] nirañjanā ǀ YKh (1) 43/30ab.

[2] See KuKh 2/18 and note.

> of Yoga (yogapīṭha), and Samvartāmaṇḍala. There Bhairava is Kubjeśa and the form of the power (which is his consort) is Kubjikā who is surrounded by sixteen energies. What are these sixteen? They are (the vowels, beginning with the letter A and ending with visarga.[1]

The End of the Twelve and the phases of Sound that trace it out is a common feature of the doctrine concerning the Yogic body in most if not all the early Śaiva and Kaula Tantric traditions. Here, at the summit of existence, reside the deities of each tradition in their *maṇḍala*s. But despite the cardinal differences in the contents of the End of the Twelve from one school to another, the phases of ascent and its overall structure are essentially the same in the Kubjikā Tantras, the Śaiva Siddhānta, the Kashmiri Śaiva texts and their sources. Paraphrasing the important Trika scripture, the Triśirobhairavatantra, Abhinava explains:

> Just as there is a space twelve fingers wide at the base of our (body), there is also one the same size outside the body. O fair lady, the body extends from the feet up to here, at the end of the head, up to the plane of 'non-touch',[2] a span of eight-four fingers. Now, consciousness also rests in the aforementioned (space) above the body; thus, one imagines that it is also (part of) the body. This is the reason why there is this transcendent space of twelve fingers breadth.[3]

There are two Ends of the Twelve – one is below and the other above. The TĀ[4] explains that the distance from the left toe to the Snake of Brahmā, that is, the Cavity of Brahmā where a form of Kuṇḍalinī resides, is eighty-four fingers. Twelve more are added to get to the End of the Twelve and twelve more again for the same distance below the body. This makes a total of one hundred and eight fingers. This figure may also be arrived at in another way. One may reckon that there are eighty-four fingers up to the forehead, ninety-six up to the Cavity of Brahmā and one hundred and eight up to the End of the Twelve.[5] The Kubjikā Tantras measure

---

[1] etasmāt sarvaṁ dvādaśāntād [k kh: -ntā] jāyate līyate ca | [. . .] tasya [k kh: taṁ] bahusaṁjñābhedāḥ [k kh: -bheda] yathā parākāśaṁ [k kh: -śa] brahmarandhraṁ [k kh: -randhra] paśunāthāśrayaṁ [k kh: paśū-] manonmanapadaṁ [k kh: saṁtanmanapadam] visargaḥ [k kh: visargaṁ] suṣumnādhāraṁ [k, kh: suṣumṇā-] dvādaśāntaṁ yogapīṭham saṁvartāmaṇḍalam [k: saṁvarta-] | tatra kujeśo [k kh: kujeśa] bhairavaḥ [k kh: -vaṁ] | kubjikākārā [k kh: kuvjikārā] sā ca [k kh: va] śaktiḥ ṣoḍaśabhir vṛtā iti śaktayaḥ | kās tā [k kh: kāṣṭhā] ṣoḍaśa | yathā akārādivisargāntās tāḥ [k kh: -ntāḥ tāḥ] | Ṭ MS K fl. 26b.

[2] The sense of touch pervades the entire physical body. Thus the plane of 'non-touch' is the one beyond it.

[3] TĀ 16/110d–113ab.

[4] TĀ 7/68cd–70ab.

[5] TĀ16/100.

differently. According to the Ṭīkā the length of the body is eighty-four finger-spans up to the end of the head. Beyond that is the place of the Triple Peak Mountain – Trikūṭa – that covers twelve fingers' space and is the End of the Twelve. Together they cover a distance equivalent to the width of ninety-six fingers.[1]

The part of this Yogic body that interests us here is the twelve-finger space above the head. This is marked by the so-called Wick of Smoke that rises from the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head and disappears into the End of the Twelve.[2] Here the sensitive yogi experiences the higher 'silent' phases of the utterance of the seed-syllable OṀ and, by extension, all others like it. The ṢSS explains:

> A, U and Ma along with the Point (bindu) are in the heart, throat, and palate (respectively). The (Half) Moon, the Obstructress (nirodhikā), Sound (nāda), the End of Sound (nādānta), Power (śakti), the Pervasive One (vyāpinī), the Equal One (samanā) and the Transmental (unmanā) are (with the initial four) said to be the twelve supports (ādhāra). (Yogis) know that that is the End of the Twelve by making use (of the seed-syllable) A U Ma.[3]
>
> The Wick of Smoke (dhūmravarti) that is said to rise up into the End of the Twelve is above the Great Cavity (mahārandhra) and travels (upwards for the span of) of twelve fingers.
>
> The supreme Transmission (krama), realised by Being (bhāvagamya), stands perpetually present at its extremity. The Yogi should worship the divine Transmission there by moving (through these) stages (padacāreṇa).[4]

---

[1] caturaśītyaṅgulaṁ [k kh: -la] śarīrapramāṇaṁ mastakāvadhi [k: -vadhis; kh: -vadhiḥ] tadūrdhve trikūṭasthānam aṅguladvādaśakam [k kh: -ke] | taṁ dvādaśāntam | evaṁ caturaśītiḥ [k: caturāśiti; kh: -ti] tathā dvādaśāṅgulakena ṣaṇṇavatyaṅgulāḥ [kh: ṣarṇṇavatya-; k kh: -lā] |
Ṭ MS K fl. 25a

[2] See below, chapter 2, p. 412-413.

[3] Cf. Padoux 1975: table opposite p. 346.

[4] hṛtkaṇṭhatālubhāle [k: -ge] ca a-u-maṁ bindusaṁyutam |
candro [k kh: candraṁ] nirodhikā nādo [k kh: -da] nādāntaḥ [k kh: -ntaṁ] śaktir [k kh: śakti-] vyāpinī [k: -vyāpitaṁ] ||
samanā [k: śamana; kh: samanaṁ] unmanā [k kh: unmanaṁ] caiva ādhārā [k kh: -raṁ] dvādaśa [k kh: -daśaṁ] smṛtāḥ [k kh: smṛtaṁ] |
a-u-mena [k kh: -menaṁ] prayogena dvadaśāntaṁ tu tad viduḥ ||
dvādaśāntordhvagā tasmin dhūmravartis [k, kh : dhūma-] tu yā smṛtā |
mahārandhroparisthā tu dvādaśāṅgulagāminī ||
tasyāntagaṁ [k: tasyāṁtugaṁ; kh: tasyānugaṁ] sadā tiṣṭhed bhāvagamyaṁ paraṁ kramam |
tatra [k kh: tatrā] divyaḥ kramaḥ pūjyaḥ [k h: -jyā] padacāreṇa yoginā || ṢSS 28/2-5.

These references do not tell us exactly where all the twelve phases of the utterance (uccāra) of OṀ are located. We are assisted in this by the Śaiva Siddhānta sources[1] analysed by Brunner in her work on the Somaśambhupaddhati. She supplies three diagrams drawn on the basis of these sources depicting their location in and above the body. These have been integrated into the table that follows. The reader's attention is drawn to two points. Firstly, in these texts the root mantra (mūlamantra) is not OṀ (= AUṀ) but HAUṀ. However, Brunner explains, referring to various sources, that this does not make much difference. The letter Ha is uttered in the navel, according to Somaśambhu. The remaining part starts from the heart, as does the utterance of OṀ. The second point to note is that the SvT and the Prāsādacandrikā also mention the measure (mātrā) or duration of the utterance of each part. In both cases the whole extends for three and a half-measures. The first three measures are for the audible A U Ma and the remaining half is variously divided into the components of the higher, silent resonance.

The commentary adds: There, above, at the very end of the Wick of Smoke, above the Great Cavity at (a distance that) measures twelve fingers, is the Supreme Energy whose nature is consciousness. Supreme Śiva is above that (energy). The Transmission (krama) has come forth there from that Śiva.

tatrordhve dhūmravartiprānte mahārandhrasyopari dvādaśāṅgulapramāṇe parāśaktiḥ cidrūpā || tasyā ūrdhve paraḥ śivaḥ || tasmāt tatra tacchivāt [k kh: tyācchivāt] kramaṁ nirgatam |

[1] They are: 1) Somaśambhupaddhati (nirvāṇadīkṣāvidhi) verses 231-236; 2) SvT 4/263-267ab, 342cd-348 and 350-355; 3) Prāsādacandrikā quoted in the Kriyādīpikā (p. 96). The same passage is quoted by Anantaśambhu in his commentary on the Siddhāntasārāvali (p. 39) where it is attributed to the Vātulāgama. The Siddhāntaśekhara (p. 368-370) agrees with this source.

1. The End of the Twelve: A Comparative Table

Energy of the mantra			Duration (in mātrā)			Lord of the Energy			Extension (in fingers)			Part of the Body
SŚP	SvT	PrC	SŚP	SvT	PrC	SŚP	SvT	PrC	SŚP	SvT	PrC	SŚP	SvT	PrC
	Unmanā	Unmanā	NOT NOTED	?		?	Śiva	Ahata-śiva	12	(12)	4	Topknot	Top-knot	Top-knot
	Samanā	Samanā		?	1/256						4
	Vyāpinī	Vyāpinī		1/64	1/128						3
Śakti	Śakti	Śakti		1/32	1/64					1	1	Brahma-randhra	Brahma-randhra	Brahma-randhra
		Nādānta[1]		XXX XXX XX	1/32			Sadā-śiva	XXX XXX XXX	XXX X XXX X XXX X	11	XXXXX XXXXX XXXXX	From fore-head to head	Fore-head
Nāda	Nāda	Nāda		1/16	1/16	Sadā-śiva	Sadā-śiva		4?	11		Head
	Nirodhī	Nirodhī		1/8	1/8
	Half Moon	Half Moon		¼	¼
Bindu	Bindu	Bindu		½	½	Īśvara	Īśvara	Īśvara	4	2	2	Forehead	Centre Eye-brows	Centre Eye-brows
Ma	Ma	Ma		3	1	Rudra	Rudra	Rudra	4	4	4	Palate	Palate	Palate
U	U	U		2	2	Viṣṇu	Viṣṇu	Viṣṇu	8	8	8	Throat	Throat	Throat
A	A	A		1	3	Brahmā	Brahmā	Brahmā	4	1 + 6	4 + 6	Heart	Heart	Heart

[1] Nādānta appears only in this text out of the three tabulated. In this case, the ṢSS deviates from the SvT, which is normally a major source for the Kubjikā Tantras.

The End of the Twelve is thus the 'location' of the highest state in the recitation (uccāra) of the syllable OṀ, which in the Svacchandatantra is represented as the Path of Mantra. Padoux explains that the stages of the syllable OṀ, like those of other seed-syllable mantras:

. . . show how the 'gross' sound vibration of the phonemes making up the bīja [seed-syllable] mantra arises, becomes subtler, then merges into the pure transcendental energy identical with Śiva, where the sound and breath are reabsorbed and wherefrom they originate. It is this upward movement of the phonic energy that the yogin identifies with in order to merge into this energy. However, this process has a twin aspect, human and cosmic, the yogin attains liberation as a result precisely of his identification with increasingly higher levels of energy. This moving back to the source of energy is therefore not only that of the yogin towards liberation, but also of cosmic re-absorption (saṁhāra) and, taken the other way around, of emanation (sṛṣṭi).[1]

The entire cosmic order, in other words, is the resonance of sonic energy – the energy that the Kubjikā Tantras identify with their goddess. Accordingly she, like the ancient syllable OṀ, is commonly said to consist of three or three and a half-measures (mātrā) to represent that she is both the entire expanse of immanence symbolized by articulated Speech (the three measures) and the transcendent Speech beyond of the half-measure. In order to better understand this aspect of the goddess we must understand the evolution of the symbolism of the recitation of the Vedic syllable OṀ. This is of great consequence for all Tantric schools, as the principal notions developed in that non-Tantric context were variously applied to the recitation of all Tantric mantric syllables. This is particularly the case amongst the Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava Tantric schools who, to varying degrees and in different ways, admitted the same syllable into their sonic pantheon.

The analysis of the audible sound of the syllable OṀ in the principle Upaniṣads is always triplicate. It consists of three basic measures (mātra), namely A, U and the concluding substantive element Ma. The three parts of OṀ are associated with several triads initially conceived through relatively concrete Vedic symbols as we find, for example, in the Praśnopaniṣad.[2] There these three are the three Vedas through which one attains the human world, the Moon and finally the Sun from whence there is no return to the mortal state. This basic triadic pattern was developed further in the Māṇḍūkyopaniṣad according to which the three measures are the states of waking (viśva), dreaming (taijasa) and deep sleep (prājñā). The fourth state in which the true, absolute nature of the Self is realised is 'without measure' (amātra).[1] In the following passage from the Maitryupaniṣad this notion is further extended to form the basis of what came to be an important concept amongst nondualist Vedāntins and those who discussed the metaphysical basis of the theory of language namely, the Sound Absolute – Śabdabrahman:

[1] Padoux 1990: 94.
[2] Praśnopaniṣad 5/1-7.

> Verily there are two Brahmans to be meditated upon: sound (śabda) and non-sound (aśabda). Now non-sound is revealed only by sound. Now, in this case the Sound-Brahman is OṀ. Ascending by it, one comes to an end in non-sound . . . This is immortality . . . As a spider mounting up by means of his thread (tantu) obtains free space, thus, assuredly, indeed, does that meditator, mounting up by means of OṀ, obtain independence (svātantrya) . . . . Passing beyond this variously characterized Sound-Brahman, men disappear into the supreme, the non-sound, the unmanifest Brahman.[2]

Later Upaniṣads preferred to think of this fourth, most subtle and elevated part of OṀ in positive terms as a 'half-measure' (ardhamātra). Thus according to the Atharvaśiropaniṣad, the first three measures of OṀ are the deities Brahma, Viṣṇu and Īśāna. The text continues:

> But the three and a half-measure has all these as its deities, is unmanifest, goes out into the wide (expanse) is pure and resembles a mountain-crystal in colour; he who meditates on it continuously goes to the abode of bliss.[3]

According to the Yogatattvopaniṣad:

> Motionless is the half sound
> And just as in a crystal perchance
> Is reflected the light of the sun,
> So shines in the soul, inspiring it,
> The highest spirit by means of Yoga.[4]

The way the Dhyānabindūpaniṣad teaches how to use this 'half-measure' reminds us of the use of the three measures in the Maitryupaniṣad. Indeed, the silent

---

[1] Māṇḍukyopaniṣad 3/23–4/1.
[2] Maitryupaniṣad 6/22.
[3] Atharvaśiropaniṣad section 5.
[4] Yogatattvopaniṣad 10d–11, Deussen's translation.

'half-measure' or ‘mora’, which is higher consciousness, subsumes the soteriological potency of all the measures:

> Pursing one’s lips like a lotus stalk
> One is accustomed to drink water,
> One should similarly draw in wind also,
> When as a Yogin one practices Yoga.
>
> Using the half mora as a rope,
> Draw out of the well of the heart-lotus
> The Manas [mind] upwards along the path of artery, > Between the brows, where it melts away.
>
> For the forehead between the brows,
> Where there is the root of the nose,
> Is the perennial dwelling place,
> The great resting place of all.[1]

The tenth century polymath Vācaspati Miśra commenting on the Yogasūtra[2] outlines a visualization that contains, as Beck points out, the earliest appearance of Nāda-Brahman in the Patañjali Yoga tradition and, in this sense, within the six systems of philosophy as a whole. Vācaspati, clearly influenced by the Tantric approach to Yoga, directs that the adept should imagine a lotus with eight petals between the abdomen and the heart. This lotus is first turned upwards by means of the breath. In the calyx are the three letters A, U and Ma, one above the other, corresponding to the spheres of the Sun, Moon and Fire and the states of waking, dreaming and deep sleep, respectively. Vācaspati continues:

> Above that is the higher space, the Sound of Brahman itself,[3] the fourth state of ultra-consciousness, which the knowers of Brahman call the half-measure (the ardhamātra).[4]

These basic notions find a place in the context of Yogic practice taught in the Tantras of most if not all the major Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava schools. In this respect, the Kubjikā corpus is exemplary. Thus the texts often refer to Kuṇḍalinī as leading [1] Dhyānabindūpaniṣad 22- 23, Deussen's translation.

[2] Yogasūtra 1/36.
[3] paraṁ brahma vyomātmakaṁ nādas turīyasthānam.
[4] Quoted from Feuerstein 1975: 85 by Beck 1995: 89.

upwards in the form of a spider's thread (tantu).[1] The four sacred seats are equated with the three full measures and the half-measure.[2] The latter is the supreme energy that, possessing three divisions, viz. the other three measures, is Rudra's power.[3] Most pertinently, we are told that the syllable AIṀ (called Vāgbhava) is adorned with a half-measure.[4] AIṀ, along with HSKHPHREṀ,[5] is the syllabic form of the goddess. In the commentary on the following passage found in all three of the basic Kubjikā texts, the KMT, ṢSS and ŚM, we are told that this is the Kaula version of OṀ to which the same analysis applies:

> Everything generated within the Three Paths is tranquil and has been placed in the (half-measure consisting of) three measures. Without the Three Paths the maṇḍala of the Yoni does not manifest (bhrājate lit. 'shine'). Without the Yoni there is no success (niṣpatti) in divine and profane matters. It is present (in all that is) most excellent, middling and the least. The three measures (mātrā) are said to be the Point, Power (śakti) and Sound. The abode, which is the Yoni (bhagālaya), is formed by the union of these three conjoined with the supreme half-measure that is (known as) Praṇava in the Kulāgama. Conjoined with the letters A, U and Ma, this Praṇava is action.
>
> Commentary: The commentary of this (verse is as follows). The three measures are the Point, Power and Sound. The universe generated within the Three Paths has been 'placed' (there), that is, fashioned by this (triad). The three paths are (the three channels of the vital breath,) Iḍā, Piṅgalā and Suṣumṇā. They are the Moon (of apāna on the left), the Sun (of prāṇa on the right) and Fire (of udāna in the middle). How could the Yoni be produced without them? The Yoni consists of the three qualities (of Prakṛti), the Three Paths, Three Measures and the Three (levels of) Speech. (In short), she rests on three (modalities) and (her) form is Vāgbhava (i.e. AIṀ). Thus she is accomplished as (the syllable) AIṀ. This is the description of the praṅava according to the Kulāgama; it is (the praṇava) of the rites of Kula (kulakriyā). Or else, praṇava (can also) consist of the letters A, U and Ma.[6]

---

[1] KuKh 13/17 and note.
[2] KuKh 6/210.
[3] KuKh 60/97.
[4] KuKh 58/29
[5] KuKh 9/1-19ab.
[6] trimātranihitaṁ [KMT, ŚM: trimārgavihitaṁ; ṢSS: trimātraṁ vihitaṁ] sarvaṁ [KMT: śāntaṁ MSs DEFHJK agree with this reading] tripathāntasamudbhavam |

Similarly, in some places the goddess is said to consist of just three 'measures'[1] thus implicitly representing her in the sonic triadic counterpart of the triangular Yoni which, in this case, is just the letter E, not AIṀ. The letter E is represented by a downward-facing triangle the sides of which are the three measures. The extra half-measure is symbolized by the slanting line drawn from the upper right-hand corner of the triangular letter E which, along with a semi-circle and point, transforms it into the seed-syllable AIṀ.[2] These three additions together make up the half-measure. As the ṢSS tells us: 'One should know that Sound (nāda), the Point (bindu) and Power (kalā) are the half-measure of all (the syllables).'[3] The letter E is the Triangle, which is the core of the maṇḍala and the 'seat' (āsana) of the goddess.[4] This is the gross form, as it were, of the goddess on which she sits in her subtle, undifferentiated form. The two together, the audible and geometric form and the silent, formless energy, make up her essential sonic form – the syllable AIṀ. The goddess who consists of three measures is, as our text says, that part of her that 'abides in the form of emanation'.[5] Above is the half-measure that leads to the pure transcendent. This is the goddess in her supreme form, which is the source and essence of the energies liberated below. Encompassed in the domains of the three measures, they are collectively her gross form as the triangle even as she merges into Śiva through the half-measure and abides there within him.

Accordingly, in the following passage in which Kuṇḍalinī is described, these two aspects of the goddess's energy are distinguished. One is the gross aspect, which consists of the three measures of the letter E. The other is the subtle or supreme form

---

tripathena vinā naiva [KMT: bhadre; ŚM: devi] bhrājate yonimaṇḍalam ||
yoniṁ vinā na niṣpattir divyādivyeṣu vastuṣu |
uttamottamamadhyasthā [k kh: -sthaṁ; ŚM: uttamādhamamadhyasthā] kanyasāntavyavasthitā [k kh: -tāḥ] ||
bindu śaktis tathā nādo [KMT, ŚM: nādaṁ] mātrātrayam udāhṛtam | trayāṇām api saṁyogān [kh: saṁyogā] niṣpadyeta bhagālayam ||
parārdhamātrasaṁbhinnaṁ praṇavaṁ taṁ [KMT, ŚM: praṇavo 'yaṁ] kulāgame |
a-u-makārasaṁyuktaṁ [ṢSS: -saṁyuktaḥ; ŚM: -saṁyogāt] praṇavedaṁ kriyātmakam [ṢSS: praṇavo 'yaṁ kriyātmakaḥ] || ṢSS 14/53-56 = ŚM 11/143cd-147 = KMT 8/56-59.

(vyākhyā): asya vyākhyā trimātram iti bindu-śakti-nādaṁ tena nihitaṁ kṛtaṁ viśvaṁ tripathāntasamudbhavam | tripathaṁ iḍā piṅgalā suṣumṇā || somasūryāgnibhūtās tair vinā kathaṁ yoninispattiḥ | yonis traiguṇyarūpā tripathā trimātrā vāktrayā trilambinī vāgbhavarūpā iti siddhā ai/ iti kulāgame praṇavavyāvarṇanaṁ kulakriyātmikānām | praṇavākāram a-ukāramakāramayam evaṁ praṇavaṁ vā ||

[1] KuKh 2/40-41.

[2] See above p. 107 for a diagram of Vāgbhava, the triangular syllable AIṀ.

[3] nādabindukalā jñeyāḥ sarveṣāṁ cārdhmātṛkāḥ | ṢSS 15/26cd.

[4] See note to KuKh 3/13-14ab.

[5] KuKh 2/40-41.

which is the Supreme Energy (parā śakti) identified with the seventeenth digit of the inner Moon This is implicitely related to the half-measure:

> She is the eternal Transmental. Devoid of the universe of thought constructs (niṣprapañcā), she resides in the life breath of all. She is the supreme energy, called Kuṇḍalī and is the seventeenth energy (of the Moon). [. . .] She is the subtle (aspect). I will (now) tell (you) how she is in (her) gross form. [. . .] Residing within the plane of the Neuter (absolute), she is (the one) energy (kalā) and her form is (made of all the) energies. She is threefold (as) will, knowledge and action and abides (permanently) having pervaded the universe.
>
> Called knowledge, (she is Kuṇḍalinī and) her form is (round like) an earring (kuṇḍala). Called action, she is the mother of the letters (varṇamātṛkā). Called will, (her) form is mantra. She is (both) the object of denotation and the denotator. Associated with (both) cause and effect, she emerges from within the pure (energy of the Moon) (vimalānta). She has three natures, she resides on three paths, she is endowed with the three causes and the three energies. She is associated with the letter E. (As) the Supreme Power, she resides within Śiva.[1]

Ultimately, the half-measure of the goddess's syllable AIṀ dissolves into Śiva just as the half-measure of the syllable OṀ dissolves away into the silence of the Supreme Brahman – the Nameless (Anāmaka):

---

[1] nityonmanī niṣprapañcā [ṅ: niḥprapaṁcā] sarvaprāṇe vyavasthitā ||
*kuṇḍalyākhyā [all MSs: -lākhyā] parā śaktiḥ [ṅ: śakti] sā ca [k, g: sarva; kh: sa va; gh: * ?; ṅ: sādha] saptādaśī kalā | [. . .]
sā sūkṣmā [gh: ?] sthūlarūpeṇa [gh: ?; ṅ: mūla-] yathā sā tad vadāmy aham || [. . .]
napuṁsakapadāntasthā [ṅ: napuṁsarupadāta-] sā [ṅ: sa] kalā kalavigrahā || [g: ?]
jñānakriyecchā [kh: -kṛpesthā; ṅ: -kūpe-] trividhā [ṅ: tṛvidhau] vyāpya viśvaṁ vyavasthitā | [g: ?]
jñānākhyā [ṅ: -khye] kuṇḍalākārā [ṅ: -rākārā] kriyākhyā [k kh gh ṅ: kṛpākhyā] varṇamātṛkā [ṅ: varttamātṛkā] || [g: ?]
icchākhyā [k, kh, g, gh, ṅ: ityākhyā] mantrarūpā sā vācyavācakalakṣaṇā [k, kh, g, gh, ṅ: -ṇāt] |
kāryakāraṇasaṁyuktā vimalāntavisarpiṇī [k: viṣanāṁta-; kh, g gh: visanānta-; ṅ: vimalāna-; gh: visarpinī] ||
trisvarūpā [k gh: triḥ-] trimārgasthā [ṅ: trimānasthā] kāraṇatrayasaṁyutā [k: -tāḥ] | [g: missing]
śaktitrayasamopetā [k: -samāpetā-] caikāreṇa [k, g, gh: mekāreṇa; kh, ṅ: maikāreṇa] vibheditā [ṅ: vibheditāṁ] || [g: ?]
parā śaktiḥ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: śakti; g: ?] śivāntasthā [k: -sthās; g: missing; ṅ: śirāntasthā] . . . |
KuKauM 4/7cd-8ab, 4/9cd, 4/10cd-14a.

> The New Moon (Amā) dissolves away into the half-measure and the half-measure into the plane of the Nameless. O god, the Nameless is Kula where the lord is Kuleśvara. I praise that Kula, the essence of Kaula, the venerable ocean of knowledge.[1]

Again:

> There is (the energy which is) one measure (ekamātrā), two measures (dvimātrā) and three measures (trimātrā). The (energy which is the) half-measure is supreme and subtle. Above it is (the one reality which is both) supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent). It is the teacher's place, the Great Place. The Self, which is endowed with the consciousness of its own consciousness, has come from that Place. The pure (beings) who are on their way to the Supreme should also be conjoined into that plane, initiated by Śrīnātha.[2]

In the following passage we are told that the triangular part of AIṀ, consisting of three measures, is located in the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head (also called the Cavity of the Hair) and extends upwards. Above (or, what amounts to the same thing, within) the Void of the three measures where the lunar energy of the half-measure – here called the Full Moon – is symbolically located is the god. There he draws from this energy, which is the source of his exalted status as the First Teacher:

> The plane of the One-footed (ekapāda i.e. the letter E)[3] is where the Skyfarer is in the Skyfarer within the Cavity of the Hair. Śrīdeva is above Meru (the triangle above the head) (merupaścima) in the essential nature of the Void (kha), which is the threefold measure (of energy) (mātra). (This is) where everything consists of Space (ākāśa) and is the Cavity (vivara), which is the nectar of Fire (vāḍava). There, above, in the Void is the supreme god. (He is) the

---

[1] amā līyati [k, kh, gh: līpati] mātrārdhe [k, kh, gh: -ddhai] mātrārdhānāmake pade || anāmakaṁ kulaṁ deva yatra nāthaṁ kuleśvaram |
taṁ kulaṁ kaulasadbhāvaṁ vande śrījñānasāgaram || YKh (1) 4/30cd-31.

[2] ekamātrā dvimātrā ca trimātrā ca tathaiva ca ||
ardhamātrā parā sūkṣmā tasyordhve tu parāparam |
gurusthānaṁ mahāsthānaṁ tasmāt [k, kh, gh: tasmā] sthānād vinirgatam [k, kh: vinirgabhaṁ] ||
svabodhabodhayuktātmā ye śuddhāḥ [k, kh, gh: śuddhā] paragāminaḥ |
te 'pi te tatpade yojyāḥ [k, kh, gh: yojñā] śrīnāthena [k, kh, gh: -nāthaina] tu dīkṣitāḥ [kh: dīrkṣitāḥ; gh: dīkṣatāḥ] || YKh (1) 3/292cd-294.

[3] See above, p. 192, note 1.

> moonbeam (candrāṁśu) that, well-fixed, oozes (nectar). The (energy of the) Full Moon (pūrṇamāsā) resides as the teacher's being (gurutva) on the plane of the Skyfarer.[1]

Despite its complexity, we notice in this sonic symbolism the absence of one of the basic aspects of its original counterpart represented by the utterance of the syllable OṀ, that is, the equation between the 'measures' and the four states of consciousness. The first three – waking, dreaming and deep sleep – correspond to the three audible letters – A, U and Ma respectively, and the 'Silence' beyond contains the resonance which represents the higher Fourth state in which the identity of the Self with the Absolute is realised. Tantric traditions in general develop this symbolism by analyzing the phases of this 'Resonance' up to the perfect Silence of the transcendent, the abode of the supreme form of Speech. The Kubjikā Tantras regularly refer to the Fourth state and to another state called Beyond the Fourth, which is that of the liberated condition attained when the Fourth state is permanently established. However, they hardly concern themselves with the previous three states. The Fourth and Beyond the Fourth is the Transmental, that is, in the specific terminology of these Tantras, the Command, which, as the pure energy of grace, is the undifferentiated (niṣkala) form of the goddess.

This form of the goddess, understood in the context of the ascending levels listed below and other analogous ones, of which she is the culmination, is a special focus of attention of this school. Thus, although the goddess is identified, as in other Tantric traditions, with Speech, when referring to her undifferentiated identity, she is usually said to be the Transmental or the Command rather than Speech. Again, rather than Speech, Kubjikā – like the other great goddesses of the Kaula and Bhairava Tantras – is most commonly understood, to be the 'soundless' (asvara) phonemic energy (svara) which is the essence of mantras through which the world is created, sustained and destroyed.

In her differentiated form (sakala), Kubjikā is generally contemplated as the (originally Trika) goddess Mālinī. Although Kubjikā, as Mālinī, like any deity, has an iconic form, she is most commonly understood to be the aggregate of phonemic energies that constitute the primal differentiated form of the phonemic energy 'without sound'. It is as this Unstruck Sound, variously termed in the texts, that she is generally presented in the context of the Kubjikā teachings rather than

---

[1] ekapādapadaṁ [k, gh, kh: -da] yatra keśarandhrakhage [gh: -dhukhage] khagam ||
khasvarūpe tridhāmātre [k, kh: -māṁtre] śrīdevaṁ merupaścime |
yatrākāśamayaṁ [k, gh: -mṛyaṁ] sarvaṁ vivaraṁ vāḍavāmṛtam ||
tatrordhve khe paraṁ devaṁ candrāṁśu kṣarate dhruvam |
pūrṇamāsā [k, kh, gh: pūrṇā-] gurutvena saṁsthitā khecare [k, kh, gh: -rai] pade ||
YKh (1) 4/10cd-12.

Speech. This may well be because the Kubjikā Tantras consciously avoid this basically Vedic perspective.

Kashmiri Śaiva exegesis has no problem in this respect. Indeed, some of the best and most detailed expositions of Speech (vāc) are found in the works of Kashmiri Śaivites, particularly Abhinavagupta. Although not discussed as extensively as Speech, we do also find profound expositions of the states of waking, dreaming and deep sleep along with Fourth state beyond them in the work of Kashmiri Śaiva exegetes. This was probably because the early Kashmiri Śaivites were influenced by the Upaniṣads and philosophical reflections (initiated originally by Buddhists) concerning the relationship between thought and consciousness and so, by extension, with its states. By the time we reach Abhinavagupta, Kashmiri Śaivism crystallizes in his work as the highest development of the Trika school. At the scriptural level, this Tantric tradition reached its apogee in the compact and systematic Mālinīvijayottaratantra. Although known and respected by the redactors of the KuKh, it was not, of course, rated as highly as it was by Abhinava, who took this, effectively, to be the main Trika Tantra. There the four states of consciousness are related to four yogic states as we find commonly in Kaula Tantras of various schools, including those of the goddess Kubjikā.[1] But in other traditions, as this assimilation did not take place, the four states of consciousness were largely ignored.

In short, in the Kubjikā Tantras the ascent through the stages of OṀ, common to most if not all Śaiva schools, is generally divested of the related notions of the states of consciousness and is not associated with the levels of Speech, although the flux of phonemic energy does, effectively, move through them.[2] As the Kubjikā Tantras themselves do not explain the twelve stages in the sonic development of OṀ that lead to the End of the Twelve,[3] at length we must refer to the explanations offered by the Kashmiris, particularly Kṣemarāja in his commentaries on the Netratantra and the Svacchandabhairavatantra, which is well known to the Kubjikā Tantras. So let us now turn our attention to a brief exposition of these states.

The Half Moon and the Point. The upward progression, we have already noted, corresponds to the process of withdrawal (saṁhāra). In Kashmiri Śaiva

---

[1] These states are Piṇḍa, Pada, Rūpa and Rūpātīta. See MVT 2/36 ff. and TĀ 10/227cd ff. They are discussed extensively in chapters 17 to 19 of the KMT. KuKh 19/6 ff., 44/5-8ab and notes. Also the (unpublished) Kulapañcāśikā 1/8 ff..

[2] Both these associations are found in the later Tantric traditions that combine the (so-called) Vedic and Tantric perspectives. See, for example, Bhāskara Rāya's Varivasyārahasya. A chart of these stages of the upward development of phonemic energies is appended to Subrahmaṇya Śāstrī's edition and translation of this text (see bibliography). There we see clearly how Bhāskara Rāya relates all these dimensions.

[3] See below, p. 417-420.

terms, objectivity is initially merged into the subjective aspect of consciousness, which is then absorbed into the pure consciousness that transcends subject and object. Above the audible sound of the syllable OṀ is the sphere of the ideal objects denoted by speech (vācya), represented by the Point and the Half Moon. The Point symbolizes the union of transcendental Śiva and His energy, which corresponds to the sphere of immanence. It is energy gathered together in a highly concentrated state that contains in potential the entire sphere of manifestation. This the Kubjikā Tantras identify with the seed of the goddess, rather than the god. The Half Moon represents the point at which this potential is just about to actualize itself and emerges to manifest externally. As such it is said to be the 'vitality of emission' (sṛṣṭivīrya) that manifests objectivity and, nectar-like, falls onto the Point that contains what is to be made manifest. It is the first sign of the awakening of the Point and its rupture. The Half Moon goes on to develop into the Full Moon of the Point once filled with the 'nectar' of the bliss, which accompanies emanation. In this way the energy of the Half Moon emits in the descending phase and withdraws in the ascending one.

The Obstructress (nirodhikā): The 'Obstructress' is the sound energy above the Point, which separates the lower outer sphere from the higher inner one. Sometimes identified with Raudrī,[1] this energy blocks or obstructs (nirodhikā) the divine beings that govern the lower spheres, preventing them from rising beyond it and being capable of perceiving the pure undifferentiated unity of the supreme state. This state represents a serious obstacle to the yogi's ascent but, if he manages to rise above it, it can also help to prevent him falling below it. Due to the dual function of the energy operating at this level, the Netratantra refers to it not only as the Obstructress, but also as the power of mantra (mantrakalā). As such it is the energy of the higher order of beings that operates through mantra. It is the level on which the energy of mantra is particularly powerful and helpful in maintaining the higher states.

Sound and the End of Sound: 'Sound' (nāda) is the name given to the pulse (spanda) of the supreme level of Speech (parā vāc), which animates the highest reality. The Netratantra refers to it as a form of sound that pervades the universe. Kṣemarāja explains that the energy of the higher levels initially manifests in two aspects. One is subjective, as the aggregate of the energies of Speech that function as the denotators (vācaka) of the second aspect, which consists of the aggregate of the energies of Speech, which they denote (vācya). When the initial impulse towards manifestation arises, the energy of consciousness retains the pulse of the second aspect within itself and expresses the pulse of the first aspect in the form of undifferentiated Sound. As this Sound is the denotator of the world of objects, which are its denoted meaning, it manifests (sphuṭati) the universe, and so is called the 'manifestor' (sphoṭa). As such it is the aggregate of phonemic energies (śabdagrāma) that generates the universe identified with the Sound Absolute (śabdabrahman) – the absolute reality in the form of sound (dhvanirūpa, śabdanasvabhāva). Viewed from the reverse perspective, Sound is the resonance that follows the Point that condenses the energy of mantra, which, through Sound, merges into Śiva's energy. Accordingly, it is defined as that which remains of the synthetic awareness of the conscious subject in itself when the duality of thought comes to an end.

[1] Cf. NT 22/39.

Sound is the reflective awareness of the energy of transcendental consciousness, which, becoming conscious of itself, assumes the form of 'Unstruck Sound' (anāhatadhvani). It is not manifest as the individual phonemic energies of Speech, but is the phonemic energy (varṇa) of all these as the instrumental cause of their manifestation, and underlies them when they are manifest individually. As such it can be identified with the emissive power of consciousness (visarga), as yet unmanifest, that resides in the junction between transcendent Śiva and his immanent energy. The Netratantra identifies it with the Sadāśiva principle, which corresponds to the state in which manifestation rests in Śiva's energy. Kashmiri Śaivites explain this state in terms of their phenomenology as being conscious of itself in its essential subjectivity (ahantā) and containing all the objectivity (idantā) that is to be made manifest.

The 'End of Sound' (nādānta) corresponds to the stage in which Sound dissolves into Energy, which is the following stage and the point of entry into the principle of Power (śaktitattva). It is said to be like the final resonance (anuraṇana) of a bell that can be faintly distinguished just before the sound of it ceases completely. It is also said to be like the sound of running water because, even though there is no physical sound, the 'resonance' of the energy of consciousness is rapid and indistinct. At this stage Śiva has a global consciousness of the universe that resides within Him, and is pervaded by the evanescent vibration of the End of Sound. Here the unity of the aggregate of phonemic energies, made manifest as the End of Sound, is full of the power of the supreme form of Speech from which it issues forth.

Energy and Beyond: The final phase of Sound merges into that of Energy, which is its source in which it abides, as the pulsation (spanda) of its potency. It marks the beginning of the union of Śiva with His power that takes place in three stages, manifested by the three energies called the 'Pervasive' (vyāpinī), the 'Equal One' (samanā) and the 'Transmental' (unmanā), respectively. Actually, 'samanā' literally means (the energy) 'with mind' in contrast to the one that follows which is 'unmanā' – 'without mind'.[1] However, the texts almost invariably explain the term 'samanā' as if it were a derivative of the word 'sama' meaning 'equal' as this is the experience at this level – i.e. one of the 'equality' of all things realised to be all the one, universal divine consciousness. The first of these energies – the Pervasive – is immanent in manifestation and, pervading it, gives it life. The second – the Equal One – is transcendent evolving into immanence. It marks the stage where the first pulse (spanda) of consciousness takes place that gives rise to the universe of manifestation. It absorbs it into itself when it is reabsorbed, and projects it out of itself when it is emitted. Finally, the Transmental is the supreme transcendental energy that is united with Śiva and is virtually one with Him. It is the highest and most subtle limit of immanence. As such it is the final point of transition into Śiva, which it pervades and in which it is stilled. Thus it is described as the transcendental Void of the energy of consciousness, and as uncreated, immobile Speech.

[1] This usage is clearly exemplified in the passage from the DP quoted below, p. 400-401.

The Transmental – the Goddess Beyond Mind

The Transmental – Beyond Mind – is where the basic mental state (manasatva) of the mind (manas) ceases. The door to liberation, according to Woodroffe, it is the 'secret teaching of all the Tantras'[1] and is indeed common doctrine to virtually all developed Śaiva and Śākta Tantric traditions. It is not only the highest of the series of states leading progressively to the liberated state, it is also a positive power that brings it about by severing the bonds of attachment to the world.[2] On the threshold of transcendence, the Transmental is the supreme transcendental energy that is united with Śiva and is virtually one with Him. This, according to the Kubjikā Tantras, is the essential metaphysical identity of the goddess Kubjikā. We have noted that Kashmiri Śaivites identify the Transmental with Spanda – the subtle activity of divine consciousness. Although a stage lower than Śiva, Spanda is elevated in the school by that same name, to the level of the supreme principle. The reason for this is essentially the same. Spanda / the Transmental / the goddess are the experience of the supreme reality which the Kubjikā tradition, in common with other schools, calls the Śāmbhava state. It is the means by which manifestation flows down from there, drenched in the lunar nectar of immortality:

> There, at the end of the mind, there is nothing else except the (energy) which is beyond the mind (manonmanī). (And so the goddess) is called the Transmental (unmanā), the supreme (energy), who transports the nectar (of immortality).[3]

---

[1] Woodroffe 1981: 425.
[2] Ibid.
[3] KuKh 15/13.

Kubjikā is the energy 'beyond mind' which leads to the pure transcendent Being of her consort. She is the Inexplicable (Anākhyā), Without Name (Anāmā). She is the semper eternum of God's Being which encompasses past, present and future in its inexplicable simultaneity which is, literally, beyond the mind. She is the final stage at the end of the ascent through the expanse of immanence, at the extremity of manifestation that merges into the transcendence of the Śāmbhava state:

> Above that is the Transmental (unmanā) state; that state (corresponds to the) Śāmbhava (principle). (One attains it) once one has practiced (immersion in) the one Void where everything comes to an end. And once the Transmental at the end of the Void has been reached, who is it that is not freed from bondage?[1]

> Emanation (sṛṣṭi) (generated) from the transmission (krama) abides alone in the Yoni, facing downwards. (This energy is) the Transmental (manonmanī), the essential Being (of all things) (sadbhāvā) and the great wave (of the energy of consciousness) whose form is Light.[2]

As the higher stage contains the ones below it, the highest stage – the Transmental – contains in itself all the phases of manifestation merged in the process of ascent and so, conversely, contains in a potential form all that is to be emitted. The Transmental thus lies at the interface between the sphere of phenomenal manifestation and Śiva's sphere, the Śāmbhavamaṇḍala. In this way the goddess links the two. Through her and by her, the energies in the upper sphere pour down into manifestation as the world of phenomena on the one hand and as the liberating teachings of her tradition on the other. Thus she is not only the port of entry into the upper sphere of the liberated condition, she leads upwards to it. Operating as the energy that leads to liberation, the Transmental is the Command (ājñā). Operating as the energy through which the world and the teachings are emitted, it is the Will (icchā). Thus, the Transmental which defines most essentially the goddess's metaphysical identity is the foundation of both the praxis and doxia of the Kubjikā Tantras. It is also of singular importance in other schools of which we will now examine a few examples.

First we turn to the Svacchandabhairavatantra. There we find that the Transmental appears, as usual, at the upper extremity of a progressive ascent of consciousness through the phases of the syllable OṀ. This takes place in

---

[1] KuKh 9/18-19ab.
[2] KuKh 24/44.

consonance with the pervasion of the vital breath through the centres of the body, each of which is governed by the five deities who preside over a 'karaṇa' that is, 'instrument' representing an aspect of the universal cause of creation and destruction. The process is termed 'the Abandonment of the Instruments' (karaṇatyāga) because, as the breath-cum-consciousness rises from one to the other, the lower is abandoned for the higher. This rise, essentially a variant of the one we have already examined leading to the End of the Twelve, can be represented schematically as follows.[1]

2. Table of the Five Instruments according to the Svacchandatantra

Phases of OṀ	Cause	Location
A	Brahmā	Heart
U	Viṣṇu	Throat
Ma	Rudra	Centre of the palate
The Point to Constraint	Īśvara	Centre of the eyebrows
Sound to the End of Sound	Sadāśiva	From forehead to head
Energy, Pervasion, Equal One and Transmental	Śiva	Centre of the head upwards

The level of the energy of the Equal One (samanā) is projected symbolically onto the topknot (śikhā) at the apex of the microcosmic body. Here the yogi experiences the 'equal flavour' (samarasa) of all things. His consciousness not directed to a specific object (mantavya), his mind abides in a state of pure indeterminate awareness (mananamātra). By rising beyond this level, the yogi's consciousness is purified and comes to rest in the power of the Transmental (unmanā), which is the undivided Light that illumines the entire universe, and attains Śiva.[2] In this way he goes beyond even the Transmental level and so abandons the six causes and merges into the seventh, which is Supreme Śiva – Paramaśiva – beyond them. According to the Svacchandatantra this is 'extremely subtle, the supreme state (bhāva) said to be non-being (abhāva)'. Kṣemarāja comments:

> The supreme state is the Supreme Being (sattā) of Paramaśiva. It should be known to be extremely subtle and the universal cause, which, because it is the cessation (prakṣaya) of all being, is Non-being.[3]

[1] SvT 4/262-266.
[2] SvT vol. 2 p. 66.
[3] Comm. on SvT 4/268cd.

The Transmental (unmanā), just below this state, is the reflective awareness of one's own nature that is directed in a subtle way (kiñcidaunmukhya) to its self-realisation. It represents the highest and subtlest limit of immanence as the universal Being (mahāsattā), which contains and is both being and non-being. At the same time, the energy of the Transmental is the direct means to the supreme state of Non-being. Thus while contemplation of the other lower phases in the development of OṀ bestows yogic powers (siddhi) of an increasing order of perfection, it alone leads to liberation directly. Accordingly, the Tantra enjoins that the yogi should constantly contemplate supreme and subtle Non-being by means of this energy. This is because Non-being is beyond the senses and mind and is, according to Kṣemarāja, the pure knower who has no objectively distinguishable characteristics (alakṣya). The Tantra concludes:

> Non-being should be contemplated by means of Being, after having rendered Being without foundation. (In this way) one attains the plane of Non-being free of all limitation: this is the abandonment of the causes.

Kṣemarāja comments:

> The plane whose nature is Non-being is that on which no phenomenal entities (bhāvāḥ) exist. It should be contemplated by Being, which is Supreme Being (parā sattā) of the nature of consciousness. (In response to the query) 'surely the consciousness principle is that which bestows being?' (He replies by saying that this is to be done) 'having rendered Being without foundation.' 'Being is that which exists (namely everything) from Sadāśiva to Earth; this is rendered without foundation and free of support in its tranquil (i.e., unmanifest) state by penetrating into the abode of power, thus causing it to be (the Transmental).[1]

The same theme is again taken up again a little further on when the Tantra comes to deal with the nature of the Voids. These are seven within which are distributed the phases of OṀ. As before, six levels are to be transcended and merged into the seventh, which is 'supremely subtle and devoid of all states.' The lower Voids are impure because they are unstable. This is true also of the sixth Void, which is that of the Transmental, even though it is Śakti and, as such, the way to achieve the highest Void. It is below the highest Void because it is the vibration of consciousness (spanda), which is in a state of subtle motion (kiñciccalatva) in relation to the supreme principle and so, according to this

[1] SvT vol. 2, p. 178.

Tantra, is not ultimate. The seventh Void is Non-being. The Svacchandatantra declares:

> That which is not void is called the Void, while the Void is said to be Non-being. Non-being is taught to be that wherein existing things have ceased to exist. (It is) pure Being (sattāmātra), supremely tranquil: that (transcendental) place abides in a certain indefinable manner.[1]

The TS takes up this theme. After quoting directly from the SvT, it teaches a series of absorptions of which 'establishment in Non-being' is presented as the highest. Here the yogi realises that supreme reality of 'Non-being' in which there is no-mind (amanaska). Free of phenomenal supports he thus achieves liberation. The KuKh adopts this doctrine from the TS[2], which is brought to fruition in the context of the teachings of the Kubjikā tradition by relating it to the Divine Current. This is the flux of the energies of the higher energies leading to the Transmental streaming through the centre of the End of the Twelve, understood in this context as aspects of the contemplation of Non-being. As the MBT teaches: 'One should constantly contemplate Non-being. (This) is the teaching concerning the arising of one's own nature'.[3] It is the teaching concerning the sequence of states and energies that constitute the Divine Current:

> Non-being, the teaching of the Divine Current, is the great bliss of the Sky (of consciousness) that, by means (of its) eighteen aspects, is the cause of the arising of one's own nature.[4]

These eighteen aspects are the sixteen energies associated with the goddess who is the seventeenth and the god, her partner and the first teacher, as the eighteenth. The detailed description of these phases of the flux of the energy of the Transmental through the Point in the centre of the maṇḍala within the End of the Twelve will be discussed elsewhere. Suffice it here to note that in this perspective, as in others we have examined, there is a vital connection between the End of the Twelve and the End of the Sixteen. In this case, the latter consists of the god and the goddess associated with the sixteen energies of the Divine Current of the Command, that is, the Transmental.

---

[1] SvT 4/292cd-293.
[2] See KuKh 40/151ab-166 and notes.
[3] KuKh 57/29ab.
[4] KuKh 57/37cd-38ab.

The Kubjikā tradition adds a dynamic dimension to the Transmental not found in most of the traditions that preceded it. Even the earlier Kaula teaching ascribed to Matsyendranātha taught in the KJN presents the Transmental much as it is in the SvT, that is, as a passive transcendental state. Thus the god teaches in the KJN:

> O goddess, one should not think of Water, Fire, Wind (or Space) either above, below or in the middle. O beloved, (the yogi becomes stiff) like a piece of wood (or) iron if the mind, O fair lady, is in the Transmental state. Place the void mind in the Void; (thus) the state of one who is without thought is immobile.[1]

The same practice is taught in the Śivasūtra which says: '(Comfortably) seated, (the yogi) sinks effortlessly into the lake (of consciousness)'.[2] Kṣemarāja quotes the following passage from the Netratantra in his commentary:

> One must not meditate on anything above, below, in the centre, in front, behind or to either side. One should not contemplate anything within the body or outside it. Do not fix your attention on the sky or below (on the earth). Neither close the eyes nor gaze fixedly. Think not of the support, the supported or (even of) the supportless, nor of the senses or of the gross elements or sound, taste, touch or anything else. Having abandoned (everything) in this way, be established in contemplation (samādhi) and become one. That is said to be the supreme state of Śiva, the supreme soul. Having attained that unmanifest (nirābhāsa) plane, (the state of bondage) ceases.[3]

But although there is no place to fix the mind – which in this state and by this practice has been transcended – nonetheless the NT,[4] like the SvT, teaches a path to the realisation of this condition by ascending through the stages of the utterance of the sacred syllable OṀ. According to the NT as well, the final stage of this ascent is the Transmental, which is the 'undifferentiated Self' (niṣkalaṁ ātmatattvam).[5] This is the stage of absolute consciousness, of complete pervasion by and inherence in Śiva (śivavyāpti): the transcendental Void (śūnyātiśūnya), beyond all appearing that is the 'unmanifest' to which the above passage refers.[6]

---

[1] KJN 14/82cd-84ab.
[2] ŚSū 3/17.
[3] NT 8/41-45.
[4] NT chapter 22 – summerized by Padoux 1990: 405 ff.
[5] NT 22/22.
[6] nirābhāsaṁ paratattvam anuttamam | NT 22/23b.

We turn now to see what the Kālīkrama has to say. Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī, along with Mahālakṣmī, is one of the main forms of Kālī worshipped as the supreme goddess in the JY. In accord with its own perception of itself, Sanderson refers to the tradition of the JY, which is the earliest substantial scriptural form of the Kālīkrama, as the Mata. The Mata teaches, as do the Kubjikā Tantras, that the goddess is the Transmental in the End of the Twelve. One wonders why this perception of Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī is virtually absent in Abhinava's exegesis. Was this because he wished to reserve this high state for the goddesses of the Trika as, indeed, he presents them? Whatever be the case, we should notice first of all that according to the Kālīkrama, like the Kubjikā tradition, the Transmental is more than the transcendent beyond mind. It is also – indeed, above all – the supremely active energy of consciousness. This activity is understood in the Kubjikā Tantras to be creative and so the Transmental is accordingly symbolized by the Yoni. Conversely, although Kālī, the Transmental in the End of the Twelve, is no less active in the Kālīkrama, instead of creating it consumes – the goddess absorbs time into eternity, diversity into oneness. It is for this reason that she also 'measures out' time. In the following passage from the JY we find Bhairava seated on the beautiful peak of Kailāśa. He is telling the goddess about his inner state:

> Established in the supreme state, I was penetrated by powerful meditation. Then (when this was happening) my supreme energy was awakened from the Root Wheel (kandacakra). Her nature the Great Consciousness and delighting in bliss endowed with consciousness, she entered into the reality in the centre within the foundation, which is the Void of the Pulsing Union (saṁghaṭṭa). There in the centre, O daughter of the mountains, is the supreme light between the two, being and non-being. Within that centre my (energy) abides in accord with (her supreme) state of being. (She is) Kālī who generates (kalanī) time, she who is the cause of cogitation (kalpanā). Then that supreme goddess who devours time issued forth, absorbed in the bliss of her own (innate) bliss, powerful with the contemplation of (her) own nature. Established on the plane of consciousness and the unconscious, she is between the plane of consciousness and the unconscious. (She is) the goddess who is the Great Void, the Transmental who devours time.
>
> (She is) Kālī who generates (kalanī) time, who causes (all the states of consciousness) from the Fourth onwards to unfold. As she drags (all time) properly (into her own Voidness), she is said to be the One Who Drags – Saṁkarṣaṇī. As she drags (out) the supreme place (sthāna) in the Void from (her own) body and if one stimulates (consciousness) (pīḍayet) (she) awakens, so she is said to be the One Who Drags – Saṁkarṣaṇī.

> As she abides as the Void and transports the breath of inhalation and exhalation and resides in the End of the Twelve, she is said to be the supreme Kālī. As she measures out time, Kālī is the (true) deity.[1]

Notice that Kālī generates time just as she is the cause of cogitation. An activity of the mind, cogitation is set in time. Indeed, this passage implies that cogitation itself is time, a view that Abhinava expounds and defends.[2] In other

---

[1] dhyānena mahatāviṣṭaḥ [k, kh, g: sa-; kh, g: -viṣṭo] parabhāvasthito hy aham ||
tadā me paramā śaktiḥ kandacakrāt prabodhitā |
mahāsaṁvitsvarūpā sā sacidānandanandinī ||
saṁghaṭṭavivarādhāre madhyatattve samāsataḥ |
tatra madhye parā jyotiḥ [g: jyoti] sadasaddvayamadhyagā [k, kh, g: sadasadvaya-] ||
tasmin madhye yathā bhāvaṁ [g: ?] sthitaṁ me parvatātmaje |
kālī kālasya kalanī [k, kh, g: karaṇī] kalpanāheturūpiṇī ||
*tadā sā paramā devī nirgatā kālabhakṣaṇī [kh: * ? bhakṣaṇī] |
svānandānandasaṁlīnā svabhāvabhāvanotkaṭā [k, kh, g: svabhāvā; kh: -ṭhā] ||
cidacitpadasaṁrūḍhā cidacitpadamadhyagā |
*mahāvyomātmikā devī unmanā kālabhakṣaṇī [kh: kāla * * ?] ||
kālī kālasya kalanī [kh: karaṇī] turyādipravikāsinī [kh, g: -śinī] |
samyag ākarṣayed yasmāt tena [kh: tanta] saṁkarṣaṇī smṛtā [kh: ?] ||
ākarṣayet paraṁ sthānaṁ khe [k: sve] gātrāt [k, kh, g: yaṁtrāt] pīḍayed [kh: ?] yadā |
prabodhaṁ [kh, g: -dha] kurute yasmāt tena [kh, g: tasmāt] saṁkarṣaṇī smṛtā ||
vyomnā ca vartate yasmāt prāṇāpānapravāhakī |
dvādaśāntasthitā yasmāt [kh: ?] tasmāt [kh: ?] kālī parā smṛtā ||
kālaṁ kalayate yasmāt tasmāt kālī tu devatā | JY 4/19/183cd-192ab.

[2] There are two aspects of consciousness (saṁvit). One is temporal and the other is not. The latter is the sphere of pure manifestation (prakāśamātra) and consciousness (saṁvinmātra). The former is the sphere of the activity of its reflective awareness. This activity is divided up into moments of perception-cum-cogitation (vikalpa) by the power of time that belongs to non-temporal pure consciousness. Abhinava explains:

> Knowledge is not divided (bhinna) by the diversity of the objects of knowledge. (It is universal and pervasive) as is (the vision of) a man standing on the peak of a mountain. Time is the agent of differentiation. In its subtlest form it is considered to be an instant. 'An instant' is the subtlest limit (of time) and it is the duration of (a moment) of awareness. (This must be so) otherwise, even the wisest would not be able to explain it. What is the limit measure of consciousness? Up to the point that its non-existence manifests. This non-existence (of knowledge) doesn't occur until a conjunction or disjunction in the sense organs, the object of knowledge or the experiencing subject, takes place (between consciousness and each other). If (this conjunction and disjunction) is a pulsation (spanda), it must certainly (depend) on the movement of the breath, and so when this pulse of the vital force ceases, it also no longer exists. Nor does the non-existence of this (conjunction and disjunction) entail the non-existence of consciousness. (Their cessation) is that very same consciousness (in all its fullness). In reality (consciousness) is not long (or short) because all temporal distinctions have been eliminated. Thus, consciousness is not affected by time and it is one and devoid of differentiated thought forms. Even so, it is aware in this way and that of the multiple objects of knowledge, thus turning into words, Kālī produces time and with it the entire sphere of temporal manifestation by generating perceptions and their attendant cogitation. Conversely, as the energy of the Transmental, she 'drags' into the Void of eternity – unmanifest beyond time which is its source – time by absorbing all forms of cognition. She is the goddess who 'devours time' by consuming thought constructs into herself – the Transmental.

The Devīpañcaśataka is an important source of the Kālīkrama that developed in Kashmir after the Kālī Mata of the JY. Jayaratha quotes it extensively in his commentary on Abhinava's exposition of the cycle of Twelve Kālīs. They are the twelve phases of the Wheel of the Inexplicable, which Abhinava presents as the cycle of cognitive activity (pramāṇa). This is preceded by the Wheels of Emanation, Persistence and Withdrawal and is followed, according to some branches of the Kālīkrama, by that of Illumination (bhāsā). Together they constitute the Fivefold Reality (pañcārtha) governed and sustained by the goddess Kālī. She is presented in the following passage in her fifth and highest phase as pure Illumination – Bhāsā. The pure will of Śiva, she has two aspects: With Mind, and the Transmental. The former is the energy that illumines all forms of manifestation – symbolized by the Sun, Moon, Fire and the stars. The latter consumes the former into the undifferentiated radiance of the Void of pure consciousness:

> The Great God – Mahādeva – is beyond Śakti, supreme bliss, free of qualities and supports, unchanging, supreme, pure, free of cause and (without) example, present within all existing things, beyond the Void, free of defects, omnipresent, the doer of all things, free, full of nectar and, unconditioned, is present in all living beings. O Supreme Lord! By his awakening, that supreme Kālikā has spontaneously arisen (svecchayā), the one supreme power endowed with those same attributes. She is subtle, supreme, tranquil, and delighted by supreme bliss. Śivā has arisen spontaneously (svabhāvataḥ); stainless, she is (all that is) knowable. She is the Supreme Goddess (parameśvarī) who, by her own will, is (both) the Transmental (unmanā) ('Without Mind') and With Mind (samanā).[1] differentiated thought forms (vikalpa) in the field of phenomenal being. Until another pulse (spanda) manifests, that discoursive awareness (vikalpa) stands alone as a unified whole (eka) conceiving multiple things.

---

TĀ 7/24cd-32ab.

[1] śaktyātītaḥ parānando guṇāśrayavivarjitaḥ ||
nirvikāraḥ paraḥ śuddho hetudṛṣṭāntavarjitaḥ |
sarvabhāvāntarasthaś ca vyomātīto nirāmayaḥ [g: nī-] ||
sarvagaḥ sarvakartā [kh, g: -rttā] ca svacchando 'mṛtanirbharaḥ [k, kh: svacchandā] |
nirupādhir mahādevaḥ sarvabhūteṣv avasthitaḥ ||
tasyāvabodhāt paramā svecchayā parameśvara |
jātā sā [k, kh, g: tat] kālikā śaktir ekā taddharmadharmiṇī [g: tarddharmmadharmmīṇī] ||

The (power) that shares in Śiva's attributes has arisen without (prior) reflection (acintitā) like the light of the rays in the sun and (the power) to burn within fire. It is Śiva's will in the form of the Transmental and With Mind, (arisen as) both nondual and dual (respectively). 'I desire this and that spontaneously (anicchātaḥ lit. 'without desire')' – that is this desire, the action within Śiva that has arisen as the supreme power who is the Transmental and With Mind.[1]

And (that energy) With Mind generates the Fivefold Reality (pañcārtha) within this universe. The Transmental, who is Śiva's capacity (to do all things) (sāmarthya), bestows the most excellent knowledge. She, the Supreme Goddess, again then spontaneously (svecchayā) devours the universe. The permutation (of the Transmental) is said to be the Light that precedes the mistress of the Wheel of Rays (of divine consciousness). Linked to Moon, Sun and Fire, she generates the seeds of (her) energies. Her form is one and, transcendent (nirālokā), is the supreme abode. She assumes a state of oneness in the middle of one who possesses (her) radiant energy. She shines, present in multiplicity (nānākhya) like the light of many suns. (That light) is not the moon, (or) the light of the stars; it is not the light of the rays of (the sun), the lord of the sky, nor is it the brilliance of lightning – nor is it like the beautiful sun (of energy). That Light (bhāsā) is seen in the belly (of consciousness) with the eye of knowledge, that is, in the eye on the path of opening (unmeṣa). She is not seen otherwise. All (things) shine due to her: Fire, Moon, Sun and stars. As the division of Sun and Moon, she bestows the plane of oneness. Thus she is the aggregate (kula) of rays and, ferocious, she is the Supreme One (Parā) who has reached the final end of Kula and devours duality with the Yoga of the Fire of (Universal) Destruction.[2]

---

sūkṣmarūpā [kh, g: śūkṣma-] parā śāntā paramānandananditā |
svabhāvataḥ śivā jātā vedyarūpā nirañjanā ||
unmanā samanā sā tu svecchayā parameśvarī | DP 7/18cd-23ab.

[1] yathā raśmiprabhā [g: rāśmi-] sūrye [g: sūrya] vahnau ca dahanātmikā || acintitā samutpannā śivasya sahadharmiṇī |
samanonmanarūpeṇa śivecchā [g: śivacchā] dvayam advayam ||
tat tad icchāmy anicchātas tadiccheyaṁ [k, kh, g: -da] kriyā [k, kh: kriye; g: kriyo] śive |
saṁbhūtā [g: saṁbhūtāṁ] tu [g: ta] parā śaktiḥ [g: śakti] samanonmanarūpiṇī || Ibid. 7/23cd-25.

[2] samanā caiva viśve 'smin pañcārthānāṁ prasūyinī |
unmanā śivasāmarthyā [g: -sāmathyā] dāpayej [k, kh, g: darpayej] jñānam uttamam ||
punaḥ sā grasate viśvaṁ svecchayā parameśvarī |
tadvivartaḥ [k, kh, g: -vivarta] smṛto jyotiḥ puñjacakreśipūrvagaḥ [g: puñjacakrośi-] ||
kalābījāni sūte ca somārkānalasaṁyutā |
ekākārā nirālokā paradhāmasvarūpiṇī ||

The DP is still an anonymous scripture. Subsequently, when the Kashmiri Kālīkrama developed in the hands of known authors, the doctrines were presented again and further developed along the lines already established. Moreover, they were enriched with a more sophisticated hermeneutics based on a subtler, more detailed conception of the dynamics of consciousness. In this expanded perspective, the twelfth century Kashmiri Śitikaṇṭha adds new dimensions to the conception of the Transmental and the two energies that precede it, the Pervasive and the Equal One. According to him they are the phases of the will of universal, divine consciousness that emanates, sustains and withdraws its manifestations. In this context, the Transmental also brings about withdrawal but it is understood as one of the three aspects of the Original Energy (ādyaśakti) of consciousness. To explain this, Śitikaṇṭha quotes the following passage:

> By its unfolding, the will arises which generates (all things). It is emanation (sṛṣṭi). The supreme and the first, she is called the Pervasive One (vyāpinī). Whenever this will falls spontaneously on (any) external object, that relish (carvaṇa) (of its essential nature) is persistence and is said to be the Equal One (samanā). Assuming its own essential nature, (that same energy is) withdrawn because (of the ensuing) indifference (to the object once known and experienced) and the contraction of the expansion (in the previous phases). Thus, due to the power of the Transmental, withdrawal (saṁhāra) takes place.[1]

This is a feature that the goddess cults of Kālī and Kubjikā have in common with respect to those of the gods Svacchanda and Mṛtyuñjaya as well as of the Bhairava of the early Kaula schools. The former stress the dynamic energetic nature of the Transmental, the latter that it is transcendental; these two approaches are combined in the Trika. In particular we may examine two contexts in which the Transmental appears in Abhinava's presentation of the Trika. The first is the visualization of the Trident that serves as the seat (āsana) for the deities of the Trika.

---

tejas tu [g: tra] yasya madhyasthā saikībhāvatvam [g: maikī-] āgatā |
nānākhyagā tu sā bhāti bhūribhānusamaprabhā ||
na śaśī tārakābhā no [k, kh, g: vo] nāsau vyomeśaraśmibhā |
na ca sā taḍitaḥ prakhyā citrabhānusamā na sā ||
sā bhāsā jaṭhare caiva [k, kh, g: naiva] dṛśyate jñānacakṣuṣā |
unmeṣamārgacakṣuṣe nānyathā dṛśyate tu sā ||
pradīpyante tayā sarve [g: sarvva] vahnicandrārkatārakāḥ [g: -tārikāḥ] |
ravisomavibhāgena sāmarasyapadapradā ||
tena [k, kh: tenā; g: tanā] sormikulā bhīmā [kh: bhāmā] dvaitabhāvasya bhakṣiṇī | saṁhāravahniyogena kulaprāptagatā parā || Ibid. 7/26-33.

[1] MP (1) p. 39.

Śiva is generally worshipped seated on a seat or throne (āsana). The officiant should think that this throne consists of the thirty-six principles (tattva). In the case of Trika ritual they are projected into the vital breath and assimilated with various parts of the Trident, which is the core of the Trika maṇḍala.[1] According to Abhinavagupta, Trika excels other schools because the thrones described by them reach only certain principles[2] whereas that of the Trika extends up to the Transmental beyond Sadāśiva.[3] We are especially concerned here with the three prongs of the Trident. These issue out of the navel of Sadāśiva who lies supine, gazing upwards into the Cavity of Brahmā. Abhinava explains:

> (The devotee) should meditate on how three rays are born from (Sadāśiva's) navel. These, of the nature of the End of Sound, consist of Power (śakti), the Pervasive One (vyāpinī) and the Equal One (samanā). Resplendent with these (there) they radiate out of the three cavities of the head until they reach the End of the Twelve. There are three pure lotuses on top of them whose nature is the Transmental. Such is the Throne consisting of thirty-seven principles.[4]

Ascending along the Trident, duality diminishes step by step until one reaches the Transmental, which is the level of oneness free of all differentiation.[5] In accord with the Trika doctrine of 'triadic oneness' the Transmental consists of three lotuses. These blooming lotuses are the seats of the three goddesses of the Trika – Parā in the centre and Aparā and Parāparā to her left and right along with their consorts Bhairavasadbhāva, Navātmabhairava and Ratiśekhara, respectively. Abhinava explains:

> It is said[6] that the three prongs are Power, the Pervasive and the Equal One. There also, (above) is the supreme abode (paramadhāman) of the plane of the Upper (ūrdhva) Kuṇḍalinī pertaining to the Transmental and described as being of the form of three lotuses. 'This is the supreme throne'[7] because it reaches up to Parā. The goddesses abide above it.[8]

---

[1] See TĀ 15/295cd-312.
[2] TĀ 15/319-320.
[3] Concerning the throne see SŚP 3/47-56 and the notes; also SvT 2/55cd ff..
[4] TĀ 15/313-314. These verses are a paraphrase of MVT 8/69-70.
[5] TĀ 15/342-343ab.
[6] In MVT 8/96ab.
[7] MVT 8/70cd.
[8] śaktivyāpinīsamanātmakaśṛṅgatrayam uktam | tatrāpi unmanasordhvakuṇḍalikāpadaparama-dhāmasitakamala [+ -traya-] rūpatayā nirūpitam ity etat paramāsanaṁ parāparyantatvāt iti

A common feature of all these presentations of the Transmental, whether passively transcendental or actively engaged in emanation and withdrawal, is the link between the Transmental and the experience of lunar nectar. The Kubjikā sources, as in several other instances, are anticipated by the less sophisticated teachings of the KJN. After expounding the transcendental nature of the Transmental the KJN proceeds to tell us how this state is attained by means of Gesture (mudrā), that is, by the rise of Kuṇḍalinī. Here she is called Anāmā – the Nameless – one of the names also given to the goddess Kubjikā:

> The Nameless (energy) is fixed in the Heart. This is the Gesture (mudrā) that bestows the goddess. If one sees her in the End of the Twelve, she shines (like) a necklace of gems. This is the Gesture (mudrā) called Anāmā; once (it is) known (one attains) the (liberated) skyfaring state. O beloved, one must break though the door which, endowed with consciousness, is sealed with the Five Seals (of the lower Wheels) and is well obstructed by the chain (of the door). Break through the End of the Twelve, which is such, by means of the activity of Śakti. (The letters) that are goddesses and Yoginīs present on the plane of the Wheel of the Phonemes (mātṛcakra) merge into the Wheel of the Skyfaring goddesses, (and so in this way) generate (kṣobhayet) the supreme nectar. O goddess, without nectar how, O beloved, (can one attain) immortality? Nectar is the essence of Kaula.[1]

The purpose of raising Kuṇḍalinī is to drink lunar nectar according to the Kālī teachings of the JY as well. In the following passage we observe that Kuṇḍalinī who releases this nectar is in two places: there is the Upper (ūrdhva) Kuṇḍalinī who is in the End of the Twelve,[2] and the lower one in the genitals. Both tadupari ca devīnāṁ sthitiḥ iti | PTv text in Jayadeva 1988: 43-44. See Gnoli 1965: 219-220 and Sanderson 1986: 178 ff. and ibid.: 187 for a drawing of the Trident that is visualized in the body.

---

[1] anāmā hṛdaye lagnā mudreyam īśvarīpradā |
dvādaśānte yadā paśyet sphurantīṁ [sphurantan] maṇimālikām [-kā] || anāmā nāma mudreyaṁ jñātā khecaratāgatiḥ [-tāṁ gatim] |
mudritaṁ pañcamudrābhiś caitanyasahitaṁ priye ||
bhedayet tat kapāṭañ ca argalayā [argalā yā] susañcitam |
tāvac ca [pañcā] dvādśāntaṁ yat [yāvac] śaktyācāreṇa bhedayet ||
devyo [devyā] bhūtvā ca yoginyo [yoginyā] mātṛcakrapadānugāḥ [-cakrāvaśānugā] |
līyante khecarīcakre kṣobhayet paramāmṛtam ||
amṛtena vinā devi amaratvaṁ kathaṁ priye |
amṛtaṁ kaulasadbhāvaṁ . . . . || KJN 14/90-94c. The text is drawn from the printed edition. The emendations are mine.

[2] Comm. TĀ 5/111.

emit nectar, thus clearly equating the seminal fluid that flows out below with the white lunar fluid that streams down from above:

> That energy (called) Kuṇḍalinī resides in the Secret Wheel (in the genitals). O fair lady, that place which fulfils all desires should always be kept secret. Then (it is called) Guhyā (the Hidden One) and is always more secret than the secret. The nectar that comes out of this is hard to acquire by gods or demons. A thousand rebirths are destroyed in the Ocean of Kula of one who possesses it. [. . .] Amā, the energy of the (New) Moon is located in the Door of Brahmā. Pure water falls (from) there and, having fallen into the heart of Kuṇḍalī, the nectar which is the juice of Kuṇḍalī comes out of his body. By just eating this, (yogis) become immortal and free of old age, wrinkles, white hair and all diseases.[1]

Śitikaṇṭha, who expounds the Kashmiri Kālīkrama, describes a similar process in his Mahānayaprakāśa in relation to the circle of Śāktasiddhas:

> Śākinī who is born from the one sacred seat (that contains the entire flux – Krama – of the energies of consciousness) is endowed by means of (the following) eight forms with the most excellent contemplation[2] and brings about repose in the (well) practiced place above and below. These places are eight. (Coming forth) from the Foundation of Birth by the emergence of the vital breath of the Root (kunda), it brings it to rest in the upward flowing rise (of the vital breath) in the end of the channel of the navel. (Then it assumes) a fixed form (sthitirūpa) at the end of the cavity of the Heart and in the mouth and palate by checking the upward and downward movement (of the breath). (Then) having stabilized (sthitiṁ kṛtvā) the Wheel of the Point (between the eyebrows) and of the head (in the Cavity of Brahmā) by the flow (of the breath) of the three: middle, upward and downward, the arising (of

---

[1] yā sā kuṇḍalinīśaktir guhyacakre vyavasthitā ||
guhanīyaṁ sadā bhadre tat sthānaṁ sarvakāmadam |
tadā guhyeti vikhyātaṁ guhyād guhyataraṁ sadā ||
tadudbhavaṁ tu amṛtaṁ durlabhaṁ yat surāsuraiḥ |
yasya janma sahasrāṇi kṣayaṁ yānti kulārṇave || JY 4/21/74-76ab.
[. . .] amā somakalā yā tu brahmadvāre vyavasthitā |
tatra pātaṁ jalaṁ śuddhaṁ patitaṁ kauṇḍalīhṛdi [k, kh: kauṇḍilī-] ||
tasya dehād viniṣkrāntam amṛtaṁ kauṇḍalīrasam [k: kauṇḍilī-; kh: kauḍilī-] |
tena prāśitamātreṇa bhavanti hy ajarāmarāḥ ||
valipalitanirmuktāḥ [k: -taṁnirmuktāṁ] sarvavyādhivivarjitāḥ | Ibid. 4/21/78cd-80.

[2] Read śreṣṭhasaṁkhyānāpannā for śreṣṭhasaṁkhyāmāpannā.

consciousness) that takes place by being divested (of the obstacles in these places) is strengthened by the downward movement. Then by (its) downward movement and (its) entry into the Kula (aggregate of bodily energies), (its) nourishment develops (consciousness) (samṛddhida) by coming to rest in the abode of the supreme (energy) (parāsthāna).

If (consciousness) abides in the Point (bindu) one can drink the nectar of the Moon located above. It is the light of the Abode of the Moon. Achieve repose by the unfolding of the microcosm (aṇḍavikāsa).[1] This is the unique and special (quality) of the light of the Abode of the Sun. The digestion (of multiplicity) is the power of the gastric fire of the navel[2] because, even though (this) Fire pervades the entire body, the Violent digestion (haṭhapāka) of diversity takes place in the belly.[3] This is the external (process). Such is the threefold process (krama), that is, the coming to rest of all the energies of the Point in the Root (kanda). This has been explained as the power (dharma) of the New Moon. Such is the process related to the dwelling place (of the Śāktasiddhas).

Or else, repose in the abode of the supreme (energy) (parā) takes place having arisen from the boundary of the Cavity (kavāṭa) of the Point and entered (therein) by the Path of the Bridge (between the eyebrows), which is the last (upper) part. In this way, the eight (energies of the Siddhas in the aforementioned places) that have been activated (udita lit. 'arisen') (in this way) obtain the life force (jīvana) in every way of the Body of Kula located in the flow of the pervasive (breath). This is the sequence of consciousness (saṁvitkrama) of the Śākta (Siddhas). Thus, by means of the eight (energies of these places), the Moon melts. And (the experience of) that (Moon) culminates (in its most developed

---

[1] The word 'aṇḍa' literally means 'egg'. Presumably, what is meant here is the Egg of Brahmā, i.e. the universe that is projected into the body.
[2] Concerning this fire, see KuKh 25/9cd-12ab and note.
[3] Cf. TĀ 3/259cd-262:

The masters have said that the form (of consciousness) that transcends limiting conditions is of two types according to whether it comes about by the non-arising of limitations or by their cessation (praśama). Again, (their) cessation is of two kinds, according to whether it takes place peacefully or by a process of violent digestion (haṭhapākakrameṇa) brought about (in an instant by Bhairava) who is called the One Who Delights in Devouring Completely and whose nature is perpetually aflame. This (manner of) cessation, which is brought about by violent digestion, is the third type. It burns the fuel of differentiation (bheda) and is (particularly) worthy of being taught. All existing things consigned in an instant (haṭhataḥ) to the fire that burns in the stomach of one's own consciousness abandon the division of relative distinctions and thus fuel it by their power.

form) in order to bring about the wonder of supreme bliss throughout one's own Body of Kula.[1]

The End of the Sixteen

Just as the much better-known End of the Twelve is located at a symbolic distance of twelve fingers above the head, the End of the Sixteen is four fingers breadth above that. According to the Kubjikā Tantras, this is the 'place' where liberation is finally attained. Although the End of the Twelve above the head was virtually forgotten by the Tantric traditions that developed after the 12th century, it was a common basic feature of the inner yogic physiology of the great majority, if not all, the Tantric traditions that developed before then. However, the End of the Sixteen above it was not. Abhinavagupta refers to the End of the Twelve extensively as the highest point in the rise of Kuṇḍalinī, but never refers to the End of the Sixteen. Is this because it had not yet been 'discovered' by the Tantric traditions that preceded him to which he refers? It is not known, or at least not well known, to the main Siddhāntāgamas. It is certainly unknown to the Svacchanda and *Netratantra*s. Although the BY knows about Kuṇḍalinī and even associates her with the sixteen vowels,[2] no mention is made of the End of the Sixteen. Indeed, the BY, probably the earliest major Bhairava Tantra of the Vidyāpīṭha,[3] makes no reference even to the End of the Twelve, let alone the End of the Sixteen.

Similarly, the End of the Sixteen appears to have been ignored by the Trika Tantras. It is practically unknown to the TS and the MVT and is not mentioned in the fragment we possess of the Siddhayogeśvarīmata. There is a unique reference in the TS to an 'end of the sixteen'. Although it is not to the End of the Sixteen, which is the object of our enquiry, it is interesting as it exemplifies the close relationship between that and an 'end of the twelve'. Although this too is not the End of the Twelve to which we are referring, the relationship between twelve and sixteen is exemplified. The vowels are sixteen, as are the digits of the moon. If the so-called four neuter ones (ṣaṇṭhavarṇa) are not counted, they become twelve, like the solar months. The context is a description of the progressive ascent of the Point (bindu) of consciousness and vitality through a series of stages projected into the body and beyond. Bhairava tells his consort:

> And, O beloved, above the uvula there are two Points. That, fair lady, is called the 'end of emission' (visargānta i.e. the end of the

---

[1] MP (1) p. 98-100.
[2] evaṁ kuṇḍalinī śaktiḥ svaraiḥ ṣoḍaśabhiḥ sthitā [k, kh: -tāḥ] | BY 1/137ab.
[3] Concerning the Vidyāpīṭha Tantras, see Sanderson 1987.

> sixteenth vowel) and the 'end of the twelve', the end of the energies (of the vowels) (kalā), the end of the vowels and the end of the sixteen.[1]

The evidence in the Kubjikā Tantras suggests that the End of the Sixteen is an additional, emergent development. Perhaps the reason why we do not find references in these Trika sources is that they are relatively early. However, the presence of the End of the Sixteen in the JY suggests that this is not so. Parallel to the absence of this higher Wheel in the Trika sources is the relatively scant use of lunar symbolism. The association of the figure sixteen with the digits of the moon is evident and well represented in the yogic symbolism related to the End of the Sixteen. One wonders whether, in general, the development of this new, higher place may not have been the result of a transition from an earlier solar symbolism – linked to the number twelve – and a later lunar one. The former is quite clear in the following reference in the Tantrāloka.

> It is said in the Vīrāvalītantra: 'When by merging the mind one-pointedly into Śiva's nature that is pure enlightened consciousness (bodhamātra), the Sun (of prāṇa) and the Moon (of apāna) set. (Then, when) the Sun of Life, which is one's own consciousness, has reached the End of the Twelve, that is said to be liberation. Breath control is useless. Breath control, which (merely) inflicts pain on the body, is not to be practiced. He who knows this secret is both liberated and liberates others.'[2]

Referring to the Śrīvidyā tradition, Padoux pertinently remarks, after noting the occasional, rare occurrence of the End of the Sixteen with respect to the End of the Twelve as the location of the highest Wheel (cakra) in the subtle body: 'Even so, in the measure in which the dvādaśānta [End of the Twelve] is considered to have twelve petals, a solar number, it naturally evokes another cakra that should have sixteen, a lunar number and one of plenitude'.[3] The Svacchandasaṁgraha, quoted by Amṛtānanda in his commentary on the YHṛ,[4] is one of the rare places in which the End of the Sixteen is mentioned in the texts of the Śrīvidyā tradition. There it is explained in a similar way as 'the end of

---

[1] lambakasyordhvataś caiva dvau bindū [k: divyau; kh, g: vindvau] yatra te priye ||
visargāntaṁ tu taṁ proktaṁ dvādaśāntaṁ ca bhāmini |
kalāntaṁ [k: kakhāntaṁ] ca svarāntaś [kh: svarānta] ca ṣoḍaśāntaṁ ca taṁ smṛtam ||
TS 1/81cd-82.

[2] TĀ 4/89-91.

[3] Padoux 1994: 287 fn. 67.

[4] YHṛ p. 324, comm. on 3/135cd-134ab.

emission' (visargānta), which is the sixteenth vowel. Moreover, there the lunar nature of the End of the Sixteen is explicit:

> The Circle of the Moon in the abode of the Void (vyomasthāna) is called the End of the Sixteen. The solar orb is in the place below it and it possesses twelve energies. It is called the End of the Twelve and is the location of the Void.

The JY expounds the cult of the goddess Kālī in numerous forms, especially as Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī – the Attractress of Time – who consumes it. As such she is identified with the seventeenth digit of the Moon, which as the Kubjikā Tantras also affirm, 'devours time'.[1] Accordingly, the Vidyā of the goddess Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī consists of seventeen syllables. Her secret, most powerful form is fully developed when the ascending recitation of her mantra reaches its final syllable at the 'end of the sixteen'. So we read in the second ṣaṭka of the Jayadrathayāmalas.

> I have explained the mother of mantras consisting of seventeen syllables along with (her) letters. [. . .] She is the abode at the beginning and at the end of time and is the consumer of time of the (lunar) energies (kalā). Established in the dynamism of the centre (madhyavṛtti), she consumes the threefold time (of past, present and future). Gross time is emanation (sṛṣṭi). It abides as the first of all (things). The secret one of (all the) gods and goddesses is located at the End of the Sixteen. Located on the plane of Kula, that is the time that destroys.[2]

We would expect these seventeen units to be arranged in as many locations along the axis of the subtle body. We do find this is the case and, moreover, this was clearly known to Abhinava. Thus he presents an ascending series marking the stages of the rise of Kuṇḍalinī, the highest stage of which is

---

[1] Caṇḍikā devours time. There are sixteen energies of the Moon. (Caṇḍikā) is the one called Amā, which is the seventeenth that is on the (liberated) plane of the skyfaring state.

*kālabhakṣī ca [k, kh, gh: ] caṇḍikā [k, kh, gh: + ca] kalāś [k, kh, gh: kalā] ṣoḍaśa ||
saptādaśī amā nāma [k, gh: nīma] khecaratvapadānugā | YKh (1) 1/43cd-44ab.

[2] mantramātā mayā khyātā varṇaiḥ saptadaśākṣarā || [. . .]
ādyantakālanilayā kalānāṁ kālabhakṣaṇī ||
madhyavṛttisamārūḍhā tridhākālaṁ prabhakṣayet [-yat] |
sthūlaṁ [sphūlaṁ] sṛṣṭimayaṁ kālaṁ sarva-ādyena saṁsthitam ||
guhyaṁ [sūhyaṁ] ca devadevīnāṁ ṣoḍaśāntavyavasthitam |
sa ca saṁhārakaṁ nāma kālaṁ kulapade sthitam || JY 2/19/172ab, 173-175ab.

that of the 'Pure Self' heralded by the Transmental just below it. In this set-up, drawn by Abhinavagupta from the Devyāyāmala, there are seventeen stages. These are:

1) the Root (mūla), 2) the Bulb (kanda), 3) the Ether (nabhas), 4) the Navel (nābhi), 5) the Heart (hṛt), 6) the Throat (kaṇṭha), 7) the Forehead (bhālika), 8) the Palate (tālu), 9) the Half Moon (ardhacandra), 10) the Obstructress (rodhikā), 11) the Sound (nāda), 12) the End of Sound (nādānta), 13) the Pervasive One (vyāpī), 14) Power (śakti), 15) the Equal One (samanā), 16) the Transmental (unmanā) and 17) the Supreme Wheel of the Pure Self (śuddhātmaparacakra).

Although the Devyāyāmala has been lost, we know very well from references that the goddess of that Tantra was Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī. Indeed, Jayaratha quotes this Tantra as a source of her Vidyā[1] consisting of seventeen syllables. As the Devyāyāmala tells us that these places are related to the recitation of mantra,[2] we may conclude that the seventeen syllables are contemplated in these seventeen places. Accordingly, the Wheel of the Self can be said to be at the end of (i.e. after) the sixteen. Indeed, the ascending series of sixteen stations described in the 'Sūtra of Liberation (attained) at the End of the Sixteen' quoted below from the MBT are practically the same and, as the name of the Sūtra suggest, culminates in the End of the Sixteen. Note moreover, that the Transmental figures here too as the penultimate energy that leads to the supreme state.

But Abhinava either chooses to ignore this covert reference to the End of the Sixteen, replacing it implicitly with one to the End of the Twelve, or the Devyāyāmala itself was ambiguous in its characterization of the supreme Wheel, a situation we observe in some of our Kubjikā sources as well. Certainly, in the following reference Abhinava cites from the Devyāyāmala, the highest stage in the ascent of the vital breath and its accompanying consciousness is the End of the Twelve:

> (The power of the vital breath), born from the Wheel of the Heart, subtle, similar to the moon or a crystal, the form of a line and the nature of Sound (nāda), (it) passes through the series of Wheels and finally rests in the End of the Twelve where Suṣumṇā terminates and is united with the three channels (Iḍā, Piṅgalā and Suṣumṇā). At this point, after having filled the Wheel of the Heart, the teacher should recite the mantra which, ablaze like (the submarine) fire, pours out of the holes for the eyes, the hairs (of the body) etc. until, dissolving as it does all the butter (of objectivity), that has been offered to the flame (now) tranquil (in the End of the Twelve), satisfied and propitiated by that stream of butter, it reaches the cavity of the navel. In this way mantras, energized, awake and very pure, bestow liberation.[1]

[1] Comm. on TĀ 29/68-70ab.
[2] TĀ 23/37-39ab.

According to Jayaratha this process starts from the Heart and returns to it. Thus, the 'navel' metaphorically denotes the Heart. Starting from the Heart, the Transmental is the twelfth in serial order. If we start from the navel, it is the thirteenth, which could also be understood to be the End of the Twelve. In the former case, the Wheel of the Self is in the End of the Twelve; in the latter, it would be beyond it. So Abhinava's sources may well be accommodating their doctrine to a final End of the Twelve rather than to an End of the Sixteen which would thereby house a seventeenth energy. Certainly the doctrines concerning the seventeenth digit of the Moon were well known to Abhinava. Indeed he quotes the Triśirobhairava – one of his major Trika sources, which describes it as the energy of the supreme form of emission.[2] Identified as the 'nectarine part within the Person of sixteen parts',[3] Jayaratha explains that it is:

. . . the Supreme Kaulikī who is pure consciousness and nature the form of nectar because it nourishes the sixteen energies beginning with those of the inner (mental) organ and because it is always active as its nature never decays . . . It is the seventeenth energy called the New Moon – Amā – whose nature is the Unstruck Sound (hakārārdhārdha) of the supreme (form of) emission (visarga) whose nature is bliss.[4]

The supreme energy of the Point is the emanation that takes place in the upper regions and rains down a shower of nectar.[5] According to Trika doctrine also it is:

The goddess who is the tranquil energy of the Moon who abides above as the aesthetic savour (rasa) of the bliss of the nectar of the full (Moon) (pūrṇāmṛta).[6]

---

[1] TĀ 23/33-36.
[2] TĀ 3/138-139ab.
[3] puruṣe ṣoḍaśakale tām āhur amṛtāṁ kalām | Quoted from the Triśirobhairavatantra by Jayaratha in his commentary on TĀ 3/137cd-141ab.
[4] Ibid.
[5] ūrdhve tu saṁsthitā sṛṣṭiḥ parmānandarūpiṇī |
pīyūṣavṛṣṭiṁ varṣantī baindavī paramā kalā || Comm. TĀ 1/1, p. 10.
[6] ūrdhve sthitā candrakalā ca śāntā pūrṇāmṛtānandarasena devī | Ibid.

So it seems that the Trika scriptures Abhinava followed posited that all this took place in the End of the Twelve, not in the End of the Sixteen. This is true also, in part at least, of the teachings of the Kālīkrama. The following reference is drawn from the Kramasadbhāva an important source of the Kālīkrama. Here we see clearly that the 'sixteen' are the lunar vowels, but they are located in the End of the Twelve – a set-up also found in the Kubjikā Tantras, although they developed a second higher wheel above:

> Always greedy to eat the Body of Time at the end of the a eon, she is Kālī who, by the upper path, is present in the form (rūpa) at the end of the End of the Twelve. [. . .]
>
> Mounted on the energy at the extremity of emission (visarga), she is in the middle of the sixteen vowels. She is Kālī, the seventeenth energy, the action that brings all things to an end.[1]

The Kubjikā Tantras present the End of the Sixteen as an extension of the End of the Twelve, which serves to accommodate the extended realisation of the Transmental into the Śāmbhava state, the liberated condition. Although the Śāmbhava state is already a representation of the highest condition in the early Kubjikā Tantras, it is developed further in the later ones. Emblematic of this development is the extension of the End of the Twelve to the End of the Sixteen. Although the End of the Sixteen is known to the early Kubjikā Tantras, it appears there as the level of transcendence beyond all levels. Like the End of the Twelve, the understanding here of the End of the Sixteen has yet to be completely developed by filling it out with the lunar energy of the goddess. The Ṭīkā explains:

> In this way (from the top of the head) up to the location of the (left) toe (the body measures) eighty-four fingers. Then, above that, there (is a space measuring) twelve fingers in the three energies. In this way (it extends for) ninety-six fingers. That is the End of the Twelve (dvādaśānta). Then above that is the Transmental (manonmanī). It has the quality of reflection (manana) and salvation (trāṇa). It is above the End of the Twelve (dvādaśānta) and measures twelve fingers. In this way, (adding) both ninety-six and twelve

---

[1] kalpānte [kalpāte] kāladehasya carvaṇe lālasā sadā |
ūrdhvamārgena [-mārghaina] sā kālī dvādaśāntāntarūpagā || [. . .]
visargāntakalārūḍhā ṣoḍaśasvaramadhyagā |
saptādaśīti sā kālī [kālīṁ] kriyā sarvāntakī kalā || KS 3/49, 81.

> fingers together, makes one hundred and eight.[1] That is the End of the Sixteen (ṣoḍaśānta). . . .
>
> Then above them, in the extremity of the Wick of Smoke (dhūmravarti) – that is, at the end of the Transmental state (unmanāvasthā) – (one attains) the state of tranquillity (śāntāvasthā) that cannot be reached (by the mind). There all the states are tranquil. That is the Śāmbhava (state). That is the Lord (īśa), the place (sthāna) at the end (of all others) where everything ceases (nivartate). Thus the mind (manas) should be fixed there. When the mind has reached there in this way, one is freed of the bondage of transmigratory existence.[2]

A hierarchy of Five Voids is described in the Ṭīkā. The last two are the Supreme Void and the Void of Māyā. Although the Supreme Void was said earlier in the same text to be the End of the Twelve,[3] here it is said to be:

> . . . on top of the End of the Sixteen in the place of the mountain called Kaumāra at the end of the Wick of Smoke. This is (also) said elsewhere:[4] 'Mount Kaumāra is the Inexplicable (anakhya) which at the End of the Sixteen.'[5]

The Wick (varti) is the Command.[6] So the End of the Sixteen, said to be at the end of the Wick of Smoke, is at the extremity of the Command which is in the End of the Twelve. According to the ṢSS[7] and its commentary, mount Śrīparvata is the Cavity of Brahmā where Dhūmāgni – 'Smoky Fire' – is located. This fire

---

[1] Cf. above, p. 378-379.

[2] evaṁ pādāṅguṣṭhasthānaṁ yāvad aṅgulāś caturaśītiḥ [k kh: -la caturā-] | tatas tasyordhve [k, kh: tasyorddha] śaktitraye aṅguladvādaśa [k kh: -daśā] | evam aṅgulāḥ [k kh: -la] ṣaṇṇavatiḥ [kk: -ti] | taṁ dvādaśāntam | tatas [kh: tataḥs] tasyopari manonmanā | sā ca mananatrāṇadharmiṇī [k: -trāsa-] | tasyā [k kh: tasya] dvādaśāntordhvaṁ [k: -ntā ūrdhvaṁ] dvādaśāṅgulapramāṇam | evaṁ ṣaṇṇavatis [k, kh: -ti] tathā dvādaśāṅgulam ity ubhayataḥ aṣṭādhikaṁ śatam aṅgulānāṁ [k: -maṅgalānāṁ] bhavati | taṁ ṣoḍaśāntam [. . .] tatas teṣāṁ . . . ūrdhve dhūmravartiprānte [k: -prānta] unmanāvasthānte [k kh: -sthāpanasya] agamyā śāntāvasthā | tatrāvasthāḥ [k kh: -sthā] śāntāḥ sarvāḥ | sā śāmbhavī [k kh: śāṁbhavāḥ] | tat [kh: ta] sthānaṁ sarvāntīśaṁ yatra sarvaṁ nivartate [kh: tivarttate; k kh: + yāsāti] || tasmāt kāraṇāt tatra manaḥ [kh: maḥ] kuryāt | tatra manaḥ prāptam anena bandhanāt saṁsārān muktir bhavati | Ṭ MS K fl. 16a.

[3] Ṭ MS K fl. 26b quoted above.

[4] In ṢSS 1/49cd.

[5] idānīṁ parākāśaṁ kathyate yathā | parākāśaṁ ṣoḍaśāntoparisthitaṁ [kh: -sthane] kaumārākhye [kh: komārākhye] parvatasthāne dhūmravartiprānte [k, kh: dhūma-] | tathānyatroktaṁ kaumāraṁ parvataṁ yac ca anākhyaṁ [kh: asā-] ṣoḍaśāntikam [k: -ke; kh: -kā] || Ṭ MS K fl. 173a.

[6] KuKh 30/84.

[7] ṢSS 1/40.

generates a column of smoke that extends upwards to a distance of twelve fingers above the head, corresponding to the series of levels that constitute the End of the Twelve described above. Above this is mount Kaumāra, which is the path that leads to the Cavity of Brahmā.[1] mount Kaumāra, the reader will recall, is the place to which the goddess sets out first of all after she come out of the Liṅga. From there she proceeds to the other sacred sites which, internalized, are projected onto the face. In other words, the End of the Sixteen is implicitly understood here to be the first and highest place where the goddess manifests when she emerges out of the absolute. From here she progressively descends down into the triangle of the Transmental in the End of the Twelve, spreading her energy to the sacred seats and other sacred sites, both to those in the outside world and to their inner counterparts.

Normally this would be the highest level. But the Ṭīkā makes one of the rare references in the Kubjikā literature to a level beyond the End of the Sixteen – which is where, in another context we are told is located Śāmbhavī Śakti – the energy of the Śāmbhava state. Although there is no lunar symbolism involved, we are reminded of Abhinava's remark that some schools also posit an eighteenth digit of the Moon.[2] According to the Ṭīkā:

> Located above the End of the Sixteen is the End of the Seventeenth, where the trail of smoke dissolves away. The Void of Māyā is there in the place that is formless and free of defects. This is (also) said elsewhere: The Supreme Void is the supreme place. The one called Māyā is above that.[3]

We have seen how the stages in the ascent to the End of the Twelve are understood as phases of the utterance of the syllable OṂ. The texts present the stages of the ascent up to the End of the Sixteen in a number of ways. Two are especially interesting. The first is found in the Ṭīkā. There we are told that there are five measures, each corresponding to a type of Self (ātman) that pervades a number of finger-breadths of the body as follows:

1) Parātman – Supreme Self: extends from the toes to the End of the Sixteen for 100 fingers.

---

[1] ṢSS 1/50ab: tad vai yad randhragaṁ mārgaṁ tac ca kaumāraparvatam |

[2] See above, p. 349 note 2.

[3] māyākāśaṁ ṣoḍaśāntordhve saptadaśamānte [k kh: saptā-] vartate [k kh: missing] yatra [k: yathā] dhūmravartinī [k kh: -ni] līnā bhavati | anāmaye [k kh: -mayo] nirākāre [kh: -kāra] sthāne tatra māyākāśam | tathānyatroktam | parākāśaṁ pare [k kh: -raṁ] sthāne [k kh: -naṁ] māyākhyaṁ [k kh: māyākhyāmaṁ] tadūrdhvataḥ || Ṭ MS K fl. 141a-141b.

2) Parāparātman – Middling Self: extends from the toes to the End of the Twelve for 96 fingers.
3) Siddhātman – Accomplished Self: extends from the toes to the Place of the Point (bindusthāna) between the eyebrows for 84 fingers.
4) Prasiddhātman – Famous Self: extends from the Heart to the energy in the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head for 36 fingers.
5) Pudgalātman – Individual Self: extends from four fingers below the Heart, between the Wheels (called) the City of Jewels (maṇipura) and Unstruck Sound (anāhata) up to the energy in the Cavity of Brahmā for 40 fingers.
6) Śambhorātman – Śambhu's Self: pervades all the others extending from the toes to the End of the Sixteen for 100 fingers and above that by eight fingers to Paramaśiva, making 108 fingers all together.[1]

All thirty-six metaphysical Principles are perceived along with the pervasion of the first five. First of all, by concentration (yogadhāraṇā) on these five, successively one perceives (paśyati) and attains mastery (siddhyate) over the five gross elements. Starting from Earth, each of the gross elements is attained by concentrating on the pervasion of each one of these 'Selves'. The elements have the same places and measures of the body as their corresponding 'Self'. The extent of the pervasion of the thirty-six principles and their locations in the body are equivalent to those of the five elements and hence to the corresponding subjective identity. They accord with the nature of the place (sthāna) in which they are perceived and are related to one another as the support is to the supported. Thus, by attaining mastery over the five elements in this way, one attains mastery over all the thirty-six principles. The correspondences are as follows:

---

[1] prathamataḥ parātmā | pādāṅguṣṭhād ārabhya [kh: -dārabhyo] ṣoḍaśāntamadhyāvadhir [k kh: ṣoḍaśāntāmadhye aṅguṣṭhakāvadhir] yāvat vyāptiḥ aṅgulaśata-m-eka iti parātmāvyāptiḥ | parāparātmāvyāptir yathā pādādidvādaśāntāvadhir yāvat [k kh: -dhiḥ yāvat] ṣaṇṇavatyaṅgulavyāptiḥ iti parāparasya vyāptiḥ | siddhātmāvyāptiḥ kathyate yathā pādādibindusthānāvadhir yāvad aṅgula-caturaśītivyāptiḥ [k kh: -caturā-] iti siddhātmāvyāptiḥ | prasiddhātmāvyāptiḥ [kh: prasiddhātma-] kathyate yathā [k kh: yadā] hṛdayād ārabhya śaktyantaṁ [k, kh: śāktyanta] yāvad aṅgulaṣaṭtriṁśad-vyāptiḥ [k kh: -triṁśavyā-] pūrvoktamudrāvyākhyānasthānāt sphuṭaṁ jñātavyam [kh: jñāvyaṁ] iti prasiddhātmāvyāptiḥ | pudgalātmāvyāptiḥ [k kh: -tmavyāptiḥ] kathyate yathā hṛdayādho 'ṅgulacatuḥ [kh: hṛdayādhau aṁgulacatuḥ] maṇipūrakam anāhataṁ cakradvayasannidhyamadhyād [k kh: sannimadhyād] ārabhya [kh: ārabhyo] śaktyantāvadhir [k kh: śaktyantavidhir-] yāvat aṅgula-catvāriṁśadvyāptiḥ [kh: aṁgulaṁ; k kh: -catvāriṁśavyā-] iti pudgalātmāvyāptiḥ | evaṁ para-parāparasiddhaprasiddha-pudgalātmānāṁ [k kh: paraḥparāparasiddhiḥprasiddhaḥ-] pañcānāṁ śaṁbhor [k kh: śambhur] ātmā vyāpakatvena vartate | pādāṅguṣṭhād ārabhya [kh: -bhyo] ṣoḍaśāntā-vadhiryāvat aṅgulaśata-m-ekāvadhir yāvat [kh: aṁgulaṁ-] asya vyāptiḥ tadūrdhve paramaśiva-syāṣṭāṅgulavyāptiḥ | evam atra [k kh: aṁtra] guṇaikaśate [k: guṇaśatameke; kh: gula-] sāṣṭādhike ātmāṣaṭkavyāptiḥ | Ṭ MS K fl. 36a.

1) Earth - Earth Tattva (1 tattva)
2) Water - Water Tattva > Prakṛti (24 tattvas)
3) Fire - Puruṣa > Māyā (7 tattvas)
4) Air - Śuddhavidyā > Sadāśiva (3 tattvas)
5) Space - Śakti (1 tattva)[1]

The Ṭīkā concludes by declaring that:

> Thus, by knowing the five (elemental) principles completely by means of the fivefold Self, (all) thirty-six principles are attained. Similarly, by knowing the Śiva principle, that is, the principle of Supreme Śiva by means of the Śambhu's Self, which is the sixth, one becomes of his nature. Thus the pervasion of the sixfold Self has been explained.[2]

Notice that just as the Void of Māyā is posited beyond the End of the Sixteen, so is Paramaśiva. However, the Ṭīkā appears to be inconsistent here. One would expect the principle Śiva to be located in the End of the Sixteen with Supreme Śiva at an eight-finger-span's distance beyond. In this scheme, the lunar

---

[1] *tathā eṣāṁ pañcānāṁ tattvopalabdhiḥ [k kh: talopalabdhiḥ] kathyate | yathā prathamataḥ pudgalātmavyāptiḥ kathyate | yogadhāraṇānugamena [k: -mevā; kh: -medhā; k kh: + evaṁ tādi] pārthivatattvaṁ paśyati siddhyate ca | tathā prasiddhātmavyāptiḥ | vyāpakabhāvena yogadhāraṇānugamena āptattvādikaṁ sarvaṁ [kh: sarva] paśyati tathā [k: tamya; kh: tasya] āptattvaṁ siddhyate | tathā siddhātmāvyāptiḥ | yogadhāraṇānugamena tejastattvaṁ [k kh: tejatatvaṁ] paśyati siddhyate [kh: siddhaye] ca | tathā prasiddhātmavyāptiḥ | yoga-dhāraṇānugamena [k: -nagamena] bhāvanāpūrvakena [k kh: bhāva * pū-] vāyutattvaṁ paśyati siddhyate [kh: siddhyaṁte] ca | yathā parātmavyāptiḥ | yathā yogadhāraṇānugamena bhāvanāpūrvakena ākāśatattvaṁ [kh: ākāśata * *] paśyati siddhyate ca | vyomarūpī bhavatīty arthaḥ | pūrvoktasthānakāṅgulapramāṇagatyā [k kh: -gatyāt] svakīyam | svakīyasthānānurūpeṇa tattvopalabdhir [k: -labdhi-; kh: -laddhi-] jñātavyaḥ [kh: -vyam] | na kevalaṁ pañcabhūtānāṁ vyāptiḥ kathitā anyeṣāṁ ṣaṭtriṁśānāṁ tattvānām ādhārādheyabhāvena [kh: ādhārāddheya-] kathitā | yathā pārthivatattvaṁ ātmatve [k: astatvam; kh: astatveṁ] | āptattvād ārabhya [k kh: apta-] prakṛtitattvāntaṁ guṇatrayasahitaṁ [k kh: guṇa * * * * * *] yāvac [k kh: missing] caturviṁśatattvāni [k kh: -tatvā *] bhavanti | te āptattve [k kh: ap-] siddhe sati sarva eva [k kh: sarveva] siddhyante [k kh: sidhyanti] | tathā tejastattve [k kh: tejatatve] siddhe puruṣādimāyāntaṁ tattvasaptakaṁ [k kh: -kāḥ] siddhyate [k kh: sidhyanti] | tathā vāyutattve siddhe śuddhavidyādisadāśivatattvāntaṁ [k kh: śuddhavi * * * *; kh: suddhavi * * * *] siddhyate [k: sidhyanti; kh: siddhyanti] | tathā ākāśatattve siddhe śaktitattvaṁ [k kh: śaktiśivatattve] siddhyate [k: sidhyanti; kh: siddhyaṁti] ekam | iti tattvapañcake [k: -ka] siddhe sati ṣaṭtriṁśatattvāni [k: -triṁśatatvā; kh: ṣaṭtṛṁśa * tvā] siddhāni [k: siddhā; kh: siddhāḥ] bhavanti [kh: bhavati] | śivatattvaṁ siddhyatīty arthaḥ |* Ṭ MS K fl. 36b.

[2] iti pañcātmakena pañcatattvaparijñānāt ṣaṭtriṁśatattvāni [kh: -tṛśatatvā] siddhyante [k, kh: sidhyati] | tathā ṣaṣṭhena [kh: ṣasthena] śambhor [k kh: śaṁbhur] ātmakatvena śivatattvaparijñānāt paramaśivatattvaparijñānāt tadrūpī bhavati | iti ṣaḍātmakavyāptiḥ kathitā | Ṭ MS K fl. 36b.

symbolism, which is the central feature of the presentation of the End of the Twelve and the Sixteen that we find in the later Kubjikā Tantras, is missing.

The same is true of the following scheme outlined in the 'Sūtra of Liberation (attained) at the End of the Sixteen' found in YKh (1). This ascent is not understood as degrees of pervasion of self-consciousness, but as the stations of the ascent of Kuṇḍalinī. The first six stages are the Six Wheels (cakra). Beyond is the ascending series of the stages of Speech, which is virtually the same as the standard series, projected into the space leading to the End of the Twelve. The main difference in the two series lies in the replacement of the three stages of the audible articulation of OṀ with the Six Wheels. The last three of the latter correspond to the former three in the heart, throat and on the bridge of the nose between the eyebrows. The extra sixteenth is projected above the Transmental that has been shifted up three places from its earlier position in the End of the Twelve. Notice also that the End of the Sixteen is not related to the sixteen energies of the Moon as we find in most of the later accounts. In this scheme the Moon with its energies is the Point on the forehead and the Half Moon is above or within it. This scheme, like many others, illustrates first the stages in the rise of the audible sound of a seed-syllable mantra up to the Wheel of the Command between the eyebrows. This is followed by the still audible but fading resonance of the final nasalization of the seed-syllable. This is drawn as a Point (bindu) above a semi-circle called the 'Half Moon' (ardhcandra) because of its shape. It is felt above the bridge of the nose. So the placement of this pair here is as one would expect, and is found in virtually all such representations of the ascent of mantric sound. Their more 'internal' counterpart is not represented here in the End of the Twelve and the Sixteen, as we shall see is the case in the other schemes taught in the later Kubjikā tradition. The reason for this is probably because the scheme here is a male one. The clue to this being the case is the equation made in the text between the End of the Sixteen and the End of the Nine. The later is said to be 'above the Six Modalities' that is, the Six Wheels up to that of the Command. The following nine stages end with the Transmental. Thus, one way of understanding the 'End of the Nine' is that it is the tenth stage beyond them, that is, the transcendental Void of the End of the Sixteen. Another way is to understand the Nine to be the nine syllables of Navātman, the seed-syllable of Kubjikā's Bhairava. This is probably the Supreme Syllable to which this passage repeatedly refers. In this male scheme, the lunar nectar is emitted from the Equal One is on the plane of emission (visarga). Here, then, is the passage:

> 1) The Foundation (ādhāra) (at the base of the spine) is the first Wheel (brilliant and coloured) like red lac. There, in the middle, is the one called Haṁsa, (shining white) like a multitude of moons.

2) Above it is the Self–supported (svādhiṣṭhāna), (brilliant) as a whirling firebrand. There, in the middle, is the one called the living being (jīva). One should think that it is as (nourishing) like nectar.
3) Above that, having abandoned Kuṇḍalī, one should think of the (Wheel) Full of Gems (maṇipūraka) (in the navel). It is a mass of radiant energy, like the Fire of Time. There, in the middle, one should place the excellent and auspicious Void of (all) four colours that manifests according to the nature (of each entity).
4) One should think of the Wheel of Unstruck Sound above that (in the heart) as white and red. In the middle of that is the Great Sound (mahārāva), the most excellent Heart of the Yoginī, which is said to be dark blue, and red.
5) Above it (in the throat) is the Pure (Wheel) (viśuddhaka), which is said to be white, shining like heated mercury. There, in the middle, is the lord, a mass of energy, the Supreme Syllable.[1] One should think that it shines like the Moon, Sun and Fire.
6) The Wheel of the Command is between the eyebrows. It is a fire in the form of a Point (bindu). In the middle of it is the seed of power (śaktibīja),[2] red like vermilion.[3]
7) The Wheel of the Point (binducakra) is on the forehead and is the Unbroken Circle. Completely full of the sixteen energies (of the vowels), it is seen to be the lunar orb (candrabimba).

---

[1] Instead of translating 'parākṣaram' as 'the Supreme Syllable' we may also understand 'supreme and imperishable'. But cf. below stage 14.
[2] The seed-syllable of power – śaktibīja – is normally HRĪṀ.
[3] The Ṣoḍaśāntamuktisūtra is YKh (1) 55/1-25ab. It is recorded only in MS G. The passage reads as follows:
ādhāraṁ prathamaṁ cakraṁ raktālaktakasannibham |
tatra madhye tu haṁsākhyaṁ śaśāṅkagaṇasannibham [g: saraṅkragaṇa (?)-] ||
tasyordhve svādhiṣṭhānaṁ tu ālātacakrasannibham [g: āṇābha-] |
tatra madhye tu jīvākhyaṁ cintatyed amṛtopamam ||
tadūrdhve kuṇḍalīṁ [g: -lī] tyaktvā cintayed maṇipūrakam |
tejorāśisamaprākhyaṁ [g: -samaṇḍākhyaṁ] kālāgnirudrasannibham ||
tatra madhye nyaset śūnyaṁ caturvarṇavaraṁ śubham |
yena yena svarūpena tena tena prakāśate [g: -bhe] ||
tadūrdhve 'nāhataṁ cakraṁ sitāruṇaṁ [g: śilāruṇañca] vicintayet |
tanmadhye tu mahārāvaṁ [g: -rāva] yoginīhṛdayottamam ||
śyāmāruṇaṁ [g: syāmāruṇaṁ] samākhyātaṁ tasya ūrdhve [g: ūrdhva] viśuddhakam |
sitavarṇaṁ samākhyātaṁ taptapāradasaṁprabham [g: vantapārasāprabhaṁ] ||
tatra madhye sa bhagavān tejorāśiparākṣaram |
candrasūryāgnisaṁkāśaṁ samujjvalantaṁ [g: samācyantri} (?) vicintayet ||
ājñācakraṁ bhruvor madhye bindurūpaṁ hutāśanam |
tasya madhye śaktibījaṁ sindūrāruṇasannibham || YKh (1) 55/1-8

8) In the middle of it is the form of light (bhārūpa) which is the power (bala) in the subtle essence (tanmātra) of the Point. One should contemplate that, the Half Moon. It is the illuminator (bhāskara) of the knowledge of the fragment of the moon (khaṇḍendu).  ? Pure, it should be perceived above the Point.[1]
9) Above that is the principle of Unstruck Sound; the head of 'A' (aśira), it is omnipresent. Like (the sound of a) mad bee, that is said to be lucid meditation.
10) Above that is the subtle element of Sound (nādatanmātra). It is (in the form of a) straight (line). (Subtle) as a sky-flower, think of it as moving and straight.
11) And above that is the End of Sound that abides as tranquillity (nirācāra). It is barely a subtle measure (kiñcinmātramātra), and is (brilliant) like pure crystal.
12) Above that is the supreme Power (śakti) whose form is that of a triangle. Subtle, subtle and subtler, it shines like millions of lightning flashes.
13) Above that is the one called the Pervasive (vyāpinī) who rains down supreme nectar. One should contemplate (that) supreme bliss as the state of the (unity of) the pervader of (the universe) and that which is the pervaded. Mounted on radiant energy (tejas), its radiance is like that of a hundred suns.
14) Once that has been abandoned and one travels upwards, (one reaches) the one called the Equal One (samanā), which is full of vitality (ojikā). This energy (kalā), established in the middle of the capsule of emission (visarga), rains down nectar. When consuming the Supreme Syllable, eat the energy which is nectar (amṛtakalā).[2]

---

[1] Just as Bindu, the Point, is sometimes called 'the Unbroken Circle' (akhaṇdamaṇḍala) (see note to KuKh 3/7), similarly the Half Moon (ardhacandra) is occasionally referred to as the 'broken Moon' (khaṇḍendu).

[2] lalāṭe binducakraṁ tu sthitam akhaṇḍamaṇḍalam [g: silam-] | kalāṣoḍaśasaṁpūrṇaṁ candrabimbaṁ tu dṛśyate ||
tasya madhye tu bhārūpaṁ bindutanmātrake balam |
bhāvyaṁ tac [g: bhavyāho [?] c] cārdhacandraṁ tu khaṇḍendujñānabhāskaram [khaṇḍedu-] ||
samūlānaṁśitaṁ (?) śuddhaṁ bindorupari [g: vindunopari] lakṣayet |
tadūrdhve 'nāhataṁ tattvaṁ aśiraṁ sarvatomukham ||
mattabhramarasaṁkāśaṁ [g: -tramara-] sphuṭadhyānaṁ tad [g: dhyātsatya] ucyate |
tadūrdhve nādatanmātraṁ ṛjubhāvena tiṣṭhati ||
khapuṣpam [g: ṣa-] iva saṁkāśaṁ cañcalaṁ cintayed ṛjum [g: ṛju] |
tadūrdhve caiva nādāntaṁ nirācāreṇa [g: -bhāvena] tiṣṭhati ||
kiñcinmātramātraṁ tu śuddhasphaṭikasannibham |
tadūrdhve paramā śaktis trikoṇākāravigrahā ||

15) What is above that travels upwards. It is the Transmental (unmanā), which is said to be supreme. Like the radiance of (divine) light, it is subtle, without waves and perpetually manifest (sadoditā).
16) Above that is the eternal Void. (There) one should think of nothing. Then, having emptied the mind (one attains) Nirvāṇa, the supreme plane. Having contemplated the End of the Nine, which is supreme, (one attains) Nirvāṇa, the supreme plane. The renouncer, having contemplated the End of the Nine, is freed from bondage.

The End of the Nine is complete attainment beyond the Six Modalities (ṣaṭprakāra i.e. the Six Wheels). The tenth is at the End of the Nine. It is the Void that should be taught to be the End of the Sixteen.

Practice Yoga in the sphere (pakṣa) of the Supreme Syllable. The thread (sūtra) of the Supreme Syllable is the heart that fulfils all desires. He who, established in the venerable (goddess) Kujā, knows (this) is liberated from the bondage of birth. (Perfect) contemplation (samādhi) is with (these) sixteen aspects and is (attained) within the form of the sixfold deposition (ṣoḍhānyāsa). He who knows this is (a veritable) Lord of Yogis, the others (who do not) are (just) quoting from books. Once attained the plane that is Void and Non-void, the yogi is freed from bondage.[1]

---

sūkṣmā sūkṣmatarā sūkṣmā vidyutkoṭisamaprabhā |
*cintayet paramānandaṁ vyāpyavyāpakabhāvataḥ [g: vyāpāvyāpataḥ * * ] ||
tadūrdhve vyāpinī nāma paramāmṛtavarṣiṇī |
tejaḥskandhasamārūḍhā śatārkadyutisannibhā [g: salā-] ||
sā tyaktā [g: nā bhyaktā] gamyate ūrdhve samanā [g: mamanān] nāma ojikā |
visargapuṭamadhyasthā kalā hy amṛtavāhinī [g: bhyamṛta-] ||
paramākṣaragrāsane [g: -kṣaradgrasane] bhakṣayed āmṛtaṁ [g: amṛtāṁ] kalām |
YKh (1) 55/9-17ab

[1] tadūrdhve śāśvataṁ śūnyaṁ na kiñcid api cintayet ||
tataḥ śūnyaṁ [g: mulo stanyaṁ] manaḥ [g: mana] kṛtvā nirvāṇaṁ paramaṁ padam |
navāntam paramaṁ [g: parama] dhyātvā nirvāṇam paramaṁ padam ||
navāntaṁ paramaṁ [g: parama] dhyātvā [g: dhyāṁtvā] tyāgī mucyeta [mukhela] bandhanāt |
ṣaṭprakārasya ūrdhve tu navāntaṁ [g: -nta] pūrṇabhaṁ padam ||
navāntaṁ daśamaṁ śūnyaṁ ṣoḍaśāntaṁ vinirdiśet |
paramākṣarapakṣaṁ [g: -ṇakṣaṁ] tu yogābhyāsaṁ [g: -tyāsaṁ] samabhyaset ||
paramākṣarasūtraṁ tu hṛdayaṁ sarvakāmadam |
yo jānāti śrīkujāsthaḥ [g: -sthāṁ] sa mukto janmabandhanāt ||
samādhiḥ ṣoḍaśair bhedaiḥ ṣoḍhānyāsasya vigrahe |
yo [so] jānāti sa yogīndraḥ [g: -nduḥ] śeṣāḥ pustakavācakāḥ ||
śūnyāśūnyaṁ [g: -stanye] padaṁ prāpya yogī mucyeta bandhanāt | Ibid. 55/17cd-25ab.

The Moon in the End of the Twelve and the Sixteen

We have seen that even though lunar symbolism is not well developed in the KMT, the seeds of the future doctrines have been sown. They centre on the interrelationship between the lunar Triangle and the Point in the End of the Twelve and the Sixteen. The complexity and extent of the symbolism is further developed by the interaction between the sixteenth energy and seventeenth energy of the Moon. The former is the Full Moon and the latter, also called with calculated ambiguity the 'end of the sixteen' is the New Moon. The Full Moon is the womb of the New Moon and the New Moon is the womb of the Full Moon. Containing each other, they generate one another:

> The New Moon (amā) is the seventeenth (lunar) energy (kalā). She is the primordial womb (bhagādyā), located in the middle of the womb. The secret one of the womb who contains the womb, she has risen from within the middle of the womb. Fashioned with sixteen parts, she resides at the End of the Sixteen.[1]

The New Moon is the triangular syllable AIṀ – 'the primordial womb' – compressed into the Point in the middle of the womb – the goddess's triangle. The New Moon generates the Full Moon, even as they contain one another. The play on words is clear: the New Moon is at the End of Sixteen just as it is end of the sixteen digits of the Full Moon. Both are aspects of the goddess Śāmbhavī, the energy of the Śāmbhava state. As the source of both, she is beyond them in the End of the Eighteen. To distinguish the goddess New Moon from the Full, the former is represented as the Half Moon just as the Full Moon is the Point. A thin semi-circle drawn in the Point in the centre of the triangle represents the Half Moon. In the following passage the latter is called the 'full sacred seat of the centre'. Śāmbhavī is the energy beyond the Transmental. She is the source of the energies of the Triangle whose sides and contents are generated from her. In the centre she assumes the form of the Full Moon generated by the energies of the Triangle. Bhairava praises the goddess accordingly:

> O you who reside at the End of the Eighteen! (You are) also beyond the state of the Transmental. You are Śāmbhavī who awakens Śambhu. O you who are the great (energies of) will, action and

---

[1] bhagādyā bhagamadhyasthā bhagaguhyā bhagodarī ||
bhagamadhyāntajātā [k: -dhānta-; kh: kh: -dhāntajāto] ca amā saptādaśī [k, kh: -śīṁ] kalā |
ṣoḍaśāvayavā [kh: ṣoḍaśovayavā] baddhā [k, kh: śraddhā] ṣoḍaśāntānuvartinī [k, kh: ṣoḍaśāntanuvabhāvarttinī] || YKh (2) 33/25cd-26.

> knowledge – (you are the parts, goddesses and energies of the Triangle, that is) the straight line, the coiled one (kuṇḍalī), the one called Vāmā; the Raudrī of the universe, you are Śivā and are called Ambikā. (At the same time) you are on the plane of the current of the state beyond the Transmental. (Your) nature is subtle; your form is that of the beautiful and radiant energy which is the Half Moon.[1] Encompassed by the Triangle, you are in the centre. Born from the limbs of the three lines (of the Triangle), you are completely full and reside in the sacred seat in the centre. O Kubjī, you are Mālinī who awakens (Bhairava) the Gander (haṁsa). (When you are) in the Cavity (in the centre), you are sprinkled inwardly by the stream of nectar of the Śiva principle.[2]

The goddess is empowered by Śambhu's Command. At the same time, she herself is that energy through which he is empowered because she as Śāmbhavīśakti, Śambhu's energy, is herself the Command, the 'mother of liberation'[3] and the tradition:

> From the root (of all things) Śāmbhavīśakti is Bhairavī the energy that is full (bharitā) (of all the energies). She is supreme, subtle, and gross. Waveless, she is (the energy) beyond mind (manonmanī). She is the Transmental, a certain (indefinable) energy of consciousness which is consciousness without stain (nirañjanā). (Empirically) unknowable (aprameyā) amongst objects of knowledge, she is well known and is the mother of the universe. She generates the energy of eternal bliss and has merged into the Bliss of Stillness

---

[1] MS Ṅ says: (You) abide in the form of the Half Moon that is your own radiant energy (tejas).

[2] unmanābhāvātītāpy [k, kh, gh: -topyam; ṅ: -gham] aṣṭādaśāntasaṁsthite [ṅ: aṣṭāśāntasthite] || *śāmbhavī [k, kh, gh, ṅ: + śaṁbhū] śambhusambodhinī [k, gh: śaṁbhūśaṁbhodhanī; kh: saṁbhūśaṁbhodhanī; ṅ: saṁvo * * dhanī] tvam* ||
*mahecchākriyājñāne [k, kh, gh: mahesthākriyājñāna; ṅ: mahesthākriyā * na] ṛjvī [k, gh: oji; kh: jvi; ṅ: śajvi] rekhinī kuṇḍalī vāmāsaṁjñā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: vāmasaṁjñā] jagadraudrī [k, kh, gh: -dri; ṅ: jagadredri] jyeṣṭhā [k, kh, gh: jyeṣṭā; ṅ: jyeṣṭha] śivā tvam anākhyāmbikā [k, kh, gh: akhyāṁvikā] unmanātītabhāvaughapadasaṁsthitā [ṅ: unmanātī ; k, kh: -bhāvogha- -tāṁ; gh: bhāvogha-; ṅ: bhāvopyayadasaṁsthitāṁ] ||
*sūkṣmarūpā sutejārdhacandrākṛtis tvaṁ [k: stutejārdha-; gh: stutejārddhaṁ; ṅ: svatejārddhacandrākṛtisthaṁ] trikoṇāvṛtā [k, kh, gh: trikoṇācūtā] madhyagā tvaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: tatva] trirekhāṅgasaṁbhūtā [k, kh, gh: rekhāṁgasaṁbhūta; ṅ: * rekhā * saṁbhūta] saṁpūrṇā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: saṁpūrṇa] madhyapīṭhasthitā [k, kh, gh: sadya-; ṅ: * dyapīṭha-]* ||
*kubji tvaṁ mālinī haṁsasaṁbodhanī [ṅ: haṁsa * * * * saṁvodhanī* | ] tvaṁ gatā randhre [k, kh, gh, ṅ: raṁdhra] śivatattvapīyūṣadhārāntasaṁsiktā [k, kh: siva- -dhārāṁtu-; gh: siva- -dhārātu-; ṅ: -dhārāṁtu-] || YKh (1) chapter 12: Ādyoghadaṇḍakastotra prose portion, lines 2 to 6.

[3] YKh (1) 38/32, quoted below, p. 435.

> (nirānanda – i.e. Śiva). Blissful and delighted, she is satisfied and her form is blissful. She is the supreme Command and her form is the Void (śūnya). She pierces through the moving and immobile (universe). Her nature is the Void (vyomarūpā) and she resides within the secret (guhya) Void (vyoman). The energy that utters itself, she abides as 100,000 repetitions of mantra. She is Kāmeśvarī who, as the power of the will (kāmaśakti), has comes forth from the centre of the Point.[1]

The expression 'ṣoḍaśānta' can mean both 'the End of the Sixteen' and 'the end which is the sixteenth'. We do indeed find that the Full Moon with its complement of sixteen digits is said to be located there.[2] But, just as the 'place' at the End of Sixteen is not a seventeenth 'place' but rather the extremity of the sixteenth and so is within it, similarly the seventeenth digit – that of the New Moon – is not understood to be separate from the sixteenth which is the Full Moon. They are the two dynamic modes of the one goddess, her inner breathing. The New Moon is the lunar, anticlockwise downward-spiraling breath that fills up. The Full Moon is the solar, clockwise, upwardly spiraling breath that empties out:

> (The goddess) is the emanation (sṛṣti) of all the elements (bhūta). She creates the universe. Residing in the middle of the wheel (of energies) or participating in the (clockwise) rotation of the sun, she bestows worldly enjoyment. Established in the lunar nature, she bestows liberation and is called the New Moon.
>
> By rotating clockwise (sūryāvarta) she is the Full (Moon) and, (rotating) anticlockwise (vāmāvartā), the New Moon. Transcending

---

[1] āmūlāc chāmbhavī śaktiḥ [all MSs: śakti] bhairavī bharitā [k, gh: bharatā; ṅ: bhavitā] kalā ||
*parā [g: + sūkṣma su] sūkṣmā ca sthūlā [k, g, gh, ṅ: * * ] ca nistaraṅgā manonmanī [k, gh: manotmī] |
unmanā citakalā [g, ṅ: citkalā; gh: vitakalā] kācit cinmayā tu nirañjanā ||
*aprameyā prameyeṣu [k: ameyā *; g: prameyā *; gh: jameyā *; ṅ: ameyāsu] suprameyā [ṅ: * prameyā] jagatsutā [k, g, gh, ṅ: -tām]* |
nityānandakalākārī nirānande [k, gh: nirānaṁdi; g: -nanda] layaṁ gatā ||
sānandā nandanā [ṅ: -no] yena tṛptā [all MSs: tṛptam] ānandavigrahā |
śūnyarūpā parā [k, gh: pārā] ājñā vedhayet sacarācaram ||
sā [all MSs: sa] evaṁ [k, gh, ṅ: eva] vyomarūpā guhyavyomāntavartinī [k, gh: -vyomāna-; ṅ: -vyomātavartinī] |
vartayel [g: vartaye] lakṣajāpyena [k, gh: -pāpyena; g: -jāpena; ṅ: -yāpyena] svayam uccarate [k, gh: -muchṛsate; g: -mucchṛ?sate; ṅ: svayamuchasate] kalā ||
kāmeśvarī kāmaśaktyā bindumadhye visarpitā [k, gh: viśiṣyate; g: visarpato; ṅ: visarpyate] |
YKh (1) 43/84-88.

[2] KuKh 3/115.

> (both) Sun and Moon, she is called Śāmbhavī (Śiva's power). That power (when) Full (pūrṇā) bestows worldly enjoyment; (as the) New Moon, accomplishment and liberation. And, (that power) which give worldly enjoyment and liberation, established in the non-sequential (akrama) (transcendent), withdraws (all things).[1]

Mālinī ascends from the End of the Twelve, where she is the Full Moon, to the End of the Sixteen where she is the New Moon. There she is in her supreme state as the Skyfaring goddess (khecarī), that is, Śāmbhavī. In the End of the Twelve she is differentiated into her lunar energies (sakalā). In the End of the Sixteen she is not (niṣkalā). She is transported from one level to the other and so makes the transition from one condition to the next.

We may discern here a doctrinal development. The reader will recall that the goddess is described as seated along with the god in the End of the Twelve surrounded by her sixteen energies with her as the seventeenth. In this set-up everything, including the 'end of the sixteen', is contained in the End of the Twelve. As Mālinī, the goddess is the Void of the Point in the centre of the Void of the End of the Twelve. As the Mālinī of the Point – Bindumālinī – she is the centre of the Adamantine Wheel of her sixteen energies:

> (Mālinī) is endless, supreme, subtle, omnipresent and both supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent). The supreme energy (kalā), she is the goddess who is consciousness present in the End of the Twelve. She is the subtle energy (kalā) and, very subtle, she flows forth as the supreme (life-giving) nectar. Her form is (wonderfully diverse) like a peacock's tail and she resides in the Adamantine Wheel (vajracakra). In some places she shines like a network of emeralds; elsewhere she is like (a black) storm cloud. The goddess (mālinī) resides in the centre of the Void (of the Transcendent) at the end of the merger (of all things) and her form is all things. She who is the supreme goddess resides in the Void and her form is the Void.[2]

---

[1] sā sṛṣṭiḥ sarvabhūtānāṁ jagadutpattikārikā ||
bhuktidā cakramadhyasthā sūryāvartagatāpi [all MSs: -vartāgatāpi] vā |
*muktidā [g: bhuktidā] candrarūpasya [k, gh: kururūpasya; g: ṛjarūpā; ṅ: * * rūpasya] amā sā ca pragīyate* ||
sūryāvartena [g: sūryā ca tena] sā pūrṇā vāmāvartā amā tu sā |
somasūryapathātītā [k, gh: -pathātīnāṁ; g: -yathātītā; ṅ: -yathātīnāṁ] śāmbhavī sābhidhīyate [k, gh, ṅ: śā-; g: -vidhīyate] ||
sā śaktir bhuktidā [gh: śaktibhuktidā] pūrṇā siddhidā sā ca muktidā |
bhuktimuktipradā [k, gh: -kramā] eṣā [all MSs: detā] akramasthā [gh: -syā] ca saṁharet ||
YKh (1) 37/33cd-36.

[2] anantā sā parā sūkṣmā [g: śū-] sarvagā ca parāparā ||

The sixteen goddesses in the sixteen-spoked wheel are associated with the Moon, its moonlight, life-giving nectar, and the passion it arouses. These energies are the rays of the supreme goddess, the 'seventeenth' who is within or at the end of the sixteen:

> The rays in the great lotus of sixteen spokes are the rays which are the energies. The supreme goddess is in the End of the Sixteen and she is the supreme seventeenth (energy). The goddess in the End of the Twelve (dvādaśānta) is Mālinī in the form of the Point. She stands in front in the form of the spread tail of a peacock (mayūracandrikā). She always stands before the eyes and (in the form of) many desires she is whirling about (vibhramā). In a moment, time and again, she generates desire in the form of the Point.[1]

The flow of lunar energy through its sixteen phases and then beyond into the seventeenth transcendent source which feeds them is the flow of the Divine Current through the Point in the centre of the Triangle. As the KuKh says: 'Within the Triangle is the entire Divine Current (divyaugha), adorned with Śiva's Supreme Energy'.[2] The Divine Current, which is the seminal flow of energy through the goddess's Liṅga, is that of the highest lineage of teachers.[3] These teachers are the disembodied energies of the goddess that move in the expanse of the Void of her unconditioned Being, which, in terms of phenomena is Non-being. We will deal with them in detail in the appropriate place. Here it is enough to note that, counting from the highest phase, the eighteenth is Śrīnātha. Although he belongs to the Divine Current, he is the first Siddha in the sphere of immanence in which the lineages of the Siddhas of the sacred seats extend and transmit the teachings. Above him are the seventeen states within the Command. The dvādaśāntagatā [kh: ṣoḍaśāntā gatā-; g: dvādaśāntaryatā] devī cidrūpā paramā kalā |

---

kalā sūkṣmā [g: śū-] susūkṣmā ca sravantī [kh g: śra-] paramāmṛtam [kh: -mṛtā] ||
mayūracandrikākārā vajracakre [g: cakṣurugra] vyavasthitā [g: -tāḥ] |
kvacin markaṭijālābhā [kh: -markkaṭikājālā-] kvacij jīmūtasaṁnibhā [g: kvacijī-] ||
vyomamadhyagatā [kh: -madhye-] devī layānte [kh: lāyāntaṁ] viśvarūpiṇī |
tathā [g: tasyā] sā [g: ca] paramā devī vyomagā vyomarūpiṇī || ŚM 6/118-121ab.

[1] ṣoḍaśāre mahāpadme [g: -padmā] kalārūpā marīcayaḥ |
ṣoḍaśānte parā devī kalā saptadaśī parā [g: parāḥ] ||
dvādaśānte sthitā devī bindurūpā ca mālinī |
mayūracandrikākārā [kh: mayūraḥ-] prasphuraty agrasaṁsthitā [k: ugra-; g: yasaṁ-] ||
cakṣuragre sthitā nityaṁ [k: nityā; g: nitya] nānā – icchātivibhramā [k: -māḥ; kh: -īcchā-] |
kṣaṇena janate cecchāṁ [k, kh, g: cecchāṁ] bindurūpāṁ [k: -rūpam] anekadhā || ŚM 20/153-155.

[2] KuKh 26/4b.

[3] They are described in chapter 36 of YKh (1) which has been incorporated into the KuKh as chapter 57.

seventeenth is the Transmental, the Supreme Goddess who, established in the Void, arises from the Supreme Void. Without fluctuation (nistaraṅgā) and unmanifest, she is the wealth of liberation (mokṣalakṣmī). Her abode is concealed although she is the abode of all that is emitted through her.[1] She wanders carefree on the Transmental plane at the End of the Sixteen within the expansion that takes place in the Sky of Consciousness, the secret maṇḍala.[2]

This is the level of Mind Beyond Mind (manonmanī), which is just below that of the Transmental (unmanī). The latter is the goddess who is the pure Void. There she is unmanifest and undifferentiated; her differentiated form (sakalā) here is 'suppressed' or 'completed' (nivartita). Just below her is the seventeenth, which, in the ascending series of states of the Divine Current, is at the 'end of the sixteen'. The seventeenth energy is the transcendental energy of the lunar goddess that 'nourishes' the other sixteen energies. These are arrayed in the Void in an ascending series in such a way that the previous energies are compounded into the following ones, like the Moon that progressively increases in the bright lunar fortnight. The last in the series is the goddess identified with the Full Moon laden with lunar energy or nectar. As she rises into the End of the Sixteen above the End of the Twelve, she assumes the form of the seventeenth energy – the New Moon. Thus even as she assumes the form of the inner lunar energy by which she replenishes herself, the lunar nectar with which she is filled to become the Full Moon empties out into the lower spheres. The neophant, like Bhairava his divine archetype, is consecrated (abhiṣikta lit. 'sprinkled') with this nectar[3] and it is this nectar that baths him to purify him so that he can worship the Krama.[4]

Thus the Transmental deploys itself below into the form of the triangular Yoni from which pours forth emanation. The Liṅga rises in the centre of the Yoni. This is the Full Moon that contains all the sixteen energies, represented by the sixteen vowels. It is located in the End of the Twelve. Above, in the End of the Sixteen that is, in the centre of the Triangle, the flow of energy of the Divine Current, which is the dynamism of the liberated state the Kubjikā Tantras call Nirvāṇa, streams through the Point which marks the apex of the Transmental[5] while the Transmental abides within the Neuter as that principle of immanence that pervades and contains all manifestation of which it is the source. The Transmental's most developed form is the New Moon, the seventeenth energy of the Moon. This is the highest aspect of the Transmental that streams through the Point when it rotates anticlockwise down into manifestation.

---

[1] KuKh 57/1cd-4ab.
[2] KuKh 57/5-6.
[3] KuKh 5/59cd-61ab.
[4] KuKh 13/139-140ab.
[5] Above that, in the Circle of the Point, the flow (prasara), which is pure extinction (nirvāṇa), takes place. KuKh 58/52ab.

In this way the New Moon, which is as subtle as 'the pure shade of the Moon', generates for itself a body.[1] The texts refer to this inner dynamism, fueled by the energy of the New Moon, as the 'churning' of the Point in the centre. The energy in the centre of the goddess's maṇḍala is in a state of pure, i.e. non-spatial or temporal rotary motion (paribhrama).[2] It generates bliss and manifests Śrīnātha and the goddess in their differentiated (sakala) iconic form in the centre:

> By churning the (lunar) orb (bimba), it is split apart and the deity of Kula is fashioned (thereby). Manmatha (the god of love), split apart, arises (in the form of the) Point at the End of the Twelve. By splitting (it apart) and rubbing (one feels) content (from which) one infers (and thereby experiences one's own innate) bliss. (Thus) the division of the churning (of consciousness) has been explained and the Wheel of the Point has been revealed.[3]

The goddess is the energy of the New Moon (amā), the exquisite beauty (suṣumā) of the churning of consciousness.[4] Her House is the triangle of letters, the City or Island of the Moon; it is the body of the goddess Full Moon:

> There is another divine aggregate of letters in this House, the City of the Moon of the triple goddess (bhagavatī). It is the Island of the Moon and, saluted with respect by the best of the gods, it is the House of (the goddess) who is called 'Full' (pūrṇanāmā).
>
> The goddess there is full (i.e. the full moon) and is well established on the path of the Transmission (krama). In the tradition (anvaya), she is (the goddess Kubjikā otherwise called) Kukārā.[5] (She is the) energy (that operates) in each division and, within the beautiful Sky of Emptiness (suśuśiragagana), she is free of the networks of the clouds (of ignorance).[6]

The New and the Full Moon are the two extremities of the movement of vitality. Fullness empties out until, exhausted, it reverts to its original potential condition, which is the source of all the energies. The light turns to darkness and the darkness turns to light, just as Kubjikā becomes Kālī and reveals her dark aspect, similarly Kālī becomes Kubjikā and reveals her radiance. This cosmic

---

[1] KuKh 58/69cd-70ab.
[2] KuKh 1/3.
[3] KuKh 58/70cd-72ab.
[4] KuKh 57/81cd-82ab.
[5] Kukārā – 'she who (has as her initial) letter 'ku', i.e Kubjikā.
[6] KuKh 38/23.

cycle is repeated in the movement of the breath. When it takes place mindfully, in the manner about to be described, breathing becomes the epitome of time. Its ceaseless recurrence, which is life itself, mirrors within the creation and destruction of the world, replicating internally the fire sacrifice (the performance of which is coordinated with the phases of the moon) through which the world is created and which marks its end.

Accordingly, the Kubjikā Tantras, mindful of the importance of this process, teach several versions of it, one of which should be visualized in the following manner. The first stage engages the energy of the New Moon. It is the dark phase of progressive merger. The adept should sit and direct his attention down to the genital centre where he should visualize the rotating Wheel of Birth (janmacakra). In the middle of that moving wheel, the Wheel of the Drop rotates in an anticlockwise direction, the reverse of the original pure condition. Within that is the supreme energy of consciousness, Kubjikā, the Transmental (manonmanī). By contracting the anus, inhaling and then retaining the breath, this energy is raised up with, and through, the flow of vitality that travels up the central channel of vitality in the body called Suṣumṇā. Like a whirling wheel of fire, it enters first the navel and then the heart. Its movement beyond this station of expansion marks its progressive depletion as it assumes increasingly subtle forms of sound (nāda). Finally, at the climax of its ascent, it merges into the primary energy (ādyaśakti) of the sphere of Śiva's transcendental being (śāmbhavamaṇḍala). Thus, through this process, the residual traces of past action are burnt away.

Then follows the second phase, which involves the energy of the Full Moon. Just as the energy of the New Moon was elevated from below, this energy is 'elevated' from above. The KuKh describes this process as follows:

> (The adept) should elevate (the goddess) in the form of semen (retas) from the middle of the Drop, the Upper Place. The same (energy) that had previously waned away (now) rains down the nectar of the Full Moon (pūrṇāmṛta).
>
> (The adept) should contemplate that crooked energy. Endless and tranquil (saumyarūpā), it is (the goddess) Ciñcinī (i.e. Kubjikā) who is the Supreme Power and the emanation (sṛṣṭi) (that occurs when) the withdrawal (of phenomenal existence) takes place.
>
> (In this state this energy is round and white) like a drop of milk. (Contemplating it in this form, the yogi) should lead it up to the end of the Nameless (anāmānte). Then the consecration takes place by means of that same deity in its original form.
>
> Once (the adept) has thus contemplated (this energy), brilliant as the Full (Moon) in the Wheel of the Heart, the place of the Full > (Moon), he should induce (her) to enter her own Wheel by means of the mind (citta).

>
> She who is praised (by all) and is supreme bliss, laughingly melts (dravate). She is the Nameless (anāmā), the energy that is consciousness (who resides) in the sphere of the Nameless (anāmamaṇḍala).
>
> (Thus the yogi experiences) the contentment (tṛpti) of the night of the Full Moon, which arises in this way laden with nectar. This is the consecration of the Command, the entry (āgama) (of the breath that takes place) in the phase of emanation. Once he has purified (himself) by (this process of) entry and exit (gamāgama), (the adept) should worship the Transmission (kramārcana).[1]

The sixteenth digit is the lunar energy of the goddess that is full of all the energies and so, complete, it is the Full Moon. Hidden within it is the seventeenth digit, which is the unmanifest energy of the New Moon that is the source of all the other energies through which they release their potency as the lunar nectar of life. So the god praises the goddess saying:

> (You are) the nectar at the end of the sixteen. (You are the goddess) Śāmbhavī who milks the (lunar) Drop (bindu) and (your) body is flooded with (its) white secretions.[2]

She is equally the Energy of the Void (khakalā) established within the New Moon at end of the Full Moon and the energy of Void within the Full Moon established within the New Moon.[3] The two aspects are described in the following two verses, respectively:

> O mother of Mitra! I salute the venerable goddess called Kujā, the lord who, full (of energy) (bharitā), is the ferocious (ugrā) Bhairavī who travels to the plane at the extremity of (the energy of the) New Moon (amā).[4]
>
> I praise (the goddess) who, in the field at the extremity of the energy at the summit of the Moon is, by the process of going and

---

[1] KuKh 13/134-140ab.
[2] KuKh chapter 4, MāSt line 15.
[3] Both statements translate the following equally well: khakalā pūrṇimāsyante amānte saṁvyavasthitā KuKh 2/16ab.
[4] KuKh 5/83cd-84ab.

> coming (gamāgamakrama), divided by the divisions of will, knowledge and action. [1]

This is the Triangle called the City of the Moon, which is the Full Moon. The goddess of the New Moon (Amādevī), who destroys the polarities of the breath and with it the opposites (pakṣāpakṣa), is in the centre of it. Thus, the opposites balanced out, the formless energy of the goddess – the Energy of the Void (khakalā) – pours out along the central channel between them and deploys herself as the three energies of will, knowledge and action, and so as the 'crooked goddess' (vakradevī) assumes the form of the Triangle and so generates the Krama in its threefold form[2] corresponding to the transmissions (krama) of the goddess's three lineages.

When the god attained a vision of the End of the Sixteen, 'the consecration was imparted to the Lord by the gaze of the goddess'[3] that released the lunar nectar that flows down from the End of the Sixteen and drips down from the uvula at the back of the throat.[4] The teacher initiates his disciple in the same way[5] while the teacher is himself, like the disciples he has initiated, consecrated with this nectar every day by worshipping the inner Liṅga.[6]

The New Moon – Amā – is Kubjikā who is also called Pūrṇā – the Full One – as is Kuṇḍalinī and the supreme form of Māyā with which she is commonly identified.[7] This, the seventeenth digit of the Moon, is the energy of Parā, the highest of the goddess's six faces which, said to be 'divine and white as milk', is clearly Kubjikā's supreme lunar face.[8] The seventeenth digit is the energy of the will (icchā) that formulates intentions. For the wise yogi it is the liberating energy of the Transmental. For the ignorant it is binding Māyā, which, identified with Nature (prakṛti), consists of the three qualities of sattva, rajas and tamas[9] represented by the colours white, red and black respectively. It is as black as the New Moon and white and red as the Full Moon. The lunar nectar is, by an obvious association with the colour of the moon, white. The white colour is also derived from its association with Soma – the inebriating sacrificial drink offered in the

---

[1] KuKh 3/124.
[2] KuKh 2/15-17 and ibid. 3/43.
[3] KuKh 5/62-64ab.
[4] See KuKh 2/11.
[5] See KuKh 33/28-29.
[6] KuKh 5/69-70ab.
[7] See KuKh 24/26. Also: The one abode (gṛha) is supreme Māyā and she is Kuṇḍalinī who is the Full Moon.
gṛham ekaṁ parā māyā sā ca kuṇḍalipūrṇimā || YKh (2) 26/35ab.
[8] See KuKh 29/45.
[9] KuKh 40/25.

Vedic sacrifice which, mixed with milk, was white. The drop of Soma, an object of much eulogy during the Vedic sacrifice, was the precursor of the lunar Drop – bindu. Occasionally, the lunar nectar is associated with wine – Surā – a feminine word and embodied in a goddess by that name. The stress here is not so much on the 'white' – sāttvika – purity of the drink and its spiritually nourishing properties, as on its powerfully inebriating – rājasika – effect. This is represented by the female, red drop of wine, still lunar but tinged with solar energy:

> The slender (beautiful young) woman who resides in the centre of the Moon is the Transmental (unmanā) who transports the mind. Merged in the plane of the Bliss of Stillness (nirānanda), she is (the goddess) Wine (Surā). (Mere) wine is not (the true) wine. [. . .]
>
> Once he has understood his own Transmission (ātmakrama) well, (the initiate) should practice drinking (pāna). He should contemplate the cup as the dawning Sun and the mantra as the dawning Moon, and (then) drink. He should imagine that the Drop, the colour of a ruby, is between them. Drink the (energy of this), the seventeenth digit (of the Moon), completely full of the Supreme Nectar.
>
> The nectar that flows from that energy (kalā) is the radiant power (tejas) of the Great Bhairava. O Lord of the god of the gods, that is (the true spiritual) liquor (madya) not that produced from grapes and sugar cane.[1]

The End of the Sixteen is where the Teacher resides.[2] Here also, in the 'maṇḍala at the end',[3] is the residence of the goddess who binds and liberates.[4] The Teacher is Bhairava, the Void, whereas She is the Khecarī, the Skyfarer, who is the Command.[5] In the End of the Sixteen she is in her undifferentiated (niṣkala) form. Possessing supreme power, she is called the Mind and her nature is consciousness.[6] The End of the Sixteen is where the supreme energy within the maṇḍala, that is, the goddess's Liṅga, is located. The goddess resides there in the

---

[1] KuKh 46/291; 299-301.

[2] See YKh (1) 3/250-252.

[3] KuKh 11/22cd-23.

[4] bandhamokṣakarī devī ṣoḍaśānte [k: ṣaḍrasāṁte; gh: -ṣānta] vyavasthitā [all MSs: -te] | KuKauM 5/206cd.

[5] The Command is said to be in the End of the Sixteen. This is, in due order, (the goddess) Khecarī.

ṣoḍaśānte smṛtā ājñā etat khecary anukramāt | KuKh 11/21ab.

[6] cittākhyā [k, gh, ṅ: nāsti] citsvarūpā [ṅ: cita-] paramakalayutā niṣkalā [k, gh, ṅ: niḥkalā] ṣoḍaśānte | YKh (1) 38/36c.

Void in the centre in her transcendent form and contemplates her own infinite nature. Paired, the thirty-two syllables of her Vidyā constitute the sixteen energies of the Moon. Thus she is both the Full Moon, as these sixteen modalities of the Transmental Command, as well as the New Moon, which is the transcendental energy at the End of the Sixteen:

> The goddess (Kubjikā, as the Vidyā) of thirty-two (syllables) who is Supreme Śiva's energy, is Kaulinī (who possesses an) adamantine body (vajradehā). She has come down along the Path of Meru and is the five sacred seats (that is, the Five Praṇavas) at the beginning and end (of her Vidyā), and the best of the gods bow to her. In the division (she is) the New and the Full Moon (amā and pūrṇā) and is endowed with the parts (pada) and instruments (karaṇa) (of the Vidyā). She is the sixteen(fold) Command and is well energized (sudīptā) by the seven Peak (Syllables). (She is) Nityā, who quells the fear of phenomenal existence. O mistress (svāminī)! Tell (me) the Vidyā.[1]

Creation and the teachings proceed from there, flowing as the mighty current of the Command. Here the goddess returns to rest again. In her transcendent aspect the goddess is 'the stainless Kālī, the dense black sound (ravā) well known (to be) in the End of the Sixteen'.[2] The transcendent is at the end of the extreme limit of the stages of manifestation. This is the End of the Sixteen. The goddess resides there as pure consciousness and its infinite power. There, in the darkness, which is the goddess's own inscrutable transcendental nature, she discerns ultimate reality:

> She who is (both) supreme (transcendental – parā) and inferior (immanent – aparā) bliss, unmanifest, transcendent, supremely existent, subtle, whose abode is the Bliss of Stillness, omniscient, eternal, primordial, beyond action and (yet) ever active, is the

---

[1] yā sā dvātriṁśadevī paramaśivakalā kaulinī vajradehā
*ādyante [k, gh, ṅ: * dyante] pañcapīṭhā suravaranamitā [ṅ: -ramitā] merumārge [k: mekamārgge; g, gh: ekamārge] 'vatīrṇā [k: vatīrṇo]* | bhede cāmā [all MSs: vāmā] ca pūrṇā padakaraṇayutā [k, gh: ya-] ṣoḍaśājñā [k, gh: -śajñā] sudīptā
kūṭaiḥ [ṅ: kūṭai] saptabhir nityā [k: saptāvi nitthā; gh: saptāvi ninyā; ṅ: saptāvi nityā] bhavabhayaśamanī [ṅ: -samanī] svāmine [k: ṣṭhā-; gh: ṣṭho-] brūhi vidyām [k, gh, ṅ: vidyā] ||
YKh (1) 38/38.

[2] sā kālī niṣkalaṅkā asitaghanaravā ṣoḍaśānte prasiddhā || YKh (1) 38/75cd; cf. KuKh 3/115-116.

Transmental, Kālī, the energy of consciousness (citkalā). This is the Lineage of the Divine Current (divyaughasantati).

Above, in the reality without defects, (she is) the will (icchā) which is the Gander (haṁsa i.e. Unstruck Sound). She knows the mantra, which is mad with the passion for expansion. She is the power of consciousness (cicchakti) and her nature is consciousness (bodha). Established in the End of the Sixteen, she pervades the Void and discerns (cinoti) (reality) in the Darkness (of Māyā).

Thus, O god, beyond the god,[1] transcendent and primordial (ādyā), she resides within Saṁvartā. And so she is omniscient, the agent (of all action), the energy Śāmbhavī elucidated in the Ciñciṇīmata[2] who emanates the cosmic form.

Above, the sentient being of consciousness (caitanyacetā) should contemplate the plane of the unfolding (emanation) (prasarabhūmikā). (Kubjikā, who is also called) Kulālikā, sports (ramate) (there) by filling (bharaṇāt) the Lion (who embodies the tradition). Silent (anādinī) and unmanifest (nirābhāsā), she has dissolved (away) into the End of the Sixteen.[3]

---

[1] This is how I understand the deviant compound 'deva-m-atītā'.

[2] This and the other names for the MBT and the Kubjikā tradition will be discussed in due course as will the names of the goddess.

[3] yā sā parāparānandā [ṅ: -nantā] yā [g: missing] sā [g: missing] avyaktarūpiṇī ǀ atītā sattamā [k, ṅ: saṁtanā; g: ?; gh: maṁtatā] śūkṣmā [g: ?] nirānandapadāśrayā [k, gh: -yaṁ; g: ?; ṅ: -ya] ǀǀ *sarvajñā śāśvatī [k: pāśva ; g: sāsvatī?; gh: yāśva; ṅ: sāśva] ādyā [k, gh, ṅ: ājñādyā; g: adyā] kriyātītā [k, g, gh: -te; ṅ: -bhīte] sadoditā ǀ *unmanā citkalā [k, ṅ: citakalā; gh: cittakalā] kālī etad divyaughasantatiḥ [k, ṅ: vivyaumasaṁtatī; g: devyāmasaṁ * ?; gh: vivyaumasatatī] ǀǀ ūrdhve nirāmaye tattve icchā haṁsasvarūpiṇī ǀ [g: ?]
prasaronmattamantrajñā [ṅ: praśaron-] cicchaktir [g: cicchakti-; ṅ: cichakti] bodharūpiṇī [k, gh: vādha-; ṅ: vedhi-] ǀǀ *cinoti [gh: vi-] ṣoḍaśāntasthā [g: -śātasthām; gh: -śātasthā] timire [k, gh, ṅ: miti; g: timite] śūnyavyāpinī [ṅ: śūnya * vyāpinī]* ǀ tena deva-m-atītādyā [k, gh, ṅ: -bhītādyā] saṁvartānte vyavasthitā ǀǀ tasmāt sā [k, g, gh: tasyāmana] kartṛrūpā [sarve: kartṛrūpaṁ] tu sarvajñā śāmbhavī [k, g, gh: sāṁbhavā; ṅ: -vā] kalā [sarve: kulā] ǀ sṛjate [g: śṛjate] viśvarūpaṁ [g: viśvarūpama] hi vikhyātā [k, gh, ṅ: vichetā; g: vicchentā] ciñciṇīmate ǀǀ *ūrdhve [k, gh: ūrdha g: ūrddha; ṅ: ūrddhaṁ] caitanyacetā [g: sacetanyacetā] cintayet [k, gh, ṅ: ca cintaye; g: ca cittayet] prasarabhūmikām [k, gh, ṅ: * sarabhūmikā; g: -kā]* ǀ bharaṇād [gh: mara-] api siṁhasya ramate ca kulālikā ǀǀ anādinī [all MSs: anadhvani] nirābhāsā ṣoḍaśānte layaṁ [gh: laya] gatā ǀ YKh (1) 35/2-8ab.

The goddess in the End of the Sixteen is Saṁvartā – the energy of the Doomsday Fire – that burns with the energy of bliss (ānandaśakti) in the centre of the maṇḍala that draws its name from it.[1] Obviously fire consumes and destroys. However, as the sacrificial fire, it creates as creation, according to the common Vedic belief, takes place through the sacrifice. Thus Fire also, like the Moon, has two aspects. When Kālī is identified with Fire, it is the consuming Fire of universal destruction in which the universe is withdrawn into the Void of the pre-cosmic, unmanifest reality. But when Kubjikā is identified with Fire, its creative aspect is emphasized. But this too, mirroring the polarities of the Moon, descends into immanent emanation and rises into transcendental withdrawal. This twofold movement is described as follows:

> The Fire (bhargojāta) at the upper end of the universe emits everything into the middle of it, as it does into the end. Then, having again checked it above the universe in the supreme End of the Sixteen, the Fire (bhargojāta) enters the first and supreme Śāmbhava plane.[2]

These lines refer to the Fire itself, which retains its normal male gender. The goddess, who is the female energy of this Fire, abides within the god in the End of the Sixteen. Addressing the goddess in this aspect, the god praises her both in her transcendent aspect within the god and her immanent one as the goddess who resides and is worshipped in all the sacred sites:

> (You are) the Doomsday Fire (saṁvartā) within the primordial lord (ādinātha), the energy of supreme Śiva, the famed Kaulinī. You are Vakrā[3], the Transmental the primordial (power) (ādyā), who is like the rays of the radiance (of ultimate reality) (dyuti); (you are) Śāmbhavī, the mother of liberation. (You are) the unfailing current of Kaula knowledge and, residing in the End of the Sixteen, (you) accomplish all things. O Saṁvartā, (you are) the mother of mantra,

---

[1] KuKh 1/1.

[2] viśvasyānte sṛjati akhilaṁ viśvamadhye 'thavānte [g: -nta] | viśvasyordhve [g: viśvasyārddhe] punar api pare [g: parame] ṣoḍaśānte [g: -nta] stamitvā [g: stumitvā] bhargojāto [g: -jātaṁ] viśati [g: viṁśati] paramaṁ śāmbhavaṁ [g: -vām] pādam ādyam [g: bhādhyam āpyam] || YKh (1) 54/3bcd.

[3] All the MSs read 'vajrā'. Although this is an interesting and significant reading, Kubjikā is not called this anywhere else as fas as I know whereas 'vakrā' is a very common name.

> blissful and innate (sahajā) and called 'Mother' (ambikā) in (each) sacred seat and field.[1]

Liberation in the Śāmbhava State

The End of the Sixteen is the highest limit of the supreme energy. Beyond and preceding all differentiated manifestation, it is the Void, the supreme Śāmbhava reality. Just as the End of the Twelve is the location of the Transmental, here the energy is called Śāmbhavīśakti, through which it pours down into the manifestation and rises back up into transcendence.[2] She connects below with the stream of emanation that proceeds from it, step by step down and above with the Śāmbhava state which is its highest extreme. Thus there are two aspects of this flow: the 'lower' immanentalizing and the 'supreme' transcendentalizing. The former is Śakti, the realm of manifestation and the pervasion of deity, and is on the left. The latter is Śiva, the realm of transcendental realisation which is on the right. The union of Śiva and Śakti is the universal Śāmbhava state (sarvaśāmbhava)[3]:

> The tranquil soul should sustain within his own body both the supreme (transcendence) and the inferior (immanence). Those who have reached the end of the Transmental are fully accomplished (siddha) (both as) Śāktas and as Śaivites (śāmbhava).[4]

This, the liberated condition, is the Śāmbhava state. Although the Śāmbhava state is known to other Kaula traditions, the Kubjikā Tantras focus on this as the supreme state and the liberated condition in a special way and take pride in being superior to other traditions because they alone teach the way to its attainment. Said to be the 'Supreme Nirvāṇa',[5] it is a state of perfect, blissful and perpetual repose. It is achieved when the deity, through the teacher, bestows upon

---

[1] saṁvartā ādināthe [k, gh, ṅ: -nāthaṁ; g: ādinādināthaṁ] paramaśivakalā kaulinī suprasiddhā vakrā [k, g, gh, ṅ: vajrā] tvaṁ [g: tva] unmanādyā dyutikiraṇanibhā śāmbhavī [g: sāmbhavī; gh: śo-] mokṣamātā [g: -mānā] |
*kaulajñānaṁ [k, gh, ṅ: -jñāno] tv [k, gh, ṅ: gh] amoghaṁ vitarati [k, gh: vila * ti; ṅ: vila * sati] sakalaṁ ṣoḍaśānte tu saṁsthā* saṁvarte [k, g, gh: sarvete; ṅ: sarvate] mantramātā [g: -to] pramuditasahajā pīṭhakṣetre 'mbikākhyā [k, g, gh, ṅ: -vikākhyā] [1] || YKh (1) 38/32.

[2] But note that the sources vacillate between the End of the Twelve and the End of the Sixteen as the 'location' of the highest state.

[3] KuKh 35/81.

[4] KuKh 36/17cd-18ab.

[5] KuKh 12/12cd-13ab.

the devotee the Command in its fullest, most complete form and he or she, thus empowered, abandons duality.[1]

> Once the undifferentiated (niṣkala) plane – which is the End of the Sixteen, the supreme abode and the eternal Śāmbhava liberation – has been attained, there is nothing greater than this. (Consciousness) as the perceiver (vetṛrūpa) should experience the wonder that is without form and tranquil. In the middle of that is the Supreme within the womb. He who knows it is a liberated soul. Above, in the supreme (reality) is the tranquil, subtle and auspicious (śivā) Vakrikā of the abyss (of the Void). O Kujeśvara, the glory (śrī) within it is liberation. In (that) faultless and certain (reality) one attains the blissful pulsation (ghūrmi) of the Command. The venerable one (śrīmat) should resort to that plane if he desires liberation.[2]

One of the most specific features of the liberated Śāmbhava state the texts constantly stress is that it is a condition of consciousness beyond the mind, free of the limitations of thought constructs. Similarly, the Trika Mālinīvijayottaratantra defines one who is penetrated by the Śāmbhava state as 'thinking nothing' (akiñciccintaka).[3] Let us see what this means in the context of the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras.

Thought constructs are so binding that even the god himself implores the goddess to save him from the terrible ocean of transmigratory existence (saṁsāra), the great ocean of Māyā 'crooked with countless thought constructs'.[4] Conversely:

---

[1] KuKh 4/1.

[2] niṣkale ca pade prāpte [k, kh: -pta] ṣoḍaśānte parālaye ||
śāmbhave śāśvate [k, kh: śāśvate] mokṣe asmāt parataraṁ na hi |
arūpaṁ vismayaṁ [k, kh: viśmayaṁ] śāntaṁ [k: śāṁte; kh: śānte] vetṛrūpo hi [k, kh: vetārūpopa] lakṣayet ||
tanmadhye tu parā garbhe yo jānāti sa muktibhāk |
ūrdhve [kh: ūrddhaṁ] śāntā śivā sūkṣmā pare kandaravakrikā ||
tadantaragatā [k, kh: tedaṁtaragatā] yā śrī sā [kh: (?)] śrī [kh: (?)] muktiḥ [k, kh: bhukti] kujeśvara [k, kh: -kujesvara] |
nirāmaye niḥsandigdhe [k, kh: ni-] ājñāghūrmiḥ [k, kh: -rmi] prapadyate ||
tat padaṁ āśrayec [k, kh: āśrīye] chrīmān yadi mokṣaṁ [kh: mo mokṣaṁ] samīhate [k, kh: samīhase] | YKh (2) 11/20ab-23.

[3] MVT 2/21.

[4] O mistress of the gods, I am frightened in the terrible ocean of transmigratory existence that is hard to cross and very fierce, the great ocean of Mahāmāyā crooked with countless thought constructs. Generated from the flux of the aggregate of troubles, it is the inauspicious ocean of strife. O Vakrikā! Save me from fear!

> . . . one whose mind is free of thoughts is successful – this is the alchemical potion (rasāyana). Thought is only delusion and thought is in the mind. Once thought has been destroyed then there is success (siddhi) without any doubt.[1]

Like the Tantras of other schools, the Kubjikā Tantras teach a large variety of means to attain virtually every possible goal and fulfill all possible desires, ranging from the most worldly to liberation. But means and methods are not enough. The texts tirelessly remind the practitioner that in order to successfully perform the rituals, no less than to repeat the mantras and practice yoga, he must be 'free of thought'. A true teacher is one who is as free of thought (niṣprapañca)[2] as he is of desire.[3] The practitioner (sādhaka) should emulate him. Living the life of the renouncer, his food is what he has begged and, free of desire and cultivating the requisite moral qualities, he is 'devoted to the transmission that is free of thought (nirvikalpakrama)'.[4] The Yoginī, his female counterpart, is similarly 'girt with the aspect of consciousness that is free of thought' and so, equanimous, is free of sorrow and false joy.[5] This condition is not prescribed just for those who are accomplished; it is a basic requisite for the most common initiate – the samayin.[6] Indeed the initiate, of whatever kind, should be free of thought, that is, saṁsārasāgare ghore dustare [k, gh: duṣṭāco; kh: -rā] cātidāruṇe [k, gh: rotidāruṇe; ṅ: vāti-] |

---

*vikalpakoṭivakre [k, kh, gh: -vahne; ṅ: -vadga] * [ṅ: le] mahāmāyāmahārṇave* ||
vighnasaṁghaughajanite [k, kh: vidyū-; gh: vipa-; ṅ: -saṁghogha-] duḥsaṁgharṣārṇave 'śubhe [all MSs: durādharṣārṇave-] |
bhīto 'haṁ devadeveśi trāhi māṁ vakrike bhayāt [k, kh, gh, ṅ: mayā] || YKh (1) 12/31-32.

[1] vikalpakṣīṇacittas tu [k, kh, g, ṅ: -cittasya; gh: -citasya] siddhyatīti [kh: sidhyatīti] rasāyanam |
*vikalpo [all MSs: vikalpa] mohanam eva [k, kh, gh: mohenasyeta; g: mohanasyeta; ṅ: vikalpamohena * ] vikalpo [k, gh: vikalpā] manasi [all MSs: manava] sthitaḥ ||
*vikalpasya kṣayaṁ kṛtvā tadā siddhir [k, gh, ṅ: si * r] na saṁśayaḥ* | YKh (1) 30/9-10ab

[2] nirmamo niṣprapañcaś ca [k, kh, gh, ṅ: niḥprapañcaśva] na ca [ṅ: va] dveṣī [k, kh, gh, ṅ: meti] parigrahī || | YKh (1) 9/3cd.

[3] nirmamo [k, gh: nirgamo] niṣprapañcaś [ṅ: niḥprapañcāś] ca nirdvandvo [ṅ: nidvīṁdvā] nirbhayaḥ [ṅ: nurbhayaḥ] sadā | [k, gh: + yuga kajā svachetache bhaviṣyati (k, gh: bhavikṣati) | (kh: ?)]
nipuṇo [k, kh, gh: nipaṇo] nirvikalpaś [k, kh, gh: nirdi-] ca nirāśī tattvavikramī || YKh (1) 25/2.

[4] nirvikalpakrame bhaktaḥ bhikṣāsī vigataspṛhaḥ || YKh (1) 4/47cd.

[5] *nirvikalpāṁśasannaddhā [k, kh, gh: nirvvikalpāṁsusannaddhāṁ; ṅ: nirvikalpāsa * nnaddhāṁ] samavṛttitvalaṁpaṭā [k, kh: samavṛṣṭitva-; gh: samavṛṭhitva-; ṅ: -paṭāṁ]* ||
*viṣādaharṣanirmuktā [k, kh, gh: -ktāṁ] pīṭhasthā [k, kh, gh: -sthāṁ; ṅ: * * * ] ca sadoditā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -tāṁ] |
*yoginī sā krame yogyā viśvaṁ tiṣṭhati [k: tiṣṭaṁti; kh: tiṣṭati; gh: ti * ] tanmukhe ||
YKh (1) 9/27cd-28.

[6] The samayin is established in the Rule; he exerts himself (therein). He is beloved amongst those who belong to the teacher's clan. He is endowed with the tranquil arising (śāntodaya) (of worldly distractions, when engaged in any spiritual discipline. This should be the condition of the Yogi who, observing the Vow of Knowledge (vidyāvrata), repeats with one-pointed attention the Vidyā on his pilgrimage, or who is engaged at night in union with the Yoginīs he meets there.[1] The heroes who fall in battle during an eclipse, dying without a thought, gain great spiritual fruit.[2] Even though they are external, rituals performed with a thought-free mind, lead to the supreme state.[3] The worship of the deity gives accomplishment (siddhi) in every way by virtue of the thought-free intention with which it is done. It is the inner dimension of the rite, technically called Krama Yoga. It is this that fosters the liberated condition of flight (khecaratva).[4] The mantras that are an essential part of all rituals and most yogic practices should be repeated in the same way by rising through the stages of Sound:

> One should dissolve (all things) away at the end of the mind (manānte) by means of the division of subtle Sound. Having attained spiritual consciousness). He abandons (the objects of attatchment), is dispassionate and possesses the Rule. Free of thought and well hidden – such is said to be the samayin.

---

samayasthaḥ [k, kh, gh: -stha] kṛtotsāhī [ṅ: kṛtātsohī] gurugotreṣu vatsalaḥ || śāntodayānvitaḥ [ṅ: -yānvitas] tyāgī viraktaḥ samayānvitaḥ [ṅ: samayārccinaḥ] | *nirvikalpaḥ [ṅ: nirvi * lpa] suguptaś ca [kh: va] samayī īdṛśaḥ smṛtaḥ* || YKh (1) 25/45cd-46.

[1] yogino yogayuktātmā samayapratipālakaḥ [k, kh, gh: -kāḥ] |
nirdvandvo [k, kh: nirdvaddho; gh: nirdvaṁddho] nirvikalpaś ca niśi caryākrame [k, kh, gh: caryāhane] rataḥ [k, kh, gh: ratāḥ] || YKh (1) 3/30.

[2] candrasūryasya graheṇa [k, kh, ṅ: grahaṇe] saṅgrāme sanmukhāhatāḥ ||
patitā nirvikalpāś ca yat phalaṁ tais [k, kh, gh: tes] prāpyate |
tat phalaṁ pādaśaucena [k, kh, gh: pādaśaicaina] kramikānāṁ kuleśvara [gh: -raḥ; ṅ: -rā] ||
YKh (1) 7/29cd-30.

[3] When worshipped by means of that Wheel with an aim (hetu) free of thought constructs, one attains the supreme place by means of the rites enjoined by the scripture.

pūjite tena [k, kh, gh: kena] cakreṇa nirvikalpena hetunā [k, kh: hetunāṁ] |
prāpyate paramaṁ sthānaṁ śāstrādiṣṭena [k, kh, gh: śāstradṛṣṭena] karmaṇā [kh: -ṇāḥ] ||
YKh (1) 5/60.

[4] Śikhānātha should be worshipped in the middle on the Great Ghost as (his) seat. He bestows accomplishment (when this is done) with all one's being and with an intention free of thought. The essence of supreme bliss is considered to be the supreme state (bhāva) of the all-pervasive lord. The (liberated) state of flight arises by means of this Kramayoga.

madhye [k, kh, gh: madhyai] pūjyaṁ [k, gh: pūjā; kh, ṅ: pūjya] śikhānāthaṁ mahāpretāsane [k, kh, gh: -protāsane; ṅ: -sana] sthitam ||
siddhidaṁ sarvabhāvena nirvikalpena [k, kh, gh: -kalpaina] hetunā |
paramānandasandohaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -ha] paraṁ bhāvaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: bhāve] mataṁ vibhoḥ [all MSs: vibhuṁ] ||
anena kramayogena khecaratvaṁ [kh: khai-] prajāyate | YKh (1) 9/109cd-111ab.

> the Transmental Śāmbhava plane, which is unborn, eternal and beyond the senses, one should not think at all. One should repeat mantra in this way in the three lineages (oli).[1]

The Tantras enjoin that offerings should be made guided by an intention free of thought.[2] This means, essentially, that they should be made freely without thinking about the expenditure involved or whether offerings such as meat or wine are improper or not. According to the MBT:

> (The adept) should drink with a contented mind impelled by the supreme power. He should never reflect (on the appropriateness) of whatever is offered to his own maṇḍala. He should consume it (bhoktavya) without thought (nirvikalpena).[3]

This is the sense of the injunction: Having fashioned the plane devoid of thought, one should not consider (further) what needs to be done.[4] For, as the MBT says: 'The bondage in the fool who has (many) thoughts (vikalpasahita) is nowhere destroyed.'[5] Conversely, established on the plane free of thought, all obstacles are destroyed.[6] Indeed:

> Abundance, knowledge of the transmission, the perception (which comes from) scripture, unflinching strength, union (saṁgama), increase in wealth; (all this) is on the plane free of thought.[7]

---

[1] sūkṣmanādavibhāgena manānte [k, gh: matānte; kh: matonte; ṅ: manonte] tu layaṁ kuru |
unmanatve pade prāpte śāmbhave śāśvate [k, kh, gh: śāsvate] aje [ṅ: ane] ||
karaṇānām atīte [k, kh, gh: kāranānamatīte] vā na kiñcid api cintayet |
anenaiva vidhānena japaṁ kuryāt [k, kh, gh: kuryā] trayoliṣu [ṅ: triyoliṣu] || YKh (1) 18/51-52.
[2] yaṣṭavyam aṣṭadhā pātraṁ nirvikalpena [kh: tirvi-] hetunā [k, kh, gh: -nāḥ] | YKh (1) 3/74ab.
[3] pibet [k, kh, gh: pive; ṅ: pitu] saṁtuṣṭacittena [k, kh, gh: śaṁ-] parāśaktyā tu preritaḥ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -tāḥ] |
svacakraṁ [ṅ: svacaruṁ] dāsyate kiñcid vicāraṁ naiva kārayet ||
nirvikalpena bhoktavyaṁ . . . . | YKh (1) 9/50-51a.
[4] nirvikalpapadaṁ kṛtvā vicikitsāṁ [gh: dici-] na kārayet | YKh (1) 3/136ab.
[5] vikalpasahite mūrkhe [k, kh, gh: mūrkhai] na pāśo nāśyate [k, kh, gh: paśodrasaye] kvacit ||
YKh (1) 4/324cd.
[6] sarvavighnāḥ [k, kh: -ghnā; ṅ: -vidyā] kṣayaṁ yānti [kh: ?; gh, ṅ: yāti] nirvikalpapade [ṅ: -pada] sthitaḥ [k, kh, gh: sthitaṁ] | YKh (1) 6/171ab.
[7] vaipulyaṁ kramavijñānaṁ śāstradṛṣṭir balācalam [k, kh: -dṛṣṭi- -valaṁ; gh: dṛṣṭhi- -valaṁ] |
saṁgamaṁ [k, kh, gh: saṁjamaṁ] dhanavṛddhiś [k, kh: -riddhiṁ] ca nirvikalpapade sthitam ||
YKh (1) 4/305.

Accordingly, the teachings brought down to earth by the Siddhas liberates from the bondage of thought. Belonging to the lineage of those who practice Krama Yoga, they themselves were free of it.[1] The Śāmbhava mode of piercing through the centres of the subtle body is free of thought constructs. It is so perfect that, in that condition, even the recollection of Buddhist Siddhas brings about realisation – although the Kubjikā Tantras tirelessly repeat in many ways that Buddhism is an inferior religion:

> Such is the Śāmbhava piercing, beyond thought, one should know it for oneself. It has been explained through the venerable Process of Absorption (alaṁgrāsakrama). By recollecting the Buddhist and other Siddhas, the piercing (vedha) which is devoid of thought constructs and which is directly perceptible (pratyakṣa) arises in order (to realise) the reality beyond the senses.[2]

Freedom from thought, in other words, is both one of the foundations of practice and the achievement of its perfect accomplishment in the Śāmbhava state. The practice of Yoga is understood as the development of the Śāmbhava state beyond conception which arises when thought constructs have been silenced. This is simply because 'the condition (gati) of the mind on the plane of realisation (sugatipada) is one that cannot be conceived by thought (cintācinta)'.[3] By thought here is meant the unsettled activity of the mind engaged in overcoming the ignorance and consequent doubts that constantly assail it, not only concerning the higher aspects of reality but even that of the nature of the most trivial objects. The mind cannot free itself. Only the power of grace can liberate it from this binding activity. Accordingly the god explains to the goddess that:

> The liberated state is the plane free of doubts within the supreme (reality). O goddess, what is the use of speaking much? I have explained it before. One attains the supreme plane by the teacher's grace.[4]

---

[1] YKh (1) 12/40cd-42ab.

[2] tāvac ca [k, kh: tavati ca] śāmbhavo [k., kh, gh: -va] vedhaḥ cintātītaḥ svayaṁ vedyaḥ || śrīmadalaṁgrāsakramagadito [k, kh, gh: -makramagaditri] bauddhādisiddhasaṁsmaraṇāt [k, kh, gh: -sasmaraṇāt] jāyate [k, kh: jāyeta; gh: jāyaṁta] nirvikalpaḥ [k, gh: -kalpaṁ; kh: tirvikalpaṁ] pratyakṣaḥ [k, kh, gh: -kṣa] parokṣārthe [k, kh, gh: parākṣayo] vedhaḥ | |
YKh (1) lines 3 and 4 in prose portion following 4/250.

[3] sugatipadacittasya [k, gh: sugatiṁ-; kh, g: -māsādya] cintācintagatir [k, gh: citā-; ṅ: -matir] bhavet | YKh (1) 30/56ab.

[4] KMT 19/95d-96.

The Kubjikā texts represent the excellence of their teachings in relation to others in a number of ways. One of them, common to other schools, is to grade schools hierarchically according to the principles of existence to which their supreme state is supposed to correspond. In cognitive terms, thought and the gradations of its presence and absence defines the hierarchy of principles that range from the grossest to the subtlest that merge into the transcendent. Even so, all spiritual disciplines, whatever the tradition, are necessarily grounded in the same energy of the Śāmbhava state. They issue, as the texts put it, from the limbs of the body of the goddess who is this energy. These range from the lowest extremity – the left big toe – where Buddhism originates, to the highest – the End of Sixteen – where the Śāmbhava state is attained which is the source of the Kubjikā tradition.[1] This is the ultimate (paścima) tradition which, especially beneficial in this Age of Strife (kaliyuga), is Śāmbhava and, above all others, is their original source and ultimate end.

Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava

If we compare these teachings with the Trika doctrine expounded by Abhinavagupta, which he considered to be pre-eminently Kaula, we find that although the Transmental is also considered there to be the highest stage in the

---

[1] The systems (darśana) and their corresponding places of origin in the goddess's body are as follows:

1) Bauddha – right big toe, 2) Arhata (i.e. Jaina) – the knees, 3) Brāhma – the hip, 4) Vaiṣṇava – the middle of the navel, 5) Saura – the heart, 6) Śaiva – the throat, 7) Svacchanda (school) – middle of the mouth, 8) Nityātantra – in the Point, 9) Pūrvāmnāya – the forehead, and 10) Paścimāmnāya – the End of the Sixteen, above which there is nothing.

We shall see in chapter five that deals with the other systems (darśana) and Kaula traditions (āmnāya) in relation to that of the Kubjikā Tantras that, according to YKh (1), the Svacchandatantra is associated with the Dakṣiṇāmnāya. Thus the Nityātantra may well be associated with the Uttarāmnāya. If so, the Nityā in this case is Kālī.

bauddhaṁ ca dakṣiṇād eva pādāṅguṣṭād [gh: pādāguṣṭād] vinirgatam [k, kh, gh: -tāṁ] |
arhataś [k, kh, gh: jāhaṁ; ṅ: ārhastaṁ] caiva jānubhyāṁ [gh: -bhyo] brāhmaṁ caiva nitambajam [k, kh, gh:; ṅ: tu netrayo] || |
vaiṣṇavaṁ [kh: veṣṇavaṁ] nābhimadhyāc [k, gh: -madhyā] ca sauraṁ [gh: maura] caiva hṛdi [k, kh, gh: hyadi] kramāt | [ṅ: + āhanna caiva jānubhyāṁ]
śaivaṁ [ṅ: śaiva] vai kaṇṭhadeśāc ca svacchandaṁ [k, kh: svachaṁda; ṅ: tyakṣaṁda] mukhamadhyataḥ ||
nityātantraṁ tathā bindau [ṅ: vindo] pūrvāmnāyaṁ [k, kh, gh: pūrvvāyaṁ] lalāṭagam |
paścimaṁ ṣoḍaśānte [k, kh, gh: sarvajuddhe; ṅ: sarva ūrddhe] tu tasyordhve [k, kh, gh: tasyorddha] naiva kiñcana ||
devyaṅgāt [k, kh, gh: divyaṁgā; ṅ: -gā] nirgatā bhedā darśanānāṁ kuleśvara |
na mayā kasyacit khyātās [k, kh, gh: khyātaṁs] tvadbhaktyā kathitā [k, kh, gh: -taṁ] mayā ||
YKh (1) 13/28cd-32ab (= YKh (2) 3/20-23).

ascent to the supreme reality, it is hardly more than a bridge that serves to connect the lower immanent stages to Supreme Śiva. Moreover, it is generally not identified with the Śāmbhava state. The Kubjikā Tantras, on the other hand, deal very extensively with the Transmental and the Śāmbhava state in numerous contexts and various perspectives. One of these is as part of the triad Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava. This tripartite division is well known to those familiar with Kashmiri Śaivism. It highlights the Śāmbhava state and Śāmbhava practice as the highest in a graded series. The lowest rung is called Āṇava. This is the condition of the aṇu – the individual soul – and includes all the principles of existence that relate to his condition. Next comes Śākta, which relates to the condition of Śiva's energy, whilst that relating to Śiva himself is Śāmbhava.

In view of the cardinal importance attributed to this triad by Abhinava, it is worth briefly comparing what the Kubjikā Tantras has to say about it with a few relevant features of Abhinava's complex exposition. Inspired by the Mālinīvijayottaratantra and the teachings of his Trika teacher, Śambhunātha, Abhinava presents this triad as the three basic categories into which all the practices taught in the Tantras (and by extension all religions) can be classified. To be exact, according to the MVT, these three terms denote three kinds of penetration (samāveśa) of the supreme principle and its energy into the adept's consciousness. Analogously, in the Kubjikā Tantras they denote, amongst other things, three types of initiation that take place in this way. Quoting the MVT, Abhinava says:

> The three (ways in which impurity is eradicated) was taught by the Supreme Lord in the Mālinīvijayottaratantra in the course of explaining (the forms) of penetration (into the supreme state) (samāveśa).
>
> That penetration which arises for one who thinks of naught by virtue of an intense awakened insight (prabodhataḥ), is said to be the one pertaining to Śiva (śāmbhava).
>
> That penetration attained by conceiving reality (vastu) by the mind alone, devoid of the utterance of mantra (uccāra), is here said to be the one pertaining to Śakti (śākta).
>
> That penetration which takes place by virtue of the utterance of mantra (uccāra), bodily postures (karaṇa), meditation (dhyāna), the letters (varṇa) and the formation of supports (sthānakalpanā) is appropriately said to pertain to the individual soul (āṇava).[1]

---

[1] TĀ 1/167-170. Abhinava is referring to MVT 2/21-23.

The few references to the Śāmbhava state found in Kashmiri Śaiva texts are usually in the context of the Śāmbhava means in relation to the other two means, namely, the Empowered (śāktopāya) and the Individual (āṇava). Essentially, the Individual means makes use of the activity of the psychophysical body including the senses, mind and the vital breath. The Empowered means is concerned with the purification of thought constructs to generate the pure 'thoughtless thought': 'I am Śiva'. This is achieved by focusing on the cognitive activity of consciousness in order to develop the reflective awareness of its essential nature as the indeterminate, non-discursive consciousness of the deity who is one's own essential nature. Finally, the Śāmbhava means includes all forms of direct, instantaneous realisation, free of intervening thought constructs attained by catching hold of the dynamic subjectivity of that same consciousness. Kashmiri Trika Śaivism explains this realisation to be that of the pure, absolute ego which is the essential nature of the Self and of the deity. Like the realisation attained through the other categories of practice, it is brought about by the penetration (samāveśa) of the power of grace, which, in this context, the Tantras call Rudra's energy (rudraśakti). Each of the means leads to the realisation of three corresponding states namely, Śāmbhava, which is Śiva's state, Empowered, which is the state of Śiva's power, and the Individual state which is that of the Self.

Maheśvarānanda, who lived in South India possibly in the 14th century, asserts that Kashmiri Śaivism teaches that ultimately each of these means and states culminate in the Śāmbhava condition which is the basic, essential and ultimate identity of all three.[1] Although he finds support for this assertion[2] in Kashmiri Śaiva works, his view is, it seems, influenced by his affiliation to a tradition that maintains the primacy of this state, as do the Kubjikā Tantras. Indeed, it may be possible that he was also an initiate into the Kubjikā tradition itself.[3]

However, although Abhinavagupta would agree that this is the highest in a graded series of states of consciousness, it is not the ultimate reality taught in his Anuttaratrika school. As long as it does not become permanent, the Śāmbhava state degenerates back into the Śāmbhava means or even to a lower one belonging to the other two levels of practice. And this will inevitably happen as long as the aspirant is in a state of consciousness and being in which there is a goal to achieve. This means more than simply saying that there is no goal to achieve because it has already been attained. The Śāmbhava state is not ultimate, from

---

[1] Maheśvarānanda (MM p. 152) asserts that this view is supported by the Vijñānabhairava and Kṣemarāja who commented on it.

[2] See MM p. 168.

[3] See Sanderson 2002: 3.

Abhinava's point of view, because even though it is indeed the highest state, it is still in the domain of practice so long as even a subtle latent trace of duality remains. And such it will inevitably remain until the realisation dawns that there is nothing to achieve because nothing has ever been lost from infinite consciousness or has ever taken place outside it. Beyond all definition, which necessarily implies finitization, ultimate reality is 'An-uttara' because it is that concerning which there is 'no' – an – 'reply' – uttara. Avoiding the atheistic absolute of some interpretations of the Upaniṣads, which Abhinava understands to be simply negation, he refers to Anuttara as Bhairava. Bhairava is the principle beyond the pure transcendence of Śiva. He is the Inexplicable which from the point of view of our limited knowledge – i.e. understanding, experience and consciousness – is in this sense beyond him but assumes the status of deity for the purpose of instruction. Anuttara / Bhairava is the Lord of Consciousness (cinnātha), the pure perfectly translucent mirror within which all manifestation shines reflected. All is the Divine Light of the Absolute – Anuttara – which shines perpetually; there is nothing else and nothing else has ever or will take place. This is the highest reality that has 'no' an- 'higher' - uttara reality beyond it. It is also 'no' an- 'means' - upāya. Abhinava teaches:

> Abandon all application (avadhāna)! What are you applying yourself to? Try to understand this for yourself: application to that which is full and perfect makes no sense, nor can that which is not full and perfect every attain to authentic existence (satyabhāva).
>
> Those who sanctified thus by the supremely real consciousness firmly affirmed (within them), and who are established on the path of the Absolute (anuttara), are independent of all means.
>
> The people of this world, intent as they are on their own affairs, do not exert themselves to act for the benefit of others; while he in whom all the impurity of phenomenal existence has been destroyed and who is identified with Bhairava by virtue of which he is full and perfect has clearly only this (left) to do, namely, to attend to the well-being of the world. Such is the extent of his graciousness that those whose consciousness is pure by following that same course of development (tādrūpyakrameṇa) and who behold such a one also become of his same nature.[1]

Attainment, brought about by 'beholding such a one' who has realised the Absolute, is instantaneous, spontaneous, complete and permanent. Accordingly, 'no-means' (anupāya) is considered to be the culmination of the Śāmbhava means.

---

[1] TĀ 2/12, 34, 39-40.

From a historical perspective, we notice a prominent remnant trace of a characterization of the highest state as Śāmbhava in Abhinava's soteriology. We have had occasion to notice several times that that too, according to the Kubjikā Tantras, is attained by seeing the teacher or better, by his powerful gaze or that of the deity. What has happened is that the focus has been shifted onto Anuttara, the Personal Absolute Abhinava expounds. The reason for this is related to Abhinava's hermeneutics. His synthesis of the Tantric traditions he valued, and their incorporation thereby into the Trika school he sponsored and led to its highest level of development, involved a number of hermeneutical strategies. One of these was the categorization of practice in this way. Except for the highest means, which is only accessible to Trika Śaivite, they are applicable to all forms of spiritual endeavor of any religion or cult. Abhinava applied the categorization of practice to those he knew. Pragmatically formulated in terms of its soteriology, he incorporated the Śāmbhava state of the Kaula systems he valued into that of the Pratyabhijñā. This system was originally formulated by Somānanda,[1] whom Abhinava venerates as the teacher who first formulated (but without specifically defining) this 'practice' which is 'no practice'.[2] The phenomenological theology of the Pratyabhijñā culminated in Utpaladeva's exposition of the absolute ego.[3] This is attained by an act of recognition (the meaning of the word pratyabhijñā). This Abhinava understood to be Anupāya – No-means. Its corresponding state, the

---

[1] Somānanda refers to the system he expounds simply as monistic Śaivism. He does not call it Pratyabhijñā – 'Recognition'. The name derives from the analogy Utpaladeva (Somānanda's disciple) expounds between the recognition of a person and the Supreme Being that arises by coupling what is said about them with their previously unrecognised presence. Recognition is the basis of all knowledge, including that of empirically definable entities, whether physical or ideal. This knowledge, however, is only partial if it stops short of insight into their ultimate nature that is understood to be the complete (pūrṇa) recognition that they are all essentially manifestations of Śiva.

[2] Acknowledging Somānanda's contribution, Abhinava refers to him at the conclusion of his exposition of Anuttara and Anupāya in chapter two of his TĀ, where he writes:

> This (view) is stated in the Ūrmikaulatantra which is based on the spiritual lineage of the Siddhas, and also in the works of (our) teachers beginning with Somānanda. TĀ 2/48.

Jayaratha quotes for us the relevant verses from Somānanda's Śivadṛṣṭi where he teaches, as Abhinavagupta would call it, Anupāya:

> What can contemplation (bhāvanā) and means (karaṇa) have to do with Śiva who is perpetually manifest (udita)? [. . .] When gold has been known, once how can (further) reflection (bhavanā) serve as a means (to know it better)? Once Śiva's self-established nature has been known through firm realisation by (some) means of knowledge applied once, be it the scripture or the teacher's words, (no further) means or contemplation serves any purpose in any circumstance. ŚDṛ 7/101cd, 7/5-6.

[3] See Dyczkowski 2004: 29ff..

Absolute itself, he called Anuttara and understood it to be, amongst other things, the culmination and ultimate condition of the Śāmbhava means and the state to which it leads.

That this has taken place is apparent when we examine the teachings of the early Kālīkrama. The Śāmbhava state and its energy Śāmbhavī are already considered to be supreme in the JY. The JY, which considers itself to be an esoteric scripture, incorporates the Kālīkrama in its earliest known form as higher esoteric teachings. However, the Śāmbhava state and its energy are rarely mentioned in the JY. Moreover, although the Śāmbhava state is part of the triad along with the Śākta and Āṇava states, it is not worked into an extensive system centred on it.[1] Subsequently, when the Kālīkrama emerged as an independent school in its own right, the Śambhava state and its energy becomes a more prominent representation of the goal. The Devīpañcaśataka, for example, calls Śāmbhava the most excellent plane of being.[2]

Then in the third phase of its development, the Kālīkrama came to be formulated into a compact system transmitted through known Kashmiri teachers

---

[1] Typical of the very few independent references in the JY to the Śāmbhava state and its energy are the following.

If, having properly sustained the unfolding of the Śāmbhava (state) which is the sixteenth (energy of the Moon) that is merged within (universal) motion and, within the plane of the Fire of Time, one should know that then the god, by virtue of (that) great force (haṭhāt), is the very powerful Haṭhakeśvara.

yadā cārāntare līnaṁ kālānalapadāntare |
prasaraṁ śāmbhavaṁ saṁyag dhārayitvā [k, kh: dā-] tu ṣoḍaśam [k: -śaḥ; kh: -śa] ||
haṭhād devas [k: vevas; kh: deva] tadā jñeyo haṭhakeśo mahābalaḥ | JY 1/45/104-105ab.

O goddess, there are (countless) hundreds of particular waves in the exhaled and inhaled breath. Having taken up the modality in the middle (between the two breaths) where that Śāmbhavī energy that is brilliant like (pure white) snow (is located) . . . .

prāṇāpānau yatra [g: yathā] devi viśeṣormiśatāni [all MSs: nimiśo-] ca ||
madhyavṛttiṁ [all MSs: madya-] samāsṛtya yatra sā śāṁbhavī [k: śāṁhavī] kalā |
tuśārasadṛśaprakhyā . . . . || JY 2/19/65cd-66.

She is Śāmbhavī who destroys transmigratory existence and is imperishable contemplation.

saṁsārocchedakī yā sā śāṁbhavī [k: sībhavī] bhāvanākṣayā [kh: bhāva?] || JY 2/33/33cd

[2] O Bhairavī, abandon deviousness and grace me that I may quickly attain the most excellent Śāmbhava plane.

tyaja kauṭilyabhāvaṁ me 'nugrahaṁ kuru [g: kulu] bhairavi ||
prāpnuyām acirād yena śāmbhavapadam uttamam [kh, g: śāṁbhavaṁ-] | DP 7/7cd-8ab.

beginning with Jñānanetra (alias Śivānanda) who lived about the middle of the 9th century CE. In this phase of the Kālīkrama (now simply called Krama) more attention is dedicated to the Śāmbhava state as the ultimate one. The Mahānayaprakāśa by Arṇasiṁha is representative of this form of the Kālīkrama, into which the Pratyabhijñā has not been integrated, as took place subsequently in its south Indian branch,[1] and so is still relatively close to its Tantric scriptural prototype. In accord with the basic eschatology of the Kālīkrama, the Śāmbhava state is understood to be the condition of total cessation of all phenomenal manifestation and the binding duality of the lower modalities of the dynamism of consciousness. It is the end of all that comes to an end. The destruction of destruction: the death of death. The beings who experience this state are called Śāmbhava Siddhas. Arṇasiṁha explains:

> The goddesses of the Śāmbhava (Siddhas) reside in the abode free of duality and bestow the attainment of the plane of oneness (sāmarasya). They are said to be these very (goddesses) because, expanding, luminous lights, they are intent on devouring (the duality of) the fourfold manifestation of Speech that ranges from the Supreme to the Corporeal (vaikharī).[2]

Again:

> The Śāmbhava (state) is the one in which the power of consciousness (citi) suddenly (sahasā) dissolves away into the Great Void called the Inactive (niḥspanda) that is profound and has no abode. Cognitive awareness (jñāna) arises here in the form of a subtle wave of consciousness out of that ocean of emptiness, which is the perfectly peaceful condition of the dissolving away of destruction.[3] [. . .] Again, that same (principle) free of the cognitive process (saṁvittikalanā) is the supreme absolute (niruttara) said to be the Śāmbhava state of emptiness (vyomaśāmbhava).[4]

Śitikaṇṭha comes closer to the Trika view in his Mahānayaprakāśa where he

[1] These developments, authors and texts will be discussed in chapter four.

[2] parādivaikharītyantaṁ (parānvaikharī nityaṁ) vāgullekhacatuṣṭayam |
yatas tasyaiva niratā (niranta) bhedagrāsāya (-ye) dīptayaḥ ||
sāmarasyapadaprāptidāyinyo yā vikasvarāḥ |
khyātās tā eva śāmbhavyo devyo nirdvayadhāmagāḥ || MP (2) 100-101.

[3] mahāśūnye (mahāśrūnye) tu gahane niḥspandākhye 'niketane (niṣpandā-) |
sahasā vilayaṁ yāti citir (citi) yatra sa śāmbhavaḥ ||
atipraśāntasaṁhāravilayavyomasāgaraḥ |
tasmād īṣaccittaraṅgarūpajñānam ihoditam || MP (2) 129-130ab.

[4] punas tad eva saṁvittikalanāparivarjitam |
niruttaraṁ paraṁ yat tat kathitaṁ vyomaśāmbhavam || MP (2) 134.

teaches that the Śāmbhava Siddhas attain the (feminine) Absolute – Anuttarā. This he defines as the experience they have of repose (viśrānti), all together and at once, in the one reality by attaining[1] the ultimate (paryanta) state of assimilation of phenomena into consciousness (alaṁgrāsavṛtti).[2] Anuttarā (the feminine of the masculine Anuttara) is the primordial energy (ādyāśakti) called the Inexplicable (Anākhyā), which is the Śāmbhava nature (rūpa).[3]

The probably South Indian author of the third Mahānayaprakāśa – who, unlike Śitikaṇṭha and Arṇasiṁha, makes full use of Pratyabhijñā concepts – begins his work with a eulogy of No-means as the most intense form of grace (tīvraśaktipāta) through which the supreme principle is attained. Indeed, he goes so far as to identify the Krama teachings with No-means[4], which he identifies with the Śāmbhava penetration (śāmbhavasamāveśa) that takes place through the most intense form of grace (atitīvraśaktipāta). In this liberated state all things are experienced as the nectar of one's own innate bliss.[5]

Finally, we should note before moving on that the association of Abhinava's conception of No-means with the Śāmbhava state accords with the Kubjikā Tantras' understanding of it, as it does with that of the Kālīkrama. The KMT teaches:

> The Śāmbhava state is the contemplation (dhyāna) of the Command. It is free of all means (of realisation) there is no knowledge concerning the utterance of mantra, gesture (mudrā), meditation, thought, extent or restraint, no breaking of knots or concentration what to say of the formation of place (sthānavikalpanā).[6] (The aspirant) should cast (his phenomenal) Being

---

[1] The expression here is saṁsparśena lit. 'by touching'.
[2] MP (1) p. 103.
[3] MP (1) p. 44.
[4] This is the process of No-means where the one who is established therein is the Lord of Yoga.

anupāyakramaḥ so 'yaṁ yatra rūḍhaḥ sa yogarāṭ | MP (3) 1/23.

[5] The universe of the liberated state whilst living (jīvanmukti), which is the nectar of one's own (innate) bliss, is conceived (prakalpate) when the Śāmbhava penetration arises by the most intense form of grace.

atitīvraśaktipātād ārūḍhe śāmbhave samāveśe |
svānandāmṛtarūpaṁ jīvanmukteḥ prakalpate viśvam || MP (3) 1/7.

[6] The 'formation of a place', which is termed sthānakalpanā in Kashmiri Śaiva sources, figures there as one of the features of the Individual Means (āṇavopāya). In this context, 'place' refers to a number of types of 'locations'. The sacred sites worshipped externally and projected into the body represent one type. Other 'locations' are those that form a part of the physiology of the subtle body and the stream of the vital breath that moves through them. They also include the implements, > (bhāva) there into the location of the 'lower and upper cavity (roma)'. Above is the Knot, below the Bulb (kanda); in the centre there is nothing at all. Know that place to be Śāmbhava, characterized as Śiva's Void (śambhurandra). One should not think of anything there. (There is only) a subtle collocation (of awareness) in the energy of consciousness (citi). The bliss of knowledge comes about just by recollecting (saṁsmaraṇa) in this way. (One who has realised this) brings about many insights (pratyaya) in others by merely speaking.[1]

The Śāmbhava state, like Anuttara, is the realisation that everything is complete just as it is. There is nothing further to attain because everything has been attained right from the beginning, as it were. There is no need to practice: this reality is attained by desisting from exertion:

> One should practice the Śāmbhava (state) by the Path of Stillness (nirācāra). Again, what use is practice for one who has everything before him?[2]

So we have come full circle passing through Abhinava's Anuttaratrika and the Kashmiri Kālīkrama back to the Kubjikā Tantras. Let us see what they have to say about the three categories of practice and attainment so dear to Abhinava. The three divisions of Śāṁbhava, Śākta and Āṇava are known to the independent Kālīkrama sources such as the Devīpañcaśataka[3] and the Kramasadbhāva, idols and the like into which deities and other beings are projected for ritual purposes. Abhinava explains:

---

> The places are said to be of three kinds: in the vital breath, in the body and outside (the body). The breath is fivefold in the body. (Thus, place) is of two kinds, according to whether it is outside (the body) or within (it). The external (places) are the maṇḍala, the sacrificial ground (sthaṇḍila), the (sacrificial) vessel (pātra), the rosary (akṣasūtra), the book (pustaka), the Liṅga, the skull (tūra), the cloth (paṭa), the image (made of papier-mâché) (pusta), the idol (pratimā), and the divine effigy (mūrti). Thus the outer (place) is of eleven kinds (each which are of) countless varieties. TĀ 6/2-4ab.

[1] KMT 13/78b-82.

[2] KMT 19/98.

[3] In the DP we read the following which implies that insight of the one reality is attended by that of these three modalities but the DP has nothing more to say about them:

> I have heard about the (reality) free of thought which is the belief of the Yoginīs. Tranquil, terrific and profound, it is Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava.

yoginīnāṁ ca viśvāsaṁ [g: viśyāsaṁ] nirvikalpaṁ mayā śrutam ||

although they are not described in any detail.[1] The early Kashmiri teachers of the Kālīkrama ignored these divisions. Probably because they did not consider them to be an essential part of it, they did not incorporate them into their system. They were, however, taken up at a later stage in its development when it spread to the south of India, but this took place in the larger context of a systematic syncretism with the Trika system elaborated by Abhinavagupta. It is interesting and surprising, therefore, that they are more effective modalities in the earlier JY. In the following passage drawn from there, the three modalities are understood as those of complete and perfect Yoga attained through the realisation of oneness by merging with the universal energy of the deity:

> By reflecting on ultimate reality, (the energy of the goddess) wanders throughout the whole universe, including the gods, demons and men as the division of pervasion and the pervader. Through the Yoga (lit. 'union'), by means of which (this energy) is checked (and so appropriated); and by the unfolding of its essential nature, the yogi becomes of that nature, endowed with the very essence of accomplishment. By attaining oneness in this way, Yoga – Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava – has been explained, which illumines the meaning of the teacher's (instruction).[2]

śāntaṁ [g: śānta] ghoraṁ tathā gūḍhaṁ śāmbhavaṁ [g: śāṁḍavaṁ] śāktam āṇavam | DP 1/15cd-16ab.

[1] The following are the only two references we find in the KS. As I have consulted only one incomplete manuscript of the KS, it is possible that it has more to say about these modalities. The first reference simply says:

(Each one whether) Śākta or Śāmbhava knowledge bestows the fruit of all accomplishments.

śāktaṁ tu śāmbhavaṁ jñānaṁ sarvasiddhipradāyakam | KS 2/24ab.

In the light of the second reference, it appears that 'knowledge' stands for the Āṇava modality. Bhairava is speaking to the goddess:

The practice which is reality itself has come from your mouth. It is the knowledge that is Āṇava union (melāpa), as well as Śākta and Śāmbhava.

tava vaktrād viniryātaṁ [viniyatiṁ] vidhānaṁ tattvarūpakam |
jñānaṁ āṇavamelāpaṁ [mandhaka-] śāktaṁ śāṁbhavam eva ca || KS 3/9.

[2] vyāptivyāpakabhedena paramārthavicārataḥ || vicarantī jagat kṛtsnaṁ sadevāsuramānuṣam |
tadavaṣṭambhayogena tatsvarūpavikāsanāt [k: -rūpe-] ||
tatsvarūpo [k: ta- kh: na-] bhaved yogī siddhisaṁdohasaṁyutaḥ |
evam aikātmyasaṁpattyā śāktaṁ [k, kh: śākta] śāmbhavam āṇavam ||

Basic to the perspective of the Kālīkrama is the perception of immanent reality in temporal (rather than spatial) terms, and the transcendent as their unity in perennial eternity. The equation of the phases of these processes with the three categories we are examining is therefore particularly interesting, though not elaborated in the JY itself or by Abhinava who preferred the Trika presentation of them. Note that in this case, the fourth modality is Kula that corresponds to the Inexplicable that contains the three modalities:

> O goddess! Sinless one! I will explain to you all the Śākta and Śāmbhava (states) as well as the Āṇava (condition) and Kula which is a special (viśeṣa) grace. The process of emanation (sṛṣṭikrama) is the first. Descent (i.e. persistence) is the second. Withdrawal is the third and the Inexplicable (anākhyeya) is the fourth.[1]

Turning now to the Kubjikā sources, we may start with the most basic application of these three as modalities of mantra – one already found in the JY although it is not elaborated there.[2] To be effective a mantra must be recited in consonance with the rise of Kuṇḍalinī along the channels of the vital breath. The body of the mantra is Āṇava while the seed that makes it fertile and potent is the energy of Kuṇḍalinī. This is the Empowered (śākta) modality of mantra. The Śāmbhava modality is the elevation of each part (pada) of the mantra and with it

---

yogam ākhyātam etad vai guror arthaprakāśakṛt | JY 1/12/456cd-459ab.

[1] śāktaṁ [k, kh, g: śākta] śāmbhavaniḥśeṣaṁ [k, kh, g: -ṣa] āṇavaṁ [kh g: aṇavaṁ] kulam eva ca |
viśeṣānugrahaṁ devi pravadāmi tavānaghe ||
sṛṣṭikramaṁ tu prathamaṁ avatāraṁ dvitīyakam |
saṁhāraṁ [g: ?] tu [g: ?] tṛtīyaṁ [g: ?] syād anākhyeyaṁ [k: aṁnā; kh, g: ānā-] caturthakam ||
JY 4/20/58-59.

[2] In one place the JY simply says:

> Mantras enjoined by the scriptures are Śākta, Śāmbhava and Āṇava.

śāktāś ca śāmbhavā maṁtrā āṇavāḥ śāstracoditāḥ [g: -coditāditāḥ] | JY 4/50/187ab.

A more sophisticated understanding of mantras in relation to these states is implied in the following reference. It is part of a passage in which the activity of various energies are described:

> Another (energy) pierces fettered souls with force by means of the Yoga of emanation and another (pierces) with the vitality of mantra in union (yoga) and in the Śākta and Śāmbhava (states).

anyā ca sṛṣṭiyogena vedhayantī balāt paśūn ||
*mantravīryeṇa [kh: maṁtravī * ?] caivānyā yoge śākte ca śāmbhave | JY 4/20/33cd-34ab.

the vital breath and Kuṇḍalinī, the energy of consciousness, to the plane (pada) of the Self. Thus these three, the body, which is Āṇava, the mind, which is Śākta, and the Self, which is Śāmbhava, fuse in the purifying rise of Kuṇḍalinī and its nourishing, illumining descent in consonance with the rhythm of the vital breath. The MBT teaches:

> Mantras are in three modalities (gati) – Āṇava, Śākta, and Śāmbhava. The Vidyā should be repeated by means of the empowered (śākta) utterance. (Repeated in this way) this mantra is merged in the dynamism of Śiva (śivacāra). One should repeat the mantra, which is on the path to liberation, within Rudra. Śakti is the seed of mantras while the body (piṇḍa) (of the mantra) is the field. One should know that the part (pada) (of the mantra arises) if it is fixed (in the field which is its highest state). This is a mantra's threefold modality (gati). The Self, mind (manas) and body (piṇḍa) is the triple energy and the 'coming and going' (which is the dynamism of the mantra's recitation). One should think that (in this way) the utterance of that mantra has become one.[1]

More specifically, the three, Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava, are the three aspects or parts of the mantra Tadgraha.[2] The section of the KMT where this mantra is explained is drawn from the Tantrasadbhāva, a Trika Tantra. It is an example, therefore, of the application of this tripartite division in the original Trika sources adopted by the Kubjikā tradition. This mantra is considered to be so important that the texts refer to it as the 'Root'. It called the 'Triple Thorn' (trikaṇṭaka) because it is divided into three parts.[3] It consists of fifty groups of three syllables each, thus making one hundred and fifty syllables in all. The first syllable in each group is a letter from the alphabet called the Assembly of Sounds – Śabdarāśi – in which the letters are arranged in their normal alphabetical order.[4] The second is a syllable of the Triple Vidyā. The Triple Vidyā consists of the

---

[1] āṇavaṁ [k, kh: ādyavaṁ] śāmbhavaṁ śāktaṁ mantrāṇāṁ trividhā gatiḥ ||
śāktoccārāj [k, kh, gh: śāktāccārāj-] japed vidyāṁ [k, kh, gh: vidyā] mantro 'sau [k, kh, gh: maṁtrasyo] śivacāragaḥ [k, kh, gh: siva-] |
rudrānte [k, kh, gh: rudāṁte] ca japen mantraṁ [k, gh: matraṁ] mokṣamārgapadāśritam [k, kh: -mārgaṁpadmāśritaṁ; gh: -mārgaṁ-] ||
mantrāṇāṁ śaktibījaṁ tu piṇḍaṁ kṣetraṁ vidhīyate |
yadā rūḍhaṁ padaṁ jñeyaṁ mantrasya trividhā gatiḥ ||
*ātmā manaś ca piṇḍaś ca triśaktiś [k: śviśaktiś; kh: śviśaki ; gh: ściśakiś] ca gamāgamam |
uccāraṁ tasya mantrasya ekībhūtaṁ vicintayet || YKh (1) 2/26cd-29.

[2] KMT 18/55 ff.. See KuKh 23/1-20 and notes concerning the mantra Tadgraha.

[3] KuKh 20/28.

[4] Most of chapter nineteen of the KuKh (19/1-75) is dedicated to an exposition of Śabdarāśi.

Vidyās of the three goddesses of the Trika namely, Parā, Parāparā and Aparā. Together the number of syllables of these three Vidyās makes fifty.[1] The third syllable is drawn from the Mālinī alphabet.[2] The first twenty-five units of Tadgraha are arranged in the normal forward order of the alphabet. The remaining twenty-five units are arranged in the reverse order. According to the ṢSS, the Assembly of Sounds (śabdarāśi) is Śāmbhava. Mālinī is Śākta and the Triple Vidyā is Āṇava. The Triple Vidyā covers the entire sequence of principles from Earth to Śiva, the Assembly of Sounds and Mālinī, the dynamics of emanation and withdrawal, respectively. The recitation of Tadgraha, half in the forward order, which is that of emanation, and half in the reverse, which is that of withdrawal, is thus the sacred sonic counterpart of the dynamism of the entire gamut of reality, alternately emitted and withdrawn. To experience the dynamism of Tadgraha is to know the whole of the one triadic reality. Thus, according to one sequence of signs of attainment presented in connection with the recitation of Tadgraha, the final and highest sign of attainment is said to be 'understanding' ((anu)gama) which the commentary explains is: 'the perfect understanding that is the knowledge of (the three levels) Āṇava, Śākta, and Śāmbhava'.[3]

Another way of understanding this important triad is in relation to another one, formed by dividing the thirty-six principles into three parts: Inferior (apara), Middling (parāpara) and Supreme (para). The first ‘inferior' part is the Principle of the Self (ātmatattva). This spans the thirty-one principles starting with Earth up to Māyā. The next, the Principle of Vidyā (vidyātattva), extends for the next four principles from Pure Knowledge (śuddhavidyā) to Śakti (śakti) and is the middle one. The supreme one, named Śiva (śivatattva), consists of only the highest principle, namely, Śiva. The three, Ātmā, Vidyā, and Śiva, symbolized by the three luminaries Moon, Fire, and Sun[4] encompass the entire range of the experience of reality. By projecting these three principles into the body, the energy of consciousness that penetrates the adept assumes these three forms[5] and so, empowered by them, he ascends through the three spheres to liberation.

---

[1] The three Vidyās are discussed and presented in full in chapter twenty of the KuKh.

[2] Mālinī is expounded in chapter eighteen of the KuKh.

[3] stobhaṁ [g: -bha] stambhanam āveśaṁ gamaṁ caivātra suvrate || ṢSS 11/122ab. The commentary explains: gamam iti āṇavaśāktaśāmbhavagamam anugamaṁ samyakparijñānam ity arthaḥ.

[4] candrāgniravibhedena vidyā ātmā śivas [k, gh: śiva] tridhā | YKh (1) 3/233ab.

[5] Meditation, worship and the repetition of mantra is the same in the body as it is in Being. Deposit the triple principle (on the body) and then at that time the energy penetrates (into it) which is Āṇavā, Śāmbhavā and Śāktā in due order.

yathā bhāve [k, gh: bheve] tathā dehe dhyānaṁ pūjārcanaṁ japam | [kh: ?]
tritattvaṁ vinyaset paścāt kalā saṁkramate tadā || [kh: ?]
āṇavā [k, gh: ānavā] śāmbhavā śāktā tasmin kāle [kh: ?] tv anukramāt [kh: ?] | YKh (1) 1/3-4ab.

In the following passage the ascent to the supreme Śāmbhava state is again understood through the three spheres of the Individual, Energy and Śiva. Although they coincide with the ones we have analyzed, they are presented in a different perspective as follows:

> Time is said to extend progressively from the Earth principle up to the Equal One (samanā). The sphere of transmigratory existence exists to the extent in which (time) operates. (This) manifold is contained within Māyā and is well sustained by Pure Knowledge (śuddha vidyā – the principle just above Māyā).
>
> Māya should be intuited to be of three kinds. First comes the Māyā (commonly known as such). Mahāmāyā is within (this, the) principle of Māyā. It follows after and is endowed with (the series of) energies (sakalā). (The third form of Māyā) is above Śiva. (Mahāmāyā) is the New Moon (amā) which is at the end of emission (visarga) and is subtle and stainless (nirañjanā).
>
> The Equal One is the inferior (immanent form of) Māyā. Thus the universe is contained within Māyā. Beyond Māyā, beyond the energies (kalā) and beyond the path (of emanation and withdrawal) is (the ultimate) faultless (reality).
>
> Without utterance,[1] incomparable, free of the impurity that is thought and the duality of desire, it is the undisturbed (stream up to the Transmental) with six parts (ṣaṭprakāra). This is said to be the differentiated form (sakala) of liberation. The undifferentiated (form – niṣkala) is said to (come) at the end of that. Once known the differentiated and the undifferentiated (forms of liberation), the yogi is freed from the mortal condition (martya). I will now expound the sixfold introduction to the differentiated (sakala aspect).
>
> The Śāmbhava (state), supreme and tranquil, is above the six (Wheels). It is liberation (kaivalya), unique (kevala), tranquil, devoid of the Five Voids[2] and beneficial. It is consciousness, supreme and pure. It is the inexplicable (kiñcit) Śāmbhava (state) that is pure consciousness (cinmātra). It is supreme. It is the supreme Nirvāṇa, the body made of consciousness along with Śiva.
>
> The subtle, pure consciousness of the Person is said to be subtle and omnipresent. (Thus) consciousness is said to be of three kinds, Individual (āṇava), Empowered (śākta), and Śāmbhava.[3]

---

[1] MS K reads: niradhvaram i.e. 'devoid of ritual'.

[2] See note to KuKh 3/125.

[3] dharātattvāt [k, gh, ṅ: -tatvaṁ; g: satvaṁ] samārabhya [k: -ratva] samanāntaṁ yathā kramam |

The account of this triad is not very clear. In the same text, before this passage, we are told that this 'consciousness (caitanya) is said to be (of three kinds) gross, very subtle and Unstruck Sound'.[1] These three conditions are, presumably, Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava which correspond to the three – Māyā, Mahāmāyā and Beyond Māyā, respectively. The first extends from Earth up to the Equal One (samanā); the second is the Transmental 'with parts' (sakala). The third is the pure transcendent. The first is embedded in the second. Thus we read just after this passage: 'In terms of emanation, the stainless reality (nirañjaka) possesses six parts (ṣaṭprakāra) within the Transmental.'[2] A little earlier we were told: 'The Body (piṇḍa) made of these principles is the differentiated (sakala aspect) whose form is the ghost (which is the goddess's vehicle). Complete and made of the six parts,[3] it is sustained by Pure Knowledge (śuddhavidyā).'[1]

---

tāvat kālaṁ samākhyātaṁ vyāptis tasya tv anekadhā ||
yāvat [k, g, gh: yāvaṁ] tasyaiva [ṅ: tasauva] saṁcāraṁ tāvat saṁsāramaṇḍalam [all MSs: -le] |
māyodare [all MSs: -ra] samastaṁ hi śuddhavidyāsvadhiṣṭhitam [all MSs: -vidyāhya- g, gh: -ṣṭitaṁ] ||
māyā [k, g, gh, ṅ: māya] yā trividhā bhāvyā ādau māyā vidhīyate |
māyātattve mahāmāyā [k, gh, ṅ: mahāmnāyā; g: sadāmāyā] sakalā cānuvartinī [k, gh, ṅ: cātu-] ||
śivasyordhve visargasthā amā [gh: āma] sūkṣmā [k: śūkṣmā] nirañjanā |
*samanā sāparā māyā [g: mā ] tasmān māyodaraṁ [gh: tansmānmā-] jagat ||
māyātītaṁ [k, gh, ṅ: mayātīta; g: -ta] kalātītaṁ [k, gh, ṅ: -ta] adhvātītaṁ [k, gh: ādhātīta; g: athātītaṁ; ṅ: āccātīta] nirāmayam |
niruccāraṁ [k, gh: niradhvāraṁ; ṅ: niraṁvāraṁ] niraupamyaṁ [k, gh: nirauyamyāṁ; ṅ: -myāṁ] kalpanāmalavarjitam ||
*icchādvandvavinirmuktaṁ [k, gh: -kta; g: -dvandvaṁdaṁvi-; ṅ: -dvaṁdvayavinirmu ] ṣaṭprakāram [k, gh, ṅ: -prakāraṁm] anākulam [g: alāmalaṁ] |
ity uktaṁ [g: missing] sakalaṁ mokṣaṁ [g: mokṣa] tasyānte [k, gh, ṅ: tasmāṁte] niṣkalaṁ [g: niṣkala] smṛtam ||
sakalaṁ niṣkalaṁ [g: nikalaṁ; ṅ: niḥkalaṁ] jñātvā yogī [k, gh, ṅ: yogi] martyād [ṅ: mattyād] vimucyate |
sakalasya [ṅ: sakalasyaṁ] upodghātaṁ [g: u oghātaṁ] ṣaḍvidhaṁ kathayāmy aham || [This and next two lines missing in MSs K and Gh] śāmbhavaṁ [g: sā-] paramaṁ śāntaṁ [g: sāntaṁ] ṣaṇṇām [g: brahmām; ṅ: ṣaṇāmu-] upari saṁsthitam [g: sa-] |
kaivalyaṁ kevalaṁ śāntaṁ [g: śānta] khapañcarahitaṁ hitam ||
*cinmayaṁ paramaṁ śuddhaṁ kiñciccinmātraśāmbhavam [k: -sāṁbhavaṁ; g: kiñcit * mātraṁ-; gh: kiñcitrinmātrasābhavaṁ; ṅ: kiṁcicinmātrasāṁ-]* |
paraṁ paramanirvāṇaṁ saśivaṁ cinmayaṁ vapu [k: camūḥ; g: punaḥ; gh: samu] ||
sūkṣmaṁ sarvagataṁ proktaṁ sūkṣmaṁ [gh: sūnma] cinmātrapauruṣaṁ [g: poruṣaṁ] |
caitanyaṁ trividhaṁ proktaṁ āṇavaṁ [g: āṇava] śāktaśāṁbhavam [k, gh: gākṣa-; g: sakta-] ||
YKh (1) 43/27-36.

[1] caitanyaṁ [g: ce-] sthūlam ākhyātaṁ mahāsūkṣmam [k, gh: -śūkṣmam] anāhatam [ṅ: ano-] ||
YKh (1) 43/20cd.

[2] *sṛṣṭinyāye [k, gh: -nyātha] unmanāyāṁ [g: -yā; gh: unmanāṁ ; ṅ: unmatā-] ṣaṭprakāraṁ nirañjakam [gh: niraṁtakaṁ] | YKh (1) 43/37ab.

[3] See above, p.375-376 where the entire passage is quoted.

So here, Śuddhavidyā is the Transmental. In terms of the previous scheme, it corresponds to the Principle of Vidyā, which contains the four principles from Śuddhavidyā to Power. The Equal One or 'With Mind' – Samanā, equated with Māyā, is the range of so-called impure principles from Earth up to Māyā. The aggregate or 'body' of the thirty-six principles (including Śiva) are contained within the Transmental which, as their oneness (sāmarasya), are aspects of it. In this state it is the 'stainless' reality, that is, the absolute manifest as all things, but free of the impurities of duality and the like. From the point of view of liberated, fully realised consciousness, this is its gross aspect which, 'free of the impurity that is thought and the duality of desire, is the undisturbed (stream up to the Transmental) with six parts (ṣaṭprakāra)'.[2] From the ignorant, fettered point of view: 'the gross is associated with ritual (karmakāṇḍa). The subtle consists of thought. That which is devoid of thought is said to be supreme.'[3] From this perspective these three are Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava, respectively. But here, it seems, the realisation of Āṇava and Śākta consciousness together constitute the differentiated form of liberation. This is the form in which the liberated soul experiences all the energies of his infinite consciousness. Śāmbhava consciousness is the same consciousness as the transcendent and apophatic absolute. This state has the Transmental as its power and so is called Śāmbhavīśakti.

Note that Āṇava corresponds to the principles that operate in the sphere of duality, Śākta to those in the sphere of unity-in-difference, and Śāmbhava is pure transcendental oneness. Moreover, according to the Kubjikā Tantras, thought operates in the first two spheres, whereas at the Śāmbhava level it does not. These formulations, derived by dividing the gamut of principles that constitute the one, undivided and yet layered reality, coincide with Abhinavagupta's presentation of the three means with the same names. Indeed, he does accept a similar division into three on the authority of the MVT and related Tantras. These are Nara – the Self, which extends from the Earth up to Māyā. Then comes Vidyā – Knowledge, which extends from Śuddhavidyā to Śakti. The third is Śakti, which is just Śiva.[4] However, although Abhinava may indeed have implied that they are parallel to the spheres of the three means, he does not make this explicit – in order, presumably, not to divide the path up in this linear fashion. This was no doubt

---

[1] tattvair ebhiḥ [ṅ: aṁbhiḥ] kṛtaṁ piṇḍaṁ sakalaṁ pretavigraham ǀ ṣaṭprakāramayaṁ pūrṇaṁ [g: pūrṇa] śuddhavidyā hy adhiṣṭhitam [g, gh: -ṣṭitaṁ] ǀǀ
YKh (1) 43/21.

[2] YKh (1) 43/31cd-32ab.

[3] sthūlaṁ [k: sthalaṁś; gh: sthaleś; ṅ: sthūlaś] ca karmakāṇḍasthaṁ sūkṣmaṁ [k, gh: śūkṣmaṁ] cintāmayaṁ bhavet ǀ cintayā [g: cintāyā] rahitaṁ yac ca tat paraṁ parikīrtitam ǀǀ YKh (1) 37/32.

[4] TĀ 1/188cd-189 and commentary.

because his subtler conception of the three means and their corresponding states allowed for a much more open eschatology that was designed to accommodate every possible means to spiritual development. To do this he had to abandon the simple linear model in which one means or state leads to the next. As Abhinava says:

> Thus while the Lord reveals himself in all his fullness to a certain person (pramātṛ), to some other (he does so) part by part, progressively. The revelation of one's own nature, consisting of that one being which is the being of all things, is for individual souls Supreme Knowledge. Inferior and multiple (is the knowledge that is) other than that. And that (knowledge) is revealed through the means that is direct as well as (those which are) a means to that (direct means); so it is that (the means to realisation) is divided into various (and wonderful) (vicitra) aspects. These (means are of) many varieties according to whether they present themselves as immediate or mediated in regard to themselves or another, totally or partially, or with or without interposed elements.[1]

Coherent with the tripartite division in this way with practice and their corresponding states, we find that the initiation that operates through them and leads to them can similarly be classified into three categories. The cardinal feature of Kaula initiation[2] is that it takes place by piercing the centres within the subtle body with various forms of energy. In this way the individual soul is lead up through them and so passes through a series of states and traverses all the worlds, principles and spheres of energies until it reaches the highest – Śāmbhava – state where, becoming one with the deity, it is liberated.

Many forms of initiation are described. Amongst them we find a division into the three types we are examining. The following formulation grades them simply in terms of the ability and condition of the teacher and his disciple to transmit and receive the Command in terms of the well known triad of qualities (guṇa) more commonly attributed to Nature (prakṛti):

> If the basic state of the teacher and the one who takes (initiation) accords with sattva, then the Śāmbhava (initiation by) piercing certainly takes place. One should know that the one due to Śakti (takes place) when there is rajas and in the case of tamas it is > considered to be the Āṇava one. O fair lady, when the basic state is a mixed one, the triple Command operates.[1]

[1] TĀ 1/140-143.
[2] See chapter thirty-one of the KuKh, which deals with various forms of initiation by piercing and also chapter thirty-three.

The presentation in other Kubjikā sources is much more sophisticated. According to our text[2] and other Kubjikā Tantras, Individual Initiation (āṇavadīkṣā) takes place by paralysing with mantras the binding fetters that sully the neophant. It may be imparted by the teacher's touch, mentally at a distance, by sight or speech. All these alternatives involve contact by the teacher, whether physical, sensorial or mental, with the disciple's body. It is essentially a corporeal form of initiation and so is appropriately considered to be 'individual' as it is concerned with the individual, embodied soul. This is why the teacher may initiate by sight, without having to touch a disciple of low caste. This may seem to be a concession to hierarchical caste considerations that Tantras of this sort should not accept. But this is not the case or, one could say, caste status works here in reverse, because this kind of corporeal initiation is so powerful that it gives immediate realisation.[3]

In the following passage Abhinava explains how the psychophysical organism – the 'body' – can serve as a means to realisation even though it is essentially objective and hence unconscious and despite the embodied subject not being ultimate. It is clear that Abhinava understood well that the Trika Tantras teach that the sphere of the Individual Means and state is that of the activity of the psycho-physical organism – namely, the vital breath (prāṇa), intellect (buddhi), senses and physical body. Again, in order to explain the effectiveness of this means, here too he applies his methodical and profound analysis of the principles taught in the Tantras to align them with Śiva's divine consciousness and power operating in and through the subject and object. So he writes:

> Ultimate reality (paramārtha) shines even in this, the lower subject who is not the ultimate one (aparamārthika) as it does in the intellect, vital breath and the body – because the vital breath and the rest are not separate from the Light which is pure consciousness (cinmātra). By virtue of the freedom of that (reality, they all possess) two qualities; thus (although) they are insentient, they constitute the body of consciousness.

---

[1] gurugrāhakayor bhāvaḥ yadi sattvānuvartakaḥ [k, kh: -kartakaḥ] |
śāṁbhavo hi tadā [kh: radā] nūnaṁ vedho [k, kh: vedhā] vai saṁpravartate ||
rājase śaktito jñeyaḥ tāmase cāṇavo mataḥ |
miśrabhāve varārohe tryājñā [k, kh, g: mi-] saṁpravartate || KRP 5/12-13.
[2] KuKh 33/30 ff..
[3] KuKh 33/31cd-38.

> Śiva says to the goddess in the Triśirobhairavatantra that it is Śiva's own supreme power which, although present everywhere, becomes an individual living being (jīva) established in a perception of itself (and the form of its experience) through the unfolding of knowledge.
>
> (The yogi) becomes one when the insentient aspect (of the vital breath and the rest) have been concealed in the course of perceiving the true conscious nature by the realisation (kalpanā) of the exuberance (ullāsa) of (its) freedom.[1]

According to the KuKh, the empowered (śākta) initiation essentially takes place by the transmission of the Command through the teacher's gaze, just as the goddess transmitted the Command to Bhairava when she emerged out of the Liṅga. The Command is the most intense form of the 'descent of power' (śaktipāta) and so the means directly based on it is accordingly considered to be the Empowered One. Although ideally the disciple is struck down in an instant by the force of the transmission of the Command, it may not always be at its most intense due to the impediments inherent in the disciple's fettered condition. But it may also progress gradually through five states of which the following are the outer signs, and so this initiation is said to be of five kinds:

> The disciple who has been pierced by the (Supreme) Principle (experiences) the fivefold state. This is, joy (ānanda), an upward movement (udbhava), a tremor (kampa), sleep (nidrā) and inebriation (ghūrṇi) as the fifth.[2]

Abhinava presents these same five as 'signs on the path' (pathalakṣaṇa) in the context of his exposition of the Individual Means (āṇavopāya).[3] In this he is apparently more consistent than our text as these five are all, evidently, visible corporeal signs. However, our text focuses on the states to which these outer signs correspond as manifestations or aspects of the empowered state that develops through the transmission of the energy of the Command. All these states develop, by the intense form of the Command.[4] Thus also for this reason this initiation is considered to be the empowered form. We may note, by the way, that Abhinava could not admit this means to be part of the Empowered category of practice, as it

[1] TĀ 5/7-11ab.
[2] KuKh 33/47; cf. MVT 11/35cd quoted in TĀ 5/107cd. See notes to KuKh 33/47-49 for a detailed treatment.
[3] TĀ 5/100cd-127 is dedicated to this topic. See especially, TĀ 5/100cd-107ab.
[4] KuKh 33/50-51.

does not involve, overtly or directly at least, the purification of thought constructs, which is, according to him, the characteristic feature of that category of practice. Indeed, this is a conception which is not explicit in the framework of the Tantras' presentation in general, although as we shall see further ahead, such might well be gleaned from it.

The presentation of the Śāmbhava modality of initiation is the most extensive in the KuKh. Despite the many variations, we can easily recognise that it follows closely the basic, common model of Śaiva initiation we find in the Śaiva Siddhānta sources. At first this seems surprising. We have seen that entry into the Śāmbhava state is momentary and is beyond even yogic practice, let alone ritual. But a fundamental modification has been made of the basic model, which we may briefly outline here in the context of our present theme. The framework around which Siddhānta initiation is constructed is the notion of the Sixfold cosmic Path (ṣaḍadhvan). The entire cosmic order is divided into three aspects. These are, from gross to subtle, the hierarchy of world orders (bhuvana), the corresponding ascending order of metaphysical principles (tattva) and spheres of force that contain the worlds and the principles. Their ritual sonic counterparts are, respectively, a set of mantras, the parts of these mantras (pada) and the letters. The teacher lays hold of the living soul (jīva) of his disciple and transports it upwards progressively by reciting the corresponding mantras of the world, principles and forces, to conjoin it with Śiva at the summit of this ascending sixfold path.[1]

This basic model is assimilated into Kaula practice by first of all understanding the Sixfold Path to have originated from the Command, which is thus both its support and ultimate nature. As the initiate progresses along the Path, he is penetrated by the corresponding series of ascending forms of the energy of the Command, that is, by the Transmental that radiates from the Śāmbhava state. Thus there are six forms of penetration (āveśa) that correspond to the six parts of the path and they are aspects of the one penetration by the Śāmbhava Command.[2] As the neophant experiences the penetration (āveśa) of the six states that correspond to the six parts of the path, he rises in six stages through the hierarchy of principles ranging from the gross element Earth up to the Transmental, and so attains to the fullness and source of the Command. The six are as follows:

1) Bhūta (Elemental): This is the Path of the Worlds. The corresponding penetration (bhūtāveśa) takes place when the five gross elements, starting with Earth, penetrate the initiate.

---

[1] See note to KuKh 2/29-30ab.
[2] Cf. KMT 10/70-72 quoted above, p. 209.

2) Bhāva (Phenomenal): This corresponds to the Path of the Parts (pada) of Mantra. The corresponding penetration (bhāvāveśa) is that of the five types of sensation, sound and the rest, perceived by the five senses, collectively said to be 'born of phenomena' (bhāvaja).
3) Śākta (Empowered): This corresponds to the Path of the Letters. The penetration by Power energizes the five senses.
4) Māntra: This is the Path of Mantra. The corresponding penetration takes place in the five organs of action which, thus transformed, are said to be 'born of mantra' (mantraja).
5) Raudra: This is the Path of the Forces (kalā). This penetration extends through the three mental organs – intellect, mind and ego – and the qualities of Nature, and so are all 'born from Raudra' (raudraja).
6) Śāmbhava: This is the one Principle (tattva) of the Path of the Principles. This penetration extends from the Person to Cessation (nivṛtti) ending finally in the Transmental state (unmanatva).[1]

A brief comparison with Abhinava's Trika at this point is revealing. Abhinava explains in the third chapter of his Tantrāloka that the Śāmbhava means, set into operation by the Śāmbhava form of penetration (śāmbhava-samāveśa) consists essentially of the reflective awareness (vimarśa); that is, the creative autonomy (svātantrya) of the pure light of consciousness.[2] This is the experience of the pure 'I' consciousness (ahaṁ) that Śiva has of himself. It has fifty aspects that correspond to the energies of the letters that together constitute the all-embracing energy of 'I'. One wonders whether Abhinava knew of the possible correspondence between the Paths and forms of penetration. If so, he may possibly have seen support for this, essentially his own interpretation, by a Tantra that posits a correspondence between the Śāmbhava form of penetration and the Path of the Letters.[3] At any rate, the division into fifty is supported indirectly by the MVT which teaches that there are fifty aspects of the penetration of Rudra's energy that operates at the Śāmbhava level although, admittedly, they are related to the thirty-six principles rather than the letters.[4] But even then, the [1] KMT 10/63-70ab and 10/76-80.

[2] TĀ 3/1.
[3] Inspired by Bhartṛhari, Abhinava divides the process (krama) of manifestation into temporal (kālakrama) and spatial (deśakrama). The former includes the arising of the letters, mantras and their parts taught in chapters six and seven of the Tantrāloka. The latter includes the Paths of the Worlds, Principles, and Forces taught in chapters eight, nine and eleven, respectively. Thus, as he deals with the Path of the Letters elsewhere, it was not Abhinava's intention to equate the fifty forms of reflective awareness with the Path of the Letters, but even so he may well have found some support for his own insight in this approach.
[4] Abhinava writes (in TĀ 1/186cd-187ab):

letters are related to the Principles and, just as in the Kubjikā Tantras, the Śāmbhava penetration / state / means / initiation courses through them. Thus the KMT teaches that all the forms of penetration listed above are aspects of the Śāmbhava one. Accordingly, the outer physical signs and powers etc that accompany them all occur in the Śāmbhava form of penetration. Even so, it has its own independent characteristics. The main one, as we are told in the following passage from the KMT, echoes what the Buddha acquired when he attained enlightenment namely, omniscience. Here this is understood as the universal perception of all the principles of existence. They are viewed from their summit attained by treading along the Sixfold Path represented by the thirty-six principles of existence, through which the neophant rises by means of the six penetrations to which they correspond. The KMT explains:

> One who has been pierced (with the pure Śāmbhava form) attains omniscience in this world. If the disciple has been purified by the aforesaid time, he attains the Śāmbhava (plane) which bestow (all yogic and other) qualities. (This happens) to a person up to (his) last rebirth if Kubjīśa comes (to him). Then, O Kubjikā, he (experiences) the Śāmbhava (form of penetration) in the body. The soul who after much time has been purified sees, as the Self does, all living beings. (He realises that) 'there is no one who is my equal in (all) the worlds' and he spontaneously (akāle) becomes pure.
>
> He sees every world, one by one, from the level of the Person up to the Transmental. Thus he is born with a pure body and he flies up with this body. He does not experience any shaking or trembling. There is only a slight rolling of the eyes (ghūrmi). He is in a faint as

---

Fifty varieties of this penetration are described (in the MVT) determined by the various clearly apparent aspects of the thirty-six metaphysical principles..

In this context, the three principles of Self (Ātmatattva), Knowledge (Vidyātattva) and Energy (Śaktitattva) are treated as separate parallel principles along with the basic 36 principles. They possess 4, 10 and 3 aspects, respectively as follows:
Ātmatattva: This consists of the three perceivers, Sakala, Pralayākala, and Vijñānakala along with Śuddha (the Pure Ones). These correspond, respectively, to the principles of 1) Earth, 2) Water to Nature (Prakṛti) (23 principles), 3) Puruṣa to Māyā (7 principles), and 4) Pure Knowledge (Śuddhavidyā) to Sadāśiva (2 principles).
Vidyātattva: This has the following ten aspects. 1) Letter (varṇa), 2) the Point (bindu), 3) Half Moon (ardhacandra), 4) the Obstructress (nirodhinī), 5) Sound (nāda), 6) End of Sound (nādānta), 7) Power (śakti), 8) the Pervasive One (vyāpinī), 9) the Equal One (samanā), and 10) the Transmental (unanā).
Śaktitattva: This consists of the following three energies: 1) Will, 2) Knowledge, and 3) Action. See TĀ 1/186cd-188ab and commentary with reference to MVT 2/17-19.

> when one takes poison. He is like a ghost in a jar. Before him he sees the entire series of metaphysical principles, perpetually manifest and active (sadodita). He is freed that instant from the field of sense objects, like the snake (that sheds its) old skin. He is mad (unmatta) with the inebriation of eternal bliss and is adorned with the quality of omniscience.[1]

Finally, before we move on to another account of these three modalities of initiation, we notice that the KMT warns that those who experience the Śāmbhava form of penetration, even though it is the highest, are liable to a very severe fall. This is possible as long as the Śāmbhava state is not fully affirmed and the transmutation from the temporal, corporeal condition to the eternal one has not taken place. The reason for this fall is intimately connected with the nature of this state. The purified soul in the Śāmbhava state is conscious of his identity with the deity. This is why he thinks 'there is no one who is my equal in (all) the worlds'. It is understandable, therefore, that the Tantra warns repeatedly against the possible degeneration of this insight into gross pride. So we read:

> Greed and delusion are said (to be the result) of the pride (that may develop due to) the Śāmbhava Command. (Overcome by this pride) the fool thinks there is no other person as capable as himself. This (also) comes from the Command but it is the Command of the (gross) elements (bhūtavatī), (not of the Śāmbhava one).
>
> O famed lady, those who are cheats and devoid of devotion for (their) teacher (are again subject to the lower penetration) of the Elements and the rest (even in the case of) one who (was previously) pierced with the Śāmbhava (Command).[2]

At first sight this appears to be a relatively minor detail but, viewed in the light of Abhinava's hermeneutics, it is highly significant. We have noted already that Abhinava teaches that the Śāmbhava means, and hence the form of penetration and state that it leads to is essentially the consciousness of the pure, absolute egoity (ahaṁbhāva) of Śiva. Although the concept of an absolute ego is not found elsewhere in any school of Indian thought,[3] the ego is revalued and seen to possess positive qualities by several Tantric traditions that developed around the end of the first millennium. The most evident precedent is Patañjali's Yoga where egoity (asmitā) is considered to be the object of the most intense and

---

[1] KMT 10/91cd -98.
[2] KMT 10/74cd-75 and 10/101.
[3] See Dyczkowski 2004: chapter one.

elevated form of concentration (asmitāsamādhi). It leads directly to the realisation of the pure consciousness nature of the Person (puruṣa) and hence his detachment from the domain of the bondage of Nature (prakṛti) which is, essentially, the sphere of objectivity. But however important for Patañjali's soteriology, it is clear that the ego is far from absolute. Closer to home, Tantric rites of adoration require that the officiant be identified with the deity. The standard well known formula is 'being the god, one should worship the god' (devo bhūtvā devaṁ yajet). This should not be confused with the Upaniṣadic identification of the Self – Ātman – with the Absolute Brahman that is intentionally impersonal, i.e. egoless. The affirmation for ritual purposes of one's own identity with the deity inevitably entails the positive affirmation of the ego as being 'I am Śiva' or the like. The principle that the offering made to the deity must come from deity, not a profane mortal, is so well accepted that the Buddhist Vajrayāna, although basically atheist as all Buddhist traditions are, accommodates it. The deity is visualized as emanating from its sonic form that emerges from the Void. Then the worshipper must similarly identify himself with it by developing what the Vajrayāna Tantras term 'divine pride' (divyagarva). But, of course, from the Buddhist perspective this 'pride' or ego, even if it does refer to deity, is no less transitory and devoid of any inherent nature of its own as any other saṁsāric phenomena.

The danger of falling into false pride that the Śāmbhava state entails, according to the Kubjikā sources, implies that its original 'unfallen' form is also egoic in some sense, as we are in fact told that it is. Even so, it is not yet identified with the condition of an absolute ego, although it is tending towards it. Abhinava tacitly takes it all the way by identifying the Śāmbhava penetration and its corresponding category of practice with the dynamic absolute ego proclaiming it to be perfectly free in all respects to do all things, not just to view itself and realise that "there is no one who is my equal in (all) the worlds".

We move on to another account of these three types of initiation related to our triad. This is found in chapter eight of the KRU:

> The Śrīkrama should be revealed, according to (the type of) initiation, after (it has been imparted). And initiation is of three types: Śāmbhavī, Śāktā, and Āṇavī. The Śāmbhavī (initiation) is free of thought constructs (niṣprapañcā). The Śāktā one should be understood to be distinct (bhinnā) from it. Āṇavī (initiation) is said to be a mixture of Śāmbhavī and Śāktā. The initiation of the goddess (devīdīkṣā) will thus be (accomplished) by means of the three types.
>
> Śāmbhavī is said to be the state that is generated having contemplated the lotus feet of the venerable teacher above one's head. (It arises) for one who, by seeing the form (mūrti) of the teacher, (becomes profoundly tranquil and so) thinks of nothing. Śāmbhava is

(the type of) penetration (āveśa) that will arise for one who is intent on the meditation that follows on from that (tadanudhyāna) and is dedicated to that task. (In other words, it happens) to the (disciple) who (experiences) the (state of) meditation even though (he is) distant (from his teacher who has) induced (his practice) by that (gracious) look (prekṣaṇā).

O mistress of the gods, both Śakta and Āṇava (states of contemplative absorption) are (forms of) thought (kalpanā) by nature and (arise) by applying the utterance (of mantras), ritual instruments (karaṇa), visualization (dhyāna) and (the formation of sacred) places (sthāna) and the liturgy (krama). This Śākta (state) is (diverse) according to the varieties (vibhāga) of visualization (dhyāna) and place. Āṇava is said to be (brought about) by the mantras applied through the process (krama) of uttering the letters (that constitute them).

In this way, O fair-faced one, in the future, in (the course of) the a eons, great (kalpa) and small (manvantara), the rite (karman) of initiation will be of three types. The rite of initiation in the Kula tradition (āmnāya) will take place during (the various) ages (yuga) and (varies) according to the nature of (each) age, and (will be imparted) through the line (krama) of teachers and disciples by means of insights (vijñāna) (outwardly apparent) as the signs of attainment (pratyaya).[1]

---

[1] *yathā [g: yayā] dīkṣā [g: dīkṣye] tataḥ paścāt [g: -cāc] śrīkramaṁ [k kh: kamaṁ; g: chrīkramaṁ] saṁprakāśayet [k: * * kāśayet]* ||
dīkṣā ca śāmbhavī [k: śāṁmbhavī] śāktā [k kh g: śāktī] āṇavīti tridhā sthitā |
śāmbhavī niṣprapañcā ca śāktā bhinnā prakalpayet [kh: prakalpayet] ||
śāktaśāmbhavasaṁmiśrā āṇavī sā prakīrtitā [g: prakalpitā] |
evaṁ tribhiḥ prakāraiś ca devīdīkṣā bhaviṣyati [g: -tī] ||
svaśirordhvasthite [g: svaśirorddhastitaṁ] dhyāte [g: dhyāyec] śrīguroḥ [kh: + pāda; g: chrīguroḥ] pādapaṅkaje |
utpadyati ca yāvasthā śāmbhavī [kh: śāṁbhvī] sā prakīrtitā || *akiñciccintakasyeha [k: aki * ccintakasyeha; kh: akiñcārccitakasyeha; g: kiñciccirtakasyeha] gurumūrtinirīkṣaṇāt* |
tadanudhyānayuktasya tatkāryaniratasya ca ||
*tatprekṣaṇākṛtābhyāsadūrasthasyāpi [k: tatpreṣaṇa * tādhyāsa-; kh: -dhyāsatkarasthāpi; g: tatpreṣaṇakṛtābhyāsadūlasthanyāpi] bhāvinaḥ [g: bhāvitaḥ]* |
āveśotpadyate yo hi śāmbhavo 'sau bhaviṣyati ||
śāktāṇavau ca deveśi dvāv etau kalpanātmakau [kh: kalānātmakau] |
uccārakaraṇadhyānasthānakramaniyojanaiḥ [g: uddhārakaraṇasyādhyā-] ||
dhyānasthānavibhāgaiś ca śākteyaḥ parikīrtitaḥ [g: -ta] |
varṇoccārakramān mantrair yojitair āṇavaḥ [k: -kamān maṁvair yojitair āṇavaḥ] smṛtaḥ ||
evaṁ tribhiḥ [g: stribhiḥ] prakāraiś ca dīkṣākarma varānane |

Both the Śākta and Āṇava modalities are within the sphere of conceptual thought and exerted intent, as opposed to the Śāmbhava sphere which is a state of pure consciousness, free of thought constructs that arises spontaneously. A distinction is drawn, however, between the more mental or 'inner' practices of visualization and concentration on fixed places projected into the subtle body that belong to the Śākta sphere, and the concrete outer practice of repeated recitation of mantras that belong to the Āṇava one. All in all, the formulations that we find in the Kubjikā sources coincide quite well with the definitions of these three modalities found in the MVT quoted above. The Kubjikā Tantras are very familiar with their Trika counterparts. Indeed, the MVT is mentioned with special respect in the KuKh.[1] It is not too audacious therefore to suggest that the understanding of these modalities in the Kubjikā Tantras were directly influenced by the later Trika scriptural sources.[2]

At any rate, we may profitably reflect on this analysis of practice in the light of Abhinava's exegesis to which we now briefly turn. Inspired by his Trika teacher Śambhunātha, whom he acknowledges as having taught him this threefold classification of practice, Abhinava distinguishes, with his usual profound insight, how thought operates in the two spheres. The Empowered means, according to him, includes all the forms of practice that serve to purify thought constructs. The purest thought is no longer a thought, but is rather the lucid understanding of one's own true identity as deity which has developed through a series of stages in which the notion of this identity becomes more firmly affirmed and lucid. After he has dealt with the Śāmbhava means, through which knowledge of the Self is attained directly by means of intuitive insight (pratibhā), he begins the following chapter of his Tantrāloka with a succinct outline of the essentials of the Śākta means:

> He who wishes to enter into this, the Supreme Lord's nature described in the previous chapter, must without delay purify (his) thoughts. A thought once purified generates another thought that is (already) by its very nature purified, and this another similar to itself, and that also another similar one. The degree of purity of these four thought constructs is, progressively, not evident, fit to become evident, in the process of becoming evident and clearly evident. Then (at the next higher level) it becomes more evident until it finally becomes supremely so. In (all these six phases) starting from (the first bhaviṣyaty agrato devi kalpamanvantareṣu ca ||

---

yugeṣu yugadharmeṇa vijñānaiḥ pratyayātmakaiḥ |
dīkṣākarma kulāmnāye [kh g: -mnāya] guruśiṣyakrameṇa tu || KRU 8/99cd-108.

[1] See KuKh 68/126cd-128.

[2] Note that by 'scriptural sources' I do not mean Abhinavagupta's presentation of the Trika (what he calls the Anuttaratrikakula) or, indeed, Kashmiri Śaivism.

> in which the purity of thought is) not evident, there are other intermediate gradations. Thus (as a result of this process) consciousness, strengthened by that noble and supremely evident nature, attains its own pure state, free of all thought constructs. And thus Bhairava's radiant power (tejas), which is consciousness, becomes fully manifest to those who reflect upon it again and again.[1]

Abhinava similarly begins the following chapter of his Tantrāloka, which deals with the Individual means, by defining it. Here too he focuses on the function of thought as central to all the forms of practice that belong to this category. But in this case, the 'pure thought' which is the certainty of the direct realisation that one's own true nature is none other than that of the deity, is achieved with the aid of psycho-physical processes. Āṇava initiation, like Āṇava practice and realisation, is accomplished by external means. This may centre, for example, on the careful energetic recitation of mantra in such a way that each letter is clearly articulated and so can fully yield its power. Accordingly, Abhinava refers to these means in the following passage as ones that are further away from consciousness than those engaged in the Empowered means but are, nonetheless, grounded in the same process. Thus, in his own sophisticated way, Abhinava again supports the teachings of the Tantras:

> When thought (vikalpa) has been purified and all contrary representation has consequently been eliminated, one certainly attains the desired object, be it worldly experience (bhoga) or liberation (mokṣa).
>
> While for some a thought becomes firm and pure by virtue of the innate freedom of Self, independent of any other means, for others thought requires another means to purify it. We have already discussed the first possibility and we shall now deal with the other.
>
> Although thought is essentially consciousness, it can only serve the individual soul (aṇu) as a means to liberation when it assumes the form of certainty (niścaya). This certainty is of various kinds which differ from one another because of the (diversity) of means, according to whether they are closer or further away from consciousness. However, (all these means) are (equally) termed 'Individual' (āṇava).[2]

---

[1] TĀ 4/2-7.
[2] TĀ 5/2-6.

Returning to the Kubjikā sources, let us see what the Ciñcinīmatasāra-samuccaya has to say. There we find that Śākta is the sphere of reality in which, as its name suggests, the energy of consciousness operates. Specifically this assumes the form of five energies that operate in this sphere of reality. These are the three energies of will, knowledge and action normally associated with Śiva along with the enlightening energy of Kuṇḍalinī and that of Mātṛkā. Mātṛkā is the energy of the phonemes that represent aspects of the energy of Speech through which the world of denotation is differentiated into the entities, qualities and activities that words denote. In this way, Mātṛkā, as the Tantra declares, 'measures out the universe'. Thus the god says:

> Next I will explain something else, namely, Śākta, Śāmbhava and Āṇava. O mistress of the god of the gods, (I will explain) the characteristic feature (of each) which, O beloved, is the great dawning of knowledge. The group of five energies is considered to be will, knowledge, action, supreme Kuṇḍalinī and Mātṛkā, which is the fifth.
>
> (The characterizing feature) of the will is (that from it) originates the expansion (of emanation). Knowledge is the perception (of it) there. (The energy of) action (functions) in what should be done and what should not. Kuṇḍalinī is the awakening of the Self. Mātṛkā measures out (mīyate) the universe. The characteristic feature of power is (thus) fivefold.[1]

The Āṇava sphere concerns the individual soul (aṇu) that has been energized by the power of consciousness. It is essentially the Self engaged in rising through the sixteen stations in the ascent of Kuṇḍalinī within the body. The body, in this perspective, is an aggregate – Kula – figuratively represented as a tree of which these are the branches (śākhā). They are also called 'supports' (ādhara) or 'places' (sthāna)[2] and, sixteen in number, range from the one called

---

[1] punar anyaṁ pravakṣyāmi śāktaṁ [k, kh, g, gh, ṅ: sāktaṁ; c: sākṣaṁ] śāmbhavam āṇavam [all MSs: sāmbhavamānavam] |
lakṣaṇaṁ devadeveśi mahājñānodayaṁ priye ||
*icchā jñānaṁ [c: * na] kriyā caiva tathā kuṇḍalinī parā* |
mātṛkā pañcamī ceti śaktipañcakam iṣyate [sarve: śaktiḥ-] ||
icchāyāḥ [all MSs: icchāyā] [k, kh, g, gh:] prasarodbhūtaṁ [all MSs: pusara- -dbhūta] jñānaṁ tatrāvalokanam |
kāryākārye kriyā caiva kuṇḍaliny ātmabodhanam [k, gh: -bodhatam; c: -yānmabodhanaṁ] ||
mātṛkā mīyate viśvaṁ [c: visvaṁ] pañcadhā śaktilakṣaṇam | CMSS 4/24-27ab.

[2] Here the account in the CMSS differs from the one we have seen above drawn from the KRU which prefers to classify this practice as Śākta. Perhaps the KRU views this practice in terms of the concentration that requires the exertion of the energy of knowledge that operates in the the Foundation located at the base of the spine up to the End of Emission in the End of the Sixteen. So the god says to the goddess:

> The essential nature of the individual soul (aṇu) is the Self that has been supremely infused with the power of consciousness. It is present in the branches of the Kula (i.e. the body) in association with the various supports (ādhārabheda). O goddess, one place and another bring each other to rest. Contemplated by (direct) experience, (each is of) a separate kind (and each bestows) a separate accomplishment. O goddess, I have explained that which is known as Āṇava.[1]

Finally, the Śāmbhava level is described concisely as being of four kinds or possessing four aspects. The first is called sama, that is, 'equal', which, I suppose, refers to Śāmbhava state as being equally present at all the levels, forms, aspects and particulars of reality. The second is called gata, which means 'gone'. This, I suppose, is a way of referring to the Śāmbhava state as the one that has 'gone' beyond the trammels of the fettered states below it and one in which the individual soul has 'gone' to the supreme level of existence. There, the third aspect of the Śāmbhava state is experienced, namely, 'merger' – laya – of the individual into the deity and the fourth which is 'awakening' – avabodha.[2]

Now we turn to an equation that is peculiar to the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras. The three, Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava, are identified with the three energies of will, knowledge and action generated from the energy of the Śāmbhava state (śāmbhavīśakti), which is also the source of scripture.[3] Their

---

Empowered sphere. The CMSS, on the other hand, prefers to understand this practice as belonging to the Individual corporeal sphere where the activity of the power of action predominates.

[1] aṇu tv ātmasvarūpaṁ [all MSs: nā-] ca cicchaktiparabhāvitaḥ [all MSs except ṅ, c: -prabhāvitaḥ] ||
ādhārabhedayogena kulaśākhāsamāśritaḥ [c: kulasākhyā-] |
sthānaṁ sthānāntaraṁ devi viśramanti [all MSs: visramanti] parasparam ||
pṛthagbhedaṁ [ṅ: -bhadaṁ] pṛthaksiddhim anubhāvena bhāvitam [all MSs: -madhubhāvena-] |
etad devi mayā khyātaṁ [k, gh: kṣātaṁ; ṅ: jātaṁ] āṇavaṁ [sarve: ānavaṁ] tat prakīrtitam ||
CMSS 4/27cd-29.

[2] Next I will explain something else namely, the characteristic feature of the Śāmbhava (state). Equal (sama), Gone Away (gata), Merger (laya) and Awakening (avabodha) as the fourth – (thus) Śāmbhava is said to be of four kinds.

punar anyaṁ pravakṣyāmi śāmbhavasyaiva [ṅ, c: sāmbha-] lakṣaṇam |
samaṁ gataṁ layaṁ caiva avabodhaṁ caturthakam ||
caturdhā [c: catudhā] bhedabhinnaṁ tu śāmbhavaṁ [ṅ, c: sāmbhavaṁ] parikīrtitam |
CMSS 4/57-58ab.

[3] The Khañjinīmata consisting of 1,000 million (verses – śatakoṭi) has been uttered. In this way, Śāmbhavīśakti that has no end has become infinite. Śāmbhava, Śākta, and Āṇava have come dynamic interaction ('churning') generates the Triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala. Accordingly, the three energies of the Triangle are given these three names in the feminine.[1] In other words, in terms of the metaphysics of the Kubjikā Tantras, these three are aspects of the Transmental in its displayed differentiated (sakalā) form. In this way the triadic energy of the goddess is her threefold Command, and so all three spheres are those of Śakti. Thus addressing the goddess, the god says:

> I am Bhairava and your Command (operates) in the Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava (spheres). There is no difference between the two (of us), like wind and the two skies (atmospheric and celestial).[2] about by her impulse. She abides (thus) in the three worlds as will, knowledge and action. Bhairava, tranquil and free of defects, resides above Meru. He is rich with the jewels of countless qualities and is encompassed by millions of Rudras.

---

*śatakoṭipravistīrṇaṁ [kh: * ? koṭi-; ṅ: -ṇe] vyākhyātaṁ khañjinīmatam [gh: khajinī-; ṅ: khaṁḍinī-] ||
evaṁ sā [k, kh, gh: śā] śāmbhavī [all MSs: sāṁbhavī] śaktir anantānantatāṁ gatā |
*tasyāḥ [k, kh, gh: taśyā; ṅ: tasyā] saṁpreraṇāyātaṁ [k, kh, gh: saṁpreṇāyātaṁ; ṅ: -yāte] śāmbhavaṁ [k, kh, gh: śāṁbhava; ṅ: śāṁbhave] śāktam āṇavam [kh: * ?] ||
*icchā [kh: ?] jñānī [kh: ?] kriyākhyā [k, gh, ṅ: kriyāsyā; kh: * ? syā] ca saṁsthitā bhuvanatraye [k, kh: -trayā; gh: -trayāṁ] |
merūrdhve [ṅ: meharddha] saṁsthitaṁ śāntaṁ [ṅ: sāntaṁ] bhairavaṁ vigatāmayam [k, kh, gh: vimātāmayaṁ] ||
anekaguṇaratnāḍhyaṁ [gh: -guṇāstāḍhyaṁ] koṭirudrāvṛtaṁ [k, kh, gh: -vṛta] param [kh: ?] |
YKh (1) 12/33cd-36ab.

[1] KuKh 58/27-28.

[2] bhairavo 'haṁ tvadīyājñā śāmbhave śāktamāṇave |
ubhayor antaraṁ nāsti vāyor ambarayor iva || YKh (2) 19/128.

Cf: (By knowing) Āṇava, the one associated with Śākta and Śāmbhava, the third, he certainly knows the threefold Command.

āṇavaṁ [g: ārṇavā] śāktagaṁ [kh: śāktavaṁ; g: śāktaga] caiva śāṁbhavaṁ [k: śam-; kh: sāṁ-; g: sāṁbhava] ca tṛtīyakam |
ājñātritayavettā ca [g: -tṛtīya-; k g: -vettāro] bhavate [k g: bhavante] nātra saṁśayaḥ ||
ŚM 8/121cd-122ab.

Also*:* One should know that the empowered condition (śākta) of this sort is the secret in the Kaulika scripture. Āṇava and Śākta, along with the Śāmbhava planes – one should know that all (of these are) empowered (śākta), and are nowhere devoid of power (śakti).

śāktam evaṁvidhaṁ jñeyaṁ rahasyaṁ kaulikāgame |
āṇavaṁ (ānavaṁ) ca tathā śāktaṁ śāṁbhavajñānabhūmayaḥ ||
sarvaṁ śāktaṁ vijānīyān na tu śaktyojjhitaṁ kvacit | AS 12/102-103ab.

The attainment of these three fulfils every possible goal whether it is worldly benefit (bhoga), magical or yogic powers (siddhi) or liberation. Attaining this threefold goal through the one reality which is Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava, one returns to the pristine and integral condition of the eternal womb and origin of all things. As Bhairava says:

> I will explain the unchanging (reality), Śākta, Śāmbhava and Āṇava. The purpose of Śāmbhava is liberation. Śākta bestows accomplishments (siddhi). Āṇava is on the paths of worldly benefits (bhoga). The 'unchanging' is considered to be (thus) threefold. Once know the unity (of these three), which is like space, (one realises) the unchanging and (ever) equal womb (bhaga).[1]

In this reference we find a simple attempt to integrate these three categories into types of practice, as Abhinava does in a much more sophisticated way. Another way to do this is to understand Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava as three 'paths' along which the three energies of the triangular womb travel and through which a series of triads function. They are, effectively, projections of the triadic functions of the psychophysical system symbolically arranged into the three partitions of the body: right, left and middle. One such set of triads is the 'three groups of five' (tripañcaka) that can be tabulated as follows.[2]

---

[1] avikāraṁ pravakṣyāmi śāktaṁ [śākta] śāṁbhavam āṇavam । śāmbhavaṁ muktihetvarthaṁ [stutkivetvarthaṁ] śāktaṁ siddhipradāyakam ॥ āṇavaṁ bhuktimārgeṣu avikāraṁ tridhā matam । khavat samarasaṁ jñātvā avikārasamaṁ bhagam ॥ ŚMS (1) fl. 2a.

[2] dakṣe ca āṇavaṁ [kh: aśaṁvaṁ] śāktaṁ vāme madhye ca śāmbhavam ॥
dakṣe [g: dakṣa] kriyāṁ [k kh g: kriyā] ca vāmecchāṁ [k kh g: -cchā] madhye jñānīṁ [k kh g: -nī] prapūjayet । vāmeḍāṁ [k, g: -ḍā; kh: -dā] dakṣiṇe piṅgāṁ [all MSs: piṅgā] suṣumnāṁ [g: śuṣumṇā] madhyagāṁ [k kh g: -gā] yajet ॥ viśuddhā [kh: viśuddha] vāmabhāge tu [k: stu] dakṣiṇe ca kulāmbikā [k kh: kulāyikā] । madhye parāmbikā [k kh: parāyikā; g: parāyikāḥ] pūjyā maṇḍalasya kulāmbike ॥ dakṣe [g: dakṣa] tamo [kh g: nāmā] rajo vāme sattvaṁ [kh g: satva] madhye tathaiva ca । yaṣṭavyaṁ śrīkuleśāni sādhakaiḥ siddhikāṁkṣibhiḥ ॥ etat tripañcakaṁ yaṣṭvā [g: yaptvā] paścāc cakrāṇi pūjayet । KRU 10/22cd-26ab.

3. Table of the Three Groups of Five on the Triple Path

Locations	Spheres	Energies	Vital Channels	Goddesses	Qualities
Right	Āṇava	Action	Piṅgalā	Kulāmbikā	Tamas
Left	Śākta	Will[1]	Iḍā	Viśuddhā	Rajas
Middle	Śāmbhava	Knowledge	Suṣumnā	Parāmbikā	Sattva

Another important triad is one which relates purely to the Kubjikā teachings. This is the goddess's threefold transmission. It consists of the three lineages (oli) through which the goddess's Command is spread, the three Transmissions (krama), which are the substance of the teachings, and the three Siddhas who were their original recipients and propagators. The following passage tells us how they are related to the centres (cakra) in the body and the three energies:

> The Transmission of the Child is in the (Wheel of the) Foundation. The Middle one is in the (Wheel of) Unstruck Sound. O goddess, the Śrīkrama, well understood (niścita), is in the temple of (the Wheel of the) Command. The Eldest, Middle One and the Child – the lineage (oli)[2] is considered to be of three kinds. Will, knowledge and action (together) is said to be the triad of energies. (This is) the triple Command pertaining to Āṇava, born of Śakti and Śāmbhava.[3]

The three transmissions prescribe the three procedures (vidhi) by which the Krama should be worshipped in the Āṇava, Śākta, and Śāmbhava modalities[4]

---

[1] There appears to be a mistake here. The energy of the will is usually associated with Śāmbhava.
[2] The most common form of this term is 'oliḥ'. This variant form is attested in KuKh 7/93a. See note to Sanskrit text of KuKh 3/11b.
[3] bālakramaṁ tu ādhāre madhyam anāhatāśṛtam [k: ānāha-; kh: ānāha- -tāśṛtaṁ; g: ārāha-] |
śrīkramaṁ niścitaṁ devi ājñāmandirasaṁsthitam [k: ājñamadira-] ||
jyeṣṭhā madhyā tathā bālā ity olī trividhā matā [k: natā] |
icchā jñānī [kh, g: jñāna] kriyā ceti śaktitrayam udāhṛtam || [. . .]
āṇavī śaktijā caiva śāṁbhavīty ājñātrayam [kh:- tyājñayātrayam] | KRP 4/8-9, 11ab.
[4] One should know that in the ocean of this great hymn (mahādaṇḍa) is present (the triple transmision) of the Aged, Youth, and Child that prescribes the three methods (vidhi) in the Āṇava, Śākta, and Śāmbhava (modalities). (In this way) that fierce Mantravidyā has come forth in many ways.

ity arṇave [all MSs: ārṇava] mahādaṇḍe āṇave [k, kh, gh: ānave] śākta – śāmbhave [k, kh, gh: sāṁbhave; ṅ: sāṁbhave] |
*trividhidaṁ [ṅ: -dheyaṁ] vijānīyād [kh: vijānī d] vṛddhakaumārabālakam [k, kh, gh: -kaumalavālakaṁ] || collectively called the 'Triple Thorn'. This, we have seen, is the mantra called Tadgraha. This Trika mantra is thus integrated into the Kubjikā system by identifying its three parts with the three transmissions. In the KuKh we read:

> The Transmission (krama) is said to be of three kinds – gross, subtle and supreme. (It is) the Triple Thorn (consisting of the modalities of) the Individual Soul (āṇava), Energy (śākta) and Śiva (śāmbhava) as the third. (These correspond respectively to) the Supreme (para), Middling (parāpara) and Inferior (apara) (levels). (The wise) know that the one Transmission of Lineages, divided (thus) into three triads (tritrika), is threefold.
>
> The gross one is said to be the Transmission of the Aged, which is the authority of the Lineage of the Eldest. The subtle Transmission is that of the Youth which is said to be extremely subtle. The Transmission of the Child, which is the third, and the Lineage of the Youngest, which should be considered to be supreme. (In this way) that which is only one is divided threefold. The one Transmission is the Triple Thorn. (Thus) the triple Śrīkrama has been explained. (The wise) know it to be the triple Transmission of the Lineages.[1]

Just as the three lineages are characterized in this way, similarly there are three types of yogis[2] and the god who manifests as the teacher in these three lineages is visualized in three forms corresponding to the Āṇava, Śākta and Śāmbhava modalities.[3] Analogously, the Ṭīkā classifies the three Transmissions into these three and adds a fourth called the 'Desireless' (nirīha) and the Transmission of the Bliss of the Command (ājñānandakrama), which is that of the Divine Current of the eighteen Nāthas.[4]

---

nirgatā mantravidyā sā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: ca] raudrabhāvā [k, kh, gh: rudrābhāvā; ṅ: rudra-] hy anekadhā | YKh (1) 12/28-29ab.

[1] KuKh 28/129-133ab.

[2] YKh (1) 25/114 ff.. Quoted below on p. 499.

[3] YKh (1) 3/216 ff..

[4] idānīṁ [kh: + ājñānaṁdakramoddhāraṁ | iti] ājñānandakramam aṣṭādaśanāthakramaṁ catuḥprakāram | yathā śāktam ekaṁ | śāṁbhavaṁ [kh: śāṁbhava] dvitīyam | āṇavaṁ [k kh: ānavaṁ] tṛtīyam | nirīhaṁ caturtham | Ṭ MS K fl. 88a.

The Earlier and the Later Traditions concerning the End of the Twelve

We may conclude with a brief comparison of these teachings concerning the inner Moon and those that developed in the later period, that is, after the 12th century. We have already noted that about that time the Muslims established their dominion over the north of India and, in all probability due to that, most if not all of the Tantric traditions that once flourished in the North were ultimately interrupted. Although the transmission of the teachings of these traditions and the Tantric lineages through which they were passed on were lost, the essential principles, symbols, many of the deities, rituals and other practices were not forgotten. One could say that, to a large extent, the paradigms remained; even so the actual forms they generated in the revival that followed, although similar, were not the same. In some cases, the transition could not be made without substantial modifications and even loss of the earlier structures, even though they had endured for centuries and had been reproduced in many Tantric traditions. An overall treatment of developments in the symbolism related to yogic practice in the later Tantras with respect to the earlier ones is still a large, virtually virgin area of research. Here we can only briefly note one or two major changes as examples relevant to our present discussion.

We shall do this by examining the following passage drawn from the Ṣaṭcakranirūpaṇa. It is chapter six of the Śrītattvārthacintāmaṇi by Pūrṇānanda, a Rāḍhīya Brahmin who lived in Burma about 400 years ago.[1] Rich in content and often studied independently, the teachings of the ṢCN exemplify a number of important modifications of the earlier paradigm. The most apparent and striking one is that what the earlier traditions taught takes place above the head, has been shifted down into the skull. Thus, the End of the Twelve, which is universally accepted in the early Śaiva and Kaula Āgamas, to be located at the extremity of the subtle body twelve fingers above the head, has been lost. But its contents have been moved down, as it were, into the Thousand-petalled Lotus (sahasrāra) in the head. The reason for this is nowhere stated. Neither the texts nor the living tradition are at all conscious that this has taken place. One explanation that makes sense happens to be articulated in the oral tradition of the Bauls of Bengal. They are engaged in what they call the Practice of the Body (kāyasādhana) and believe that realisation can only be attained in the body. If Kuṇḍalinī, the life-force of the body were to exit from it, the practitioner would inevitably die.[2]

The following is Woodroffe's translation of the verses in the ṢCN concerned with the Thousand-petalled Lotus:

---

[1] See the preface (p. 1-2) of the edition of the Śrītattvacintāmaṇi.
[2] See notes to KuKh 40/32cd-34ab.

Within (the Thousand-petalled Lotus) is the full Moon, without the mark of the hare,[1] resplendent as in a clear sky. It sheds its rays in profusion, and is moist and cool like nectar. Inside (the lunar orb), constantly shining like lightning, is the Triangle and inside this, again, shines the Great Void [the Supreme Point] which is served in secret by all the Suras [gods].

Well concealed, and attainable only with great effort, is that subtle Bindu (śūnya) [Point (Emptiness)] which manifests the pure Nirvāṇakalā with Amākalā. Here is the Deva [god] who is known to all as Paramaśiva. He is the Brahman [Absolute] and Ātman [Self] of all beings. In him are united both rasa [the bliss of liberation] and virasa [the bliss of the union of Śiva and Śakti] and He is the sun which destroys the darkness of nescience and delusion.

By shedding a constant and profuse stream of nectar-like essence, the Bhagavat instructs the Yati [renouncer] of pure mind in the knowledge by which he realises the oneness of Jīvātmā [the individual soul] and the Parmātmā [the supreme soul]. He pervades all things as their Lord, who is the ever-flowing and spreading current of all manner of bliss known as Paramahaṁsa [the Supreme Gander].

Here is the excellent (supreme) sixteenth Kalā [energy] of the Moon. She is pure, and resembles (in colour) the young Sun. She is as thin as the hundredth part of a fibre in the stalk of a lotus. She is lustrous and soft like ten million lightning flashes, and is down-turned. From Her, whose source is the Brahman, flows copiously the continuous stream of nectar (or, She is the receptacle of the stream of excellent nectar which is the blissful union of Para and Parā).

Inside (Amākalā) is Nirvāṇakalā, more excellent than the excellent. She is subtle as the thousandth part of the end of a hair, and of the shape of the crescent moon. She is the ever-existing Bhagavatī [goddess], who is the Devatā [deity] who pervades all beings. She grants divine knowledge, and is as lustrous as the light of all the suns shining at one and the same time.

Within its middle space (i.e., in the middle of Nirvāṇakalā) shines the Supreme and Primordial Nirvāṇa Śakti; She is lustrous like ten million suns, and is the Mother of the three worlds. She is > extremely subtle, and like unto the ten-millionth part of the end of a hair. She contains within Her the constantly flowing stream of gladness, and is the life of all beings. She graciously carries the knowledge of the Truth (tattva) to the mind of the sages.

[1] Just as Europeans see in the markings of the moon the face of the 'old man of the moon' so Indians see there the outline of a hare. Accordingly, one of the Sanskrit names for the moon is 'śaśin' which literally means '(the one who possesses) a hare'. The Full Moon in the Thousand-petalled Lotus does not have these markings because, unlike the outer moon, it shines with the pure, unstained light of consciousness.

>
> Within Her is the everlasting place called the abode of Śiva, which is free from Māyā, attainable only by Yogīs, and known by the name of Nityānanda [Eternal Bliss]. It is replete with every form of bliss; and is pure knowledge itself. Some call it the Brahman; others call it Haṁsa. Wise men describe it as the abode of Viṣṇu, and righteous men speak of it as the ineffable place of knowledge of Ātmā, or the Place of Liberation.[1]

Nirvāṇakalā is the Transmental.[2] According to the Kaṅkālamālinītantra, the Transmental is the seventeenth digit of the moon within the Circle of the Moon.[3] It is called Nirvāṇakalā and is coupled with Amākalā.[4] The ultimate object of meditation and devotion is the Point in the centre of the Triangle within which, and by which, these two energies are emanated. Note that according to these later schools, exemplified by the ṢCN, Amākalā is the sixteenth – not the seventeenth – energy of the Moon. The Kaṅkālamālinītantra, for example, in the course of describing the Triangle within the Thousand-petalled Lotus in the head teaches:

> Having meditated on the Triangle placed below (the Cavity of Brahmā), he thinks that Kailāśa . . . is there. O Mahādevī, by placing the undisturbed mind (cetas) here one lives in bliss to the full term of one's life . . . free from all ills. For such a one there is no rebirth. Here constantly shines Amākalā, which knows neither increase nor decay, and within it, again, is the seventeenth digit, known as Nirvāṇakalā. Within Nirvāṇakalā is the fiery Nibodhikā. Above it is unmanifested Nāda [Sound], effulgent as ten million suns. It is the excellent Nirvāṇa Śakti, the cause of all. In this Śakti it should be known that Śiva who is changeless and free from illusion abides.[5]

This is the reverse of what we find in the KuKh. Amākalā is usually, the seventeenth digit and is the energy of the New Moon. The sixteenth is Pūrṇākalā

---

[1] ṢCN 41-49.
[2] Woodroffe 1981: 425.
[3] Ibid..
[4] Ibid. 431.
[5] Quoted by Woodroffe 1981: 435 fn. 5.

and is the energy of the Full Moon. But this appears, as we have seen, to be a later development in the doctrine of the Kubjikā Tantras. What the later texts say about Nirvāṇakalā/ – śakti is largely what the KuKh says about Amākalā. The term Nirvāṇakalā/ – śakti is unknown to the Kubjikā Tantras, but the goddess, as the Divine Yoni, is identified with the plane or state (bhūmikā) of Nirvāṇa.[1] As Śāmbhavī, she is the Plane of Knowledge (jñānabhūmikā) which is Nirvāṇa and Supreme Nectar.[2] At the same time she is also the radiant energy (tejomayī) that issues from Nirvāṇa, the Supreme Principle[3] and bestows its bliss. Nirvāṇa is the Skyfarer's Transmission (khecarakrama), that is, the Divine Current and Yoga.[4] One enters it when all Karma has been destroyed.[5] It is the Teacher's Mouth.[6] The goddess is called Nirvāṇā when she is in the form of the sleeping snake of Kuṇḍalinī. But as such, she is not sleeping because she is not below in the realms of bondage but above in the End of the Twelve.[7] There, immersed in profound and blissful contemplation, she sleeps, as it were, encompassing within herself the All that issues from her when she awakes. Nirvāṇa is the Silence[8] experienced when the Transmental is attained, that is, by the cessation of the mind (manas),[9] and so hardly differs from it. Thus it said to be the Void (antarīkṣa) that is Supreme Bliss and Beyond Mind (unmana). It is the supreme body of the Supreme Goddess.[10]

Conclusion

The language of the texts manipulates these symbols, juxtaposing and exchanging them one with the other. The Point (bindu or bindumālinī) in the centre of the maṇḍala is the Void, the Divine Current (divyaugha), the Transmission of the Skyfarers (khecarakrama), the Liṅga, the Bhaga which is the syllable AIṀ, the Moon, the First Sacred Seat and, as we will see, it is also the Kadamba Tree and its Bud and the Tamarind Tree. The Triangle (trikoṇa) is the also the Liṅga as well as the Cave, the Island and City of the Moon, Kula (or Mālinīkula), the Ocean of the Yoni, the Triple Peak mountain (trikūṭa), the World of the Lineage (santānabhuvana), and the letter E. At the End of the Twelve in the yogic body, it is also concretely, directly visible in the core of the maṇḍala. By

---

1 KuKh 3/63-64ab.
2 KuKh 57/55cd-56.
3 MāSt line 1.
4 KuKh 12/12cd-13ab.
5 KuKh 13/94.
6 KuKh 22/19.
7 KuKh 31/63cd-64.
8 KuKh 62/66.
9 KuKh 41/16cd-17ab.
10 KuKh 55/1.

linking dimensions of representation, the conventions (saṁketa) link the spheres of reality. Resonant with many implicit meanings, metaphysical and experiential, the following statement is much more than a description of how the triangle is drawn in the middle of the hexagon in the centre of the maṇḍala:

> The Liṅga is the Solitary Tree (generated) by churning the three energies (of the Triangle). Then arose Kula, the Ocean of the Yoni in the centre of the hexagon. It is called the Island of the Moon and is connected with the six aggregates (of the spheres of the maṇḍala).[1]

Although the two sets of symbols denote separate parts of the maṇḍala, they are commonly identified. The Void of the Point may be the Cave. It may also be Island or City of the Moon. Moreover, members of the two sets may be combined with one another in all possible ways. Sometimes this works well, as in the following description of the Point in the centre of the Triangle:

> The Full Moon, which is the Command, is the (supreme) energy in the Mālinīkula. It is in the middle of the Liṅga in Triple Peak (mountain) within the Cave of Silence (tūṣṇīguhā).[2]

As the teachings unfolded through successive revelations, the manipulation of symbols in this way developed, just as aging art forms do, into a complex baroque. Although the language of the KMT is rich with symbolic expressions, once one knows the basic terminology, the text is relatively clear. Subsequently, the language was enriched with more terms without much substantial additional meaning. Although the same paradigms continue to operate, they are further extended and the contents are richly ornamented with symbols that replace and refer back to each other in compounding, complex layers. Ultimately, the language of the texts became a dense mass of such expressions, building one upon the other so freely, that in places they became virtual cryptograms. In this and other ways the system developed parallel to this linguistic development. The later sources reworked the myths, extended the sacred geography, tirelessly produced variants of the Krama and continued to add to the other elements of the teachings. All this took place in a period of perhaps two or three hundred years probably starting in the eighth or ninth century CE. The subsequent developments took place not through the medium of the Tantras but in the liturgies (paddhati)

---

[1] In KuKh 58/27cd-28.

[2] pūrṇimājñāsvarūpeṇa sā kalā (kālaṁ) mālinīkule (-kulamu) ||
liṅgaṁ (liṅga) madhye triśṛṅge (triśṛṇu) ca tasmin tūṣṇiguhāntare (tūṣṇī-) | AS 10/143cd-144ab.

derived from them. The great majority of these were redacted by the Newars in the Kathmandu Valley to which the cult traveled in the beginning of eleventh century. There it lay hidden to the present day.

Chapter Three

Sacred Place and Inner Space

This study is essentially textual; even so it is not devoid of concern with the world 'outside' along with the 'inner' one of the Tantric scriptures. A cardinal point of contact between these two domains is sacred geography. Sacred geography is a way in which human beings take possession of place. Through it they find their home not only in the human world but also with the deities to whom sacred places ultimately belong. Here men live with them and their ancestors. Here they acquire the power of sacred places – that same power the sacred beings who reside there possess. Here we return to those places sanctified by the transmission of sacred knowledge to participate again in their power. Established at the beginning of time by the presence of deity and of perfected men and women who, descending from the limitless expanse that is their original home into the world of men, they form a bridge to its unconditioned and eternal power.

Sacred geography is as much human as it is divine. It is more than physical, social or cultural geography. It is the geography of the land in which we live. It is not just space or places, it is our home. Places locate us. They personalize the landscape, transforming it into a familiar place where we are free of the fear of the unknown. It becomes a place where we belong and which belongs to us, recovered from the anonymous expanse or from those who had been there before us. As long as man has trod the earth conscious of himself and his surroundings, he needed to know at least in which direction he was travelling. Originally a nomad, the ancient Indian roamed the face of the earth invoking the deities not of place but of direction. Wherever he went he would call them to offer them what he could and receive from them sustenance, offspring, vigour, power, and all the good things of the world in which he moved. He called his gods from their distant homes in the sky, the wind, the fire, the waters, in the dawn, in the rivers, in all the seemingly limitless and sacred landscape that enveloped him and through which he moved with his kin and comrades. He carried with him the sacred fire with which he cooked his food and that of the gods, the fire which, wherever it was placed, became his home and shelter. In this fire he made his offerings, the same fire with which he cooked his food and was, in his ever-changing world, the centre where he found nourishment and life-sustaining warmth.

Then, with the passage of time, his life became more sedentary and he delighted in a land in which he lived where the rivers and the clouds were like fat mulch cows, flowing with nourishing milk.[1] Here he communicated with the gods, offering them rich sacrifices, lengthy and full of invocations, praise and thanksgiving. Here he could take time to make his petitions and prepare the offerings. But he never lost his urge to wander and so, with time, the nomad became a pilgrim.

Pilgrimage is a rich and varied human phenomenon. It is man's response to the sacredness of places where theophanies – astonishing manifestations of the divine have occurred. Necessarily linked to places, they are creative events (and sometimes destructive too) that originally took place, as Eliade would say, in illo tempore, at the 'beginning of time', and in those places from where arose the gods, mountains, rivers, sacred trees, everything of importance – indeed, even the entire universe. Sacred sites not only commemorate the origins of things, they are also powerful markers of place. In the barren landscape of the Australian desert, they orientate the aboriginal. In crowded urban space they transform it into a living maṇḍala populated by the beings of its sacred sites and the mortals who live and move amongst them. The guardians of place came to be guardians of the home, the village, the neighbourhood, town, city, state and, ultimately the entire country, regardless of the boundaries of human settlements.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the first reference we find in the Sanskrit sources to sacred place and its natural human response – pilgrimage – occurs with the founding of the prototype of the first Aryan state. This took place in the early post-Ṛgvedic period praised as the golden age of the Kurus under their king Parikṣit, the ancestor of the well known Janameya Pārikṣita of Brāhmaṇa and Mahābhārata fame, of the Pārikṣita dynasty of the Kurus. Momentous developments took place in the Vedic culture of the period, including the arrangement of the Vedas in the form we have today. The centre of political power and Vedic culture became Kurukṣetra – the Land of the Kurus. This was the favoured land of the Vedic gods, who flocked to the many sacrifices

---

[1] There is no need to enter into the controversy concerning the original home of the so-called Indo-Europeans. However, it is worth stating that there can be no doubt that the Vedas were entirely revealed in India. Moreover, they contain no explicit memory of some earlier period outside India. The theory that the Indo-European ancestors of the Vedic peoples came from outside India is by no means as easy to establish as many history books lead one to believe. Elements of Vedic sacrifice – such as the mobility of the sacred fire – do suggest that the Vedic people were at some time nomadic, but this does not necessarily imply, yet alone prove, that they were not native Indians. Witzel's research has clearly established that the Vedic sources attest the expansion of Vedic culture across northern India west to east, not the other way around. Nonetheless, this fact does not prove that Vedic culture originated further west outside the confines of India.

The reader is referred to Bryant (2001) for a concise, unbiased presentation of the major theories. While he shies away from reaching any ultimate conclusion, his study does demonstrate that the 'Aryan invasion' theory is not one but many theories, none of which, however plausible, have been proved.

performed there in their honour. It is in Kurukṣetra that the heavenly river Sarasvatī – the Milky Way – was regarded as flowing down from heaven around the time of the winter solstice. The ritual texts make the Sarasvatī and her companion the Dṛśadvatī the place of long treks – the first recorded pilgrimages – along her banks to the point where they flowed down from the now-opened door of heaven in the north-east.[1]

The sources we examine in this chapter along with the Kubjikā Tantras are typical of a new order of highly literate Tantric cults that emerged from the seventh century CE onwards. These, like the earlier Tantric cults and Śaiva sects from which they evolved, focused on the figure of the roaming ascetic. But now the places he travels to are much increased in number. Moreover, they are no longer just simply called 'sacred lands' – kṣetra – they are specific seats – pīṭhas – of deities and meeting grounds for male initiates and Yoginīs, their female counterparts. The development of the sacred geography of India we witness in these sources is paralleled by that in their public, exoteric counterparts – the Purāṇas. Influencing each other, the latter came to serve as the register and scriptural authority for a vast expansion both of the number of sacred sites as well as the detailed development of the sacred geography of each place.

Inevitably, the original culture of peripatetic renunciants had to adapt to the needs of initiated householders and cloistered monks, bringing about the rapid internalisation of sacred sites and pilgrimage. This process, along with the cataclysmic effects of the Muslim incursions into India and the subsequent conquest, left the scriptural 'imprimatur' that recorded and sanctioned the history of the development of the sacred geography of the country largely in the hands of the redactors of the Purāṇas. The powerful Muslim presence, with the loss of patronage this entailed coupled with their active widescale destruction of temples, brought about the end of extensive religious foundations. Thus, Buddhism with its network of large monastic institutions died out, as did the original Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava monasteries that were their Hindu counterpart, where the Muslims were in power. Wherever this took place, Hindu religious culture, fighting for survival, centred itself again, as it had done in earlier times, on small local and domestic cults that could be managed with relatively modest individual and public support. Monumental temples and monasteries were replaced by less visible, but no less grand, detailed and extensive sacred geographies which integrated the myriads of local cults, great and small, into robust networks that could elude and resist the Muslim determination to conversion. So, although the earlier Tantric traditions had largely been truncated in the parts of India where these changes took place, Tantric deities, sites and rituals proliferated once more and for the same reasons as before and the same public needs – protection, personal and political power. But now the enemy was no longer within and the destruction wrought was more terrible. So the kinds of deities that originated in the Tantras continued to appear in large numbers in the public domain and mingled there with the divine forms already there. Each was allotted a place, and the magnitude of their sacrality and power was no longer measured by the size of the modest temples, shrines and domestic altars they inhabited, but by the power of place from which they drew their energy first and to which they returned it, strengthened. In this way the countless millions of gods and goddesses of India could work together, coordinated by the network of sacred sites that covered every corner, great and small, of the vast land of Bhārata.

---

[1] Witzel 1995: 15-16.

It is understandable that the cults of the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras should lay stress on sacred place because their deities and attendants are, amongst other things, guardians of place. There is little reason to doubt that the villages and towns of India in the first half of the first millenium were populated, as they are now, with numerous local, rural and urban supernatural beings. But although their domestic counterparts were accepted as paradigms in the ritual world of the Brahminical Gṛhyasūtras in the first centuries before the common era, it took centuries more for the paradigms of their rural and urban counterparts to find extensive application in the Sanskritic tradition. Around the 7th century CE we witness a general development of this phenomenon. The public cults supported by the Purāṇas witnessed a similar growth in their sacred geographies. It is from this time onwards that they began to blossom to become the vast and highly detailed one we know today. The extent and speed with which they developed can be guaged by comparing the description of the sacred sites in Vārāṇasī in the early 9th century manuscript of the Skandapurāṇa[1] and that of the Kāśīkhaṇḍa compiled and inserted into the same Purāṇa several centuries later. The former refers to just a few sites – all of which are related to male beings, Liṅgas and solar discs. The Kāśīkhaṇḍa refers to more than 400 places inhabited by a range of beings. Although the great majority are Liṅgas, a large number are female beings, the majority of which are of the type that in the Tantras would be generically referred to as Yoginīs.

Renouncers and Householders

In order to understand the development of the Indian's sensitivity to the sacrality of place, which for centuries has been a major aspect of Hindu sprituality,

---

[1] The oldest recovered manuscript of the of the Skandapurāṇa is Nepalese dated 810 CE, concerning which see Bakker 1993: 21. See the same article by Bakker for early myths concerning Vārāṇasī and Bakker 1986: part 1, pp. 126 ff. for the development of māhātmya literature including the Kāśīkhaṇḍa of the Skandapurāṇa.

we must seek one of its roots in the life and ethos of the renouncer and his relationship to the householder.[1] This is especially true if we wish to understand the development of the extensive sacred geography of the early Tantras in general and, specifically, the form it has assumed in the Kubjikā Tantras.

The famous hymn to the ascetic (keśin) in the late tenth section (maṇḍala) of the Ṛgveda is one of the earliest references to ascetics in India. Noteworthy is that many characteristics of Śaiva ascetics recognizable centuries later are already attributed to him. He is associated with Rudra, whom he imitates. He wears ochre clothes and has long unkempt hair. Most interesting is a feature that became cardinal to that of the liberated state for all Kaula and related Tantric traditions: he flies:

> The Muni, girdled with the wind, wears garments soiled of yellow hue; he, following the wind's swift course, goes where the gods have gone before. (. . .) Wind (vāyu) hath churned for him: for him he poundeth things most hard to bend, when he with long loose locks hath drunk, with Rudra, poison[2] from the cup.[3]

However, despite such references, Vedic religion was essentially meant for householders, not renouncers. Even so, some scholars believe that it developed parallel ideals of renunciation spontaneously within its own ambit. According to Heesterman, a major exponent of this view: 'the ultramundane renunciatory drive is not only clearly visible in the Veda's sacrificial ritualism but central to it as the motive force of its development. Whatever additional outside stimuli there may have been, the renunciatory tendency can be seen to arise orthogenetically from within the Vedic tradition itself.'[4]

Heesterman is of the view that the figure of the renouncer is a natural development of that of the Vedic sacrificer who was invariably a householder. The Vedic sacrifice served, amongst other things, to integrate (even as it distinguished between them) the two domains of the Vedic world and life – the village and the forest. The confines of the former were those delineated by the sacrificial and domestic hearths. The 'forest' was the uncharted and wild expanse beyond. Amongst the numerous and complex strategies to bridge the gap between them was the cyclic foray into the forest by the householder who was for the required time divested of his householder status, which he resumed upon his return.

---

[1] The other major cause of this development is, of course, the transition from Vedic to classical Hinduism, which came about to a large extent by adaptation to the local ('non-Sanskritic') religions and cultures. We shall take a look at this phenomenon in the context of the typology of the cults to which the Kubjikā Tantras are most closely related in another publication.

[2] Griffith: water.

[3] Ṛg Veda 10/136/2,7 translation by Griffith.

[4] Heesterman 1982: 253.

Ultimately, according to this view, the brief periods in the forest became a permanent retreat. The classic example is Yajñavalkya, the earliest recorded Vedic exponent of the doctrines of Karma and reincarnation and amongst the first in India to discover the Absolute Brahman in the pure abstraction of self-realisation. On the occasion of his demise into the wilds, he enlightens his grieving wife by revealing the secret of the Brahman and its identity with the Self. Here we find a great ascetic teaching the liberating knowledge of the Absolute in the final part of the Veda which was kept secret, just as centuries later the Tantras would be treated as secret doctrines originally taught and propagated by ascetics.

Many scholars do not agree with Heesterman. They focus on the fact that the elements of asceticism stood in sharp contrast to the essentially householder Brahminical ideology. At the origin of this contrast they see two distinct cultures. Indian asceticism was traced to non-Brahminical or even non-Aryan sources.[1] This alternative culture is so centred on the ascetic's ideals that it has been called śrāmaṇa – an adjective derived from the noun 'śramaṇa' which means 'renunciant' or 'monk'. Buddhism and Jainism are the most evident examples of śrāmaṇa sects that developed in the midst of others like them that primarily valued renunciation. By the Buddha's time (c. 5th century BCE) the ascetic renouncer must have been a common sight. As Bhandarkar notes: 'there was a tendency amongst the people which often worked itself out, as is evident from the Pāli birth-stories [of Buddha's previous lives], to give up worldly life and betake themselves to the forests or mountains. Buddhism, Jainism and other like systems considered an ascetic life to be a sine qua non of religious elevation. There is reason to believe that Śramaṇas existed before the rise of Buddhism.'[2]

This alternative culture probably also included the early followers of the Sāṁkhya who subsequently developed the classical Yoga system that reached maturity in Patañjali's Yogasūtras and the doctrines concerning the structure of the material realm (prakṛiti). The latter was adopted by most Hindu sects in variously modified forms, thereby evidently and profoundly influencing the classical Hinduism that emerged in the wake of Vedic culture. Jacobsen explains: 'Sāṁkhya and Yoga as renunciant systems, are closely related to the śrāmaṇical movement. While Jainism and Buddhism became 'non-orthodox' (nāstika) movements, Sāṁkhya was to a large degree the renunciant ideology of that which developed into the Hindu Brahminical 'orthodox' (āstika) tradition. Several authors has (sic.) argued that there is considerable evidence, especially in the Epics, for a close connection between the early Sāṁkhya school of religious thought and the renunciatory way of life.'[3] [1] Belvalkar and Ranade 1927: 401. For a recent restatement of this dichotomy and attempted synthesis of various viewpoints on the origin of Indian asceticism, the reader is referred to Bronkhorst (1993).

---

[2] Bhandarkar 1965: 29.
[3] Jacobsen 2001:123.

In the succeeding centuries social conditions changed considerably; even so, the possible conflict between the binary extremes of the householder's and the renouncer's life remained and constantly demanded resolution. One way this was done was to order man's life into four stages – āśrama. Kane[1] provides the following brief summary of Manu's view concerning the four stages of life: 'the span of life is one hundred years. All do not reach that age, but that is the maximum age one can expect to reach. This should be divided into four parts. As one cannot know beforehand what age one is going to reach, it is not supposed that these four parts are each of 25 years. They may be more or less. As stated by Manu IV.1 the first part of a man's life is brahmacarya [celibacy] in which he learns at his teacher's house and after he has finished his study, in the second part of his life he marries and becomes a householder, discharges his debts to his ancestors by begetting sons and to the gods by performing yajñas [sacrifices] (Manu V.169). When he sees that his head has grey hairs and that there are wrinkles on his body he resorts to the forest i.e. he becomes a vanaprastha [forest dweller] (Manu VI.1 – 2). After spending the third part of his life in the forest for some time he spends the rest of his life as a saṁnyāsin [renouncer] (Manu VI. 33).'

In this context the āśrama system can be understood to be have been created by conservative Brahmins to reduce the impact of the culture of renunciation on their essentially householder life. Brahminical hermeneutics was thus able to resolve the opposition between the value systems centred on the renouncer and the householder by showing that they were not truly opposed because they represented the proper dharma (the svadharma) of people belonging to different age groups.[2] That the four stages of life developed into a manner of domesticating asceticism is evidenced by the fact that in its earliest formulation in the Law Books (dharmaśāstra), the āśrama system was not understood to be a way of dividing the span of a man's life. Rather, they were originally possibilities from which an individual could choose freely.

Another strategy to achieve harmony between the apparently conflicting Brahminical ideals of the householder and the ascetic, who in the course of time came to be the guardian of the highest religious achievements and ideals, was to incorporate the latter into the former. Tambiah explains that: 'many Brahmin groups, whether pursuing religious knowledge as householders set apart from others or serving as priests for others, took on certain ascetic values and practices while remaining within this āśrama. They became in this sense double-faced taking their place, so to say in between the renouncer, whom they regarded as their preceptor, and the laity of the other varṇas [castes]. Indeed, some ascetic orders confined themselves to recruits from the twice-born, giving prominence and highest recognition to those Brahmin candidates who became renouncers in the last stages of their lives, having fulfiled their gṛhastha duties. Hinduism is indeed a mansion with many interconnecting rooms.'[1]

[1] Kane 1974: vol II, part 1 p. 417.
[2] Olivelle 1997: 17.

We may cite any number of examples of how the rooms of the mansion of Hinduism interconnect. We find an interesting one in the work of the Siddhāntin Vedajñāna who lived in Citamparam in Tamil Nadu in the 16th century[2] and wrote the Śaivāgamaparibhāṣāmañjarī. The ŚĀPM is a compendium of extracts from the Siddhāntāgamas. Dagens (1979: 27-8) writes in his French introduction that: 'The theme of the observances (āśrama) recurs frequently in the ŚĀPM; the recognized observances are that of the householder, the mendicant monk (bhikṣu), the brahmacārin and the forest dwelling ascetic (ibid. 4/31-33ab), but this basic list is qualified by dichotomies within each of the observances and, moreover, by categories that are superimposed on the aforementioned four: . . . this is particularly the case with the yatins, that is, those who have mastered their senses and can be exempted from the four observances (3/297-8). The dichotomies relate to the brahmacārin, gṛhastha and vānaprastha (2/112-121ab). Concerning the first, it is said that he can make a perpetual vow (to be celibate) and he is then a naiṣṭhika, a renouncer. Or he who, on the contrary, considers his observance to be a stage towards that of a gṛhasta, is then a bhautika. The gṛhasta also has two possibilities before him: take on his observance without worrying about other things except the pleasure of the senses or, on the contrary, give it up when his responsibilities have been fulfiled and detach himself from the world. The vānaprastha can be a gṛhastha who retires [to the forest] with his wife or, on the contrary, be a solitary brahmacārin. Worth noting in this context the special praise for the state of the gṛhastha which is considered to be the best as the gṛhastha can sustain equally well the role of brahmacārin and the vānaprastha [. . .] there is no question at all of the fourth observance listed above (4/31 qv.) [i.e. that of the renouncer] except in the context of initiation: after praising the role of the spiritual teacher that can be assumed by both the brahmacārin and the gṛhastha, comes the peremptory affirmation that ascetics practicing austerities (parivrāṭatāpasa) cannot act as intermediaries to transmit the grace of Śiva to the world.'[3] But previously quoting the Acintyāgama ŚĀPM says: 'The renouncer should initiate the renouncer and householders in due order'.[4]

Examples of strategies designed to integrate in various ways the life of the householder and that of the renouncer could be multiplied considerably. These

---

[1] Tambiah 1982: 319.

[2] Concerning the date of Vedajñāna, see ŚĀPM 6 ff. and 362 ff.

[3] lokānugrahakartāraḥ parivrāṭ tāpasā na hi || ŚĀPM 2/46ab; quoted from the Kriyāpāda of the Sarvajñānottara.

[4] naiṣṭhiko naiṣṭhikaṁ caiva gṛhasthān dīkṣayet kramāt | Acintyāgama 2/43ab.

should suffice to frame the problem and give an idea of possible solutions outside the specific ambit of the Kubjikā Tantras to which we now turn. One of the simplest ways to accommodate these conflicting ideals takes its cue from the Brahminical āśrama model, implied in the following question:

> How is (the conduct of) the follower of the Rule (samayin), the spiritual son (putraka) and the adept (sādhaka)? (What is) the state of the teacher (ācārya)? In brief, (what is) the teaching concerning the four stages of life (āśrama)?[1]

The four stages of life are here equated with the four types of initiate. The analogy is sound for the aspirant who is ultimately to become a teacher. But not all aspirants are qualified for this; many prefer to remain regular initiates. Those who aspire to more can take up the life of the adept (sādhaka), a renouncer whose life is centred on the repetition of mantra (japa). The teacher, as we shall see, may be either.

These distinctions may also simply be abandoned, which was probably accepted as an option in the earliest stages of the development of the Śaiva Āgamas, one that was soon epitomized in the figure of the Avadhūta. Well known to post-14th century treatises on Yoga,[2] the Avadhūta appears in substantial detail for the first time in the Brahmayāmala. Outwardly, he lives the life of a renouncer who carries a skull and dwells in cremation grounds. He is, in other words, a Kāpālika. However, the BY stresses that his outer lifestyle should be sustained by his inner spiritual state centred on Stillness – nirācāra.[3] The term also suggests his outer transgressive, antinomian behaviour, which is also nirācāra in another sense of the word, namely, 'without decorum' or 'ill-mannered' in terms of common social norms and conventions. Thus a typical passage in the BY teaches that:

> If the one who recites mantra is Still (nirācāra)[4] and abides within the body of an avadhūta, he then performs the yogic rite of adoration of Śiva. Avadhūtā is that energy (he possesses) and the one who is Still is Śiva.[5]

These lines must have appeared to be particularly significant to the redactor of the ṢSS who must have had them in his mind when he wrote the

---

[1] KuKh 31/6-7ab.

[2] See note to line 4 of the MāSt in chapter four of the KuKh.

[3] Concerning nirācāra – the condition of Stillness – see above, chapter 1, p. 100 ff..

[4] Here 'nirācāra' also describes this ascetic as 'without social convention'.

[5] nirācāro [k, kh: -rā] yadā mantrī avadhūtatanuḥ [kh: -tanu] sthitaḥ ||
tadā tu kurute pūjāṁ yogaśīlāṁ śivasya [kh: śitasya] ca |
avadhūtā tu sā śaktir [k, kh: śakti] nirācāraḥ [k, kh: -ra] paraḥ śivaḥ || BY 2/1cd-2.

following two passages. The variants are significant and worth quoting. They, along with the additions that suppliment them aid our understanding both of the Avadhūta and his inner practice:

> If the yogi is one who is Still (nirācāra) and abides with the body of an Avadhūta, he then performs the rite of adoration of the Yoginīs and Śiva. When (the breath is the one that) exits it is Still (nirācāra) when it (is the one that) enters, it is Avadhūtā. O goddess, present in the body he constantly unites one with the other (and so checks their movement). By practicing both wherever the eye and mind (may happen to) wander, (the yogi) is successful (siddha) there itself.[1]

Again:

> Stillness (nirācāra) is said to be the exit of the power of the vital breath. The yogi is then one who is Still (nirācāra) and abides on the plane of an Avadhūta. He then performs the rite of adoration of the mitresses of Yoga and Śiva.[2]

Just as the Kaula initiates of the goddess Kubjikā took over these symbolic representations of Yogic practice drawn from the outer life of the Śaiva ascetic, so did the Trika initiates before them. Thus in the TS we read:

> O goddess, the plane of the renouncer is said to be the Transmental. The state of the plane of Stillness is successful without a doubt.[3]

Avadhūtā, as a name of Kubjikā implying her inner form as Kuṇḍalinī, appears as many as three times in the Mālinīstava in chapter four of the KuKh (lines 4, 59 and 99) but nowhere else in the Kubjikā Tantras.

[1] nirācāro yadā yogī avadhūtatanau [gh: -tanu] sthitaḥ || tadā tu kurute pūjāṁ yoginīnāṁ śivasya tu |
nirgame tu nirācāraḥ [k kh gh: -ra] praveśe cāvadhūtakaḥ ||
anyonyamaithunaṁ devi kurute dehagaḥ [gh: dehagāt] sadā |
yatra yatra gataṁ cakṣur [gh: cakṣu] yatra yatra gataṁ manaḥ ||
tatra tatra dvirabhyāsāt [gh: durabhyāsā] siddhas [gh: siddhis] tatra ca tatra ca |
ṢSS 10/7cd-10ab.

[2] nirācāras tu saḥ proktaḥ prāṇaśaktes tu nirgamaḥ || nirācāras tadā yogī avadhūtapade sthitaḥ |
tadā tu kurute pūjāṁ [k kh: pūjā] yogeśīnāṁ śivasya tu || ṢSS 25/105cd-106.

[3] avadhūtapadaṁ devi unmanaṁ tu tad ucyate ||
nirācārapadāvasthā siddhyate nātra saṁśayaḥ | TS 2/27cd-28ab.

As in the BY, the inner Stillness of the Avadhūta, who is beyond all distinctions of caste and stages of life, is understood in the TS to be the essential condition of Kuṇḍalinī who is the Transmental (unmanā):

> That subtle and supreme power is said to be Stillness (nirācāra). Wrapping (itself around) the Point (bindu) (in the centre) of the heart, her form is that of a sleeping serpent.[1]

Although this very verse appears at the beginning of a long passage quoted by Kṣemarāja in his commentary on the Śivasūtra,[2] and so became very well known (as did several other passages from the TS), to later Tantric exegetes, the Yoga system taught by monistic Kashmiri Śaivites, although very rich, found no place for the teachings concerning Stillness – nirācāra. Is this because the association with the unconventional Avadhūta was too strong? Is this also the reason why the references to the Avadhūta in the TS compared to the BY are very few? Be that as it may, such considerations (linked with the process of domestication and sanitization of Śaiva antinomian doctrines) were no deterrent for the Kubjikā Tantras, which on the contrary not only took over this teaching, but also elaborated it further.

The following passage, drawn from the ṢSS, exalts the figure of the liberated renouncer – the Avadhūta. Thus retaining this, the original ideal model. At the same time, however, the householder is considered to be superior to the lifelong celibate. This fits with the mainstream smārta point of view, which stresses that a man should fulfil the debts he has to his ancestors by procreating. On the other hand, the Tantra takes care to assure the celibate Brahmin, that even if he omits to fulfil this obligation, he is no less entitled to receive the benefits of initiation and be on the path. What matters above all is that the aspirant should possesses the required moral qualities and devotion:

> Or else, (he may be an ascetic who) always lives in a cave and eats roots, wears bark clothes, keeps silence and is firm (in the observance of his ascetic's) vow; whether he has dreadlocks or shaved head, he is ever intent on the practice of chastity. He knows the reality of concentration and meditation and does not keep the company of the worldly(-minded). The divine Transmission (krama) should be told (to such a one,) not to (just anybody) one likes. O goddess, one should tell this, in the proper manner, to one for whom pleasure and pain, gold

---

[1] yā sā (kh: missing) śaktiḥ (kh, g: śakti) parā sūkṣmā nirācāreti kīrtitā ||
hṛdbinduṁ veṣṭayitvā tu prasuptabhujagākṛtiḥ | TS 1/215cd-216ab.
[2] Commentary on ŚSū 2/3; see Dyczkowski 1992: 73.

> and iron, friend and foe, nectar and poison are the same and, reflecting on the Transmission, observes all the rules of the renouncer (naiṣṭhikadharma). The liberated Kaula (avadhūta) is the best, middling is the householder and the least is the renouncer (naiṣṭhika). This should be told to one who is fit out of all these three; (and) not to any other: this is the Command in the Kula teaching.[1]

If we must grade these ways of life, the perfect renouncer is better than the householder. But the teaching may be imparted equally despite this gradation. Any condition is acceptable, so long as the initiate follows the teachings. These are such that they can be practiced equally in the solitude sought by the renouncer or in the home of the householder. It is purely a matter of what is most conducive for a particular individual:

> He whose mind is (centred) in a cremation ground, (a solitary place where there is just) a single tree, the junction (of rivers), a mountain cave, (or) a forest should delight (in spiritual discipline) in these places. This (teaching) should (also) always be given to the devout soul (bhaktātman) whose duty is (to serve) the teacher, the deity and the fire in the sacrifice (he performs in his) home.[2]

The image of the householder presented here as one whose regular practice (sadācāra) is to make offerings to the fire[3] aligns him to the Brahminical ideal of

---

[1] athavā gahvarāntasthaḥ [kh: -stha] kandamūlāśanī [k: – sanaḥ; kh: chandamūlāsanaḥ] sadā ||
valkalāmbaradhārī ca vāgniṣedhī [k kh: -niṣedhaṁ] dṛḍhavrataḥ |
jaṭine muṇdine vāpi brahmacaryarate sadā ||
dhyānadhāraṇatattvajñe asatsaṅgavivarjite |
tasyoktavyaṁ [k: evamuktaṁ; kh: evamuktā] kramaṁ divyaṁ nānyaṁ tu yasya rocate ||
sukhaṁ duḥkhaṁ samaṁ yasya tathā vai loṣṭakāñcanam |
arimitraṁ tathaiveha tathā caivāmṛtaṁ viṣam ||
sarvanaiṣṭhikadharmān [k kh: sarve naiṣṭhikadharmā] ca pālayet kramacintakaḥ |
tasyedaṁ kathayed devi vidhinānena pūrvavat ||
avadhūtottamaḥ prokto madhymo gṛhapālakaḥ | kanyaso naiṣṭhikaś caiva yatra ete mayoditāḥ ||
trayāṇām api madhye ca yas tu yogyo bhavet priye |
kathet tasmai na cānyasya ājñaiṣā [k: āptaivā] kulaśāsane || ṢSS 10/19cd-25.

[2] śmaśāne ekavṛkṣe vā saṁgame [k; sabhra(?)me] girigahvare |
yasya cittaṁ varārohe eṣu sthāneṣu saṁramet ||
gurudevāgnikārye ca yasya kāryaṁ [kārye] gṛhe 'dhvare |
saṁpadyate sa bhaktātmā tasya deyam idaṁ sadā || ṢSS 10/14-15.

[3] Of course, the Kaula fire sacrifice differs from the Vedic. Instead of Vedic mantras, that is, the hymns intoned to the Vedic gods, the Kaula recites the goddess's Vidyā. In place of the Soma he offers alcohol:

the Vedic householder who always kept the sacred fire lit and makes offerings in it at the prescribed times:

> The fire offering along with the (repetition of the) Vidyā is enjoined for those who are devoted to the householder's life and who worship the gods, the teacher and the fire.[1]

There is, moreover, no ambiguity, as there is in Vedajñāna's views, concerning the status of the teacher. What matters is that he should have the power to perform the Kaula initiation. Pierced by power of awakened consciousness, he possesses the spiritual power of speaking in many tongues.[2] Presumably, his possession of this power implies that not all his disciples knew Sanskrit and that he could make use of his command over other languages to enlighten them. Moreover, he must experience the higher states of Kaula Yoga and be able to transmit them. He is then a true Brahmin – not by virtue of his birth, but by his spiritual state. He is a Kaula Brahmin: although he possesses all the qualities of a Brahmin, he knows how to handle – for ritual purposes – the normally defiling substances produced by the body:

> Again, the one who pierces the mind (cittavedha) (with the energy of grace) is a (true) teacher. He should awaken the unawakened to the Kula scripture (grantha) by means of good languages (subhāṣā). The one who can explain the (yogic states known as) 'Established in the Body' (piṇḍastha), 'Established on the Plane' (padastha) and the procedure (krama) related to (the ritual offering) of bodily substances – what is supreme, subtle and gross – is a (true) teacher. (Caste is) no consideration, (whatever he be,) starting from a Brahmin to an outcaste. Indeed, the teacher is one whose action (kriyā) (ritual and yogic) is such is said to be a Brahmin (vipra – regardless of his caste).[3]

The fire offering of the Vidyā is enjoined as the regular (daily) practice (sadācāra) for householders. One should make a fire offering, purified with liquor, to the image (mūrti) on the southern side of the Krama (maṇḍala) along with oleanders, white Arkas and (other) beautiful white flowers. KuKh 34/97-98ab.

[1] KuKh 34/3.

[2] Divine awakened consciousness is that which (causes one to) speak Sanskrit, Prākṛit and the nasal (sounding) Apabhraṁśa by virtue of the piercing of consciousness (that takes place inwardly).

saṁskṛtāṁ prākṛtāṁ bhāṣām apabhraṁsānunāsikam ||
jalpate bodhavedhena divyabodhaḥ sa ucyate | ṢSS 20/8cd-9ab.

[3] athavā cittavedhaṁ tu [k kh: -vidhastu] yaḥ karoti gurus tu saḥ ||

Clearly, despite Kaula antinomianism with respect to mainstream, Brahminical ideals, the householder lifestyle and the ideal moral and spiritual qualities of the Brahmin continue to be considered to be the supreme paradigms of spiritual conduct. Thus the contrast generally assumed to exist between the non-Brahminical Kaula Tantric and his smārta-cum-vedika counterpart is denied in our sources, even as the excellence of the Brahmin's status is maintained. The ideal Kaula teacher is here presented as one who, observing the strictures of commensality imposed on a Brahmin and his ritual purity by regular ablutions, shares in the Brahmin's 'exoteric' state, regardless of his caste. The teacher must be a Brahmin in this sense, as the Brahmin alone is empowered to perform the essential initiatory and other rites, even though they are Kaula. The most important and fundamental of these is the piercing of his disciple with consciousness. This sets him on a quasi-shamanic journey through the spheres of the universe in and outside the body. The Brahmin is one who 'shakes' with the intense energy of possession. Kaula initiation, which takes place by an intense penetration of spiritual energy (āveśa) that pierces through the mind and subtle body, causes the disciple who is being initiated to shake like someone possessed. In this way, in a different milieu closer to the folk, tribal, and shamanic roots of India's indigenous non-Brahminical culture, the Kaula teacher, whatever his caste, emulates the Vedic Brahmin who also shook inebriated by the sacrificial Soma. Moreover, he transmits this ecstasy ('going out' of the body and ego etc.) to his disciple. As the possessor of power, he can also practice magic, but at the same time, he has all the 'exoteric' qualities of the good householder. The ṢSS teaches:

> (The true teacher is dedicated to) truthfulness, ritual purity and cleanliness (saucya), compassion, and forbearance; he unites with his wife when it is her season, not out of passion, but for a son for the benefit of (his) clan and lineage. He practices the six magical rites, bathes (regularly) and worships at the three times of day. He avoids the Śūdra and the low caste as well as (accepting food from others), whether cooked or raw. One who is endowed with such qualities is a Brahmin (vipra), not by caste or by virtue of (his) sacred thread (and the like). These are the qualities of a (true) Brahmin. He who possesses them is a (true) teacher. Moreover, he removes error, and he reveals the meaning of the kulagranthe subhāṣābhir aprabuddhaṁ [k kh: ku-] prabodhayet |

---

piṇḍasthaṁ ca padasthaṁ ca kāyadravyagataṁ kramam ||
paraṁ sūkṣmaṁ tathā sthūlaṁ yaḥ kathet tu gurus tu saḥ |
dvijādisvapacāntasya īdṛśī na vicāraṇā ||
atha vipro guruḥ prokto yasyāsti cedṛśī kriyā | ṢSS 20/9cd-12ab.

> Kula scripture. Previously consecrated, (such a one) should always be made (one's) teacher.[1]

We may pause here to note that the impelling concern here that the aspirant should have as his teacher a 'true', i.e. Kaula, Brahmin is evidence that these Tantras were produced, in part at least, by Brahmin householders. Specifically we notice that chapter 20 of the ṢSS, of which these passages are a part, does not have a counterpart in the KMT. It is likely that this chapter at least – if not most or all of the ṢSS – was redacted one or more Kaula Brahmin householders who, in the spirit of their purely smārta counterparts, promote the excellence of the Brahmin and, as Kaulas, maintain that his status is not just a matter of birth.

Moreover, the absence of any but incidental concern in the KMT itself with these matters, although it too caters for the householder, may be seen as a shift towards a greater degree of involvement with Brahminical concerns. Conversely, we find that the YKh of the MBT shifts the focus of attention to another figure that serves as a means of integrating the ideals of the renouncer and the householder, namely, the yogi. The broad, essentially Tantric category that accommodates all these typologies is the Siddha.[2] Kaula Siddhas generally have consorts. Although they are considered to be partners in the Siddhas' Kaula practice and, not their wives, even so in this context we may understand this to be another strategy to overcome the extreme polarization of the two conditions of the householder and the renouncer and another example of a third condition between the two. The divine models, of Śiva and Śakti are, after all, married even though Śiva is also the archetype of the Śaiva ascetic. The Kaula understands this to be not only a sanction of the sacrality of marriage, but especially exemplary of his Kaula practice, the essence of which is purification through the rise of Kuṇḍalinī brought about by the power of the descent of grace that takes place when the Siddha unites with his consort or at any other time, in any condition.

It is worth pausing for a moment to see how the Kubjikā Tantras present the ideal model of the Kaula practitioner. Were it not for the antinomies in his

---

[1] satyaṁ śaucaṁ dayā kṣānti ṛtukāle gamāgamaḥ ||
putrārthī na ca kāmārthī gotrasantatihetave [k: -saṁpati-] |
ṣaṭkarmacaraṇaṁ snānaṁ trisandhyāvandanaṁ tathā [k, kh: smṛtam] ||
śūdrāntavarjanaṁ caiva pakvaṁ cāpakvam eva ca |
īdṛgguṇayuto vipro na jātyā copavītakaiḥ ||
brāhmaṇasya guṇā hy ete yasya tiṣṭhanty asau guruḥ | athavā bhrāntihartā ca kulaśāstrārthadarśakaḥ ||
pūrvābhiṣecitaḥ [k kh: -te] so hi kartavyas tu guruḥ sadā | ṢSS 20/12cd-16ab.

[2] White has written extensively about the history and varieties of Siddhas. The reader is referred to his excellent studies for a broad, comparative and rich presentation of the figure of the Siddha in a wide range of Tantric and other traditions. See especially White 1996 and 2003.

ritual observance, there would hardly be any need to stress that he must be a moral person in the commonly accepted sense of the word. But while most of his moral qualities are universal and predictable, amongst them are those that are best cultivated by the renouncer. The renouncer's poverty, his humility and his freedom from worldly desires remain, at least in the Indian mind, inexorably exemplary, whatever a person's status and condition. The MBT explains that:

> (A true practitioner) is a hero (vīra) who exerts himself and is courageous. He is content, devoted to the teacher, not greedy, compassionate, industrious, self-controlled, of good appearance, sāttvika, deep, all his limbs are intact (and) active, he knows (true) devotion and the scriptures and crosses over into (higher) realities. He is devoted to the transmission which is free of thought (nirvikalpakrama), he eats what he has begged and is desireless. He is always content and is loved by the Yoginīs. He is free of attachment, aversion and ego. He is loved by his (spiritual) clan (svagotra). He is wise and he observes the Rules. He is the joy of those who are devoted to him and always does what he promises to do. He who has these characteristics is an accomplished soul (siddha) (already) in his previous life. Otherwise he is not a Siddha and his tradition is not Kaula.[1]

The MBT goes on to describe the signs of one who is not a Siddha:

> He is excessively tall, bald, deformed, short, dwarfish, his nose is ugly or he has black teeth and is wrathful. Some of his limbs are missing and is deceitful, cripple and deformed, foolish, inauspicious, envious, deluded, badly behaved, and violent; without any teacher, he is devoid of the rites, he maligns the Krama without cause, he is not

---

[1] udyamī [k, kh, gh: udyamaṁ] sāhasī [k, kh, gh: sāhasaṁ] vīraḥ [k, kh, gh: vīraṁḥ | ]
prasanno [k, kh, gh: prasannaṁ] gurubhaktakaḥ [k, kh, gh: kaṁ] ||
nirlobhī ca [k, kh, gh: nilobhaśca] kṛpāluś ca vyavasāyī jitendriyaḥ | sumūrtiḥ [k: mūmurtiḥ; kh: sūmūrtiḥ; gh: sūmurtiḥ] sātviko dhīraḥ [gh: vīraḥ] sarvāvayavasaṁyutaḥ ||
kriyāvantas [k, kh, gh: kriyāvaṁto] tathā bhaktiśāstrajñas tattvavikramī |
nirvikalpakrame bhaktaḥ bhikṣāsī vigataspṛhaḥ ||
sarvadā sukhasaṁtuṣṭo [k, kh: sukhaṁ] yoginījanavatsalaḥ |
rāgadveṣavinirmuktaḥ ahaṁkāravivarjitaḥ ||
svagotravatsalaḥ prājñaḥ samayānāṁ pratipālakaḥ |
pratipannajanānandaḥ [kh: pratipannaḥ-] pratijñārūḍhakṛt sadā ||
īdṛśaṁ lakṣaṇaṁ yasya sa [k, kh, gh: si] śiddhaḥ pūrvajanmani [k, kh, gh: -niḥ] |
anyathā na bhavet siddhaḥ saṁpradāyaṁ na kaulikam || YKh (1) 4/45-50.

devoted to the Siddhas, he (always) suffers and is without wisdom. He is (always) ill and one should know that he is (always) attached (to worldly objects) and has no scripture. He has no energy and is dull and lazy. Ugly, he lives by cheating and, cruel, he is deluded, and devoid of (any) sense of reality. Such is the characteristic of one who is not accomplished (asiddha) in a past life.[1]

Concerning the Siddha the MBT goes on to say:

His heart is uplifted and his nose and the rest (of his face) is well balanced. The sign of one who is well accomplished is that he is well behaved (śrīmat) and he produces abundance. His foot is upraised and his thighs are broad, the forehead is well balanced. He is accomplished from a previous life (pūrvasiddha) and is Bhairava. His navel has three creases. His penis is small and auspicious (sulakṣaṇa). His body is straight and well proportioned. Such a one is accomplished from a previous life (pūrvasiddha) in the western (tradition). His nails are well proportioned and red. His hands bear the marks of elevation and his eyes are red. Such is an accomplished one in the previous lineage. His face is like a lotus and his hair is (tied up in a knot in the) foreign style (barbara). One who is such and is equal in pleasure and pain is part of the Siddha lineage.[2]

---

[1] atidīrgho 'tha [all MSs: dīrghātha] khalvāṭo [k, gh: khatvāṭo] vikṛto hrasvavāmanaḥ [all MSs: krasva-] ||
kunakhaḥ śyāmadanto [all MSs: syāma-] vā krodhī hīnāṅgacumbakaḥ [all MSs: -caṁvakaḥ] |
vikalo vikṛtas tathā prajñāhīno 'śivas [all MSs: -śavas] tathā ||
māyāmatsaryaduḥśīlo [k, kh: -matsaraduḥ-; gh: -matsaraḍaśīlo] hiṁsako [k, gh: -kāṁ] guruvarjitaḥ |
kriyākāṇḍavinirmukto ahetukramadūṣakaḥ [all MSs: addheto-] ||
siddhavarge abhaktaś ca duḥkhī [k, gh: dukhaḥ; kh: dukha] prajñāvivarjitaḥ [k: mārjāvavarjitā; kh, gh: mārjāva-] |
vyādhī tathāviraktaś ca vijñeyaḥ [k, kh: viṣajñaḥ; gh: vijñayaḥ] śāstravarjitaḥ [kh: śāstri-] ||
tejahīno jaḍo 'lasyo [all MSs: jaḍālasyoḥ] virūpaḥ śaṭhavītakaḥ |
nighṛno mohasaṁpannas tattvabhāvavivarjitaḥ ||
īdṛśaṁ lakṣaṇaṁ yasya asiddhaḥ pūrvajanmani [all MSs: -niḥ] | YKh (1) 4/51cd-56ab.

[2] hṛdayaṁ [all MSs: hyadayaṁ] unnataṁ yasya nāsādyaṁ susamaṁ bhavet ||
kurvan [all MSs: -t] supuṣkalaṁ śrīmān susiddhasya ca lakṣaṇam |
pādaṁ ca unnataṁ yasya vistīrṇajaṅghanasthānam [all MSs: vistīrṇaṁjaghastha-] ||
lalāṭaṁ susamaṁ yasya pūrvasiddhaḥ sa bhairavaḥ | trivalī yasya nābhis tu śiśnaṁ [all MSs: sisanaṁ] hrasvaṁ sulakṣaṇam [k: sūlaṇaṁ; kh: sulaṇaṁ; gh: sūlakṣaṇaṁ] ||
ṛjupuṣṭisamākāraḥ [all MSs: -ro] pūrvasiddhaḥ sa paścime |
nakhāś ca susamā raktā hastau connatalakṣaṇau [k, kh: -ṇo; gh: cottalakṣaṇo] ||

There is (an auspicious) line on his foot and (the lines) on his hand (are shaped) like an auspicious lotus. His shoulders are equal as are (his) teeth; his neck and breasts are upraised. Or else he may be bent over (kubjākāra). Such a one is part of the Siddha lineage. (His) thigh is (strong as if) issuing from a wheel and he has a faint auspicious line of hair (on his belly). His gait is playful and his body well proportioned. Such is the mark of a Siddha. . . . .[1]

(Such a man) does not feel fear (even if) there is terrible cold or heat outside or he suffers a bad accident. He is very intelligent (atimedhāvin) and his accomplishment is close at hand. He is not greedy or sick and is forbearing. (His) urine is good and sweet smelling and (he passes) little stool. (He possesses) a serene beauty and the first sign of success in Yoga (that he displays) is its fine profundity. * ? and (instead of criticizing, he) praises the good qualities (of people) when they are out of sight.

The most excellent characteristic of a Siddha is that he does not fear living beings (sattva). He observes the fivefold Yoga of the beginning, continuity and fulfilment, the innate and the one born from universal being; he sees the omnipresent universe.[2]

---

raktau tu locanau yasya sa siddhaḥ [all MSs: taṁ siddhaṁ] pūrvasantatau |
keśāś ca barbarā yasya mukhaṁ padmopamaṁ [k, gh: -saṁ] sadā ||
sukhaduḥkhasamaś caiva [all MSs: sukhaṁduḥkhamayasyaiva] sa bhavet siddhasantatau |
YKh (1) 4/56cd-61ab.

[1] pāde yasya bhaved rekhā abjam eva kare [all MSs: abdevata karau] śubham || [gh: missing]
samaskandhas [all MSs: samaskaṁdhos] tathā danto [k, kh: dantā] grīvonnatapayodharau [k, kh: grīvoṁtatapayaudharau] | [gh: missing]
kubjākāro [k, kh: kajākārā] 'thavā yasya sa bhavet siddhasantatau || [gh: missing]
vakrajaṁ [k, kh: krūkra; gh: missing] jaṅghanaṁ [k, kh: jaṁgheghane; gh: missing] yasya [gh: missing] īṣadromāvalī [all MSs: -vaṇī] śubhā |
līlāgatiḥ [all MSs: -gati] samaṁ kāyaṁ [gh: kārya] siddhalakṣaṇam [kh: siddhaṁ-] īdṛśam ||
YKh (1) 4/61cd-63.

[2] śītoṣṇabahiratyugre [k, gh: śrītosravahiratyugre; kh: śrī-] yasya [all MSs: yaṁsya] durghāto [all MSs: dhādhāta] jāyate |
na bheti cātimedhāvī [all MSs: vāti-] tasya siddhir upasthitā [all MSs: tāḥ] ||
*alolyam arogyaṁ suniṣṭuratvaṁ [k, kh, gh: -mārojñasuniṣṭuratvaṁ] sugandhaṁ [k, kh, gh: * gaṁdhaḥ + sūbho] sumūtraṁ [k, kh, gh: * mūtraṁ] purīṣam alpam* |
kāntiprasādaś [k, gh: kātri-; kh: kānni-] ca susaumyatā ca yogasya [k, kh, gh: yogaḥsva] siddheḥ [k, gh: vṛṁte; kh: vṛtaṁ] prathamaṁ [gh: -me] hi [k, kh: hiṁ] cihnam ||
anurāgañjane jāti (?) parokṣe [k, kh: parokṣai; gh: -kṣa] guṇakīrtanam [k: -kīrtitaṁ; kh: -kīrtinaṁ; gh: guṇakīrtitaṁḥ] |
na vibheti ca satvānāṁ siddhalakṣaṇam uttamam ||
ārambhagatiniṣpannaṁ [all MSs: -ghaṭanisphanti] sahajaṁ viśvabhāvajam [k, gh: visva-; kh: nisva-] |

Another way the polarities we are examining can be reconciled is in the figure of the ideal yogi. In accord with a common triadic classification we examined in the previous chapter, yogis are of three types: Śāmbhava, Śākta and Āṇava, consonant with their states, the highest of which is the Śāmbhava one who lives the liberated life.[1] Although he is a peripatetic renouncer, he is also a householder. The openness towards the lowest type of yogi with respect to his caste implies that he is still, at times at least, part of caste-based society. The 'eight Houses of Kula' where the Mothers (mātṛkā) reside[2] are the stations of the pilgrimage he undertakes as part of the vow we shall describe further ahead. While the liberated Śāmbhava yogi is in the ideal condition in which he is at once householder and renouncer, the Āṇava yogi alternates between the two. Thus of the three, the Śākta yogi appears to be the one who is most unambiguously the renouncer. Although, in the following passage, the difference between these three types is not well defined, the point is well made that the sincere, practicing initiate is a yogi, irrespective of his caste or condition, whether that of a householder or renouncer. Moreover, the goal he attains is mystic flight – a condition that is eminently yogic.

> (The Śāmbhava yogi) has the authority (to perform the rites), knows the scripture and has a consort (sapatnīka). He practices secretly (guptācāra) and is always a renouncer (tyāgin). (Being) a householder, he observes the Rule. Solitary, he has a wife (sapatnīka) and, well hidden, he eats the sacrificial pap (caruka). One who has abandoned strife, (being) tranquil and austere, he attains (the liberated state of) the Skyfarer. He has obtained initiation and, consecrated, he desires success (siddhi) in mantra. The observance of the teacher's dictates is his vow. He resides in a mountain cave. Having established his space (kṣetra), he fasts and eats roots and bulbs. He is a regular initiate (samayin) and eats what he has begged from houses. He is a yogi who lives in the forest. Free of duality and craving, he is intent on practicing Yoga at night. Free of being and non-being, he is wrapped in an old blanket. At the end of the day he should wander around in search of alms and eat the divine sacrificial pap (caru). He is free of rebirth (gamāgama lit. 'coming and going') and has severed (the bonds of) doubt. All the universe consisting of (the triple impurity, namely) innate (mala), Karma and Māyā is all Māyā (i.e.

---

pañcadhā rakṣayed [gh: -yad] yogaṁ sarvagaṁ paśyate [all MSs: pasyate] jagat [all MSs: jagaṁ] || YKh (1) 4/65-68.

[1] These three types may not necessarily be arranged in a hierarchy.

[2] See below, p. 540-541.

false). It is said that everything should be abandoned. This is the meditation of those who desire (spiritual) fruit. (A yogi who practices this way) is naked (digambara), eats (the food he) begs and avoids the company of the fettered. He considers himself and others equally. (Such a one) is said to be a Śāmbhava yogi.[1]

Free of duality, egoless, free of craving, he awakens the body (of mantra) (piṇḍabodhaka). He is well conjoined (sannadha) to the transmission (krama) of the intense (form of the) Command (tīvrājñā). He carries a patchwork quilt and (wears) cotton. Always intent on wandering at night, he is said to be a Śāktayogin.[2]

Intent on the practice of mantras, he wears ochre clothes. He wanders in search of alms amongst Brahmins and others in the group of eight Houses born of Kula. Craving the practice of accomplishments (siddhisādhana), he is the Āṇava yogi.[3]

---

[1] sādhikāraḥ [gh: -raṁḥ] sapatnīkaḥ [ṅ: -ka] śāstrajñas tattvavikramī [gh: -mīṁ] । guptācāraḥ sadā tyāgī gṛhasthaḥ [k, kh, gh: gṛgāḥ] samayasthitaḥ ॥ ekāntasthaḥ [k, kh, gh: ekāta-] saptnīkaḥ suguptaḥ [ṅ: suguptaś] carukāśinaḥ [k, kh, gh: carukāsānaḥ; ṅ: -sanaḥ] । saṁtyaktavigrahaḥ [all MSs: -ktānugrahaḥ] śāntas tapasvī [all MSs: tālavī] khecaraṁ vrajet ॥
*labdhadīkṣābhiṣiktaś [ṅ: taccadīkṣābhi * ktaś] ca mantrasiddhisamīhakaḥ [ṅ: -ka]* । *gurūktavratavān [k, kh, gh: guruktavratavat; ṅ: -vat] tiṣṭhet [all MSs: tiṣṭa] saṁsthito [k, gh, ṅ: -tā; kh: saṁsthi ?] girigahvare [k, kh, gh: -ro] ॥ *kṣetraṁ badhvā [gh: -dhva] jitāhāraḥ kandamūlāśanaḥ [k, kh, gh: -sanaḥ; ṅ: -mūla * naḥ] sadā* । samayī [k, kh, ṅ: sāmayī; gh: sāmamayī] gṛhabhikṣāśī [ṅ: -sī] vanavāsī ca yoginaḥ ॥ nirdvandvī [k, kh, gh: nirddado; ṅ: nirdvaṁdo] niḥspṛhī [all MSs: nispṛhaḥ] śānto [k, gh: śāṁtā] niśāyāṁ yogatatparaḥ । *bhāvābhāvavinirmukto [k: -muktā; gh: -bhāva * nirmuktā] jīrṇakanthāvaguṇṭhitaḥ [k, gh: -guṭhataḥ; kh: -guṭhitaḥ; ṅ: -kaṁyāva-]* ॥ *dinānte [k: ditāṁte; gh: ditāte] paryated [k: paryad; kh, ṅ: paryaṭed; gh: parya d] bhikṣāṁ sudivyacarukāśinaḥ [k, kh, gh: adivyacarukāsinaḥ; ṅ: adivyacarukāśanaḥ] । gamāgamavinirmuktaḥ [gh: -nimuktaṁḥ; ṅ: samā-] sa [all MSs: saṁ] yogī chinnasaṁśayaḥ ॥ malaṁ karma [k, gh: kārmma] ca māyā ca māyeyam akhilaṁ [ṅ: māyemaya khilaṁ] jagat । sarvaṁ [all MSs: sarvva] heyam [k, kh, gh: hayam] iti proktaṁ etat dhyānaṁ [k, kh, gh: yahvaṁ; ṅ: ṣaṭkaṁ] phalārthinām ॥ paśusaṁgavinirmukto [k, gh: -ktā] bhikṣāśī [k, kh, gh: -sī] ca digambaraḥ । svaparatraikasanniṣṭaḥ [k, kh, gh: -ṣṭa; ṅ: -katat tiṣṭhaḥ] sa [ṅ: saṁ] yogī śāmbhavaḥ [k, kh: sāṁbhavaḥ; gh: -va] smṛtaḥ ॥ YKh (1) 25/115-122.

[2] nirdvandvo [k, kh: nirddaṁdo; gh: nirdaḍo; ṅ: nirdvaṁndo] nirahaṁkāro nirāśī [k, kh, gh: nirāśā] piṇḍabodhakaḥ । *tīvrājñākramasannaddhaḥ [ṅ: -ddha] kanthākarpāsadhārinaḥ [k, kh: -karpya*dhāri*ḥ; gh: -karpa * dhāri * ḥ; ṅ: kuṁthākarpyaradhā-]* ॥ niśāṭanarato [k, kh, gh: niśāyāṁṭarato; ṅ: niḥ-] nityaṁ śāktayogī sa ucyate ।
YKh (1) 25/123-124ab.

[3] *mantrānuṣṭhānanirataḥ [gh: -nutrānanirataḥ] kāṣāyavastradhāriṇaḥ [ṅ: -dhāri ] ॥

As a yogi, the initiate may assume different personas. In some places he is a learned householder scholar, in others a renouncer.[1] Instead of leading the wandering life and going on pilgrimage to sacred sites, the adept should practice Yoga.[2] This injunction clearly indicates that it is better to stay in one place as a householder, or resident renouncer who may live in a Śaiva temple or even a brothel (!).[3] Although both the wandering life of the solitary ascetic[4] and pilgrimage to the sacred seats[5] are prescribed, householders can reproduce them in their own homes.

The country, the city, or house that has a copy of the Tantra, which only the initiate is entitled to possess, becomes a sacred site.[6] Even more conveniently, all the sacred sites may simply be imagined in the body, in the vital breath or even directly in consciousness. It is equally essential for the renouncer as it is for the householder to experience the inner development of his spiritual energy and the pervasive presence of the deity (vyāpti). The householder who experiences this can tread the solitary path of the wandering ascetic in his own home.[7] He must simply take care to set aside a place for his practice there where he is alone to become like him – a solitary renouncer. Thus he may internalise that lifestyle to participate in the inner, yogic (or one could say mystical) experience of the renouncer while remaining a householder. Or, indeed, he may do so as a renouncer. Either way, the model of dvijādau paryaṭed [k, kh, gh: -ṭid] bhikṣāṁ gṛhāṣṭakaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -ka] kulodbhavam [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -vāṁ] |

---

āṇavaḥ [k: ānave; ṅ: āṇave] sa bhaved [ṅ: bhave] yogī [gh: yogīṁ] siddhisādhanakāṁkṣiṇaḥ [ṅ: siddha-] || YKh (1) 25/124cd-125.

[1] KuKh 37/24cd-25ab; cf. ṢSS 41/28cd-29ab.
[2] KuKh 37/65.
[3] KuKh 37/43.
[4] KuKh 37/53cd-56.
[5] KuKh 6/192cd-193ab ff..
[6] KMT 25/192cd-194ab.
[7] In the Ambāmatasaṁhitā we read:

Washing first (his) food with water, he should eat it with the left hand. Maintaining the vow of purity (śuci) and silence, (he should remains) concentrated and content. All the food he has earned is the sacrificial pap (caruka) he eats. The pervasion (vyāpti) (of the deity) and success in the repetition of mantra (japasiddhi) arise due to that. This should be done in one's own home or in a secluded place where there are no other people. Otherwise, the householder should not do it.

āhāraṁ vāriṇā kṣālya vāmahastena bhakṣayet |
śucir maunavrataṁ kṛtvā ekacittaḥ prasannadhīḥ ||
*carukaṁ prāśyate [jāyate] sarvaṁ tenāhāraṁ [tena * raṁ] yathārjitam* |
etasmāt kāraṇād vyāptir japasiddhiḥ pravartate ||
svagṛhe ca prakartavyaṁ ekānte vijane 'pare |
athavā tu na kartavyo gṛhasthena yatas tathā || AS 18/119-121.

the inner, liberated life with its rich variety of mystical experience remains that of the life, both outer and inner, of the renouncer.

The attainment of yogic and magical accomplishments – siddhis – and the rest depends on the performance of outer practices that householders are not fit for. Particularly important is pilgrimage to sacred places. The original model for the adept is that of the renunciant yogi; even so, the lists of followers of this tradition, whether imaginary or not, clearly indicate that people of all castes (including women) were initiated. The Brahmin (presumably householder) initiate received the same name (ending with -ānanda) as did the outcaste. The relative importance of the renunciant with respect to the householder also seems to have eroded away. Thus, in another part of the MBT, the householder is exalted rather than the renunciant and the teachings are declared to be specifically for him. Internalisation of the ritual and prescribed mode of behaviour and dress was the standard manner in which Kaula cults like that of Kubjikā were domesticated. At present in the Kathmandu Valley, which is the only place where it has survived, it is entirely a cult for householders. There is evidence that this was not originally the case, but has probably been so for several centuries[1] mirroring the situation in Kashmir in the 10th and 11th centuries.[2]

Some scholars have stressed that Tantric cults as a whole, and especially those of the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras, focus much of their attention on the acquisition of magical and yogic powers – siddhis. The assiduous repetition of mantras, in conjunction with the performance of rites in powerful places, is certainly intended for such goals. But these are not the only ones. Indeed, we can grade cults and their practices in terms of the degree to which they are concerned with this. The form of Trika Śaivism that developed in the hands of Kashmir exegetes, for example, has virtually expurgated such goals from their program. Their link with the original form of the cults that they have assimilated into their synthesis, which were considerably concerned with magic, exorcism and yogic power, is maintained by understanding the alternative goal of liberation as the supreme yogic and magical accomplishment – parasiddhi. This approach is reflected in their scriptural sources that not infrequently posit a gradation of siddhis – up to that of the attainment of spiritual freedom. Moreover, even the least domesticated cults, such as the strongly 'Kāpālika' oriented one of the BY, always maintain a fundamental grounding in the essential initiatory and other rites and, therefore the principles they imply, most clearly presented by the Siddhānta. There the distinction is consistently maintained between aspirants for worldly benefits (bhoga) and those who seek liberation (mokṣa). A feature of Kaula traditions is that they also sought to integrate in their own way these goals. Moreover, this item on their agenda became more pronounced in the course of their development. Amongst them we can say, broadly speaking, is Kashmiri Śaivism. Here we witness the acme of this development. The goal here is liberation, albeit enriched with the concomitant attainment of all the other goals. The stress is so emphatic that, in order to preclude all possible ambiguities, the Yoginīs and other beings who are guardians and dispensers of magical powers in the source traditions of Kashmiri Śaivism are virtually ignored along with the magical rites they render fruitful. At the same time, however, the distinctive 'antinomian' character of the underlying perspective with respect to the schools with Upaniṣadic and Vedic roots was maintained by a positive valuation of the world and the activity of the senses engaged in perception as a means to liberation. Sanderson, referring collectively to these cults as those of the Tantras of the Vidyāpīṭha,[1] succinctly explains the situation:

[1] See Dyczkowski 2004: 231.
[2] See Sanderson 1988: 202-203.

> The Yoginī cult, like the main cults of the Vidyāpīṭha, was the speciality of skull-bearing ascetics removed from conventional society. It might reasonably have been expected to remain so but for Kaulism. This movement within esoteric Śaivism decontaminated the mysticism of the Kāpālikas so that it flowed into the wider community of married householders. In that of Kashmir it found exponents who used it to formulate a respectable metaphysics and soteriology with which to stand against the Śaiva Siddhānta.[2]

While the Kaula Tantras of the Kubjikā cult are not as 'extreme' as those of the BY, which espoused the 'mysticism of the Kāpālikas', they stopped short of such extensive reforms. They maintained the Yoginī cults and even the concern with the attainment of magical and yogic powers. However, we witness a strong general tendency towards higher soteriological concerns. This works itself out in increasing degrees and in various ways as the tradition developed in the individual scriptures. From this perspective one could say, for example, that the Kumārikā-khaṇḍa of the MBT is more developed that the Yogakhaṇḍa, its predecessor. The distinction drawn between the attainment of worldly gains and liberation is strongly emphasized in the KuKh and the latter is unambiguously the ultimate goal. Indeed, the gap between them is written into the structure of reality itself. Thus we read in the KuKh:

> The aggregate (kula) consisting of the twenty-four (principles) is under the sway of Dharma, passion (kāma) and worldly gain (artha). It dissolves into the fourth goal of life (varga), which is liberation and the vessel of the sacrificial oblation (iḍā).[3]

---

[1] Concerning this classification, see Dyczkowski 1988: 49ff and the first part of the following chapter.
[2] Sanderson 1988: 679.
[3] KuKh 13/40.

To state its case, the KuKh does not shy away from relating its doctrines to those of its 'Vedic orthodox' Brahminical counterparts. Indeed, the four so-called goals of life (caturvarga, puruṣārtha) are the mainstay of the theoretical system of values of brahminical orthodoxy. Biardeau explains: '. . . there is a single hierarchy of four terms which everybody knows by heart and must respect: liberation – mokṣa – at the very top, then dharma, the socio-cosmic order which organizes the empirical world, followed by artha, which includes all material interests – wealth, successful ventures and the means of ensuring them – and finally kāma, essentially amorous desire and pleasure. [. . .] But we already know that the four cannot be arranged in a series, since mokṣa concerns the man who is leaving society whereas the other three are the goals pursued by man living in the world.'[1]

However, although our text does distinguish between liberation and the remaining three, this distinction is not sustained by a radical, ontological gap between these polarities as would appear from the above reference. Śiva's liberated condition is not compromised by his presence within the principles below him,[2] and the liberated yogi is like him. He lives his last life in the liberated state of perfect detachment.[3] When impurity has been removed by grace, all that remains is the body[4] which is now pure,[5] free, as Śiva's body is, of the subtle form of it that transmigrates.[6] This, then, is liberation in this life.[7] The social status or condition of the person who attains this state is not relevant. Just as caste status should be of no consideration, the condition of the person in his last, liberated life, whether that of a householder or renouncer, is irrelevant from the essentially monistic perspective of Kaula doctrine. Reality is the very 'non-being' or absence of such distinctions that arise only because of false ego-based notions. This doctrine and more that relates to this matter was taught originally in the TS from which the KuKh draws several chapters. There we read:

> The mark is mental (manobhava) and meditation consists of thought, O god; everything is (eventually) destroyed, (so) one should realise that: 'I am not'. Those who are intent on non-dual action (realise that): 'I am not, nor is there anything else.' (Such a one) does not think: 'I am liberated'. Nor is he ever bound. One should abandon the (last) trace of ignorance (which induces one to think): 'I am

[1] Biardeau 1989: 41.
[2] KuKh 13/30-31.
[3] KuKh 13/44.
[4] KuKh 13/23-24ab.
[5] KuKh 13/27cd-28.
[6] KuKh 13/5cd-6.
[7] KuKh 13/29.

> performing the vow (of a renouncer)', or '(I am) a householder'. Nor should he think: 'I am a Brahmin' or '(I belong) to the lowest caste', (or even) '(I am) the deity'. The mark of one who is well merged (in the supreme reality) is not that (he is) a youth, old man or a child. He does not think: 'I am in heaven', or '(I am) in the emptiness of hell'. The mark of one who is well merged (in the supreme reality) (is the realisation that): 'I am not, nor does this exist'. He is neither a yogi (lit. 'one who is conjoined') nor is he disconnected (from Yoga) (viyogin). He wishes for nothing (he does not have) and is detached (from what he possesses). The mark of one who is well merged (in the supreme reality) is that he is omniscient and egoless. One who is omniscient thinks: 'I am not. (I am) not a fool nor (am I a great) scholar'. Until he does not abandon (everything) in this way, he has nothing. The feeling that 'I am' is always bound within the three qualities. Until he does not abandon (this egoity) he will (always) be bound. He for whom pleasure and pain, friend and foe, auspicious and inauspicious are equal is certainly free from the bondage of rebirth.[1]

So now we have covered a range of possibilities from the affirmation at a higher level of the Brahminical ideal in the figure of the Kaula initiate as a Kaula Brahmin, to the ultimate denial of all distinctions in a world which, although monistic Śaiva, is clearly influenced by a reified understanding of the Buddhist negation of the ego and all that it entails. We have thus cleared the way for another possibility, which is simply to cut through the problem by denying its ultimate necessity and ineluctable permanence. The householder may live the life of the renunciant periodically by observing the same vows. We have seen that the most orthodox Vedic culture allowed for this possibility. The observance of vows formed a part of the Vedic ritual order and continued down into the smārta tradition, in the form of the penances (prāyaścitta) it prescribes.

The natural correlate of the āśrama and caturvarga systems, sustained as they are in the Brahminical law books (dharmaśāstra), is caste – varṇa. Accordingly, the two are commonly considered together. The varṇāśrama system is naturally subverted by the renouncers who belong to non-Brahminical sects. In places (but not consistently), the Purāṇas criticize Śaiva sects for being subversive in this way of the orthodox smārta ordering of society and, by implication, contesting the authority of the Vedas. From this point of view, to be a nāstika – 'non-believer' or 'atheist' – and one who does not follow the varṇāśrama is virtually synonymous. It does not just mean being a Buddhist or a Jaina. But this did not bother some branches at least, of the Pāśupata, the oldest, specifically identifiable Śaiva sect.

[1] KuKh 41/8-16ab.

Thus one version of the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice found in the Mahābhārata presents Śiva in his older form as Rudra who declares:

> I, Rudra, for the first time created the mysterious religion of the Pāśupata, beneficent to all, facing all directions, one that can take years or even only ten days to master, one which although censored by the foolish because it is opposed to the order of the rules of caste and stages of life (varṇāśramadharma), is nevertheless appreciated by those of perfected wisdom (gatānta) and is in fact superior to it.[1]

The Mahābhārata refers to the Pāśupata as one of four doctrinal systems (jñāna) along with the Sāṁkhya-Yoga, Pāñcarātra and the Veda.[2] This implies that the first three systems were distinct from the Veda. The Kūrmapūrāṇa lists the following sects as non-Vedic: Kāpāla, Lākula, Vāma, Bhairava, Pūrva, Paścimam, Pāñcarātra, and Pāśupata.[3] The Lākula are a branch of the Pāśupata who were closer to the most extremely antinomian sect – the Kāpāla. Concerning Vāma and Bhairava, the reader is referred to an earlier publication.[4] Note the two, Pūrva and Paścima. This pair is well attested, as we have seen in the KMT. The latter is the Kubjikā cult and the former the Kaulism of the earlier (pūrva) tradition. The scant degree in which the Kubjikā cult, like all the early Śaiva Āgamic and Kaula cults, aligns itself with the Vedic tradition is discussed elsewhere. Here we note that the same Kūrmapūrāṇa and distinguishes between two types of Pāśupatas – Vedic (śrauta) and non-Vedic (aśrauta).[5] Presumably the latter was the form of it taught in the Āgamas.

---

[1] MBh 12/285/194-195, quoted in Hopkins 1978: 114-115.
[2] MBh 12/350/64, quoted in Hopkins 1978: 96.
[3] kāpālaṁ lākulaṁ vāmaṁ bhairavaṁ pūrvaṁ paścimam |
pāñcarātraṁ pāśupataṁ tathānyāni sahasraśaḥ || KūPu chapter 16 quoted in Taylor 2001: 254.
[4] See Dyczkowski 1988: 38-39; 42-49 and, of course, Sanderson 1988.
[5] Previously I fashioned the auspicious Vedic Pāśupata in order to liberate (those in bondage). It is more secret than secret and, subtle, is the essence of the Veda. The wise man who is devoted to the practice of the Veda should contemplate Śiva, the Lord of the Creatures – Paśupati. This Pāśupata (cult) is Vedic and should be practiced by those who desire liberation. I myself have (also) uttered (the scriptures of the) Vāma, Pāśupata, Soma, Lākula and Bhairava. This should not be practiced. it is outside the Veda and contrary (to it).

nirmitaṁ hi mayā pūrvaṁ śrautaṁ pāśuptaṁ śubham |
guhyād guhyataraṁ sūkṣmaṁ vedasāraṁ vimuktaye ||
vedābhyāsarato vidvān dhyāyet paśupatiṁ śivam |
eṣa pāśupataḥ śrautaḥ sevanīyo mumukṣubhiḥ ||
vedavādaviruddhāni mayaiva kathitāni tu |
vāmaṁ pāśupataṁ somaṁ lākulaṁcaiva bhairavam ||
asevyam etat kathitaṁ vedabāhyaṁ tathetaram | Kūrmapurāṇa chapter 38 of the uttarabhāga. See Taylor 2001: 254

Although some were distinguished from the Vedic tradition, the Pāśupatas were all rooted, in part at least, in Vedic culture. They worshipped Rudra / Śiva with Vedic mantras and one can argue that there is a continuity, although it cannot be traced in detail, with the earlier ascetics who were mentioned in the Vedas. One of the earliest probable references to sectarian Śaiva devotees are the Śivabhāgavatas mentioned by Patañjali (c. 150 BCE), the famous commentator on Pāṇini's grammar, who describes them as Śaiva peripatetic ascetics who moved about carrying iron lances.[1] There is no need here to repeat what has already been said several times elsewhere;[2] suffice it to say that the earliest inscriptional evidence for the existence of the Pāśupatas themselves is the famous Mathura pillar inscription dated 61 Gupta era (= 380 CE) made during the reign of Candragupta II.[3] It records that a certain Pāśupata ascetic called Udita installed two Liṅgas in memory of his teachers and lists ten generations of his predecessors up to Kauśika who was a direct disciple of Lakulīśa. Thus the date of Lakulīśa, the founder of a major branch of the Pāśupatas, is established as being the second quarter of the 2nd century AD. Inscriptions referring to the Pāśupatas in general and Lakulīśa Pāśupatas in particular appear in various places in India well into the fourteenth century. From about the 11th century we hear about the Kālāmukhas, the members of another Pāśupata school that developed in South India and flourished especially in Karnataka in the 11th to the 13th centuries.[4] Several references to the Pāśupatas by the Chinese pilgrim Yuan Chwang and by the Sanskrit poets Bāṇa Bhaṭṭa and Bhavabhūti who all lived in the seventh century testify to the extensive presence of Pāśupata ascetics in India at that time. Close to a hundred remains of probable Pāśupata sites have been identified[5] in a large area covering most of northern and central India stretching from Rajasthan and Gujarat through Uttara and Madhya Pradesh to Orissa down to Maharasthra, Andhra and Karnataka with a few sites as far south as Tamil Nadu. A good number are also found in the Himalayas, Kashmir, Himachal, Nepal and one in Assam. Their dates range from the fifth to the end of the thirteen centuries. Thus Pāśupata doctrines and practices developed before the formation of Tantric Śaiva systems and continued to flourish alongside them for centuries even as they can be discerned in

---

[1] While this reference is certainly important, Lorenzen (1991: 175) rightly advises that we should not read too much into it: ‘J. N. Banerjea has suggested that the Śaiva-bhāgavatas mentioned by Patañjali (c. 150 B.C.) in his comments on Pāṇini v, 2, 76 were pre-Lakulīśa Pāśupatas . . . Banerjea's theory must be viewed as pure speculation. It is certain that Śaivite ascetics existed before Lakulīśa, and some of these undoubtedly inculcated similar beliefs and practices. Religious orders are never founded in a vacuum. Wine and wineskins are never completely new. Nonetheless this does not justify calling these early Śaiva ascetics Pāśupatas.'

[2] See for example, Chakraborti 1970: 1 ff. and Lorenzen 1991: 173 ff.

[3] EI XXI, 1 ff.

[4] See Chakraborti 1970: 18. The standard account of this Pāśupata sect is by Lorenzen 1991 (2nd edition): 97 ff.

[5] Most of them are conveniently listed in Donaldson 2002: 341-343.

the earliest strata of their development.

The focus of the practice of these early sectarian Śaivites was the Pāśupata vow. This was to be literally done as described, observing the outer form whilst maintaining an inner meditative attitude. The Pāśupatas repeated Vedic mantras and, in some sects, even wore the Brahminical thread (yajñopavīta). Thus they were, one could say in a broad sense, a link between the Vedic keśin and the later Āgamic Śaivites and the followers of Bhairava and Kaulas who, coming after, worshipped goddesses, Yoginīs and a wide variety of female and male supernatural beings with mantras developed for that purpose. Their Brahminical roots allowed them entry into the smārta tradition of which the Purāṇas are one of the mainstays. Scattered throughout the Śaiva Purāṇas, where they appear as Brahminical sages, we find a great deal concerning them. Śiva describes their vow in the Kūrmapurāṇa accordingly:

> Tranquil, with the mind under one's control, the body covered with ashes, devoted to celibacy and naked, one should observe the Pāśupata vow. In former days I created the supreme Pāśupata vow, more secret than secret, subtle and the essence of the Veda, [for man's] liberation. The sage, devoted to the practice of the Vedas, wearing nothing but a loincloth or a single piece of clothing, should meditate upon Śiva, the Lord of Beasts (Paśupati).[1]

The Pāśupatasūtra probably pre-dates the Śaivāgamas or at least belongs to the early period of their development. Several essential elements of Tantric practice are missing. There is no mention of *maṇḍala*s, no visualizations, or inner yogic physiology and the mantras are Vedic. The Pāśapatasūtra teaches that those who observer this vow may 'wear one garment or be naked'.[2] Again the votary 'bathes with ashes in the three periods of the day'[3] and 'sleeps in ashes'.[4] He 'wears sectarian marks'.[5] At the same time he is essentially 'without manifest mark'[6] because he keeps his practice and spiritual state concealed. The Brahmin ascetic for whom this vow is meant should be as strictly chaste as he is careful to avoid the sullying contact with those who belong to the lower castes. Thus 'he should not converse with a woman or a śūdra'.[7] At the same time he behaves in such a

---

[1] KūPu 2/37/140-142.
[2] ekavāsā avāsā vā | PāSū 1/10–11.
[3] bhasmanā triṣavaṇaṁ snāyitaḥ | PāSū 1/2.
[4] bhasmani śayitaḥ | PāSū 1/3.
[5] liṅgadhārī | PāSū 1/6.
[6] avyaktaliṅgī | PāSū 3/1.
[7] strīśūdraṁ nābhibhāṣet | PāSū 1/13.

way that 'other people think he is mad and stupid'[1] and should behave as one who is the object of reprobation'.[2] He eats meat and lives in a cremation ground, an abandoned house or cave.[3] That his way of life is the reverse of that of the worldly man is represented by his circumambulation of the sacred Liṅga he venerates in an anticlockwise direction.[4] His vocation (dharma) is to live freely like a cow or a deer, eating what he is given as alms. He has conquered the senses and keeps himself clean and pure (śuci) by virtue of the water with which he bathes.[5] He is a religious soul (dharmātman) who should recollect Rudra at all times and so finally attains union (sāyujya) with him.[6]

There were other Pāśupatas who stressed the wilfully transgressive features of the Pāśupata's vow. An interesting example is found in the Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā which prescribes a form of the Vow for the Mahāpaśupata ascetic who belonged to the more radical Lākula branch,[7] which was perhaps the 'non-Vedic' one to which we have referred above. Emblematic of his more antinomian vision is that he carried a skull, as did his infamous Kāpālika contemporaries who worshipped Bhairava and Yoginīs.

The observance of vows like this one became a part of well-established practice also in Siddhānta Śaivism, prior to the development of the Kaula Tantras and their closest relatives, the Bhairava Tantras. The Kaula Tantras in this respect do not deviate from the modalities of practice laid down by the Śaiva Siddhānta. But this is more indulgent in some respects and less 'permissive' in others. The practice of such vows is a part of what is termed 'caryā'. The term 'caryā' is derived from the root car which has a wide range of meanings. These include, according to Monier-Williams: 'to move one's self, go, walk, move, stir, roam about, wander (said of men, animals, water, ships, stars etc.), ṚV; AV etc.; to spread, be diffused (as fire) BṛS xix, 7; to move or travel through, pervade, go along follow, Mn; MBh etc; to behave conduct one's self, act live, treat (with instrumental or locative), RV; AV etc; to be engaged in, occupied or busy with (instrumental, e.g. yajñena carati 'to be engaged in a sacrifice'), RV x, 71,5; AV vi, 117, 1; AitBr etc; (with [ŚBr iv; ChUp; ŚāṅkhŚr] or without [ŚBr 2, xiv] mithunam [i.e. sex]) to have intercourse with, have to do with (instrumental) [. . .]

---

[1] u*nmatto mūḍho ity evaṁ manyante itare janāḥ* | PāSū 4/8.
[2] nindyamānaś caret | PāSū 4/14.
[3] PāSū 5/16, 30 and 9.
[4] PāSū 2/8. It is interesting to note that the interiors of the famous caves of the island of Elephanta located just offshore Bombay are constructed in such a way that it is clear that the Liṅga there was circumambulated in an anticlockwise direction. Evidently they were, at some time, the haunts of Pāśupatas.
[5] PāSū 5/18, 14, 11, and 19.
[6] PāSū 5/31, 34, and 33.
[7] The reference is in chapter 4 of the NTS quoted by Sanderson 1988: 665-666.

to undertake, set about, undergo, observe, practice, do or act in general, effect, make (e.g. vratāni carati, 'to observe vows,' AV etc.; vighnaṁ carati 'to put a hinderance,' MBh; bhaikṣaṁ carati 'to beg' [. . .] tapasā indriyāni carati, to exercise one's organs with penance, MBh xiv, 544 . . . .'

While the noun caryā retains most of these meanings in the Śaiva Āgamas, it is also a specific technical term with a number of meanings that accord with the actual practice or practices it denotes. The Siddhānta Āgamas define caryā simply as '(right) conduct' (caraṇa).[1] Theoretically all Siddhānta Āgamas should contain a section (pāda) specifically dedicated to this topic, although in practice most do not. The matters that would normally be dealt with there are dispersed in the other sections, as is partly the case even when this section exists. Moreover, matters that would be best put in other sections may appear in this one. Even so, the following brief summery of the contents of the first nine chapters of the caryā section of the Mataṅgapārameśvarāgama gives a good idea of what is covered by the term caryā in the Siddhāntāgamas.[2] Caryā there includes:

1) General rules (samayā) that Śaivas should observe. These are taught after initiation.
2) The five duties of a Śaiva. These are a) the practice of Yoga, b) the repetition of mantras, c) the study of the scripture, d) worship of the Liṅga, and e) of the teacher.
3) How to serve the teacher.
4) Special practices for the four types of initiates, ranging from the ordinary follower of the rule (samayin) to the teacher.
5) The daily practice of three other types of initiate, namely, those who develop by performing rituals (karmin), through Yoga (yogin) and by knowledge (jñānin).
6) Purification of the body and soul in general and in particular when one has been polluted by contact with impurity or has sinned by causing harm to others. Purification of the adept's eating vessels and food.
7) How the adept who lives the renoucer's life (i.e. the sādhaka) should beg for his food (bhikṣāṭana). How he should share his food and offer it to the Liṅga, teacher and guests. The mantras to be recited and other ritual acts when eating.
8) How the adept should go on pilgrimage, purify his water pot (kamaṇḍalu) and the like. The places he can stay. These include Śaiva temples and the houses of devotees.
9) The observance of Rudra's vow (vrata) and other such vows.

---

[1] MṛĀ (kriyāpāda) 8/174ab.
[2] See introduction to the edition of the Mataṅgapārameśvarāgama p. 138-141.

The subjects dealt with in the sole surviving chapter of the caryāpāda of the Mṛgendrāgama are similar; it also includes a section on expiation (prāyaścitta). In the following excerpt taken from there (supplemented in brackets by the commentary), we notice first of all that the observance of the vow is now open to all. But even though the members of all castes may observe it, considerations of caste remain sufficiently important for a visible sign of caste affiliation to be retained:

> The teacher, the adept (sādhaka who repeats) mantra (mantravṛtti), the (spiritual) son and (ordinary) follower of the Rule (samayin) are the four kinds of Śaivas and these may either observe vows (vratin) or not (avratin). Those who observe vows may have matted hair (jaṭila) or shaved heads (muṇḍa). Amongst them, Brahmins are white with ashes and (the others according to their) caste are adorned (if they are kṣatriyas) with a single sectarian mark (tilaka), (a triple) line of ash (if they are vaiśyas) and (thick bands of ash in the shape of strips of) cloth (if they are śūdras). [. . .] The vow of those who are 'endowed observers' of the vow (bhautikavratin) has an end, (whereas) those whose (vow) terminates with the falling of the body are said to be firmly grounded observers of the vow (niṣṭhāvratin). These (can be) teachers, (spiritual) sons (putraka) and advanced adepts (sādhaka). The endowed (observer of the vow) is one who has offered the vow in the proper manner to the Lord of the Vow at the end when the vow has been fulfilled, and given up its accoutrements. He possesses the wealth that is the (fine) figure of a beautiful wife and is said to be (one who observes the vow for a special) intention (kāmya). Otherwise (if he is not a householder) he is (called) a true (observer of the vow) with an end (satsāntanika).[1]

When the householder who has completed his vow returns to his former status he must observe all the responsibilities that this entails, including sexual intercourse with his wife in her fertile period.[2] But when he observes the vow he must behave as all the others who observe it do, of whatever type they may be. The same text explains what this involves:

> One who observes a vow sleeps on the ground and gives up meat, women and wine. Alone, he takes care of the accoutrements (mātrā) of one who observes a vow) and, alone, his (sole) companion

[1] MṛĀ (caryāpāda) 2-3, 8-10.
[2] Ibid. 21.

> is a water pot (kamaṇḍalu). He avoids entertainment afforded by women, song, dance or (idle) chat. He does not live with a woman and avoids (wearing) garlands, smearing (his body with scented oils) and the like.[1]

In the Mataṅgapārameśvara (caryāpāda), we find a description of Rudra's vow, which is typical of such vows:

> Permitted by (his) teacher (to observe the vow), smeared with ashes, not accepting (gifts from others), observing silence, holding a trident, always eating (only what he has received) as alms and content, he should repeat mantra. Next to a solitary Liṅga, in a cremation ground or under a tree, self-controlled and established in concentration, he should observe the vow at night. Wearing (just) a single piece of cloth or naked, having conquered anger and helpful (to others), the wise man fills the earth at all times with (his) discernment and having done so lives there quietly. Then placing ash thereon and generating (in himself) by (the right application of) reason (yukti) a true aversion for the world, with an ever-pure heart and full attention he contemplates (Sadāśiva).
>
> (The Lord) has three eyes, a Half Moon as a crest-jewel and five faces. (His) body, clearly manifest and auspicious, is like a mass of lightning flashes and, the size of the (adept's) own thumb, (he) is seated on the calyx of the lotus of the heart. Once he has (contemplated him thus, the adept) should enter therein (thinking) "I am He without a doubt!"
>
> Thinking (thus) he should practice night and day, eating little and always pure, recollecting the Vyomavyāpin mantra along with Brahmā (mantra) and its limbs. Always bearing (patiently) heat and cold and ever friendly and compassionate, O best of sages, (he practices) contemplating the universe within himself or else (he abides in the thought that) "I, who have conquered the mind by Yoga am all things and abide (thus) within this universe."
>
> The universe (stands) manifest (before him), the support of many (beings) and full of many creations (racanā), possesses myriads of states of being, the abode of many multitudes of energies ('letters').
>
> [. . .] Pervaded by the darkness of ignorance, the universe is in the grip of the sleep of worldly experience (bhoganidrā). (And the soul) is immersed in darkness (dense like) a moonless night, its abode

[1] Ibid. 18-19.

> the bed of the body; this is (how it) plays the game of sleep under the influence of the fetters of (false worldly) desire and slumbers, overcome by attachment and indolence. (But) it is not really so.
>
> The mind of the great soul who, by virtue of his practice, has been touched by the sun of the Supreme Lord, is illumined by the knowledge of Śiva. (Thus) the adept not attracted by others and so, struck (by Rudra's grace), strengthened by the energy of (his) way of life (caryā) attains the highest bliss (hṛṣṭi).
>
> (Then he realises): "There is none other anywhere better or worse than me." He considers the entire universe to be like (his) relative and inwardly he is blissful by virtue of his dedication to (his) outer condition.[1]

The caryā taught in the various schools of the Bhairavāgamas and Kaula Tantras shares much in common with that of the Siddhāntāgamas, but there are also major differences. The observance of the Rule (samaya), for example, is basic to all of them, although all the rules may not be the same.[2] Again, these schools, including the Kubjikā Tantras, find little place for practices designed to purify from pollution brought about by physical contact or impure food. However, the other observances are maintained, at least in the basic form. Particularly important is the observance of vows, which is considered to be a specific characteristic of the sādhaka's practice. This is the case also in the Siddhāntāgamas, although they have not developed the rich and extensive culture found in the Bhairavāgamas and Kaula Tantras associated with their preferred venue for their observance of vows, namely, the cremation ground.

The caryā taught in the Kubjikā Tantras has been sanitised and domesticated with respect to that of the more extreme schools of the Bhairavāgamas, such as that of the BY. Even so, we notice a residue of these extreme practices. Generally, however, the caryā taught in the Kubjikā Tantras is typical of that found in the Bhairavāgamas and Kaula Tantras in general. This involves the ingestion of various sacrificial substances (dravya) offered to the deity such as meat and wine as well as bodily fluids, including those produced by sexual intercourse. Ingested in the form of sacrificial food called caru offered by Yoginīs, the adept acquires magical and yogic powers and ultimately attains liberation.

Whereas Kaulism may be understood to be a reform of the earlier even more transgressive cults of the Bhairava Tantras, the Siddhānta chose, as a whole,[1] right from the incipience of its Śaiva systems, to contain the transgressive elements of the earlier Pāśupata Vow. Even so, the goal of the Siddhāntin's Vow and the practice of it require that the adept should reach a higher state of being in which he experiences that ego-based thoughts of personal worth or inferiority (and with it caste status and hence ritual purity) are annulled. But although he must be detached, he need not be radically transgressive. There is no need for him to be.

---

[1] Mataṅgapārameśvara (caryāpāda) 9/5-14, 16-21ab.

[2] The rule the initiate must observe are taught in chapter 37 of our text.

Here then is another way out of the impasse. Like his Vedic predecessor, the initiate abandons the condition of the householder, and becomes a nomad. In the following passage drawn from the KuKh, the renouncer's condition is deemed superior to that of the householder because the latter remains at home. He is not a pilgrim:

> O Bhairava, the householder (gṛhastha) shrouded by Māyā does not possess accomplishment in the home and he does not attain worldly benefits (bhukti) or liberation (there). (But) those who are devoted to the worship of the Vidyā, intent on that, their mind (given solely to) that are without a doubt, liberated while living (jīvanmukta) in this world of living beings. O god, once they have gone to either the First Seat, Pūrṇagiryaka, the one called Jāla or the venerable Kāmarūpaka; they certainly achieve the goal and they have no troubles.[2]

The householder is here understood to be one who 'stays at home' – which is the literal meaning of the word 'gṛhastha' normally translated as 'householder'. The householder who 'stays at home' is 'shrouded in Māyā', the most fundamental impurity.[3] To overcome this condition he may at times becomes a pilgrim. In this condition he is essentially a renouncer-cum-yogi, at least for the time during which he is engaged in this practice. Initiation authorizes the initiate to perform the rituals, recite the mantras, practice the Yoga and the rest that form a part of the common observance, both daily and occasional, taught in the Kubjikā Tantras.

---

[1] 'Śaiva Siddhānta' is a collective term that denotes all the 'Siddhāntas' taught in each of the major Siddhāntāgamas. These may vary sometimes considerably. The Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā, for example, which is 'in all respects anomalous' (Goodall 1998: lxxiii) as a part of the Śaiva Siddhānta corpus is considered to be a Siddhānta. Indeed, an early Nepalese manuscript of this text (NGMPP No. A 41/4) may be one of the earliest extant manuscripts of a Siddhānta (see ibid. 1998: xli, note 95). The variety of positions ranging from dualist to nondualist is a measure of the diversity we find amongst the Siddhāntas (see ibid. lvi with reference to Sanderson 1991: 291). So what we say here, although generally applicable, cannot cover every case.
[2] KuKh 11/92cd-95.
[3] KuKh 13/11.

Once initiated, he may, if permitted to do so by his teacher, chose to observe an alternative practice which allows him to move out of his house and be free, for a time or permanently, from the householder state. He is then free to wander about, to travel to the sacred sites and gain those benefits he cannot find at home – including liberation.

This alternation between the two conditions is variously represented. One is the contrast between practice during the day and the other at night. The latter, called 'niśācāra' – the Practice at Night – recurs repeatedly in our sources. Immersed in contemplation in the Cave of the Yoni in the End of the Twelve, this is the practice through which the goddess attains the liberated state of Flight (khecaratva).[1] Night and day are symbolic of two polarities of practice. The day is the domain of daily life. It is the auspicious domain of creation and stability and of the sacred forces and beings who sustain it. Conversely, night is the domain of destructive forces and the deluding darkness of slumber. Māyā is the Night (niśā, rātri), the dark night of ignorance.[2] However, Māyā is also the goddess who is made of the night (niśāmayā).[3] Māyā, the Night, has two faces. The night of ignorance for the worldly, fettered soul is the day of awakening for the wise. Śiva, inactive like a corpse, is immersed in contemplation (samādhi) 'at night' (niśākāle) when he is free of Māyā.[4] His is the Practice of Stillness (nirācāra)[5] – the realisation of the extinction – nirvāṇa – of all limitations and afflictions through the rise of Kuṇḍalinī brought about by his Practice at Night (niśācāra).[6] The fettered condition is not a separate state, independent of the liberated one. It is simply its reverse. Accordingly, the core of Kaula practice is centred on reversing this reversal. The night, normally considered inauspicious, is therefore the time for the most elevated and powerful Kaula practice and of all the nights, the best is the darkest one – the night of the New Moon. The Kulacūḍāmaṇitantra declares:

> O god, if the practitioner (sādhaka) does not wander at night and does not perform the Kula rite of adoration at night, how can he be a Kaulika?[7]

The Kubjikā Tantras describe numerous rituals and spiritual practices (sādhana) that should be undertaken at night. Even so, an extensive theoretical framework into which they can be classified and distinguished from other forms

---

[1] KuKh 6/3-4ab.
[2] TĀ 8/422.
[3] Parātantra 1/123.
[4] Parātantra 1/32.
[5] See chapter 1, p. 100 ff.
[6] See note to KuKh 3/125.
[7] KuCūT 5/22.

of practice or those related to them as we find in the later Kaula schools has not yet evolved. However, we can clearly discern the seeds of its subsequent development. What is here called the Practice at Night is a good example. The subsequent Kaula schools developed a classification of practice into three broad categories. This has been the subject of a great deal of reflection in the later Kaula Tantras, their commentaries and independent works. The system is subject to various interpretations examined by Woodroffe in several places in his writings to which the reader is referred.[1] Very briefly we may outline the theory as follows to help us understand what the Practice at Night is.

The basic state or spiritual condition – bhāva – of those who are on the spiritual path may be of three types. The suitable forms of practice or conduct – ācāra – vary in accord with these states. The lowest condition is the basic state of the fettered soul – paśu – that is accordingly called paśubhāva. In this state one should follow the basic rules and norms enjoined by the common, exoteric scriptures that derive their authority from the Vedas and the smṛtis. In this context this is called samayācāra. It is coupled with the practices and rules enjoined on Vaiṣṇavas, such as vegetarianism and sexual restraint. This is termed vaiṣṇavācāra. The next state is attained by those who have taken Kaula initiation, the highest form of which is called Śāmbhava, reminding us of the form of initiation taught in the Kubjikā Tantras that preceded these schools. Those who have received this initiation gain access to the condition of the Kaula adept, who is technically called a vīra – lit. 'Hero'. His practice is called vīrācāra. It involves the ritual consumption of meat and wine along with ritual intercourse, which serves to generate the sexual fluids considered to be the most excellent sacrificial substances. His deity, the consort of a Bhairava, is a goddess whom he worships by means of these things. The third and most developed state is called divya – 'divine'. In this state no outer ritual or practice of any sort is necessary. The adept shares in the condition of deity. The outer practice is accomplished internally. The ritual sex practiced in vīrabhāva, for example, is replaced in divyabhāva by its inner counterpart, the union of Śiva and Śakti. The two – vīrabhāva and divyabhāva – sustain and compliment each other.[2] The first state and its corresponding practice are meant for the day. It is public, domestic and in accord with commonly agreed norms of moral conduct. The deity is male. The last two, on the contrary, are secret. They are essentially meant for the renouncer but are accessible to the householder in periods when he chooses to participate in the [1] See, for example, see his introduction to the Kaulāvalinirṇaya p. 13 ff.

---

[2] The Niruttaratantra (quoted by Woodroffe 1973: 241) declares that:

> He who is not in dīvya or vīrabhāva and worships Kālī suffers pain at every step and goes to hell. If a man who is of a paśu disposition worships Kālī he goes to the Raurava hell until the time of final dissolution.

renouncer's condition. They are practiced at night and the deity is the goddess. The Kālikopaniṣad enjoins:

> The Śāktas who have had the Śambhava initiation should practice Brahmacarya by day, (while) at night be naked and always practice the repetition of mantra (japa) and ritual (pūjā) etc. with mind intent on sexual intercourse.[1]

Vīrācāra is practiced at night and should be concealed like 'one's own mother's lover' (jāravat). The uninitiated fettered soul who does not observe Kaula practice (paśu) should not worship the goddess in this way. The Kaulāvalinirṇaya enjoins:

> At night the pure one eats the sacrificial food offered to the fire and by day he should repeat the Vidyā. In every circumstance the Hero has two identities (dvivāsa lit. 'two clothes') and is always sexually continent.[2]At night he should worship the goddess in accord with Kula practice. It is said here that the enjoined practice (vidhi) is of two kinds for all the twice born.[3]

Although the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras do display a clearly discernable degree of domestication and, to a lesser extent, adaptation to non-Tantric practice, the spirit of compromise we find in the later Kaula schools exemplified by these passages is largely absent. We also notice, on the other hand, continuity in the later Kaula literature with the earlier Kaula traditions. The vīra is already the protagonist of Kaula practice. The Practice at Night is also said to be the Conduct of a Hero (vīracaryā). Thus the Tantra teaches:

> Those who undertake the vow should practice the threefold conduct (samācāra) in the course of (their) nocturnal practice (niśācāra). This is the Conduct of a Hero (vīracaryā), which is the Hero's Vow (observed) in the modalities of the Hero's union and the

---

[1] Quoted by Woodroffe 1973: 240. The translations of this and the following two passages are mine.

[2] The Kaula's 'sexual continence' is twofold. During the day, that is, when he is playing his public role, it is literally that. However, during the night, when he assumes his fundamental, secret Kaula identity, he practices 'sexual continence' by means of ritual intercourse. Thus, he emulates the goddess's own practice.

[3] naktaṁbhojī hāviṣyānnaṁ japed vidyāṁ divā śuciḥ |
dvivāsaḥ sarvathā vīro brahmacārī bhavet sadā |
rātrau saṁpūjayed devīṁ kulācārakramena tu |
dvijanmānāṁ tu sarveṣāṁ dvidhā vidhir ihocyate || Kaulāvalinirṇaya in Woodroffe 1973: 240.

> union Dūtīs (Kaula consorts) practice with everybody (sarvagamana), which is both external and internal. The mind should not be checked. One should go wherever the mind goes and practice the Conduct of Desire (icchācaryā). Clearly evident, this is said to be the threefold sign (liṅga) (of this practice), the sum and substance (saṁgraha) of the Vow.[1]

The Conduct of a Hero is the Divine Conduct (divyacaryā) of Kāpālins by which the goddess is worshipped.[2] Her Vidyā should be repeated constantly in the course of the Practice at Night. This is done in the sacred seats, cremation grounds, abandoned temples, and other such solitary places where Kaula adepts (sādhaka) and those like them go to repeat their mantra and practice their spiritual discipline.[3] The Tantra repeatedly stresses that this can only be done by one who knows the Kaula teachings[4] that are established by means of this practice.[5] Described briefly in the KuKh,[6] it is a form of Kaula practice – caryā – that involves the ritual consumption of meat and wine and other Kaula substances along with ritual intercourse. The adept, intent on the repetition of the Vidyā, visits the sacred sites where the Yoginīs reside who act as his partners. If they consider him to be fit for this practice they grace him with the sacramental offerings and unite with him externally and inwardly within the subtle body where the sacred sites in which they reside are projected. This union takes place by means of the inner energy of Kuṇḍalinī, which for the ignorant is the power of Māyā that binds and deludes them, but for those who seek the higher states of being, it operates in the opposite way.[7]

The KuKh integrates the Practice at Night with one adopted from the Tantrasadbhāva. This is the Vow of Knowledge (vidyāvrata). 'Knowledge' – vidyā – is the mantra of the goddess the observer of the vow must repeat without a break throughout his observance. The Bhairava Tantras such as the BY and JY prescribe many such Vows of Knowledge modelled on the earlier Great Vow (mahāvrata), that is, the Pāśupata Vow and that of the Kāpālikas. The various Vows of Knowledge taught in the BY are all meant to be literally performed externally. An important feature of the Vow of Knowledge presented by TS, which was redacted at a later, more advanced stage of the development of the

[1] KuKh 15/46-48.
[2] KuKh 4, MāSt line 93.
[3] KuKh 11/89cd-91ab.
[4] See e.g. ibid. and KuKh 15/39cd-41.
[5] KuKh 30/177d-178ab.
[6] See KuKh 15/39cd-50.
[7] See KuKh 3/125 and for more details, see ibid. 11/90, 15/39-50, and 16/5.

Bhairava Tantras, is the presentation of inner equivalents of its outer forms, thus allowing for its internalisation.[1] It is described as follows:

> Listen, O god, I will explain the excellent vow of Knowledge. (The adept may have) matted hair, shaved head or topknot, he may have bathed (snātaka) or practice celibacy – in any condition, whether he abides in the (normal) course of practice (krama), or (the observance of this) vow, he is successful. (In any case), the external vow should be observed, that is, the concealment of Kaula practice (kaulikācāragopana).
>
> (This is true also) of the yogi who bears the Five Insignia (pañcamudrā), is covered in ashes and naked, or who wears rags (cīvara)[2] and the bark of trees, or is adorned with all the ornaments, or who wears red clothes, or even one who wears whatever he pleases. The teaching of the scripture is that the vow is said to be in accord with the garment the best of adepts may assume.[3]

In its outer form the Vow of Knowledge consists of either shaving the head or letting the hair grow into matted locks, the wearing of a topknot, regular bathing, smearing the body with ashes and the wearing of the Five Insignias. Although the texts tell us the inner equivalent of the Five Insignias[4] we are not told their outer form. The Kāpālika, as his name – 'Skull Bearer' – implies, carried a skull as part of his penance modelled, as Lorenzen[5] has demonstrated, on that prescribed for having murdered a Brahmin. Along with the skull he was to wear six insignias, namely, a necklace (kuṭhikā), neck ornament (rucaka), earrings (kuṇḍala), crest jewel (śikhāmaṇi), ashes (bhasma) and sacred thread (yajñopavīta). These are described by Yāmunācārya in his Āgamaprāmāṇya and by Rāmānuja who draws from him in his commentary on the Brahmasūtra.[6] The wearing of similar insignia was common practice amongst Buddhist Tantric ascetics who were inspired in their own way by the same model. The Buddhist Sādhanamālā[7] equates the six insignia with the six perfections (pāramitā) of the Bodhisattva. Kanhapāda (Skt. Kṛṣṇapāda), a Bengali Buddhist Siddha of the eleventh century, refers to himself

---

[1] See KuKh 14/7 ff.

[2] According to Monier-Williams cīvara is 'the dress or rags of a religious especially a Buddhist or Jain monk.'

[3] KuKh 14/2cd-6.

[4] See KuKh 14/24ff.

[5] Lorenzen 1991. See bibliography.

[6] See Śrībhāṣya on Br. Sū. 2/2/35-37 and A Review of Rare Buddhist Texts, vol. I, Central Institute of Higher Tibetan Studies, Sarnath, Vārāṇasī 1986, p. 103.

[7] Sādhanamālā p. 489.

as a Kapālin. His anklets and bells (ghaṇṭi), he says, are the two breaths. His earrings (kuṇḍala) are the sun and moon. The ashes he smears on his body are the ashes of passion, aversion and error. His pearl necklace is the highest liberation.[1]

Although the Hevajratantra is Buddhist, it teaches, as do the Buddhist Yoga and Anuttarayoga Tantras in general, practices that have so much in common with those of our text that they can be justifiably regarded as Kaula and their practitioners as Buddhist Kaulas.[2] Thus Snellgrove's description of the practitioner of the HT as he appears in the Tantra can help us to understand how the initiate who observed the outer form of the Vow of Knowledge behaved and what the five insignias (pañcamudrā) were that he wore:

> He receives the five symbolic adornments, crown [cakrī], earrings [kuṇḍala], necklace [kaṇṭhī], bracelets [rucaka], and girdle, as signs of his success. These he wears on those set occasions . . . when perfected yogins and Yoginīs come together, to consume flesh and wine, to sing and dance, and realised their consummation of bliss. He is free from all conventions and wanders as he pleases, knowing no distinction between friend and foe, clean or unclean, good or evil.[3]

The god Hevajra wears the same five insignia that, symbolizing the Five Buddhas of the directions, possess their purifying power.[4] According to the HT:

> The crown is worn for the adoration of one's guru and master and chosen divinity. Earrings are worn to indicate one's deafness to evil words spoken against one's guru and ‘vajra-holder’. The necklace suggests the mantras intoned, the bracelets one's renunciation of harming living-beings, the girdle one's service of the Mudrā [i.e. Tantric consort]. The body should always be signed with these signs of the Five Buddhas.[5]

---

[1] Dasgupta 1976: 58 ff..
[2] The KMT (10/146a) understands these Buddhist Tantrics in this way when it admonishes that one should avoid Buddhist Kaulas.
[3] Snellgrove 1959: 11. The HT itself (1/5/2-4 (Snellgrove's translation)) says:

> The yogin must wear the sacred earrings, and the circlet on his head; on his wrists the bracelets, and the girdle around his waist, rings around his ankles, bangles around his arms; he wears the bonenecklace and his dress a tigerskin and his food must be the five ambrosias.

[4] HT 1/3/14. The corresponding five Buddhas are listed in HT 1/6/11. See also ibid. diagram 5, p. 129 for a table of the five Wisdoms and their corresponding colours.
[5] HT 2/6/3-4.

According to our sources, the inner equivalents of the Five Insignias (pañcamudrā) are the Five Brahmās.[1] They are the stations of the upward movement of Kuṇḍalinī, the energy and essence of the Vidyā, that travels up from the navel through the five spheres of Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Rudra, Īśvara and Sadāśiva. The wearing of these signs and the pilgrimage to the sacred Kaula sites makes the yogi unbearably attractive to woman. He is so charged with the energy of the goddess that they flock to him and are so overwhelmed with passion that they die before him.[2] Over the years he rises through higher levels, to those of Brahmā, Viṣṇu and the rest until he ultimately attains the liberated skyfaring (khecara) state.

But although the initiate who observes this Vow may wear these signs of his observance, he should keep it a secret. This is basic. The unpublished Kulapañcāśikā which, like the KJN, is attributed to Matsyendranātha similarly teaches secrecy. There the goddess asks why those 'great heroes' who reside and move around at night in cremation grounds do not always manage to unite with the Yoginīs there.[3] The god replies:

> Even though they know the three times and are capable of attracting the three worlds, they conceal their practice and guard (the teaching) that has come from (their) Kula. Seeing one who does not have manifest outer signs (of his attainment and practice) the rays (of the deity) converge (upon him). O beloved, they are most hidden and so do not approach one who bears outer signs.[4]

Although the Kulapañcāśikā teaches that there should be no outer signs, it does not prohibit them, as long as the ascetic inwardly cultivates the spiritual

---

[1] KuKh 14/27-28.

[2] KuKh 14/40 ff..

[3] O Hara, why is it that those people who are great heroes devoted to worship and meditation, greedy to drink (the sacrificial) blood – who, well established, carry swords and are devoted, O god, to wandering at night in cremation ground(s) – do not always attain union with the Yoginīs?

pūjādhyānaratā ye tu narāḥ [k, kh: narā] sṛkpānalaṁpaṭāḥ [k, kh: -ṭaṁ] |
nityodyuktā [k, kh: nityodraktau] mahāvīrāḥ khaḍgahastāḥ pratiṣṭhitāḥ ||
śmaśānanilaye [k, kh: sma-] deva rātrau paryaṭane ratāḥ [k: ratā] |
kathaṁ na labhyate [k, kh: labhate] nityaṁ yoginīmelakaṁ [k, kh: yogīmelāpakaṁ] hara [k, kh: haraḥ] || KP 3/13-14.

[4] yady api te trikālajñās [k, kh: -jñā] trailokyākarṣaṇe [k: trailokyakarṣaṇe] kṣamāḥ [k, kh: -mā] |
tathāpi saṁvṛtācārāḥ [k: -rā] pālayanti kulodbhavam [k, kh: -tī] || avyaktaliṅginaṁ [k: -taṁ] dṛṣṭvā saṁbhāsanti marīcayaḥ |
liṅginaṁ nopasarpanti atiguptā yataḥ [k: yata; kh: yatat] priye [k: priyet] || KP 3/18-19.

Verse 3/19 of my edition is quoted by Kṣemarāja in his commentary on the Śivasūtra 3/26. The translation is mine. See Singh 1979: 187.

sense that they adorn the body of the god with whom he identifies. In this way the outer signs are hidden, as it were, within deity:

> O goddess, one who has matted hair, (or a) shaved head, is covered in ashes and, adorned with the five insignias, observes (the ascetic's) vow and conduct, one who practices ritual intercourse and is dedicated to drinking as Kaulas do (vīrapāna) within my body is, O Maheśvarī, one who knows (the teachings of the) Kula and is fit by virtue of each one of these (practices) for union (with the Yoginīs). Endowed with right knowledge, O goddess, he unites (with the Yoginīs) in (each) sacred seat, field and village, if he is dedicated to the wisdom of (his) teacher.[1]

The concealment of this observance was enjoined at an early stage in the history of its development. Indeed, most of what is said in these verses concerning the outer form of the vow the Kaula adept may observe is already well established in the Pāśupatasūtra as aspects of the Pāśupata's vow.[2] Thus one aphorism teaches that 'hidden wisdom is austerity that shines without end'.[3] The next one goes on to admonish that the true is adept is one who 'keeps (his) vow secret'.[4] The practice of secrecy may equally well be the total privacy of domesticity that the householder can enforce in his own home for his own secret, inner practice. Kings and potentates keep their practice hidden to preserve and intensify its power. It is their secret weapon in the battle for survival and expansion.

We have seen that the renouncer in Vedic times wore ochre coloured clothes. This practice continues amongst Śaiva renouncers who attribute the origin of their orders to Śaṅkarācārya. Vaiṣṇava renouncers, who in their outer appearance resemble in many respects their Śaiva counterparts, generally wear white. Modern Śākta renouncers wear red clothes. A similar practice is recorded in the Brahmayāmala, a text that may well belong to the seventh or eighth century.[5] In one of a series of vows (vrata) described there, the initiate may chose

---

[1] jaṭī muṇḍī śikhī [k: si-] bhasmī mudrāpañcakabhūṣitaḥ [k, kh: -tam] |
vratacaryāsamopeto [k, kh: -taṁ] yas tu sevati [k, kh: sevanti] maithunam ||
vīrapānarato [kh: -ratā] devi mama dehe maheśvari |
tena tenaiva yogyas [kh: yogyās] tu kulajño [k: kulajā; kh: -jñā] melāpakasya tu ||
pīṭhe kṣetre tathā grāme samyagjñānena [k: samyak-] saṁyutaḥ [k, kh: -tāḥ] |
melāpako bhaved [k: bhave] devi gurujñānārpito [k, kh: -jñānāpito] yadā || KP 3/20-22.

[2] Cf. KuKh 15/34.

[3] gūḍhavidyā tapa anantāya prakāśate | PāSū 4/1.

[4] gūḍhavrataḥ | PāSū 4/2.

[5] See Dyczkowski 1988: 48-49.

to perform he should wear 'black and red clothes and no upper garment'.[1] Another prescribes that: 'wearing red clothes, a red garland and (smeared with) unguent, he has red ornaments and holds an ascetic's staff. In particular, he should always carry a skull and a double-headed drum'.[2]

The KuKh similarly says that the true Kaula yogi is one 'who is adorned with all the ornaments or who wears red clothes, or even one who wears whatever he pleases'.[3] The same verse is found in the KMT but there we find the variant: 'whether he is dirty or white (i.e. clean) adorned with clothes and ornaments'.[4] The distinction between 'clean' and 'dirty' is still maintained amongst modern Nātha yogis who may choose the path of the 'clean' ascetic who performs ritual ablutions or one who does not. One is reminded of the satirical representation of the Bhairavācārya by the 11th century Kashmiri, Kṣemendra, who says of him that he is 'smeared with faeces (gūthalipta)'.[5] Abstaining from washing is, for example, part of the practice (sādhana) sometimes prescribed for the worship of Juṣṭacāṇḍālī. Part of the initiatory rites of some modern Aghoris I have interviewed is to shave their head and then smear it with their own urine and faeces. It is not surprising that this is not a universally accepted practice. The Pāśupatasūtra enjoins that the he who observes the Pāśupata vow 'should not look at urine or excrement'.[6]

Vows such as this came to be totally internalised. More than just integrated into symbolic ritual implements and actions, they came to be seen as most authentically observed by inner yogic practice and thus domesticated. We find a good example in the Śivasūtra, revealed in Kashmir in the middle of the 9th century. There we read that 'the activity of the body is the vow'.[7] Bhāskara understands the 'vow' to be the Great Vow (mahāvrata). The five insignia of those who observe it are the ascetic's stick (daṇḍa), ashes, sacred thread, banner and ornaments. He explains the inner practice of the Great Vow as follows:

> (This yogi) performs the Great Vow of abiding in his own

---

[1] kṛṣṇaraktaparīdhāna uttarīyavivarjitaḥ [k: uttariya-] | BY 21/14ab. This observance is part of the 'vow of impurity' (malinavrata).

[2] raktāmbaradharo bhūtvā raktamālyānulepanam |
raktair [k: raktaṁr] ābharaṇair [k: ābharaṇai] yukto khaṭvāṁgaṁ [k, kh: khaṭvāṁga] karasaṁsthitam ||
kapālaṁ dhārayen nityaṁ ḍamarukañ ca viśeṣataḥ | BY 21/72-73ab.

[3] KuKh 14/5.

[4] malīmaso 'tha śuklo vā vastrābharaṇabhūṣitaḥ || KMT 25/32cd. This is essentially the reading of TS 15/4cd which is the original one.

[5] See Narmamālā 3/14cd–17 in Raghavacarya and Padhye 1961: 337. Also see Dyczkowski 1987: 16.

[6] mūtrapurīṣaṁ nāvekṣet | PāSū 1/12.

[7] ŚSū 3/26.

> unfettered nature. (His) five insignia (mudrā) are the body, that is, the skeleton, the skull, the anklets, the backbone, which represents the stick, and the bones that are those of the hands, feet and neck. The ashes (he smears on his body) are the supreme radiance (of consciousness) and the three qualities (guṇa), the sacred thread. His banner is the Great Path and his ornaments, the senses. His sport is to play amongst the objects of the senses and he delights constantly in the cremation ground of the Heart (of consciousness) illumined in his body, speech and mind. Whatever he does is the eternal festival of the Lord of Heroes.[1]

The Vidyāvrata taught in our text may be equally well performed literally or internally that is, by means of the imagination. Either way, it does not require the performance of elaborate rites, simply the assiduous repetition of the goddess's mantra – her Vidyā, and hence its name. Externally, the observer of this vow is engaged in pilgrimage to the sacred sites. Although provisions exist for the drawing of the Kramamaṇḍala and its worship outside the home, he is not required to do so. He is entirely 'established in the vow (vratastha)'. The inner form is for the resident householder; as such he must maintain the usual ritual program and so is defined as 'established in the Krama (kramastha)'.[2]

An important feature of this Vow not incorporated in its famous predecessor is that an itinerary is prescribed or recommended. Although the peripatetic, ascetic lifestyle of the Pāśupata is prescribed in detail in the Pāśupatasūtra, no specific places are mentioned for him to go to. Indeed, part of the vow is simply wandering. The same is the case in the Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā, which enjoins a more elaborate (one could say more developed) form of the Great Vow of the Pāśupata which includes the carrying of a skull and wearing human bones.

We find the same situation in the BY. There the chief protagonist is the avadhūta. Like the Lākula Pāśupata of the NTS he carries a skull, but instead of Rudra he worships Bhairava and the Yoginīs associated with him with offerings of skull bowls full of human blood. The BY prescribes a series of nine vows. These are called Vidyāvratas because they are symbolically related to each of the nine syllables of the Vidyā of Kāpālīśa Bhairava and his eight Yoginīs.[3] The first

---

[1] Dyczkowski 1992: 140.

[2] KuKh 14/4ab.

[3] Next I will explain the vows born from Ucchuṣma (Bhairava). The Vow of Nakedness is one. The second is (the vow of wearing) rags. The third one is the one of impurity. The fourth is (the Vow of) Madness. The sixth one is said to be the one of the skull. The sixth one is said to be (the Vow of) Bhairava. The seventh is called the (vow of behaving like a) child. The eighth is (the

of these, called the Vow of Nakedness, is not only typical of the others; it exemplifies the aimless and constant wandering life of those who observe such vows:

> (One who is engaged) in the Vow of Nakedness is always naked and has no upper garment. His body is covered in ashes and his hair is always dishevelled. (He should) always worship the place where (he practices) Yoga. He should wander about at midday. O dear one, whether in a village or a town he must certainly wander about. He has deposited the mantra on his body and, devoid of the five insignia, he always keeps silent. Having performed the morning (rites), he should wander about by day. Once he has performed the midday rite and that of the evening at night, the adept (sādhaka) should always eat at night as a part of the vow. He should perform the midnight (rite) along with the rite of adoration and the rest. (He should) always wander about at night and should be free of doubt (and fear). O mistress of the gods, there is no need to reflect here (on what should or should not be done) here in these Vows of Knowledge.[1]

The outer practice of such vows, which is a regular part of the cults of these Bhairava Tantras, continues to be enjoined in the later Kaula traditions (of vow of) eating meat. The ninth is the (vow of) growth, which gives all accomplishments. These are said to be the nine Vows that belong to the Vidyā division.

---

ataḥ paraṁ pravakṣyāmi vratān ucchuṣmasaṁbhavān |
nagnavrataṁ [k, kh: -vratāṁ] bhaved ekaṁ dvitīyāṁ tu kucailinam ||
tṛtīyaṁ [k, kh: -ya] malinaṁ nāma caturthonmattakaṁ bhavet |
kapālaṁ pañcamaṁ proktaṁ ṣaṣṭham [k, kh: ṣaṣṭam] uktaṁ tu bhairavam ||
saptamaṁ bālakaṁ nāma [k, kh: nāmaṁ] kravyādaṁ cāṣṭamaṁ [k: -saṁ] bhavet |
navamaṁ vardhamānaṁ tu [kh: -nastu] sarvasiddhipradāyakam ||
ete nava vratāḥ [k, kh: vratā] proktāḥ [k, kh: proktā] vidyābhede vyavasthitāḥ [k, kh: -tā] |
BY 21/1-4ab.

[1] nagnavrate sadā nagna [k, kh: nagnau] uttarīyavivarjitaḥ [k,kh: -taṁ] ||
bhasmadhūlitadehas tu [k, kh: bhasmā-; k: -dhūritadehaṁ tu] muktakeśaḥ [k, kh: -śa] sadā bhavet |
yogasthānaṁ sadā pūjyaṁ [k, kh: pūjya] madhyāhne [kh: -hnaṁ] bhramaṇaṁ [k, kh: -naṁ] bhavet ||
[k: + grā] grāme vā nagare vāpi avaśyaṁ [k, kh: avasyaṁ] paryaṭet [k, kh: -ṭe] priye |
kṛtanyāsaḥ sadā maunī [k: -ni] pañcamudrāvivarjitaḥ [k: -tā] ||
pūrvāhnikaṁ tathā [kh: tadā] kṛtvā divā bhramaṇam ācaret |
madhyāhnikaṁ tataḥ kṛtvā rātrau tu aparāhnikam ||
*nakte [k, kh: na ] bhojanaṁ kāryaṁ sādhakena vrate sadā |
ardharātrāhnikaṁ kāryaṁ pūjādikapuraḥsaram [k: -dikaḥpuraḥsaraḥ; kh: -saraḥ] ||
rātrau tu bhramaṇaṁ [k, kh: -nan] nityaṁ varjanīyaś ca [k, kh: varjanīya na] saṁśayaḥ | vidyāvrateṣu deveśi nātra kāryā vicāraṇā [k, kh: kārya vicāraṇāt] || BY 21/5cd-10.

which the Kubjikā cult is typical) although the possibility of internalisation and adaptation to the householder's condition is always left open. Thus our text introduces a prescription for the way of life of the roaming renunciant with the words: 'By the (grace) of the teacher's Command that he has received, the Command operates within the disciple all the time'. In other words, the Command graces him, whatever his condition, whether it be that of a householder or renouncer. The text continues by outlining a lifestyle for the wandering renouncer. More faithful to the earlier model, unlike his counterpart who performs the Vidyāvrata of the TS, he carries a skull:

> Desirous of success (siddhi), he wanders constantly (all over) the country, (as freely) as he desires. If he is one who in his Kaula practice is a renouncer (caryāvadhūta), he should wander in (each) sacred seat and field, (one by one) in due order (kramāt). The yogi who, by virtue of the intensity of the Command (bestowed upon him) desires success, should take a skull (kharpara) (to use for eating his) meals and (his) belongings. (This) Lord of Yogis should always live in an abandoned temple.[1]

Notice also that this 'Lord of Yogis'[2] lives in temples. This is in accord with the lifestyle of the ascetics of an earlier period who, prior to the development of monasteries (maṭha), lived in temples when they were not wandering about. This archaic trait is combined with another that appears in the early Tantras – he wanders in 'sacred seat and field'. The development of the outer sacred geography that this implies is an essential and integral part of the Kaula modality of practice as is its internalisation. Right from the initial stage of its development, the connection between the outer sacred sites and the beings who inhabit them was felt to be, above all, within the body. Thus the JY teaches:

> Those gods who reside in sacred fields and seats, primary and secondary, and those powerful beings who are in the meeting grounds, primary and secondary, move about, O beloved, concealed in the form of falcons (cillā) and the like, their actions, mantras and powers (kept) secret. Who knows what takes place within the body by that activity.[3]

---

[1] KuKh 37/19cd-22ab.

[2] Concerning this term, see note to KuKh 5/41cd-43.

[3] pīṭhakṣetropapīṭhasthā hy upakṣetre tathāparāḥ [g: mahātapaḥ] |
saṁdohe [k, kh: saṁdoha; g: sadohe] copasaṁdohe [k, kh, g: tamasandohe] saṁsthitās tā [k, kh, gh: -tāptā] mahābalāḥ [g: -lām] ||
cchadmanā vicaranty [k: -vivara-] etāś cillārūpādikaiḥ priye |
guptācārā guptamantrā [g: manāṁ] guptavīryās tu devatāḥ ||

The projection of the sacred sites into the body transforms it into a channel of the power of place. Wherever one who carries the sacred sites within his body goes, wherever he sits or stands, that place becomes powerful and sacred. Thus the ṢSS teaches that he need not be a wandering ascetic or even travel to draw energy from the power of place:

> The householder should also constantly deposit (the seeds of) the Ages (corresponding to the sacred seats) on the Earth and the sacred seats in the body. Thus (the energy of the very) ground (he stands on) is aroused.[1]

The Vow of Knowledge taught in our text allows for the possibility of both types, while it is clear that the renunciant who merely bears the outer signs of renunciation (matted hair, smearing the body with ashes etc) without realising their inner equivalents cannot gain the fruits of observing his vow. Conversely, the householder, who cannot wander naked as the yogi may do, can only strive to realise the inner equivalents of the outer forms. He is then, in a sense, in a superior position to the renunciant. Even so, the text does not enjoin the abandoning of outer forms tout court. Abhinavagupta similarly prefers, in accord with what he calls generically the Kaula modality (prakriyā), an interiorised 'entry into sacred sites (kṣetrapraveśa)'. But does not approve however, of the total elimination of the outer practice, because a more fundamental feature of Kaula practice is its grounding in an attitude of non-duality, which would be violated by making distinctions of inner and outer.

This conduct or, we may call it a way of life – caryā – is also open to householders.[2] He may observe this as his vow all his life or for a certain period of time. In the latter case, if he is a householder and he chooses to perform the vow externally, for the period of his observance he will be freed from his responsibilities as a householder and lead the wandering pilgrim's life of the renouncer. Throughout the Kubjikā sources we notice that both these conditions, that of the renouncer and that of the householder, are variously considered to be ko hi jānāti tac ceṣṭācaritaṁ tanumadhyame [gh: tanta] | JY 3/38/22-24ab.

---

[1] gṛhastho 'pi sadā kālaṁ yugān [k: -nu] bhūmyān [k: bhūmyā] tu vinyaset ||
pīṭhān śarīramadhye tu tasya kṣubhyen mahītalam | ṢSS 34/20cd-21ab.

[2] YKh (1) testifies that:

> And there are others who observe (Kaula) practice and vows that are householders initiated into the Krama.

caryāvratadharāś [k, kh: caryāprata-; gh: caryāpratadharā] cānye gṛhasthāḥ [all MSs: sthā] kramadīkṣitāḥ [gh: -tā] | YKh (1) 4/134ab.

better than the other; ultimately, however, they are understood to be equivalent. Thus, in one place we are told that the renouncer is superior to the householder because the latter's mind is enveloped in Māyā, while the renouncer is liberated in this life.[1] Even so, we read that the external vow, that is, the renouncer's way of life, is not the best.[2] What matters is practice, not lifestyle, and true practice is grounded in inner experience. The outer form depends on the inner experience in order to be effective and meaningful. Thus, either way, as a householder or renouncer, the initiate who observes the Rule[3] will get its fruits if he practices and experiences inwardly. Otherwise, even if he lives the life of a renouncer, he will not be successful.

Accordingly, the Vow of Knowledge taught in the TS provides internal equivalents for what the adept wears, for his ornaments as well as for the weapons and the like he carries, as well as the places where he can practice.[4] But although the inner equivalents are considered to be superior to the outer forms, the latter are not negated. The TS – from which the KMT and the later Kubjikā Tantras, including our own KuKh, have drawn the passages related to the Vow of Knowledge – appears to be one of the earliest extant Śaiva Tantras that outlines extensively and systematically the type of sacred geography that is one of the basic features of the Kaula Tantras. The cult of the Brahmayāmala and that of the Siddhayogeśvarīmata are amongst the earliest we know in which we find that the worship of Yoginīs in large numbers is a central feature. Considering the great importance attributed to sacred sites in general and their extensive manipulations as symbolic ciphers in the later Tantras and their close association with such Yoginī cults, the SYM and the BY are remarkably destitute of sacred geography. Indeed, in the fragment that has survived of the SYM, there is none at all, and the schema associated with the Eight Mothers presented in the BY is a notable exception. We also notice that very few of the sacred sites that were destined to become well known are mentioned in the BY.[5] Again, the BY prefers to refer to a sacred site as a 'kṣetra' rather than a 'pīṭha'. Like the latter term, which we will examine further ahead, it has

---

[1] See KuKh 11/94-96ab.
[2] KuKh 14/23ab.
[3] Those householders who have been consecrated and attained the status of a Kulācārya and who are the protectors of the Practice of the Rule (will) not (achieve) liberation if they break the Rule, even by mistake. This is the Supreme Goddess's Command. KuKh 39/174cd-175.
[4] KuKh 14/7 ff.
[5] Kāmarūpa, for example, is mentioned in the BY only in the following ambiguous reference:

O goddess, it is on (the lotus) with six petals and has the form of letters. Recollect this Wheel, Kāmarūpa, in accord with its form.

ṣaṭpatrasaṁsthitaṁ [k: -sasthitaṁ] devi varṇarūpasamanvitam ||
kāmarūpam idaṁ [k: -mide] cakraṁ yathārūpam anusmaret | BY 57/98cd-99ab.

a range of related meanings. It may, for example, denote a part or an area of a maṇḍala[1] in general or the particular portions of it allocated to the deities that reside within it.[2] This is the term for the sacred sites where the eight Mothers reside – one of the oldest groups of sacred sites for Kaulas and followers of the Bhairava Tantras that teach the worship of the Mothers and the Yoginīs related to them. Indeed, this was one of the earliest terms used in the Tantras to denote sacred sites in general, as we find, for example, in the following passage from the BY:

> Or the wise man should perform (the rite) in the locations of the sacred fields (kṣetra) where the Yoginīs reside, or in sacred places that serve as imagined substitutes (vikalpa) for (the eight sacred sites of the Mothers) beginning with Prayāga.[3]

It is likely that a good number of Siddhāntāgamas preceded the BY which refers to them.[4] However, much of the contents of the extant Siddhāntāgamas do not

---

[1] The following passage illustrates this usage of the term 'kṣetra':

Having first fashioned a circular, auspicious area (kṣetra) of two hands, (breadth extending) east and west, and having first divided it in half with a thread, the circular maṇḍala is in three parts.

kṛtvā vṛttaṁ [k, kh: vṛrta] śubhaṁ kṣetraṁ [k: kṣatre] dvihastaṁ pūrvapaścimam [kh: -pascimam] |
sūtrārdhaṁ [k, kh: -rddha] saṁvibhajyādau [k: -kṣādau] trikhaṇḍaṁ [k: -khaṁṇḍaṁ] vṛttamaṇḍalam [k, kh: vṛta-] || BY 57/55.

[2] For example:

O fair-faced lady, in the middle is Ananta who resides in his own field (kṣetra) having placed the group of eight Bhairavas (in their proper place) beginning with Asitāṅga in due order starting from the south-east quarter.

madhye 'nantaṁ svakṣetrasthaṁ [k: svatatra-] asitāṅgāditaḥ [k, kh: -ta] kramāt ||
bhairavāṣṭakaṁ [k, kh: -ka] vinyasya [k: -sye] vahnikoṇād [k, kh: -konād] varānane |
BY 63/54cd-55ab.

[3] kṣetrasthāneṣu [k: kṣatre-] vā kuryād yoginyo [k: -nyā] yatra saṁsthitāḥ |
prayāgādivikalpeṣu [k, kh: prayogādi-] punyadeśeṣu [k: puṇya-] vā budhaḥ || BY 45/485cd-486ab.

[4] See Dyczkowski 1988: 43.

The entire body of current of knowledge was awakened by the principle (tattva) Sadāśiva and by Śiva's energy in order to benefit the three worlds. Without any doubt, all of (the scriptures) came forth there. The Siddhānta and (the Tantras of the) Mantravāda and (the class) called Tantravāda. O fair lady, all that current of the knowledge of Self, has come forth.

sadāśivena [k: -śivaṁ na] tattvena śivaśaktyā [k: -śivaktyā; kh: -śaktyād] bodhitena ca ||
jñānaughaṁ [k: jñānādya; kh: jñānogha] pūrṇadehena trailokyasya hitāya vai |
tatra te nirgatā [k: nirbhatā] sarve [k: sarva; kh: sarvaṁ] nātra kāryā [k, kh: kārya] vicāraṇā [k, kh: vicāraṇāt] ||
siddhāntaṁ mantravādaṁ ca tantravādam udāhṛtam |
tat sarvaṁ [k, kh: sarva] nirgataṁ cātmājñānaughaṁ [k: -jñānādyo; kh: -jñānogho] varavarṇini || belong to their earliest phase of redaction. Nonetheless, they preserve many archaic features and, moreover, several substantial fragments have been recovered in early Nepalese manuscripts. To these we may refer to gain some understanding of the situation prior to the BY, and also to the Niḥśvāsatattvasaṁhitā, which probably predates the BY – or, at least, partially represents a prior stage in the development of Āgamic Śaivism. There also we find that the term pīṭha is never used in the sense of a sacred site. Instead, along with 'kṣetra', we find the term 'tīrtha'. This word, although a common one for a sacred site in the Purāṇas, is relatively rare in the later Bhairava Tantras. It is significant, therefore, that the NTS lists a series of sacred rivers where the ascetic engaged in his wandering renouncer's life could bathe in accord with 'tīrthadharma'.[1] We also notice a list of places, many of which we recognize that are still especially connected with famous Liṅgas and commonly appear in the Purāṇas.[2] There too the Śaiva ascetic is enjoined to worship and bathe.

BY 33/320cd-322.

We should not put too much store on this reference as it belongs to a chapter that is concerned with the Śaiva canon (tantrāvatāra). This could have been inserted into the text at any time. It is likely that it was standard procedure to do this in order to lend greater authority to a text. However, there are also a few independent references in the BY to the Siddhānta. In one place, for example, the teacher is referred to as 'knowing all the Siddhāntas' (sarvasiddhāntavādin) (BY 14/205cd) and in another to penances that are prescribed by the 'worldly' (laukika) Siddhāntas (prāyaścittair [k: -cittaiḥ; kh: -cittai] viśudhyante siddhāntaiś [k, kh: -teś] caiva laukikaiḥ [k, kh: lo-] | BY 11/69ab).

[1] The passage opens with the goddess asking:

> You have explained (in the previous chapter) the duty of offering gifts (dānadharma); (now) tell me (about) the duty concerning the sacred bathing sites from which there will be the sacred fruit that comes from bathing in each sacred bathing site.

dānadharmas tvayākhātas tīrthadharmañ ca me vada |
*snānapuṇyaphalaṁ [kh: snāne-] yasmāt tīrthe tīrthe [k: tīr ] bhaviṣyati || NTS MS Kh fl. 9a.

The god (īśvara) responds by listing a number of rivers beginning with Gaṅgā and Sarasvatī and concludes by saying:

> He who is intent on keeping fast on (the banks of) these (rivers) that flow and are most excellent, having worshipped (there his) ancestors and gods, is freed of sin.

*upavāsaratas tāsu yaḥ sravantyas [k: śrā * ṁ; kh: srāyātran] tu saridvarāḥ [k, kh: -rāṁ]* | samabhyarcya [k: -bhyarcye] pitṚn devān [k: viṣṇu devā] sa tu mucyeta kilviṣāt [the last quarter is missing in MS K] || NTS MS Kh fl. 9a.

[2] The passage is corrupt. Perhaps comparison with other manuscripts will improve the readings. Moreover, some of the entries are clearly imaginary. Those on the second line, for example, are the names of Rudras who govern the letters, not places. Nonetheless, the reader can get some provisional idea of the sites considered sacred by the redactors of the NTS.

The latter activity, although important in smārta traditions, is hardly mentioned in the Bhairava Tantras; the sacred sites are places to meet Yoginīs, not to bathe. It seems, therefore, that at this stage (perhaps the 7th or 8th century) the Tantras had not yet developed a sacred geography that was specifically their own.

In this context we notice that at this early stage the term kṣetra is used in a broad, generic sense. There are eight kinds of kṣetras according to the Siddhāntāgamas. These are not specific places but types of locations where *kṣetraliṅga*s can be installed. These include the banks of a tank, river, or sea, the side of a well, the peak of a mountain, a forest, a cremation ground or a temple dedicated to the god.[1] These places are called 'localities of the heroes' (vīrasthāna). They are typical sites recommended in Tantras of all schools, including Vaiṣṇava and Buddhist, for adepts (sādhaka) to go and observe their Tantric vows (vrata) and repeat mantras[2] and, in the Kubjikā Tantras, the goddess's Vidyā particular.[3] The following passage in the KuKh, drawn from the TS, lists such isolated, lonely places, several of which are the sort where the goddess herself practiced and manifested herself:

Adorned with (the sacred insignia),[4] the one who recites

---

amareśaṁ [k: -sam] prabhāsaṁ ca naimiṣaṁ puṣkaraṁ tathā |
*āṣāḍhaṁ diṇḍimuṇḍiñ ca bhārabhūti * lākulam [k, kh: lākuliṁ]* || *harīndraṁ [k: hari * ndra; kh: * * * *] * yāraguhyaṁ (?) guhyaṁ [k: guhyarāhyam] madhyamakeśvaram* |
śrīparvataṁ samākhyātaṁ jalpeśvaram [k: jasyeśvara-] ataḥ param ||
āmrātikeśvaraṁ [k: asrāti-] caiva mahākālaṁ tathaiva ca |
kedāram [k: keśaram] uttamaṁ guhyam mahābhairavam eva ca ||
gayā [k: gayāṁś; kh: gayāṁ] caiva kurukṣetraṁ nakhalaṅ [k: takha-] kanakhalaṁ tathā |
vimalaṁ ca [kh: cā] mahāsaṁ [kh: ihāsaṁ] ca māhendram bhīmam aṣṭamam ||
*vastrāpadaṁ [k: vastra * daṁ] rudrakoṭir [k: -koṭim; kh: rudravāśīm] avimuktam mahāvanam [k: mahāva *; kh: mahā * ] |
*gokarṇam [kh: * * rṇa] bhadrakarṇaṁ [kh: śra * karṇaṁ] ca svarṇākhyaṁ [k, kh: -kṣaṁ] sthāṇu [k, kh: -ṇum] aṣṭamam* ||
*chagaraṇḍaṁ [kh: * garaṇḍaṁ] dviraṇḍaṁ ca sākoṭam [k, kh: mā-] maṇḍaleśvaram* |
kārāñjaraṁ [k: kāraṁjanaṁ] samākhyātaṁ devadāruvanaṁ tathā ||
śaṁkukarṇaṁ [k: saṅku-] tathaiveha sthaleśvaram [k: thaleśvara-] ataḥ param |
snānadarśanapūjābhir [kh: -darśanaṁ-] mucyate sarvakilviṣaiḥ || NTS MS Kh fl. 9b.

[1] Rauravāgama (kriyāpāda), 30/1-2.
[2] See KuKh 14/29cd-32ab.
[3] KuKh 11/97ab-100.
[4] The KMT (25/43-45) explains that the five insignias are the Five Instruments (karaṇa). These are the five deities who generate, sustain and withdraw the five gross elements, namely, Brahmā (Earth), Viṣṇu (Water), Rudra (Fire), Īśvara (Air), and Sadāśiva (Etheric Space). Their sonic form are the Five Praṇavas, which are discussed further ahead. Note that they are not only the ascetic's insignias, they are also the places in which he wanders. The insignias and the Great Elements in > mantra, taking (each sacred) field (kṣetra) as a refuge, should wander (from one to the other and within them. These places include), in due order, a cremation ground, (a deserted) forest, (an abandoned) well (or) garden, an auspicious temple, an empty palace, the peak of a mountain, a crossroad of four roads, one of three roads, village roads, the seashore, the bank of the confluence of rivers or, O sinless one, (a desert where there is only) a solitary tree or (where there is just) a single Liṅga or (any) fearful (caṇḍa) (sacred) field.[1]

The Śrīkāmākhyaguhyasiddhi, also called simply Guhyasiddhi, is attributed to Matsyendranātha.[2] In this text, the eight sites normally associated with the Mothers are identified with eight such places as follows: 1) Prayāga – cremation ground, 2) Varaṇā (i.e. Vārāṇasī)[3] – a solitary tree, 3) Kollā – a mountain peak, 4) Aṭṭahāsa – a temple of the Mothers,[4] 5) Jayantī – a palace, 6) Caritra – a deserted house, 7) Ekāmraka – the bank of a river, and 8) Devīkoṭa – a forest.[5]

These eight places (with the usual variants) are well established as those of the Mothers already in the BY and comprise one of the earliest pilgrimage circuits in those Bhairava Tantras that teach the worship of Yoginīs. The appearance of these places in this way, without the Mothers as typifying sacred places in general, suggests that they are part of an older sacred geography. Protective circles of Mothers are still worshipped around Newar towns in the Kathmandu Valley.[6] Larger circles covering whole regions are found in Orissa that were established by the beginning of the 11th century, if not before. The larger circuit extends from Orissa and Bengal in the east through Bihar and eastern Uttara Pradesh to the west.[7] The cult of the Mothers and the Yoginīs, a major feature of all Kaula cults, stimulated the development of what came to be an elaborate sacred geography. Analogous Buddhist cults of the Yogottara Tantras shared in the same development, adopting most of the Śaiva sites as their own also. While it is hardly possible to date Śaiva the form of the Five Praṇavas adorn the ascetic who abides in the heart of the subtle body where the deity resides.

---

[1] KuKh 14/29cd-32ab.

[2] A typical colophon begins: iti śrīmacchagnapādāvatāre śrīkāmākhyāvinirgataḥ guhyasiddhiḥ.

[3] Concerning the name Varaṇā for Vārāṇasī, see note to KuKh 16/3-4.

[4] The text reads 'gṛhamātrā' which I understand to stand for 'mātṛgṛha-'.

[5] śmaśānaṁ tu prayāgaṁ [prayoge] ca varaṇā ekavṛkṣakam || parvatāgro bhavet kollā gṛhamātrāṭṭahāskam |
prāsādas tu jayantī ca caritraṁ śūnyaveśma ca ||
ekāmrakaṁ [ekāgrakaṁ] nadītīram araṇyaṁ devikoṭakam |
sthānaṁ ca kathitaṁ bhadre . . . || GuSi (MS K) 2/5cd-7c.

[6] See Dyczkowski 2004: 165, map 8.

[7] See Dyczkowski 2004: 164, map 7.

Tantras with much certainty, the dating of their Buddhist counterparts is much easier because we know when they were translated into Tibetan and Chinese. Presuming that the texts developed around the same time, we may surmise the seventh century to be the time when these types of Tantras began to be written, although the type and form of the cults they describe preceded them.

In view of these developments, the Siddhāntāgamas, and the early Svacchandabhairavatantra, a Bhairava Tantra, are remarkably destitute of sacred geographies. Even so, what we do find may be taken to be an indication of the degree of spread of the cult of which they form a part. The SvT, for example, is particularly interested in the region called Madhyadeśa – the Middle Country. This was an area in central northern India of which Prayāga, the modern Allahabad, and Varanasi were the hub. The SvT recommends that teachers who came from other parts of India should be avoided.[1]

Internalisation of the Sacred Seats

The process of interiorising sacred sites by finding inner homologues for them probably developed hand in hand with the development of the outer sites and appropriation by the Bhairava and other types of Tantras. The reference from the BY quoted above tells us that even at this early stage the formation of imagined substitutes for sacred sites was already practiced. Guided by the principles he found in his Tantric sources and the monistic phenomenology of the Pratyabhijñā, Abhinavagupta (c. 975-1050 CE) systematically expounded a possible pattern of total internalisation of such sites and, indeed, all Tantric ritual. He argues that the reason why this is possible and should be realised is in every case the same, namely, that everything is a manifestation of consciousness within consciousness, like a reflection in a mirror. Thus as long as this has not been realised, rituals and pilgrimages may be performed but, as Abhinava says, 'for one who sees that all this rests primarily in the body, the inner vital breath and in consciousness, what use are these other outer deluding peregrinations (bhramaṇaḍambara)?'[2]

Worship at sacred sites does not lead to liberation. Abhinava stresses that even if they are projected onto the body or, deeper, into the vital breath, they remain external to consciousness. Nonetheless, Abhinava does not deny that pilgrimage may be beneficial, in the sense that it does yield some fruit, namely, the specific benefits and accomplishments (siddhi), magical and yogic, that each of these places and its resident deities is supposed to bestow.[1] These, however, are worldly benefits (bhoga) rather than the liberated condition.[2] Even so, Abhinava does not reject external ritual. Pilgrimage to sacred sites, like all ritual and yogic practice, are part of a hierarchy of possibilities depending on the spiritual development of the aspirant.[3] Moreover, going to places where spiritual people gather is conducive to the practice of Yoga and the acquisition of spiritual knowledge.[4] Even so, he denies that places have any inherent power in themselves. One may worship successfully wherever the lotus of the heart of consciousness unfolds.[5]

[1] SvT 1/13. Similarly, the ŚM (20/21-22ab) lists a number of regions that are inauspicious in the same way.

[2] TĀ 15/100cd-101ab.

While the Kubjikā Tantras agree that for this, or any, spiritual discipline to be effective, its interior equivalent must be experienced, they do not deny the existence of the power of place (sthānaśakti). According to this theory, the rays of the deity's consciousness converge in certain places by virtue of these places' inherent power. This convergence and formation in this way of a location where the deity may descend into the world is essential because no worship is possible in

---

[1]Abhinava writes:

Thus all these places, internal and external, concern (only) those who wish to obtain the fruits of this or that Wheel (cakra). According to the (Śaiva) scripture, these places (sthāna) are diverse and without number. TĀ 15/101cd-102ab.

[2]Abhinava writes:

Mountain peaks, riverbanks, solitary Liṅgas and the like mentioned (in the Tantras) are external (places). Here (in this doctrine) they serve (as a means to attain) particular accomplishments, not for liberation. Mountain peaks and the like, projected into the vital breath within the body, serve as a means for (Tantric) practitioners (sādhaka) to gain accomplishment (siddhi) not for liberation. TĀ 15/80cd-82ab.

[3]Abhinava quotes the Mataṅgatantra as saying that:

This prescription to ritual action (vidhāna) is an easy means (sukhopāya) that the teacher explains to those who are unable to contemplate (the true liberating) knowledge (vidyā). TĀ 15/8.

Therefore, initiation (dīkṣā), Tantric spiritual discipline (caryā) and concentration (samādhi) are for those who are unable to attain reality directly by knowledge. Even so, initiation and the rest are based on knowledge and so, according to Abhinava, the man of knowledge (jñānin) rather than the one who performs rituals, or even the yogi, is the best. Similarly, he says that teachers are of increasing orders of excellence according to whether they are proficient in the performance of rituals, Yoga or knowledge (TĀ 15/18-19).

[4]Ibid. 15/98cd-100ab.

[5]Abhinava writes:

The wealth of the sacrifice (yāgaśrī) is well established in that place (dhāman), whether internal or external, where the lotus of the heart blooms (vikāsa). Liberation is not (attained) in any other way except by severing the knot of ignorance and that, according to the venerable Vīrāvalītantra, is (brought about) by the expansion (vikāsa) of consciousness. Ibid. 15/107cd-109ab.

the absence of location. Each deity, whether in the outside world or within the body, must have a place of its own. This place, which serves as the sacred seat and field of the deity, is where union (melāpa) with the deity takes place. Consuming a sacrificial meal of meat and wine, the adept receives the grace of the deity of that place which is thus no less sacred than the deity itself.

In a more archaic, magical perspective, such places were originally believed to be potent in themselves, and this potency could be channelled and applied. Indeed, the Tantras prescribe the practice of magical rites aimed at the control of others and the destruction of one's enemies in these same places. Abhinava's warning against attachment to the practice of magic[1] recalls to mind the large amount of space dedicated to such matters in the Tantras in general and most particularly in ones such as these. The passages are eloquent testimony of the primitive animistic and magical substratum of the religious culture out of which they developed as more elevated refinements – literally 'sanskritizations'. One of these refinements is the incorporation of the ideal of liberation as a part of this geography of magical power places where the adept acquires powers, including the Great Accomplishment (mahāsiddhi), liberation. The culmination of this process of refinement was not the addition of a totally different, higher ideal, but rather its internalisation. These Tantras did not teach, as did Abhinava, that liberation and the attainment of accomplishment (siddhi) are contrasting ideals belonging to different realms. On the contrary, the Kubjikā Tantras say that:

> If one perceives the pure inner aspect with the mind, then, O beloved, one sees the subtle rays (of the light of the Supreme Principle) that are outside and they bestow union (melaka), the sacrificial pap (caru) or the liberated state (apāśavīvidhi). They bestow the (teachings of the) tradition or explain the (location of each sacred) place (sthāna). O god, they do not bestow a vision (darśana) (of the deity) by means of the mind, no matter where one wanders on the earth with an impure inner state. Although he sees, he sees not; although (reality is) perceivable, it is not perceived. He cannot know (the rays of consciousness which are) the goddesses of various kinds.[2] [. . .] (Their grace arises) in town, village, forest, city or crossroad, in a peasant's hut, at a meeting ground (saṁdoha), a sacred seat (pīṭha), a field, grove, garden, small grove or in (any of the other) aforementioned (places). (Indeed), the rays of consciousness (jñāna) arise in every single place. O fair-hipped one, (they are present in)

---

[1] One should never be attached to the business of magic. Even the experience (bhoga) of Sadāśiva is bondage for those for whom it is not proper that it be (known). TĀ 14/26.

[2] KuKh 14/83cd-87ab.

countless (numbers) upon the cover of the earth; so too in water, fire, wind and space.[1]

The 'rays of consciousness' are embodied in countless Yoginīs who are the beings who populate such places. Protectors of place, they must be propitiated and worshipped as are local goddesses and gods of villages throughout India. Thus the aspirant is admonished to be a pilgrim. But along with his outer pilgrimage he must learn to travel through his own body along the conduits of the vital force to their vital centres. This is his inner journey through the world orders, arranged as stations along his ascent to freedom. He must travel through the universe – the Egg of Brahmā. Then when he reaches the top he will find Daṇḍapāṇi who, with his staff, cracks open the Egg for him to ascend up beyond it.[2] The accomplished adept is one who is free to move at will (svecchācarin) throughout the cosmic order[3] and beyond it. Thus, the Tantras envisage an end to the initiate's cosmic wayfaring. The universe is not a closed system; reality extends beyond it, for otherwise there could be no freedom from the cosmic order. There is no break between the realms of worldly experience (bhoga) and those of the liberated state. Even beyond the cosmic order, at the very summit of reality (parā kāṣṭhā), movement does not cease. But the perfected initiate (siddha) no longer needs to suffer the strains of a long and tiring journey. No longer held fast by the forces of attraction to the glorious diversity (vicitratā) of the cosmic order, he is free to take flight. No longer wandering in the complex net of Māyā with its countless locations and times, he moves through the Sky of Pure Consciousness.

According to the Kubjikā Tantras, the fruits of travelling to the sites of the Eight Mothers with the prescribed inner mindfulness are indeed, as Abhinava says of all such pilgrimages, the acquisition of various magical and yogic powers (siddhi). These are attained over years of practice in a graded order until the final one is attained, which is the Accomplishment of Flight. Even though it comes at the end of a graded series of worldly attainments, this culminating accomplishment is not worldly (bhoga), but liberation itself. Ideally, the KMT tells us that in this particular case, this takes place in twelve years when 'even one who has murdered a brahmin' achieves success. In the first year he gains political power. The king and his harem come under his control and the king's vassal lords and ministers venerate him. In two years he gains power over the fair damsels of

---

[1] Ibid. 14/88-90.

[2] Paraphrasing the SvT, Abhinava writes:

Below (the shell of) the Egg of Brahmā and above Rudra is the abode of Daṇḍapāṇi who, in accord with Śiva's will, breaks the Egg and fashions the path to liberation. TĀ 8/160, cf. SvT 10/611cd-614.

[3] Cf. He wanders as he pleases right up to the end of the world of Brahmā.
bhramate ca yathecchayā ābrahmabhuvanāntikam | ŚM 14/274cd.

the spirits of vegetation (yakṣakanyā). In three years, the women of the demons of the seven hells are so aroused by the adept that they literally die in their yearning for him. In the following years he attains the higher worlds, starting with that of Brahmā up to that of Rudra. In the eighth year he reaches that of Īśvara, in the ninth that of Sadāśiva and in the tenth he becomes a veritable repository of knowledge. By the eleventh year, he can sport in the sky with the mighty beings who reside there, and in the twelfth, endowed with all eight yogic powers,[1] he moves with the Skyfarers in the Firmament of Pure Consciousness beyond the sky. This then is the ideal of the Bhairava and Kaula Tantras, namely, the Accomplishment of Flight (khecaratvasiddhi).[2]

The Siddhas and Yoginīs who reside in the sacred places in the Triangle are all Skyfarers. They move in the Void of the Yoni, nourishing themselves with the nectar of immortality that exudes from it. They are one with the goddess who embodies the energy that 'wanders in the Void' (khecarī). As the energy of Speech, she vitalizes all the phonemic energies that combine in infinite variety. As each of them is a sacred place,[3] she is not only the Nameless (anāmā) Letter but also Place (sthāna) – what the text calls the divine inner Place that is one's own place (svasthāna).[4]

Abhinava, in accord with his hermeneutic, provides a more sophisticated phenomenological interpretation. The energy that 'wanders in the Void' is the reflective awareness of the light of consciousness that shines as all things. This energy wanders amidst the objects of the senses and they thus become objects of perception. By extension, this same power is responsible for the subjective responses to the object, whether attraction or repulsion. Consisting of both the

---

[1] Concerning the eight yogic powers see KuKh 8/123-124 and also note to KuKh 4/5cd-6ab.
[2] KMT 25/53-64ab.
[3] See notes to KuKh 6/212cd-219ab.
[4] Khecarī clearly manifest is the letter called Without Name (anāmā). (She is) Vāgbhava (AIṀ) (that contains) the series of letters from A to KṢa in the form of sleeping serpent. Radiant like the Wish-granting Gem, it is the expanse (vistara) that is Kula Bhairava. It is the Place (sthāna), the divine inner Place that is one's own place (svasthāna) present on the earth. It is bliss whose body is invisible (adṛṣṭa). The pure transcendent tradition (anvaya). O goddess, this is the teaching concerning the transmission of the Divine Current.

anāmāvarṇanāmā [k gh: -nāmamantu; kh g: -nāman] tu vāgbhavaṁ [g: vāgbhedaṁ] khecarī sphuṭam ||
akārādikṣakārāntaṁ [k, kh, gh: -ntā; g: -rāntaṁ] prasuptanāgavigraham [sarve: prasuptaṁnanda-] |
cintāmaṇisamaprakhyaṁ [sarve: -mani-] vistaraṁ kulabhairavam ||
sthānaṁ sthānāntaraṁ divyaṁ svasthānaṁ avanīgatam [sarve: opanirgataṁ] |
adṛṣṭavigrahānandam atītaṁ [sarve: adiṣṭa-] vimalānvayam [gh: -nvaya] ||
evaṁ tu kathitaṁ [g: kathitaṁn] devi divyaughakramanirṇayam [k gh: divyogha-; g: divyoghe-] |
CMSS 1/34cd-37ab.

inner and outer senses as well as their objects, this energy courses through the spheres of subjectivity, perception and objectivity even as it flows through the emptiness of the transcendental unity of pure consciousness that precedes and sustains them.[1] The Skyfarer is one with this energy. Thus, whatever she or he sees becomes a divine manifestation of consciousness. We are reminded here of one of the modalities through which the goddess generates sacred place, that is, by her powerful and gracious gaze.[2]

These sacred sites are subject to considerable manipulation and internalisation in a surprising number of ways. Some of these have been examined in a previous publication.[3] Here we shall examine a few more to extend our understanding of the manner the main sacred seats developed, both in themselves and by further additions. The internal projection of the sites is part of the general and necessary process of domestication of such Tantric cults to render them accessible to a wider range of initiates. Transposition of such places to one's own home was also a possibility.[4] The worship of household deities residing in places in the home and the household utensils is well attested as far back as the Atharvaveda and the early Gṛhyasūtras. It is still common practice all over India – even though nowadays, as one would expect, it is more popular in villages than in towns, and mostly forms a part of the religious practice of women rather then men. Some of these household deities are very common. The most well know is Gaṇeśa who presides over the doorstep. Other household deities are more regional, even local in character. The two categories of sites – household, and

[1] PTv p. 13.
[2]Abhinava arrives at the same creative idealism through an analysis of Śaiva (rather than Kaula Śākta) spirituality when he says:

The Śivahood of consciousness (saṁvidātman) is the agency in the five functions of emanation, persistence, reabsorption, obscuration and grace. The worship, repetition of mantra, contemplation and Yoga of the yogi who considers his own nature to be complete (and perfect) as the freedom to perform (these) five functions, are perpetual (sadodita). TĀ 14/24-25.

[3] The reader is referred to chapter four of Dyczkowski 2004 with which some of the material presented in this chapter is common.
[4] For example, we read in the JY:

Having gone to a place where there are no people, a mountain peak, the bank of a river, a frightening cremation ground, a beautiful deserted forest or a secluded part of the house at night or wherever (else) one pleases, or having reached (that) great place which is a sacred seat of Yoginīs and levelled the ground, extract the Vidyā.

*gatvā tu nirjanaṁ sthānaṁ parvatāgraṁ nadītaṭam [k: na -; kh: naṭīmtaṭam] |
śmaśānaṁ bhīṣaṇaṁ kāntam araṇyaṁ [k: -ya] janavarjitam ||
athavā [k: apavā] bhūgṛhaṁ guptaṁ rātrau vā yatra rocate |
samāsādya [k: -sadya] mahāsthānaṁ yoginīpīṭham eva [k: yāginī-] vā || bhūmibhāgaṁ [k, kh: -bhāga] samaṁ kṛtvā tatra vidyāṁ samuddharet | JY 2/19/27-29ab.

those set in the outer sacred geography – is well exemplified in the following projections taught in the KMT and ṢSS:

> The man of knowledge should mark the sacred fields located in the towns. Thus (this) category (bheda) has been explained externally; now listen (to how it is) in the home. Prayāga is in the middle (of the house). Varuṇā is present in the door. Kollāpura is in the scissors (kāñcī). The stove is Aṭṭahāsaka. One should know that the threshing floor (peṣaṇī) is Jayantī and Caritra is the mortar (kaṇḍanī) (in which grain is cleaned or threshed). The winnowing fan is said to be Ekāmraka and Devikoṭa is the grinding stone (gharaṭṭaka). (Thus there are) the dish (used to cover water jars) (vardhamānī), the bedstead (upālambhī),[1] mortar (muśala), threshold, stove, winnowing fan and grinding stone.
>
> Starting with the dish in due order, one should not touch these with one's feet, if one wants the best for oneself. One should stay far away from a broom and the wind produced by a winnowing fan. Obstacles (vighna), Siddhas and Yoginīs that have penetrated the wind (vātāviṣṭa) enter the adept having identified (his) weak spot (chidra), and lay hold of the best (within him) (śreyas) for no reason. (The adept) abides in (each) place (sthāna) in the (eight) sacred fields, (namely) Gaṇikā, Śiras, Kālī, Kāla, Ālaya, Śiva, Kāliñjara, and Mahākāla.
>
> (Thus) one should know by means of (this) ploy (cumbana) that bestows the fruit of worldly benefits and liberation (both) what is in the primary and secondary sacred seats and meeting grounds (saṁdoha)[2] as well as what is in the towns, home and body. Thus, O lady of fine vows, the sacred seats and fields have been explained externally.[3]

---

[1] I have translated in accord with the commentary on the ṢSS which says that this word denotes a bedstead (khaṭvā).

[2] The terms saṁdoha and upasaṁdoha are of uncertain derivation. They are also terms in common usage in the Buddhist Tantras in this or a similar form (such as chandoha). See HT 1/7/10-18. Jayaratha derives the term from the root saṁduh, meaning to milk, suck, or ooze (milk). Thus he says that: a saṁdohaka (is what has been milked) because it consists mainly of the exuded secretion of the secondary seats (saṁdohaketi upapīṭhaniḥsyandaprāyatvāt TĀ vol. VI p. 2489 of the edition by Dwivedi and Rastogi).

The Netravibhaṅga, a commentary on the HT by Dharmakīrti, gives the following explanation of what these classes of sacred sites are:

> It is called a 'seat' (pīṭha) because one always stays there and performs the practice, also because the yogis stay there. Because it is near to that place, it is called 'nearby seat' (upapīṭha). It is called 'field' (kṣetra), because it produces good qualities, also because the mother-goddesses

Despite the thoroughness with which the sites and all that had to do with pilgrimage had been internalised, the injunction to actually visit these places was not modified. The following passage from a Kubjikā Tantra not only encourages the worship of the sacred seats, which can be done anywhere, it tells us of the fruits of visiting them in the standard style of pilgrimage texts:

> He who constantly worships the transmission (krama) of the sacred seats that has come down through the sequence of the series (of teachers) (pāramparyakrama), having known it thus, is himself Bhairava directly apparent. He who does the round of the sacred seats, whether he is a teacher (ācārya) or an adept (sādhaka), is liberated. He is Śiva directly apparent; he is (a true) member of the tradition and the best of teachers. By attending (sevana) the sacred seats, all (one's) countless sins are destroyed, whether one has committed brahminicide a thousand times (or even) if one has killed a myriad cows. So one should worship the four seats constantly. The desire of one (who does) so becomes an accomplishment (siddhi) and he is dear to the Yoginīs.[1] stay there. Because it is near to there, it is called 'near-by field' (upakṣetra). Because one desires and yearns, it is called Chando. Because it is near there, it is called 'near-by Chando'. It is called 'meeting place' (melāpaka) because it is the site of a place, [for example] Magadha and Aṅgamagadha. It is called 'near-by meeting place' because it is near there. It is called 'cemetery' (śmaśāna) because no discriminating thought (vikalpa) arises and because there are many corpses. It is called 'near-by cemetery', because it is near to there. Comm. on HT 1/7/10. The translation is by Snellgrove.

---

[3]purasthitāni kṣetrāṇi jñānātmā lakṣayet tataḥ |
bāhyataḥ kathito bhedo gṛhasthaḥ śṛṇu sāmpratam ||
prayāgaṁ madhyadeśe tu varuṇā dvāra-m-āśritā [k kh: -taṁ] | kollāpuraṁ tu kāñcinyāṁ [k kh: kaṁjinyāṁ] cullī caivāṭṭahāsakam ||
jayantī pīṣaṇī jñeyā caritraṁ kuṇḍanī smṛtā |
*śūrpam ekāmrakaṁ [k kh: śū * me-] proktaṁ devikoṭaṁ gharaṭṭakam* ||
vardhamānī upālambhī [k kh: mu-] muśalaṁ dehalam tathā |
cullī śūrpaṁ [k kh: śūrpa] gharaṭṭaṁ ca vardhamānāditaḥ kramāt ||
pādair naitān [k kh: pādai] tu [k kh: ta] saṁspṛśed yadīcchec chreyam ātmanaḥ |
mārjanīṁ [k kh: -nī] śūrpavātaṁ ca [k kh: -vānaśca] dūrataḥ parivarjayet ||
vātāviṣṭāḥ praviśyanti cchidraṁ matvā tu sādhake |
vighnāni siddhayoginyaḥ śreyaṁ [k kh: śreyo] * gṛhṇanty anārthataḥ ||
gaṇikā śirasākhyaṁ [k kh: śiracā-] ca kālī [k kh: -li] kālālayaṁ śivam |
kāliñjaraṁ mahākālaṁ kṣetreṣu sthāna-m-āśritaḥ [k, kh: -tāḥ] ||
pīṭhopapīṭhasandohapurasthaṁ [k kh: -saṁdohaṁ-] gṛhadehagam [k kh: -gaḥ] | jñātavyaṁ cumbakenaiva bhuktimuktiphalapradam ||
bāhyataḥ kathitāny evaṁ pīṭhakṣetrāṇi suvrate | ṢSS 49/138-146ab.
* Note that śreyo has been emended to the deviant śreyam instead of the regular śreyasam, which does not fit the metre.

[1] KuKh 6/184cd-185ab.

That the injunction to visit these places should be taken literally is further reinforced by the warning that follows that the adept who goes to or resides in these places should not be proud.[1] Peregrination to the sacred places is variously termed. It may be simply called a 'wandering' (aṭana, bhramaṇa). This may be associated with the pious wandering of the ascetic in search of alms (bhikṣāṭana)[2] and, especially, begging for alms in the eight sacred Kaula places listed below. Accordingly, these places are called 'sacred seats of peregrination' (aṭanapīṭha). They are the residences of goddesses, accomplished adepts and Tantric partners who are represented as low-caste women or close female relatives. From this point of view they are called 'houses' (gṛha, ghara, veśman). Thus, according to the Kubjikā Tantras, the eight major Kaula sacred sites each have a house occupied by a woman of low caste who is identified with a Mother (Mātṛkā), as recorded in the penultimate entry of the following table.[3] The second entry in bold records the identifications made by the Mādhavakula and the Devyāyāmala, both Kālī Tantras that prescribe the worship of Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī as the supreme form of Kālī.[4]

1) Prayāga[5]—prostitute (veśyā), sweeper (mātaṅgī)—Brahmāṇī—navel.
2) Varaṇā[6]—liquor seller (śuṇḍinī), collyrium girl (kajjalī)—Māheśvarī (Śāṅkarī)—heart.
3) Kollā[7]—fisherwoman (kaivartī), butcher woman (saunī)—Kaumārī—throat.
4) Aṭṭahāsa—chalk miner woman (khaṭṭikā), passionate woman (kāmukī)[8]—Vaiṣṇavī—palate.

[1] KuKh 6/196cd-202ab.
[2] KuKh 16/1-2.
[3] The identifications of the resident low-caste women (who are referred to as goddesses) with the Eight Mothers (Mātṛkā) are according to KuKh 16/13-15. The identification of these female beings with the Mothers may not be an original part of the teachings of the Kubjikā Tantras. There are several places in the Kubjikā Tantras where these eight places with their low-caste residents are listed as a group, with occasional variants, without associating them with the Mothers. This is the case in the KMT (25/90-95ab) and also, for example, in KuKh 14/78-80. The latter source supplies the inner equivalents (adhyātma). Note also that this identification is not made in the Mādhavakula and Devyāyāmala.
[4] Quoted in TĀ 29/66-67.
[5] We shall see that in the great majority of cases, despite the usual variants, the group of eight Mothers begins with Brāhmī who resides in Prayāga – an arrangement that must have become a standard one quite early on.
[6] The quotation in the printed edition of the TĀ lists Varuṇā as the name of this place. This is probably an editorial error for Varaṇā. Referring to this place, the KuKh declares that: 'Varaṇā is in Vārāṇasī' (KuKh 16/17).
[7] This place is Kollāgiri. The edition of the TĀ reads Kulagiri.
[8] The edition of the TĀ reads kārmukī.

5) Jayantikā—ball-making woman (kaṇḍukī), leather worker (carmakāriṇī)—Vārāhī—drop.
6) Caritra—washerwoman (rajakī), liquor seller (dhvajinī)—Indrāṇī—sound.
7) Ekāmra—sculptress (śilpinī), bone crusher woman (asthividāriṇī)—Cāmuṇḍā—the place of power (śaktisthāna).[1]
8) Devīkoṭa[2]—outcaste woman (antyajā), fisherwoman (dhīvarī)—Mahālakṣmī[3]—teacher's mouth.[4]

These texts not only confirm that this set of eight places is a standard one, it also exemplifies how sacred sites can be rendered easily accessible not just by projecting them into the adept's body but also into his environment. A substantial passage in the TS, reproduced in the KMT, eulogizes the inner sacred seats. These are presented there as the most important. The outer ones have been revealed only for the sake of worldly concerns:

> As long as he does not attain the sacred seat that is the inner teaching (adhyātmanirṇaya),[5] how can he achieve success (siddhi), even if he wanders (throughout) the triple universe?[6]

The Tantra takes care to find interior equivalents for all the features that characterize sacred sites, their power, location, and even those relating to the pilgrim who visits them – his dress, lifestyle, the remarkable sights on his journey and encounters. But although these internalised equivalents allow the adept to undertake the same pilgrimage inwardly through ritual, visualization and yogic practice, the texts do not deny or prohibit the actual outer pilgrimage provided that the outer forms are sustained by their inner representations because '(both) the

---

[1] This is the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head.
[2] The KuKh calls this place, as does KMT (25/94), by its alternative name, that is, Koṭivarṣa.
[3] There is an extra ninth entry according to the Mādhavakula and the Devyāyāmala. This is Haimapura, where the oil-grinding woman (cakriṇī) resides. As the 'mistress of the wheels' she is appropriately identified with Kuṇḍalinī. More specifically, she is Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī who, as the Mistress of the Kula (Kuleśvarī), is worshipped in the centre either alone, with her consort or independently of the eight listed above. Although the references quoted in the Tantrāloka do not tell us this specifically, the eight may also be identified with the Eight Mothers who surround Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī represented by her seventeen-syllable mantra.
[4] The teacher's mouth (guruvaktra) is the End of the Twelve above the head. This is where the energy of the Transmental (unmanī) is located through which the teachings flow down from the transcendent reality above. Inner maps of these eight places and the projection of the Eight Mothers onto the body drawn from the Śrīmatottara and the Śrīkāmākhyaguhyasiddhi have been published by Dehejia 1986: 48.
[5] KMT: the inner (adhyātmika) sacred seat.
[6] KuKh 14/81cd-82ab.

inner and outer aspects have an inner and outer condition'.[1] Similarly, the god teaches in the JY:

> O goddess, the inner procedure can only be accomplished by the outer liturgy (bāhyakrama). There would be no inner practice without the external one. The accomplishment of the invisible that bestows realisation is by means of the visible.[2]

Injunctions such as the following in the JY clearly refer to actual outer places, although they may be internalised, as indeed anything can be:

> Gone to a cemetery, the hero should repeat 100,000 (mantric) syllables constantly. At the end he should make a tenth the number of fire offerings, as explained before. At the end of the offering to the fire he will have a vision of the goddess in the sacrificial hearth and, along with her, he will fly in the sky where the goddess is Karaṅkinī.[3]

Obviously not everybody achieves these results, nonetheless it is still a common sight in India to see adepts – both householders and renouncers – sitting in cremation grounds at night performing rituals, repeating mantras and making fire offerings. More specifically the JY recommends that the adept reside in a sacred seat, just as he would in the other kinds of places, to observe his Tantric vow:

> Devoted to the teacher, god and fire, expert in mantra and ritual (tantra), endowed with knowledge and wisdom, one who praises (the observance of) vows and Tantric practice (caryā) resides in the sacred seat of the great Bhairava, his form fashioned from energies (kalā). His mind intent on (the practice of) that Yoga, he impels the sacred seat of mantras.[4]

---

[1] KuKh 14/82cd.

[2] devi [k: deva] bāhyakrameṇaiva sādhyā [k, kh, g: sādhya] ādhyātmikāvidhiḥ |
vinā bāhyena vidhinā na [kh: (?)] cet [kh: (?)] svādhyātmakā [kh: (?); g: syādhyāyakāṁ] vidhiḥ [k, kh, g: vidhiṁ] ||
dṛṣṭenādṛṣṭasaṁsiddhiḥ pratītiṁ [k, kh, g: -tiḥ] saṁprayacchati | JY 4/8/107-108ab.

[3] gatvā pitṛgṛhaṁ [k: pibhṛgṛhaṁ] vīro japel lakṣākṣaraṁ [kh: ?] sadā [kh: ?] ||
*ante [k: anta; kh: ?] daśāṁśato [k: daśāto; kh: ?] juhyād dhomaṁ [k: ja * * dvāmaṁ; kh: * * ?ddhomaṁ] pūrvoktam eva [k: pūrvākta-] hi |
homāntād [k: homītād] vahnikuṇḍasthā [k: -kuḍasthā] devidarśanam eṣyati [k: -madhyati] ||
tayā sārdhaṁ [k: sāddhaṁ] vrajed vyoma [k: dhyāma] yatra devī karaṅkiṇī | JY 2/44/1cd-3ab.

[4] gurudevāgnibhaktas tu mantratantraviśāradaḥ | jñānavijñānasaṁpanno vratacaryābhinandanaḥ ||
mahābhairavapīṭhasthaḥ kalākalpitavigrahaḥ |

Ultimately, however, the Kaula ritual taught in the JY does not require pilgrimage to sacred sites (tīrtha) or, indeed, any outer forms. It is enough to just recollect them.[1] The KMT goes so far as to say that 'the external sacred seats have been revealed only in order to instil devotion in common people'.[2] Clearly, by the time the TS was redacted, which was may well be a century or two prior to the KMT and hence also the JY, which is later than the KMT,[3] the outer sacred sites were already being projected into the yogi's body and 'inner' counterparts were established. Even so, by reversing the perspective of the texts from their 'inner' focus to the original outer form, we may get an idea of the praxis involved when pilgrimages to such places did concretely take place. That these processes had already reached an advanced stage by this time suggests that the sacred sites themselves and their internalisation already had a substantial history behind them when the TS was redacted. Moreover, the silence of the TS concerning the major sacred seats indicates that they are a late development in the sacred geography of such Tantras. Indeed, the KuKh acknowledges that these four sacred seats (viz. Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa) along with the four Siddhas and the rest are a basic feature of this school, though little known to others.[4]

The Kubjikā tradition begins the process of internalising the sacred sites by projecting them into the maṇḍala, the core of which is the triangle that symbolizes the goddess's Yoni. The land of Bhārata is said in the KMT to be 'a part of the virgin (goddess)' (kumārikākhaṇḍa) implying that its triangular shape, already well known for centuries, is the outer, physical, and geographical macrocosmic equivalent of the goddess's Yoni. So although the contents and other details of the Triangle representing the Yoni are not elaborated to any great extent in the KMT, the seeds were already sown. We have seen in the previous chapter that the projection of the main four sacred seats into this Triangle has already taken place and they are already a feature of the teachings. Bhairava proclaims in the KMT that the Tradition consists of the sacred seats, their lords, the Siddhas, the mothers of the sacred seats close to them, and the goddess in the middle of the sacred seats who is accompanied by the four Siddhas who teach in the four main seats.[5] Thus it is sufficient to worship just the Triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala where, significantly, in some ritual contexts the scripture (āgama) is placed. As the KMT goes on to say:

---

mantrapīṭhapraṇetā ca tadyogodyatamānasaḥ [k: -dyuta-] || JY 1/14/23-24.

[1] TĀ 29/65. This verse is embedded in a substantial section Abhinava draws and reworks from chapters 20 and 21 of the fourth ṣaṭka of the JY and so may also have been drawn from there.

[2] KuKh 14/82cd-83a = TS 15/78ab, 79cd.

[3] We have reserved part of the last chapter of this introduction for a discussion of the relative dating of these and other major sources.

[4] KuKh 60/70.

[5] KMT 19/106 ff. pīṭhamadhyagatāṁ devīṁ catuḥsiddhasamanvitām | Ibid. 19/109cd.

> Worshiping the principle (ādya) maṇḍala of the Yoni daily in this way and generating its supreme pervasion, the Current of the Transmission (kramaugha) is set into operation. This is the divine foundation of the Current (of the tradition).[1]

The group of major sacred seats is one of the Kubjikā Tantra's favourite topics. They return to it again and again as a part of a general process of projection and enrichment of the sacred geography of the Yoni, which is one of the major features of the development of the doctrines of the Kubjikā Tantras after the KMT. The measure in which the importance of the worship of internalised sacred sites develops can be gauged by the extension of this process into the hexagram that encompasses the triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala. There six seats are worshipped and so, as we shall see, this becomes a common set which is variously represented and to which, like the cardinal four seats, compounding layers of symbolic meaning are attributed. These six include the four in the Triangle, so these are worshipped twice and are accordingly invested with extra layers of meaning and sacred energy. The YKh carries this process further, by replacing the Eight Mothers and their eight sites with eight sacred seats worshipped on the eight petals of the lotus that surrounds the hexagram.[2] These include the six sites in the hexagram. Thus the main seats are worshipped three times in this set up.

Another line of development in this mania for inner sacred geography is the projection of sacred seats within the triangle, not just on the corners and centre. These are associated with the phonemic energies of the letters of the alphabet whose presence there is already well known to the KMT and its predecessors, although their link to specific sacred sites is not. However, the ground is prepared for this development by linking the four seats projected into the Triangle with the corresponding four letters which, the ṢSS enjoins, should be clearly marked and worshipped there. Moreover, the remaining phonemes are understood to be in fields, villages, towns and cities, although where they are is not specified.[3]

---

[1] KMT 19/119-120a.

[2] See below, p. 552 ff. for details.

[3] In the ṢSS we read: O fair faced one, I will tell (you) about the extraction of the seed-syllables in the grid (of letters) (gahvara). One should make an effort to know that the locations of the sacred seats in the grid (are marked) by the letters located (in the cells of the letters) A Ṛ Ga and Ha, which correspond to (the sacred seats of) KĀ (Kāmarūpa), PŪ (Pūrṇagiri), JĀ (Jālandhara), and O (Oḍiyāna), respectively.

gahvare saṁpravakṣyāmi bījoddhāraṁ varānane |

According to the later Kubjikā Tantras, the fifty sacred sites are the residence of the Rudras and Yoginīs who preside over the letters, implying that the goddess posted them there in the course of her pilgrimage around the land of Bhārata.[1] The final – one could say complete – expansion of this sacred geography projected into the goddess's inner and outer maṇḍala is a group of sixty-four. Each place has a Yoginī and a guardian (kṣetrapāla). The first twenty-four sites are found in the KMT, which describes the way they should be worshipped in a maṇḍala. This is done as a penance for transgressing the Rule to recover lost spiritual power and, as usual, for the acquisition of powers and protection. The same benefits may be acquired by just mentally recollecting them and reciting the Hymn to the Sacred Seats (pīṭhastava). The KMT explains:

> Having (mentally) formed (the twenty-four sacred places) beginning with Aṭṭahāsa and ending with Rājagṛha along with the goddesses with (their) weapons and accompanied by the guardians, by attending (sevana) the sacred fields, primary and secondary, and the meeting places (sandoha), he becomes pure. O dear one, he who is incompetent or careless (but nevertheless) gets up in the morning and recites (this hymn) achieves perfect purity by eulogizing the sacred seats. I will tell (you) that so that (the observance of) the Rule (samaya) may be purified.[2] [. . .]

---

a – ṛ – ga -hasthitairvarṇaiḥ [k kh: adhāgāḍha- -varṇṇair] kā – pū – jā -okrameṇa [k kh: -nukrameṇa] tu ||
jñātavyāni prayatnena pīṭhasthānāni gahvare | ṢSS 34/2-3ab.
The commentary explains:

> These are the four seeds of the Ages and those of the sacred seats. Why have the (seeds of) the Ages and the sacred seats been extracted from the gahvara grid? It is said (in reply) that they are extracted for those who (practice inwardly) without outer ritual (nirācāra) and desire to arouse (the energy) of the world and for their own worldly enjoyment. [. . .]
>
> Again, (the seeds of) the Ages should be worshipped in the corners or, having entered therein, within the field, village, town, sacred seat or city. One should reside there and then (the energy) of the worlds is aroused and one gets worldly pleasure and accomplishment (siddhi). (The rest is) clear. (This is where they are worshipped) externally.

ete yugabījāś catvāraḥ evaṁ pīṭhabījās [k kh: -vījāḥ] tathā | yugapīṭhā [kh: yugavijāḥ] gahvaraprastārāt [kh: gahvaraprastāt] kimarthaṁ uddhṛtāḥ || ucyate || ye nirācārāḥ lokasya kṣobham icchanti [kh: icchati] tathā ātmanaḥ bhuktiṁ [k, kh: bhuktiś] ca tadarthe [k, kh: tadartham] uddhṛtāḥ | [. . .] yugāḥ punaḥ koṇeṣu kṣetre grāme pure pīṭhe nagare vā praviśya pūjyāḥ | tatra nivasanīyaṁ tadā lokānāṁ kṣobhaṁ bhavati bhuktir [kh: bhuktil] labhyate siddhiś [k, kh: siddhayaś] ca || spaṣṭam iti bāhye || Comm. on ṢSS 34/11.

[1] See KuKh 6/212cd-219ab and notes. Also Dyczkowski 2004: 158 for a map of these sites.

[2] aṭṭahāsāditaḥ kṛtvā rājagṛham apaścimam ||
āyudhaiḥ sahitā devyaḥ kṣetrapālasamanvitāḥ |

(These are the) Mothers of the Wheel of the Earth (bhūcakra) who, in the company of the guardians, reside in the primary and secondary sacred fields and meeting grounds. The wise man who, knowing the mantras and attentive, rising (early in) the morning praises (them) or even (does so) during sleep is well esteemed by the Mothers.

Abandoning the enveloping cover (kañcuka) of sin, O dear one, by praising the sacred seats he sees no misfortune even if he is yoked to terrible sins (or) has killed his mother, father or a cow or steals the sacrificial offerings of the Heroes (vīradravya) or has fallen from the Rule due to (his) carelessness or even if he has stopped uttering the Mantras.[1]

The hymn may also be recited regularly in front of the sacred firepit, maṇḍala, idol, Liṅga, or a propitious icon, once or at the three auspicious times of the day. The seats may also be worshipped to assuage a great natural disaster, for victory in battle, a bride or progeny:

One should institute a great sacrifice at times of great fear, when in conflict with a powerful enemy, when the land is afflicted with drought, when locusts and soldiers come (to ravage it), when (one seeks to) remedy disease and suffering, when there is a fight between relatives for kingdom, when the king is deposed, during solitary combat in a great battle, in order to (get a) son, when one fails to gets a young virgin (bride), during a marriage, in order to gain victory, (or) when a fort is under attack.

This (great sacrifice) brings every success (siddhi) and is the sure means of getting (whatever) one thinks about. I will tell (you) that clearly as it (truly) is. One should make a level canopy measuring kṣetropakṣetrasandohasevanān nirmalo bhavet ||

---

athāśāktaḥ [k, kh: -śaktaḥ] pramādī vā pīṭhasaṁkīrtanāt priye |
samyakśuddhim avāpnoti prātar utthāya yaḥ pathet ||
tad ahaṁ saṁpravakṣyāmi samayānāṁ viśuddhaye | ṢSS 34/24cd-27ab = KMT 22/20-22.

[1] kṣetropakṣetrasandohe sthitā [k kh: sitā] bhūcakramātaraḥ || kṣetrapālasamopetāḥ kīrtayed yaḥ samāhitaḥ |
prātar utthāya mantrajñaḥ svapnakāle 'thavā sudhīḥ ||
yukto 'pi pātakair ghorair mātrīṇāṁ sanmato [k: saṁprato] bhavet* |
mātṛhā pitṛhā caiva brahmahā goghna eva ca ||
vīradravyāpahārī ca pramādāt samayacyutaḥ |
mantroccāravilupto 'pi pīṭhasaṁkīrtanāt priye ||
pāpakañcukam utsṛjya naiva paśyati durgatiḥ | ṢSS 34/51cd-55ab = KMT 22/47-50.
*The KMT reads the regular form mātṚṇāṁ.

> sixteen (handspans) in a frightening forest, or (beside) a solitary tree or a single beautiful Liṅga, in a temple dedicated to the Mothers (mātṛharmya), on a battle ground, on a threshing floor (khalaka), in a house, or (places) that are tranquil (saumya), terrifying (dāruṇa), or romantic (kāma) as one pleases. Beautiful with flags and garlands, (it is erected) to (win) victory in battle with the enemy and for other purposes (karman) as they arise, each separately.
>
> O fair-faced one, one should then smear that place with the dung of a brown cow mixed with liquor (ali). (The place) should abound with the fragrance of perfumed water and be fumigated with sandalwood and aloe. There, one should fashion twenty-four circles. One should fashion them in groups of six in the east, north, west, and south in the sequence in which worship takes place (pūjākrama) (of the sacred seats).[1]

Internally, within the yogic body, just as the seats of the eight Mothers can be worshipped in the Wheel of Mothers (mātṛcakra) in the heart,[2] these sacred sites may also be worshipped in the Circle of the Sun (sūryamaṇḍala). This Circle, and those of the Moon and Fire that are further in, surround the triangular

---

[1] mahābhaye samutpanne balavacchatruvigrahe |
anāvṛṣṭihate deśe śalabhasainikāgame ||
vyādhiduḥkhopaśamane rājyārthe bandhuvigrahe |
rājyabhraṁśasamutpanne [k kh: rājyā-] ekayuddhe mahāhave ||
putrārthe kanyakālābhe vivāhe jayakāraṇe |
durgābhighātakaraṇe kartavyaṁ yajanaṁ mahat ||
sarvasiddhikaraṁ hy etat cintitārthaprasādhanam |
tad ahaṁ sampravakṣyāmi saṁsphuṭaṁ [k kh: sa-] ca yathāsthitam ||
bhīvane caikavṛkṣe [k: naivavṛkṣe; kh: caivavṛkṣe] vā ekaliṅge suśobhane |
mātṛharmye raṇasthāne khalake vātha veśmani ||
saumyadāruṇakāmeṣu yathā vā rocate manaḥ |
maṇḍapaṁ ca tataḥ kuryād hastaiḥ ṣoḍaśabhiḥ samam ||
dhvajamālāsuśobhāḍhyaṁ jayārthe śatruvigrahe |
itareṣv api karmeṣu yathāsthitāḥ [k kh: -sthitā] pṛthak pṛthak ||
kapilāgomayenaiva taṁ sthānaṁ tu varānane |
saṁmārjayet tatas taṁ tu alinā saṁyutena tu ||
gandhodakasugandhāḍhyaṁ candanāgurudhūpitam |
tatra maṇḍalakāñ caiva caturviṁśati kārayet ||
pūrve ca uttare caiva vāruṇye dakṣiṇe ca [k kh: na] tu |
ṣaṭkaṁ ṣaṭkaṁ ca kartavyaṁ tatra pūjākrameṇa tu || ṢSS 34/59-68.

[2] See Heilijgers-Seleen 1994: 102ff. Although the locations of the Eight Mothers we have noted above are mentioned as part of the Wheel of the Mothers, the Mothers who reside there are not. However the group of eight Great Mothers (mahāmatṛ) in the core of this inner centre expands out into eight groups of eight Mātṛs as we commonly find happens with the standard set of eight Mothers who generate sixty-four Yoginīs.

Yoni in the core of the Wheel of the Skyfaring goddesses (khecarīcakra)[1], which is the highest station of ascent.[2] The sites are arranged on the petals of the lotus in four groups of six. There are two sacred fields on the first two petals, then come two secondary sacred fields on the next two petals and two meeting grounds on the following two. The remaining three groups of six are placed on the remaining petals in serial order in the same way. The twenty-four places correspond to the twenty-four principles of existence (tattva) ranging from Earth to Nature (prakṛti). Thus a connection is made with the principles of existence that constitute the whole of empirical reality, not just the body. The pilgrimage to the sacred places takes the adept around the manifest universe. The stops on the journey are linked in a developing progression, which is at the same time, in a seemingly paradoxical manner, circular. When he reaches the upper extremity, he continues beyond from the beginning again. In this perspective, there is no descent, only a continuous rising up through the spheres of manifestation from gross to subtle and subtle to gross.[3]

Although the TS, unlike the Kubjikā Tantras, does not present itself specifically as a Kaula Tantra, it does consider its doctrines to be Kaula. One of the major features of its Kaula character is the extensive presence of numerous Yoginīs. The adept does the rounds of the sacred sites to meet and unite with Yoginīs. The Yoginī cult of the TS is thus closely related to its sacred geography and a measure of its development. The circuit of eight so-called sacred fields or 'houses' where the Mothers (mātṛkā) reside appears to be one of the most basic and earliest developments of the sacred geography of these Tantric cults. The Vow of Knowledge described in the TS focuses on these eight. It provides interior equivalents of a number of solitary places where the adept can practice such as the

---

[1] According to the comm. on ṢSS 34/25:

The division of these primary and secondary sacred fields, meeting places, weapons, goddesses, guardians, and trees has (also) all been revealed in (the teaching concerning) the Wheel of the Skyfarers (khecarīcakra).

eṣāṁ vibhāgaṁ [k kh: -gaḥ] sarvaṁ khecarīcakre pradarśitaṁ kṣetrāṇām upakṣetrāṇāṁ [kh: -ṇa] sandohānām āyudhānāṁ devīnāṁ kṣetrapālānāṁ vṛkṣāṇāṁ ca ||

[2] The location of this Wheel is uncertain. Heilijgers-Seleen suggests the Cavity of Brahmā on the crown of the head. The text (KMT 16/57c) simply says that it is 'above the pure maṇḍala'. As the last in the series of these five Wheels, one would expect it to be in the End of the Twelve. This is where the Wheel of Skyfaring goddesses is said to be in generic references to it.

[3] This material has been drawn from ṢSS 25/2-9. Here is, it seems to me, a fine example of how pilgrimage is conceived. The pilgrim's route, rather than being a representation of the Path to Liberation, which would be straight, is more of the nature of a circumambulation of sacred space. This is done not to achieve liberation but to propitiate the deities of the sacred space and gain benefits thereby.

cremation ground, forest, the side of a well, a garden, and temple.[1] But the only sacred sites which it specifically prescribes should be internalised are the Eight Houses of the Mothers.[2] The KuKh follows suit in chapter sixteen, which is dedicated first to them as the main places to which the aspirant travels, and then to the sixty-four sites.

The Yoginī cult has already advanced in the TS to such a degree that we find the well known set of sixty-four Yoginīs arranged in groups of eight each related to one of the eight Mothers. However, the Yoginīs, unlike these sixty-four are not related to particular places as we find in the KuKh. In chapter 19 of the TS we find a set of twenty-four divided into three groups of eight, the primary and secondary fields (kṣetra and upakṣetra) and meeting grounds (saṁdoha). The same groupings are found in Tantras of other traditions, including Buddhist, and so appear, at one stage, to have been standard ones.[3] Thus a set of twenty-four sites, many of which are those listed in the TS, is also found in chapter 22 of the KMT. Much closer, indeed, they are virtually the same, are the twenty-four sites listed in the fourth ṣaṭka of the JY.[4] However, there, like the account in chapter 22, they are not divided into the three types as we find in the TS. There is a suprising mixture of the two formats that indicates a syncretism between the sources. We have seen that in chapter 2 of the KMT, the goddess visits these three types of sacred sites.[5] However, only the names of the eight sacred fields (kṣetras)

---

[1] See KuKh 14/50 ff.
[2] See Dyczkowski 2004: 164 for a map of these sites.
[3] 'In Buddhist Tantric texts (the group of) twenty-four sacred seats is especially common.' (bauddha tantragranthoṁ me viśeṣakar . . . caturviṁśati pīṭha prasiddha haiṁ Dhīḥ 1986: 137). The Tantric sites described in Buddhist sources compare remarkably well with those in their equivalent Śaiva ones (see Dyczkowski 2001 (b)). The sacred geography of the Buddhist Tantras apparently developed in an analogous manner to that of its Śaiva counterpart, that is, beginning with informal configurations to standard groups. We notice this taking place, for example, in the interim between the redaction of the Sampuṭatantra and Abhyākaragupta's commentary, the Āmnāyamañjarī, now extant only in Tibetan (for bibliographical details see Wayman 1995: 135). Abhyākaragupta lived from the 11th to the first quarter of the 12th century. He was probably born in Magadha and received his Tantric training in Bengal (ibid. 136). Chapter seventeen of the Sampuṭatantra refers to six sacred sites, namely, Koṅkaṇa (Western Ghats), Candradvīpa (south-east Bengal?), Aṭṭahāsa (Bengal), Devīkoṭṭa (north Bengal), Haridvāra (modern Hardvar), and Jālandhara (Himachal Pradesh). Apart from Koṅkaṇa, an important place for the Kubjikā tradition also, these places are in the north of India. As Bengal is especially favoured, this Tantra may have been composed there. Abhyākaragupta adds another eighteen places to make twenty-four. Although these may have been authentic sites, it seems unlikely that Abhyākara added them simply on the basis of his personal experience. Indeed, he himself says (Wayman 1995: 138) that he culled the remaining places from other Tantras, which he did, no doubt, in order to integrate the six places into the standard grouping that had become prevelant by his time in other Buddhist Tantric sources.
[4] JY 4/40/152/152-158ab, paraphrased in TĀ 29/59-63.
[5] See KMT 2/117-122 quoted above in chapter one, p. 113.

are mentioned. These would normally be those of the Eight Mothers, and they do indeed coincide, however, they do not appear there in the usual sequence we find them when they are treated independently.[1] Instead they are arranged in the order in which they appear as the first eight of the twenty-four sites in chapter 22. This is not how things are in the TS. There the twenty-four sites are divided into the three types of sites, but the order of the sacred fields is the normal one of the residences of the Eight Mothers. The link between the three versions is further established by another coincidence, namely that the Yoginīs who reside in these eight places are recognisably the same in the KMT and the TS. We shall deal with the variants in detail elsewhere. Here these observations should suffice to establish the existence of a common paradigm, indeed even a common set of sites, that is the result of the communality of the sources from which the redactors draw irrespective of sectarian distinctions.

Another forty sites are added to them, each of which, on the model of the first twenty-four, has an attendant Yoginī and guardian. These are eulogized in a hymn in the second half of chapter 16 of our text.[2] In this way there are sixty-four Yoginīs, which is an important and well known grouping. Moreover, as in many other instances, they are related to the eight Mothers. But even reinforced in this way, it is the sites, not them that are the primary concern. Clearly, these two sets, that is, the sites and the Yoginīs, although often related to one another, develop independently. Indeed, in the numerous subsequent presentations of the sixty-four Yoginīs in the Kubjikā Tantras themselves and, later, in other Kaula cults and elsewhere, they are not linked to specific sacred sites.

---

[1] A clear example of this change in the serial order is found in the JY from which Abhinava draws his list of twenty-four sites. Abhinava quotes the JY again to present the sites of the Mothers (JY 4/21/62cd-64, TĀ 29/67). But, aware of the discrepency, he only lists the low-caste women who correspond to the Mothers who reside there, an not the names of the sites, which are the same, but in the normal, and hence different serial order from that of the first twenty-four sites.

[2] See KuKh 16/33cd ff. and notes.

The Main Sacred Seats

In chapter six of the KuKh, Bhairava's pilgrimage to the five main sacred seats lays the foundation of a divine, mythical model for the adept to venerate and imitate as delineated in chapters fourteen to sixteen. The unfolding progression of topics through these chapters is, despite the many details, clear and systematic. They are threaded together by the intent to equip the aspirant with the necessary ritual and yogic praxis to enable him to successfully undertake the pilgrimage to such sacred sites. This concern is so central to the praxis taught in the Kubjikā Tantras that the prerequisites the aspirant needs are those most essential for the performance of the main rite dedicated to the goddess, namely, the Worship of the Transmission (kramārcana). The latter is the prime concern of the entire Kumārikākhaṇḍa. It is an extensive and complex ritual performed in numerous modalities, both externally and inwardly; however, in this case it is reduced to its essentials, which are those basic to any Tantric cult. One is the maṇḍala of the deity, that is, the Saṁvartāmaṇḍala. The other is the mantra which is the thirty-two syllable Vidyā of the goddess Kubjikā. Chapters eight to twelve of our text are devoted to an exposition of this Vidyā, the manner in which it is 'extracted' letter by letter from a sacred grid of letters, its division into various parts, application and benefits. At the same time, in its own cryptic, symbolic language, the Tantra expounds the maṇḍala into which the parts of the Vidyā are projected. This concern is accompanied by others. These include a reworking of the goddess's myth and the establishment of homologies with inner processes.

The first chapter of the KuKh is the Saṁvartāmaṇḍalasūtra, which is probably drawn from the beginning of the ṢSS. It is essentially a eulogy of the goddess and her consort and their maṇḍala, the parts of which are enumerated and extolled. This prologue frames the subject of the entire Kumārikākhaṇḍa. In the form of the customary eulogy with which a text begins, it presents the essential theophanic vision that inspires the whole text. Chapter two is a brief explanation of the features of the multilayered experience it represents, thus setting the tone for the teachings of the rest of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa, which alternates in the same way between the outer forms and their inner equivalents with which it is particularly, but not exclusively, concerned. Chapter three deals with the Triangle and the Point in the centre of the maṇḍala which is discussed in chapter two of this introduction. The same topic is retraced in chapter seven in order to accommodate the projections of the teachers and their lineages into the maṇḍala that must be worshipped along with the deities within it. Chapters four and five are more focused on the goddess's myth, and chapter six especially on the sacred seats. After dealing with Vidyā, the Tantra continues in chapter thirteen with the basic concepts of bondage and liberation and the view of man, deity and the world that sustains and informs it. This is done in order to explain the processes set into operation within the aspirant by the rite of initiation and consecration (abhiṣeka) that empowers him to worship the maṇḍala internally and externally and recite the goddess's Vidyā. This clears the way for the subsequent teachings in the following three chapters, fourteen to sixteen, that deal with the manner in which the adept must undertake his pilgrimage and so observe the Vow of Knowledge (vidyāvrata), the kernel of which is the assiduous repetition of the Vidyā.

These chapters have been drawn from the KMT, which in turn drew them from the Tantrasadbhāva, which, instead of the four sacred seats, considers the eight sites of the Mothers to be the primary ones. Although technically called 'sacred fields' – kṣetra – rather than 'seats' – pīṭha – the text is quick to point out that these and other such places where goddesses and Yoginīs reside, whatever their specific designations, are all essentially sacred seats[1] and so the same principles apply to them as well. Indeed, these eight sites are as much a standard group as are the Eight Mothers themselves and was probably one of the first groupings of sacred sites. Thus we find them in the Jayadrathayāmala projected onto the eight petals of a lotus just as they appear in the TS.[2]

Although the Kubjikā Tantras drew the model of how such pilgrimages were to be undertaken from the TS, the Mothers did not retain their original importance. The Mothers are protectors who serve as attendant deities (āvaraṇadevatā) surrounding the main deities in the centre. This is how they are projected into the goddess's maṇḍala. Seated on the petals of a lotus they form a protective circle around the core in which the main sacred seats are the residence of the goddess. Thus according to the Kubjikā Tantras of all such places the four sacred sites are most excellent:

> (But) those who are devoted to the worship of the Vidyā, intent on that, their mind (given solely to) that, are without a doubt liberated while living (jīvanmukta) in this world of living beings. Once they have gone, O god, to either the First Seat (i.e. Oḍḍiyāna), Pūrṇagiryaka, the one called Jāla or the venerable Kāmarūpaka, they

---

[1] ye pīṭhās te bhavet kṣetrāḥ [k, g: kṣetrā] kṣetrāḥ pīṭhā udāhṛtāḥ |
nāmaparyāyabhinnās tu śāstre [g: sāstre] śāstre [g: sāstre] pṛthak pṛthak ||
TS 15/64 = KuKh 50/27 also ibid. 14/77.

[2] Prayāga and the other sacred seats* are the eight petals (of a lotus) on which Brāhmī and the rest who are the deities of the gods are located.

prayāgādīni [k, g: prayogā-] pīṭhāni dalāny aṣṭau bhavanti tu |
tiṣṭhanti saṁniviṣṭās [k, kh, g: sa-] tu brāhmyādyo [k: ṣṭārūpādyā; kh, g: brāhmādyo] devadevatāḥ || JY 4/8/115.

*Note that these sites are called pīṭhas here, not kṣetras.

certainly achieve the goal (there) and they have no troubles (anymore).[1]

Four versions of the goddess's Vidyā correspond to each seat.[2] The repetition of the Vidyā is such a basic feature of the spiritual practice in these places that the Vidyā, identified with the goddess is said to be the 'mother in all the sacred seats'.[3] They were places where one had to be especially careful not to transgress the ethical pledges (samaya) made at the time of initiation. Displays of pride or anger there are soon severely punished.[4] Just as, conversely, those who have sinned or transgressed their vows are purified by going to them.[5] The scripture guarantees that Kuṇḍalinī will rise and pierce (vedha) through the inner centres (cakra) by one's wandering in the sacred seats.[6]

The Outer Sacred Seats

The major sacred seats – or at least Oḍḍiyāna and Kāmarūpa – are sites where Tantric teachings were probably in actual fact propagated. These and numerous other references suggest that at one time these, along with others, were active sacred sites. The distinction the KMT draws between the first four seats and the fifth one that is 'unmanifest' and 'pervasive' also suggests that a distinction is drawn between places with concrete external geographical locations and others that have only an internal ideal existence. It also suggests that this extra seat was surreptitiously added to the basic four that had already achieved acceptance by the time the KMT was redacted setting a precedent that, as we shall see, led to the addition of Koṅkaṇa in the succeeding Kubjikā Tantras.

The four seats are supremely important for the Kubjikā Tantras. Functioning as primary symbolic ciphers, the texts added to them, in the course of their development, layer upon layer of additional meanings and equivalences. The process of internalisation of these places is so ancient and thorough that the exact geographical location of these places is an object of much scholarly dispute. An additional process, which accompanies that of internalisation, renders the exact

---

[1] KuKh 11/93cd-95; cf KuKh 6/191cd ff.

[2] She is the goddess Samayā; everything is established here. The Samayās that are in the four sacred seats have all come out here. She is the goddess Rājeśvarī who has emerged from the practice of the Samayā (samayācāra).* KMT 7/6cd-7.

*Note that this term, in this context at least, means specifically the practice of the Samayā Vidyā, rather than just the practice of the Rule in general.

Forms, aspects and parts of the Kubjikā's Vidyā will be described and analysed in the course of the presentation of chapter nine to eleven of the KuKh.

[3] KMT 7/27ab: atha cet sarvapīṭheṣu māteyaṁ samayātmikā |

[4] see KuKh 6/196cd-202ab.

[5] KuKh 6/193cd-194ab.

[6] pīṭhānāṁ bhramaṇād vedhaḥ [ṅ: vedha] ity ājñā pārameśvarī || YKh (1) 20/48cd.

identification of these places even more difficult. This is the phenomenon of replication, whereby sacred places of pan-Indian importance are projected into local geographies. Although I cannot hope to resolve these disputes, I shall venture to present hitherto unanalysed material pertinent to this problem with a few modest observations and a very tentative hypothesis. Firstly, I assume that the commonly held view that the locations of Kāmarūpa and Jālandhara are in Assam and the Jammu region, respectively, is correct. This is a reasonable assumption, inasmuch as both these places, unlike the other two, Uḍḍiyāna and Pūrṇagiri, are important centres of Śāktism to this day. Moreover, the character of at least one of these places and its characterization in the Tantras appear to correspond. I am referring to Jālandhara. Tantric etymology derives the first part of this name from the word jvāla meaning 'flame' or jāla meaning 'net'. Jālandhara is a place that is 'brilliant with rows of mighty flames (mahājvāla)' where one can behold the goddess's 'countless marvellous creations like (those produced) by magic' (indrajāla – lit. 'the net of Indra') and it is here that the goddess has cast 'the net (jāla) of Māyā'.[1] Most Hindus know that in the Kangra Valley, close to the modern town of Jālandhara in the Jummu region, there is a cave where natural gas leaks from cracks in the rock. The small flames that this produces are worshipped as the manifest form of the goddess Jvālāmukhī whose name literally means '(the goddess) whose mouth is made of flames.'

Bakker examines the sources concerning Jālandhara. These range from the accounts of the 7th century Chinese Buddhist pilgrim Hsuan tsang, Muslim accounts from the 16th century onwards and 19th century British archaeologists and travellers, as well as Sanskrit sources. Bakker reports[2] that the country of Jālandhara is said to have received its name from a Daitya king called Jālandhara. According to the Padmapurāṇa, Jālandhara, the son of the Ocean and the Ganges, was given a part of India (jambudvīpa) for his residence. This country came to be known as Jālandhara.[3] Mythology identifies this area with the vast body of the demon Jālandhara who was slain by Śiva in battle. The local tradition of the Kangra Valley, which is a part of this area, identifies Jālandhara's mouth with the goddess Jvālāmukhī, whose shrine is located in the Valley. Examining the sources at his disposal, Bakker perceives a connection between the location of this goddess and Jālandhara even without referring to the Tantras where this connection is explicit.

Kāmarūpa is also not hard to identify. The original name of this place, known to both early Hindu and Buddhist sources, is Kāmaru. The Sanskritized form 'Kāmarūpa' is easily derivable from it. This place is of great importance for

---

[1] KMT 2/50c, 52d and 54b. See above, p. 89.
[2] Bakker 1983: 60 ff..
[3] Padmapurāṇa, Uttarakhanda, 4/3 ff..

the early Śākta, that is, Kaula Tantras and the strongly Śākta orientated Bhairava Tantras. This is largely because of its association with Matsyendranātha, the reputed originator of the Kaula teachings and therefore, by extension, all the Kaula Tantric traditions, including those of Kubjikā, Tripurā and Kālī. The many Kaula traditions that link this site with such an important figure and its persistent identification with Kāmākhya (modern Gauhati) in Assam lend credibility to the correctness of this identification.

Of the four places discussed here, the location of Pūrṇagiri has been the least investigated. The inhabitants of the Nainital district of the Himalayas identify a sacred mountain in that region as Pūrṇagiri. This name, however, is relatively recent. The older form, reported in the Almora Gazetteer of 1911, is Puniagiri, which is derivable from the Sanskrit Puṇyagiri ('Mountain of Merit'), rather than Pūrṇagiri. Another candidate is found in Orissa. There, learned Oḍiyas, on the basis of their local traditions, identify it with the town of Puṣpagiri. This site greatly impressed the Chinese pilgrim Hsuan tsang, who visited Orissa in the 7th century. From his description it appears that Puṣpagiri was an important Buddhist centre at that time. Unfortunately, the exact location of Puṣpagiri remains uncertain.[1] Another possibility is a mountain by this name in central India, which to my mind appears to be the most likely identification. In order to understand why I believe this, let us return to our triangle.

Jālandhara is regularly said to lie in the right corner of the triangle and Pūrṇagiri on the left.[2] In Sanskrit the words for 'right' and 'left' also mean 'south' and 'north', respectively. Consequently, we are told in this chapter that Jālandhara is the southern seat (dakṣiṇapīṭha)[3] and Pūrṇagiri the northern (uttarapīṭha).[4] But this does not mean that Jālandhara is in the south of India and Pūrṇagiri in the north. On the contrary, further ahead, we are clearly told that Pūrṇagiri is in the 'southern quarter in the region of the Deccan' (dakṣiṇāpatha)[5] and, more specifically, in the land of Koṅkaṇa, as it is in other places in the later Kubjikā sources.[6] Pūrṇagiri was placed here early on in the Kubjikā tradition. The reader

---

[1] See Dehejia 1979: 14.
[2] See, for example, KuKh 26/3.
[3] KuKh 6/59ab.
[4] KuKh 6/118ab.
[5] KuKh 6/71cd-72; cf. ibid. 6/117cd-118ab.
[6] See KuKh 7/59cd-60. Projecting the seats into a maṇḍala the AS associates this seat with Koṅkaṇa in the Deccan (dakṣiṇāpatha):

(This) is said to be the hermitage of Pūrṇapīṭha from the centre of Meru; it is on a petal in (one of the) directions. [. . .] One should know that (this sacred seat's) authority in the Dvāpara Age is in Koṁkaṇa.
pūrṇapīṭhāśramaṁ proktaṁ merumadhyāt tu digdale | [. . .]
dvāpare ca vijānīyāt koṅkaṇe adhikārakam | AS 16/113ab, 114ab.

will recall that according to the KM the goddess established this seat in the Sahya Mountains, that is, the Western Ghats.[1] Pūrṇagiri was considered to be a particularly important seat in the later sources because it was here that the tradition was subsequently revealed, just as it had been initially revealed in Oḍḍiyāna, the sacred seat of OṀ (oṁkārapīṭha). So we read in the KuKh concerning the Śrīmata, which in this context is the MBT:

> O Great Lord, (the Śrīmata) has descended into the sacred seat of OṀ. Similarly, the authority of the Lion's (Transmission) has been explained in the South (of India). There insight (pratyaya) is pure and established on (all) four legs.
>
> (A eulogy of) the glory of (that) sacred area (kṣetra) is in the home of every disciple. The radiant manifestation of Gesture (mudrāsphoṭa) and the piercing (of the centres by Kuṇḍalinī) (has occurred) in Koṅkaṇa, in the Deccan (dakṣiṇāpatha).
>
> There, I imparted the Command in (the seat) called Pūrṇa. The secret that was not told amongst men was (imparted) by the teacher in the Deccan (dakṣiṇāpatha).[2]

If Pūrṇagiri was in the south of India and the Jālandhara to which our texts refer was, and still is, a place in the Jammu region, why do the texts apparently reverse their positions? The difficulty is solved if we take into consideration the third seat on the bottom corner or 'front tip' (agra) of the triangle.[3] This is Kāmarūpa, which is probably the area around the city of Gauhati in Assam, in the north-east of India. From the point of view of an observer in Kāmarūpa, Jālandhara would be on the right of the triangle although it is in the north of India and Pūrṇagiri on the left although it is in the south of India. Moreover, if Pūrṇagiri is identified with the mountain by that name in central India, then the points plotted for these three sites would in fact be located in the corners of an almost perfectly equilateral triangle.[4] The texts seem to be aware of this shift of perspective. Thus in one place we read:

> The guardian of the cremation ground there (in the seat of Pūrṇagiri) is called Vikṛtānana (Deformed Face). And so, the Northern Seat (uttarapīṭha) is on the lion throne on the right (dakṣasiṁhāsana).[5]

---

[1] KMT 2/63cd-64. See above, chapter 1, p. 91.
[2] KuKh 30/170cd-173ab.
[3] KuKh 6/153cd-154ab and 6/210cd-211ab.
[4] See the map in Dyczkowski 2004: 158. I am grateful to Prof. Rana Singh for pointing this out to me.
[5] KuKh 6/117cd-118ab.

This change from left to right, that is, south to north, may be related to the change of location of the main area of propagation of the Kubjikā cult. It is possible that in an earlier phase, Pūrṇagiri was identified with a mountain that lay to the north of Jālandhara. The triangle representing the goddess was well known to Tantric schools that preceded the Kubjikā cult. Indeed, as we have seen, many of the basic features of the triangle described in the Kubjikā Tantras were inspired by the Trika triangle described in the TS to which important additions were made, including the projection of these seats into it. The person or persons who did this may have lived in a part of India where, in relation to them, Pūrṇagiri was further north or to the left of Jālandhara. If the latter was located in or near the Kangra valley we should look for this mountain in the north-west of the Himalayas. When the Kubjikā cult moved to the western Deccan in the costal region of Koṅkaṇa, a mountain in that area was identified with Pūrṇagiri.[1] The redactors therefore needed to make changes in the text. This, it seems, they have attempted, somewhat clumsily, to do here by adding extra details rather than making alterations.

According to the Kālikāpurāṇa also, Pūrṇagiri was located in the South.[2] On the basis of this reference Sircar suggests the identification of this site with Tulajāpur and the goddess of this seat with Tulajā Bhavānī whose shrine is in Osmanabad.[3] But this seems unlikely. Nor is it possible to accept Nandi's suggestion that Pūrṇagiri is the modern Kolhapur, which he himself tells us is associated with the cremation ground called Karavīra.[4] Having said all this we should not forget that the Tantras are not geographical texts. They are concerned above all with practice and explaining in their own terms associations which may be those of myth, ritual or the inner projections that serve as aids to ritual and yogic practice. Thus the association made between Oḍḍiyāna and the cremation ground Karavīra tells us more, in this case, about such associations than geography. Karavīra was located somewhere in the area of the modern town of Kolhapur, which is close to Pune. We would expect, therefore, that if Pūrṇagiri was indeed located in the Deccan, it should be associated with this sacred seat. Instead the sources generally place it near Oḍḍiyāna. The reason for this may well have to do with the recognition of Oḍḍiyāna as the original site of the propagation of the Kālīkrama and the extraordinary importance of Karavīra for that tradition.[5] The Kashmiri Kālīkrama consistently identifies the Northern Seat (uttarapīṭha) with Oḍḍiyāna in which Karavīra is located.[6] For the Kālīkrama, like Kubjikā's

---

[1] See KuKh 6/71cd-72.
[2] dakṣiṇe pūrṇaśailan tu tathā pūrṇeśvarīṁ śivām KāPu 64/43-45. Cited by Sircar 1973: 12.
[3] Sircar 1973: 14.
[4] Nandi 1973: 116.
[5] See note to KuKh 4, MāSt line 118.
[6] The DP declares:

Śrīkrama, Oḍḍiyāna is the first sacred seat (ādipīṭha). It is also called Udyāna or Oṁkārapīṭha in the Kālīkrama sources, as it is in the Kubjikā Tantras that do not, however, ever refer to it as the Northern Seat (uttarapīṭha) – although they do regularly link Karavīra with the first sacred seat.[1] Indeed, according to the KuKh the first sacred seat to have come into being is Karavīra itself 'that removes the impurity of the Age of Strife'.[2] According to the AS, a Kadamba tree grew there under which the scripture was hidden that was recovered and revealed in this Age of Strife.[3]

Maṅgalā is the goddess of the Kashmiri Kālīkrama founded by Jñānanetra in Kashmir. Two other important developments of the Kālīkrama took root in Nepal, namely, the worship of Guhyakālī and Siddhalakṣmī. The goddess Siddhalakṣmī developed out of a form of Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī, the principle goddess of the Jayadrathayāmala, called Mahālakṣmī. Several forms of Mahālakṣmī are described in the JY, although Siddhalakṣmī is barely mentioned. The central feature of this goddess is that she is worshipped in a circle of Kālīs and, although

---

The cremation ground of the venerable Northern Seat is Karavīraka which is worshipped by Śiva, the Supreme Self. [. . .] The terrible Bhairavī, present in the gross and the subtle, resides there accompanied by the mistresses of the sacred seat and surrounded by the Siddhas.

śrīmaduttarapīṭhasya [k: śrīmaduttaraṁ-] śmaśānaṁ karavīrakam |
pūjitaṁ devadevena śivena paramātmanā [k, kh: -ne; g: -no] || [. . .]
tatrasthā bhairavī bhīmā sthūlasūkṣmānuvartinī [kh, g: -śūkṣmānu-] |
pīṭheśvarībhiḥ saṁyuktā siddhaiś ca parivāritā || DP 1/3, 7

Jñānanetra, the founder of the Kashmiri Kālīkrama, presents Karavīra in the beginning of his Hymn to the Five Wheels of Emptiness (khacakrapañcakastotra) as the main site in the Northern Seat (uttarapīṭha) where the Kālīkrama was first taught. It is here that the bacchanalia he depicts unfolds. Jñānanetra writes:

(The Yoginīs) in the venerable Northern Seat,* born of the Lotus Seat (abjapīṭha) have assembled in a single gathering (cakra) in Karavīra, the cremation ground.

śrīpīṭha-uttarāntasthā abjapīṭhasamudbhavāḥ ||
karavīraśmaśāne tu ekacakre [k, kh: ekacakra] samāgatāḥ [k, kh: -tā] | KhCPS 7cd-8ab
*I understand śrīpīṭha-uttarā- to mean śrī – uttarapīṭhā-.

[1] KuKh 6/25cd-26, 30/175cd-177c and YKh (1) 14/31.

[2] KuKh 38/15.

[3] With reference to the scripture the AS declares:

Initially it was hidden for three ages (yuga) at the root of a Kadamba (tree). It was retrieved in (the cremation ground) Karavīra in the fourth (age) when it was made manifest.

pūrvaṁ kadambamūle tu gopitaṁ (gopi) tu yugatrayam |
karavīre (-vīraṁ) samāsādya caturthe prakaṭe kṛte || AS 28/74.

a form of Viṣṇu's energy (vaiṣṇavīśakti) and Narasiṁha's consort, she is essentially a form of Kālī. In some early Kālīkrama sources she is portrayed in this aspect in Karavīra.[1] Kolhapur is still famous as the centre of worship of the goddess Mahālakṣmī. The presence of her cult there in the second half of the eighth century is attested by an inscription dated 789 CE.[2] Another refers to Kolhapur as the original seat (ādyapīṭha) of Mahālakṣmī.[3] In 871 CE the Rāṣṭrakūṭa king Amoghavarṣa made an offering of one of his fingers to this goddess to ward off an impending calamity.[4] Nowadays there is a well known shrine to Narasiṁha in Kolhapur.[5]

While the texts testify to Jālandhara's gradual rise in the early period to the rank of one of the major seats, conversely, with the passage of time, Pūrṇagiri is mentioned progressively less in later sources. The late (probably Bengali or perhaps Assamese) Kubjikātantra, for example, does not refer to it, although it does mention the other three. Similarly, the Jñānārṇavatantra refers to eight seats, but Pūrṇagiri is missing even though the other three are amongst them. The same is the case with the Aṣṭādaśapīṭha and the Mahāpīṭhanirūpaṇa, which belong to the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, respectively.[6] The fate of Oḍḍiyāna was similar. But it would be wrong to infer that this seat and Pūrṇagiri were fictitious, as Nandi has suggested.[7] It is more probable that they simply fell out of use. The case of Pūrṇagiri is much more open to doubt probably because it was superseded by other centres relatively early and, moreover, never attained the importance of Oḍḍiyāna.

If we accept the southern location of Pūrṇagiri and a northern one for Jālandhara, the only major inconsistency with the texts is the location of Uḍḍiyāna. If this place was, as most scholars believe, located in the Swat Valley of northern Pakistan, it is far from the centre of this triangle, where many texts position Uḍḍiyāna. This anomaly is more striking if we compare this standard layout with the one found in the Niśisaṁcāratantra. Although this Tantra may have been lost,[8] the reference we have is particularly important because it was

---

[1] It is surprising that Karavīra is not mentioned in the Jayadrathayāmala. Nonetheless, this couple is portrayed amidst the bacchanalia in which the Siddhas and Yoginīs of the Five Currents (pañcavāha) are engaged in Karavīra is chapter fifteen of the Kulakaulinīmata which has drawn it from an unidentified Kālīkrama Tantra. See below, p. 582, note 1 concerning the Five Currents.
[2] Statistical Report on Kolhapur, cited in the JBBRAS 11, 1875, p. 66.
[3] J. C. Fleet, Dynasties of Kanarese Districts p. 540, cited in EI, 18, no. 26, p. 235 ff.
[4] EI, 18, no. 26, v. 47.
[5] But note that a Hasan record dated 1114 CE refers to Bhūtanātha as the Bhairava of Mahālakṣmī. See EC, 5, Hn. 135.
[6] See Sircar 1973: 18 and 42.
[7] Nandi 1973: 118.
[8] An old palm-leaf manuscript of a Niśisaṁcāratantra is preserved in the National Archives at Kathmandu (MS No. 1/1606, NGMPP reel no. B 26/25). 48 folios long, it is written in old Newari chosen by Abhinavagupta who lived in 11th century Kashmir which, more extensive than today, included Uḍḍiyāna in its outlying north-western provinces. Uḍḍiyāna (also spelt Oḍḍiyāna[1]) was an extremely important Tantric site. It is still famous in Vajrayāna circles as the land of the great exponent of Vajrayāna in Tibet, Padmasambhava, whom Tibetan historians refer to as a Kashmiri.[2] Bakker notes that several locations for Uḍḍiyāna have been suggested. These are the Swat Valley in northern Pakistan, Orissa, and a region in Bengal. After briefly examining various views, Bakker opines that: 'the arguments for the location of Uḍḍiyāna in the Swat Valley seem to be stronger. Actual proof that the Swat Valley was known as Uḍḍiyāna is obtained from Tibetan travellers in the area. The Tibetan name for the Swat Valley was O rgyan or U rgyan, but a Buddhist pilgrim from Tibet, named Buddhagupta, tells us that Tibetan U rgyan is derived from Uḍḍiyāna, on account of the similarity of sound.'[3] The site must have been well known to Abhinava as the place where Jñānanetra, the founder of the Kashmiri Kālīkrama, was said to have received his revelations. Those sources refer to it as the Northern Seat (uttarapīṭha)[4] further confirming a northern location.

---

script. The first few folios are in disorder and the beginning and end is missing. Possibly because the manuscript is incomplete, no testimonia have been traced in the text to certify that this it is the one to which Abhinavagupta refers.

[1] The spelling ‘Uḍḍiyāna’ is the one most popular in the secondary sources referred to here and in general. The form 'oḍḍi-' is the MIA of the Sanskrit 'uḍḍi-' . Śitikaṇṭha spells the name 'oḍḍiyānu' in a verse written in old Kashmiri and 'uḍḍiyāna-' in his Sanskrit commentary (see MP (1) p. 49). In order to be consistent with the secondary sources to which I refer, I have retained the spelling 'uḍḍiyāna' here. Largely in accord with the sources the spelling of this name varies in my expositions. We hardly ever find the spelling ‘uḍḍiyāna’ in the Kubjikā sources. The closest to this spelling there is ‘oḍḍiyāna’ which is also found in the Kālīkrama sources. In default of other variants this is the one we shall generally use. Concerning the large variety of spellings of the name of this seat, see note to the Sanskrit text of KuKh 2/28a.

[2] Dyczkowski 1987: 3 with reference to Nadou 1968: 38.

[3] Bakker 1983: 54.

[4] A typical colophon of the Devipañcaśataka, a Kashmiri Kālīkrama text, says that it is part of the ‘venerable Kālikākula brought down to earth by the venerable Śrīnātha and has come forth from the venerable Northern Seat’ (iti śrimaduttarapīṭhodbhūte śrīśrīnāthāvatārite śrikālikākule). Similarly, the colophons of the KS begin: ‘(this chapter is part of the Tantra) brought down (to earth) by the venerable Śrīnātha that has come forth in the venerable Northern Seat’ (iti śrīmaduttarapīṭhe vinirgate śrīnāthāpādāvatārite). Moreover the DP declares that:

(The teaching) as it in the lotus of the heart of the mistresses of the sacred seat that has come in this the venerable Northern Seat has been transmitted from mouth to mouth and by (hearing) from (one's) ear to ear.

śrīmaduttarapīṭhe 'smin [k, kh, g: sminn] āyātaṁ yādṛśaṁ sthitam ||
pīṭheśvarīṇāṁ hṛdy abje [k: hṛdayabje; kh: hṛdtya bje; g: hṛty ājje] yādṛśaṁ vartate sadā |

The layout presented by the Niśisaṁcāra, a Bhairava Tantra, gives pride of place to Kāmarūpa as the main sacred seat. Its pre-eminent status is vividly symbolized by deriving it directly from the core of reality as the cosmogenic will (icchā), an identification suggested by the first part of its name, which literally means 'sexual desire'. This assumes the form of the foundation (ādhāra) wherein all creation resides and finds its support. This desire emanates the Point (bindu) and Sound (nāda), which are the breath of the core as its pervasive vitality at rest within itself and in an active state, respectively. Uḍḍiyāna, to the right, is the Point and Pūrṇagiri, to the left, is the Sound. Kāmarūpa the Empowered Seat (śāktapīṭha) is in front.[1] By comparing the passage quoted from the Niśisaṁcāra by Jayaratha in his commentary on the paraphrases of the same by Abhinavagupta, it appears that there was no seat in the centre of the triangle. Abhinava, who apparently was aware that other sources posit the existence of a 'half seat' in the centre of the triangle, says that 'one should know that the 'half seat' is a conceived intent'.[2] One need not understand Abhinavagupta here as simply rejecting the possibility of a fourth seat in the centre. Perhaps what he meant is that one could understand it be various places according to one's intentions and needs.

This layout also produces a reasonably well-shaped triangle, although it is not equilateral, unlike the one of the first scheme.[3] The Niśisaṁcāra knows of the existence of Jālandhara but relegates it to the status of a secondary site (upasaṁdoha), along with the borderlands of India, Nepal, Kashmir and 'the direction in which foreigners (live) (mlecchadik)'. Perhaps, when the Niśisaṁcāra was redacted, Jālandhara, along with these other places had not yet gained the importance it was to have later. But despite the secondary status accorded to Jālandhara in this Tantra, it may have been given prominent status by others. Abhinava describes the maṇḍala that is worshipped as a preliminary to the Kaula karṇātkarṇaprayogeṇa [g: -na] saṁcaraṁ ca [k: saṁcaraśca; kh: saṁcaraṁśca] mukhān mukham || DP 7/9cd-10.

---

The final colophon of the KhCPS by Jñānanetra says:

> This, the venerable Hymn to the Wheels of the Five Voids is finished. It has come forth from the venerable seat of Oḍḍiyāna and is offered to all the Yoginīs. It has emerged from the oral tradition in order to (impart) the knowledge of the Mahārthakrama.

iti śrī – oḍḍiyānapīṭhavinirgataṁ sarvayoginīpraṇītaṁ mukhānmukhavinirgataṁ mahārthakramajñānārthaṁ śrikhacakrapañcakastotraṁ samaptam | NAK MS no. 1/252 numbered fl. 77a; also BSP vol. 4, part 1, p. 38.

[1] TĀ 15/84-86.

[2] jñeyaṁ saṁkalpanārūpam ardhapīṭham ataḥ param | Ibid. 15/86ab.

[3] See map in Dyczkowski 2004: 158.

rites he constructs in chapter twenty-nine of his Tantrāloka. There he states that, along with the Kaula teachers of the four ages and other things, the sacred seat (pīṭha) should be worshipped in the maṇḍala. Jayaratha comments saying that this sacred seat is 'Jālandhara from which this (the Kula) system has come down through that sequence of Siddhas and Yoginīs.'[1] One wonders, however, if Jayaratha is not mistaken. The sacred seat normally associated with the propagation of the Kula teachings in this age is Kāmarūpa, not Jālandhara.

Largely on the basis of these references, Dviveda states in his introduction to the Nityāṣoḍaśikārṇava[2] that there were originally three primary seats, not four. This view is examined and rejected by Bakker.[3] In support of Diveda's thesis we shall see that we can observe in the Kubjikā Tantras the remnants of a development from a scheme of three seats, which did not include Jālandhara, to one of four that did.[4] Thus, I would tentatively suggest that there are two triangles: an earlier one, which did not include Jālandhara, and a later one that did. The importance of Oḍḍiyāna would not allow its omission in the later scheme and so it was conveniently placed in the centre to symbolize not its location, but excellence. A more realistic variant, found in both the Kubjikā and Kālī Kulas, may lend further credence to the triangular model. This is the identification of Oḍḍiyāna with the syllable Oṁkāra. From this point of view, this seat is worshipped within the sound of the sacred syllable.[5] This identification may relate to the town of Oṁkāreśvara in what is now Madhya Pradesh, in the centre. Although this site is not in the literal geographical centre it does, at least, lie within the triangle.[6] [1] pīṭham it jālandharaṁ yatas tatsiddhayoginīkrameṇa asya darśanasya avatāraḥ Comm. TĀ 29/27cd-29ab.

---

[2] NṢA p. 81.

[3] Bakker 1993: 50-52.

[4] See KuKh 2/28 and note. This development is outlined below on p. 563 ff. and will be discussed in greater detail in chapter six, which is dedicated to the lineages and teachers venerated in the Kubjikā Tantras.

[5] Kālīkrama sources say: In this way it should also be contemplated in the syllable OṀ which is this, the essential nature of the sacred seat (called) Oḍyāna . . . . (evam oṁkāre 'py anusandheyam | yad ayam oḍyāṇapīṭhasvabhāvo . . . MM p. 92) . Also: (Now) the sacred seat Oḍḍiyāna is explained. Externally, it is that sacred seat of praṇava (i.e. the syllable OṀ), the place where (one meets the deity). (pīṭham oḍḍiyānam nirucyate | bahiś ca tat praṇavapīṭhaṁ devatāsaṁketasthānam MP (1) p. 50). In this case the praṇava is A, even so the connection between a praṇava and Oḍḍiyāna is clear. Accordingly the MM refers to the contemplation of the letter A with OṀ as an alternative in relation to Oḍḍiyāna (MM p. 92, with reference to MP (1) 32).

[6] The AS concludes a description of Oḍḍiyāṇa saying:

> I have emitted that goddess who is present in the seat called OṀ.

sṛṣṭā (sṛjetaś) sā (ca) mayā devī oṁkāranāmapīṭhagā (oṁkāraṁnāma-pīṭhayāḥ) || AS 4/90cd. Cf. also KMT 24/83a where Oṁkāra is the name of the first seat.

By the time we get to the KMT the four sacred seats of Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa are so well standardized and important that they appear in a fixed order, and their names have even been conveniently abbreviated for easy reference. Moreover, a fifth seat is emerging on the horizon. This became the most well known and recognized set of four sacred seats long after the disappearance of the Kubjikā tradition in India because it was projected into the core of Śrīcakra. But despite its later popularity (which developed when two of the sites – Pūrṇagiri and Oḍḍiyāna – had already ceased to be functional), this exact grouping does not appear to have a precedent in the Śaivāgama, although in retrospect we can observe preceding stages in its formation. The early TS, for example, in the course of enumerating the places where Yoginīs reside, lists Jālandhara, Oḍḍiyāṇa and Pūrikā together. However, the following entry is Ayodhyā, not Kāmarūpa – although the latter does appear in the same list.[1] We have seen that the Niśisaṁcāratantra quoted in the TĀ refers to only three major seats and gives pride of place to Kāmarūpa, which is symbolically represented as the source of the other two seats, namely, Uḍḍiyāna and Pūrṇagiri. The KJN, which boasts of its special association with Kāmarūpa, also signals only two other seats along with Kāmarūpa. These are Śrīśaila and Māhendra, both mountains in South India, that appear in another less common group of four sites found in the Kubjikā and other Tantras, in which Kailāśa and Arbuda are added to the other two mountains.[2]

Mountains, it seems, were amongst the earliest sacred places. The worship of sacred mountains is a feature of Epic and Purāṇic religion no less than Tantric. Amongst them the Kula mountains are considered to be the most sacred. According to the Epics and the Purāṇas they are seven.[3] Considered to be the centre of the world by Buddhists, Jains and Hindus alike, Kailāśa is by far the best known of all the sacred mountains in Asia. As it is Śiva's abode, it is understandably an important place in the sacred geography of the Kubjikā Tantras where it is identified with the triangular mount Meru. Said to be another form of Kailāśa,[4] it is, as we have seen, one of many representations of the triangular Yoni located in the End of the Twelve above the head. The teachings are transmitted from here and so are said to come down along the Path of Meru. The KRU

[1] jālandhare viśālākṣī oḍiyāṇe ca śiṣṭimā? |
pūrikāyāṁ [k, g: -yā] mahākāyā āyodhyāṁ vīranāyikā [k, g: -kāḥ] || TS 16/100.
Previously we read:
vasate [g: ?] kāmarūpe [g: ?] tu [g: ?] piṅgalā yoginī śubhā [k, g: śubhāḥ] | TS 16/88ab.

[2] See below, p. 568 with reference to ŚM 3/124-126ab.

[3] As usual, the names of these seven mountains is not uniform in all the sources. In one place in the MBh (bhīṣmaparvan, 67/56cd-57ab) they are said to be: Māhendra, Malaya, Sahya, Śaktimān, Ṛkṣavān, Vindhya and Pāripātra. Quoted in Mani 1984: 438.

[4] KuKh 3/1.

couples this mountain, which is located in Tibet behind the Himalayas, with mount Malaya in South India. The former, in the extreme north, symbolizes Śiva and the latter, in the south, Śakti. The KRU lists forty-eight more mountains, thus making fifty altogether – corresponding, presumably, to the letters of the alphabet. A virgin goddess (kumārikā) is linked to each one, which is projected onto the body starting form the top of the head down to the left foot. The daughter of the Himalayas is thus herself a goddess made of sacred mountains.[1]

These mountains, which are the world and the body of the goddess, originate, according to the KRU, from the first two mountains – Kailāśa and Malaya – which represent the most fundamental of polarities. In their original transcendent oneness they constitute the Kramamaṇḍala of the goddess. Kailāśa stands for 'Krama', that is, the series of mantras that constitute the transmission, and Malaya for the 'maṇḍala' into which they are projected. As such they are both the First Seat (ādipīṭha) in its transcendental aspect symbolized by mount Meru, which represents the Supreme Space (*parākāś*a) of ultimate reality from which emanation and, with it, the teachings (krama) issue forth. From Meru emerge the polarities: the male Malaya and Kailāśa, which is full of female blood. Their union generates the First Sacred Seat, which is symbolized by the Point (bindu) in the centre of the maṇḍala. Bhairava explains in the following passage in the KRU that it is called the Flower from which originates the Divine Current of the transmission known as that of the Flower and the seed of the universe. It is the First Seat in its immanent form.

> The supreme sky (nabhas) is pervasive and free of (all) qualities, including sound and the rest. It should be known to be the supreme space (parākāśa), which is (the supreme) reality (tattva), namely, the Void (śūnya) free of imperfection. It is the lineage (santāna) called the Path of Meru in the Kula teaching.
>
> I am that Path of Meru and the omnipresent supreme space. O great goddess, that beginningless Transmission (krama) originated from its presence. That is called the Primordial Seat (ādipīṭha), the beginningless Kramamaṇḍala.
>
> These two are Kailāśa and Malaya. There, they are said to be sacred seats. My (madīya) merger (laya) takes place there (and so) is called 'Malaya'.

---

[1] The Kālīkrama identifies Kailāsa with the goddess's body. In the CGC (verse 12) we read:

> He who was (before creation) is in truth Lord Śiva (Kilasa). O Mother, you are his mountain of purity (sattva) and upon its uppermost peak, adorned with (his) radiant purity, famed (in the scriptures), he resides perpetually.

Again, O goddess, (the meaning of) Kailāśa is explained as (it should be) understood. O goddess, dear one, it is (so called as it relates) to the blood (kīlāla) that I have placed in that (sacrificial) vessel. Kailāśa originates where that has been offered as a libation.

The Great Seat (mahāpīṭha) originated, O mistress of the heroes, where the Flower originated from that union of us two. It is the middle (seat) and is located in the centre, O dear one, and accompanied by its own energy, is called the 'Flower' by name.

O supreme mistress, it is said to be the pervasive lord of the sacred seat who, in the aforementioned Primordial Seat, bears (his) own name. O Rudrā, O supreme Goddess, one should know that he is endowed with his own power.[1]

Arbuda was another much-venerated Śaiva site. It is modern mount Abu in Rajasthan, which is nowadays an important Jain site. It appears along with the three main sites of the Niśisaṁcāra quoted by Abhinavagupta in his TĀ. Arbuda is also an important site in the KJN. This and other sacred mountains may well have preceded the sacred seats. An echo is still heard of this earlier tradition in the ŚM. There we are told that the subsidiary seats (upapīṭha) the goddess created by her gaze (avalokana) are four sacred mountains, of which one is Arbuda. A goddess resides on each mountain and exerts her authority there at Kubjikā's behest (ādeśa), granting success (siddhi) to her devotees.[2] They are: 1) Śrīśaila –

---

[1] śabdādiguṇanirmuktaṁ vyāpakaṁ paramaṁ nabhaḥ [g: mahat] | parākāśeti vijñeyaṁ śūnyaṁ tattvam anāmayam ||
santānaṁ merumārgeti [g: merumārgreti] proktaṁ yat kulaśāsane [k kh: -sāsane] |
so 'haṁ devi [k kh: missing] mahāmeruḥ [g: -meruṣ] parākāśaś ca [kh: -s va] sarvagaḥ ||
tatsakāśāt mahādevi anādikramasaṁbhavam [k kh g: -vaḥ] |
ādipīṭhaṁ tad evoktaṁ anādikramamaṇḍalam [g: manā-] ||
kailāsamalayāv etau tatra pīṭhau [kh: pīṭhe] prakīrtitau |
[The following three lines are missing in MS Kh.]
madīyaṁ hi layaṁ yatra malayaḥ so 'bhidhīyate [g: tidhīyete] ||
kailāsaṁ tu punar devi vakṣyamāṇaṁ nibodhataḥ |
yat tatpātre [k: tatpatre; g: tatpātra] mayā devi kīlālaṁ sthāpitaṁ priye ||
yatra tat [k kh g: sā] tarpaṇe dattaṁ [k kh: dattā; g: darttā] kailāsas [g: kilāsas] tatra [k: taṁtra] saṁbhavet [k kh g: -vaḥ] |
yat tat saṅgodbhavaṁ puṣpaṁ āvayor vīranāyike ||
tatrotpannaṁ [kh: -tpanna] mahāpīṭhaṁ [g: -ṭha] madhyamaṁ madhyasaṁsthitam [g: -taḥ]|
puṣpasaṁjñābhidhānena svaśaktisahitaṁ priye ||
vyāpakaṁ parameśāni pīṭhanāthaṁ [kh: -nāthā] prakīrtitam |
pūrvokte ādipīṭhe [kh: -pīṭhaṁ] tu svasaṁjñānāmadhārakam [g: svayaṁ jñānamadhārakaṁ] ||
svaśaktisahitaṁ [k: svaśaktisekti-; kh: svasakti-] rudre [k: madre; g: bhadre] jñātavyaṁ parameśvari [kh: -meśvarī] | KRU 2/44-52ab.

[2] śrīśailaṁ [g: -caile] caiva māhendraṁ kailāsam arbudaṁ tathā |
upapīṭhāni deveśī [g: -śi] kṛtvaitāny [kh: -tān; g: kṛtvenānye] avalokanāt [g: vilokayan] ||

Barbarā 2) Māhendra – Mahātārikā 3) Kailāśa – Kamalā 4) Arbuda – Koṅkaṇā. Three mountains are mentioned in the KJN, that it equates with the three qualities (guṇa) of Nature where the devotee attains union with the Yoginī (melāpaka) from whom he thereby gets success (siddhi). These are: Śrīśaila (tāmasa), Māhendra (rājasa) and Kāmākhya (sāttvika).[1] Note, by the way, that Kāmākhya i.e. Kāmarūpa, like the other three major seats, that is, Oḍḍiyāna, Pūrṇagiri and Jālandhara is in a mountainous region. Arbuda does not appear in that group of three. Even so, it is considered to be a particularly important place in the KJN. There Kāmākhya is considered to be the first sacred seat to have been produced,[2] after which come Pūrṇagiri and Oḍḍiyāna. These three have secondary seats (upapīṭha) associated with them as does Arbuda, even though it is said to be just a 'half seat' (ardhapīṭha).[3]

These patterns of development perhaps focused at one time on Arbuda, rather than Jālandhara. Then, as the latter rose to prominence, the former receded into obscurity until it virtually ceased to be a Śaiva or Śākta sites, as the scanty references to it in the later sources indicate.[4] Thus, the ŚM also refers to Arbuda as a 'half seat'. The other three, mentioned above, Śrīśaila, Māhendra and Kailāśa are secondary seats (upapīṭha). These are set in the corners of a triangle with Arbuda in the middle – a sign of its special importance, despite its designation as a 'half seat'. Juxtaposed with the triangle of the primary sacred seats that the ŚM describes just before,[5] this triangle of secondary seats (upapīṭha), meant to be worshipped together with the other one, was clearly felt to be somehow equivalent and important. Surprising as it may seem – due no doubt, to our scant knowledge of the history of the place – Arbuda here is given pride of place as the mountain on which Kubjikā herself resides and is worshipped in the middle of the triangle.

śrīśaile barbarā devī māhendre mahatārikā |
kailāse kamalā devī arbude koṁkaṇā priye ||
adhikāraṁ prakurvanti devyādeśād varānane | ŚM 3/124-126ab.

These four goddesses preside over four of the goddess's six limbs (aṅga). According to KuKh 10/29-30 Barbarā is the Topknot, Mahatārikā (= Mahantārī) is the Eye, Kamalā is the Heart and Koṅkaṇā the Weapon (cf. KMT 7/13cd-18 = ṢSS 13/12cd-17). So indirectly, in this way also, the association between the goddess's body and the mountains mentioned above is established.

[1] KJN 16/7.

[2] KJN 8/20.

[3] KJN 8/21-22 and see Bagchi 1934: 24.

[4] Sircar 1967: 81.

[5] śailaṁ [kh: sai-] māhendra-kailāśaṁ [k: mahendraṁ-] upapīṭhatrayaṁ [g: -ye] priye ||
arbudaṁ ardhapīṭhaṁ tu [k: cordhva-; g: urddha-] upapīṭhān [k: missing] prapūjayet [k: missing] |
vāme dakṣe tatordhve [kh g: tatorddhe] ca madhyasthaṁ [g: pūjayitvā] ca tataḥ priye [g: yathākramaṁ] || [k: missing]
*śaile [k: * *] tu [k: ] barbarā devī māhendre [k: mahendre] mahatārikā |
kailāśe [kh: kailāse] kamalā devī punar [k: pūrṇa] madhye tu kubjikā [k: vajrikā] || ŚM 9/56cd-58.

The same primary grouping of seats is also given pride of place in the Buddhist Hevajratantra. This is not the case with other Buddhist Tantric sources just as it is not in other Śaiva sources. It is therefore highly significant that the HT groups these four together as the foremost sites specifically called pīṭha, rather than upapīṭha, kṣetra or the like. However, the order in which they are listed differs. This is: Jālandhara, Uḍḍiyāna, Paurṇagiri[1] and Kāmarūpa.[2] The Buddhist Saṁvarodayatantra lists four such *pīṭha*s namely: Pūrṇagiri, Jālandhara, Oḍiyāna and Arbuda. Kāmarūpa figures as a kṣetra and is the ninth in serial order out of twenty-four.[3] Seven other Buddhist Tantric texts[4] list these same five places in the same serial order, the sole difference being that Pūrṇagiri, the first entry, is replaced by Pullīramalaya.[5] We notice that this substitution also takes place in one instance, at least, in the Kubjikā Tantras. This change has led some scholars to conjecture that Pūrṇagiri is Pullīramalaya (also spelt Pilliyamalaya) in the south of India.[6] Pūrṇagiri may well be in the South, as we have seen.

Finally we should note that the parallel developments we find in Buddhist and Śaiva sources may not necessarily be due to their common outer sacred geography as much as the fact that the texts shared common literary sources. Sanderson has clearly established that Tantras of all traditions draw from one another. In particular he has identified a number of instances of borrowing of Buddhist Tantras from their Śaiva equivalents.[7] Much more research is required to gauge the extent of this phenomenon and to establish to what degree the Buddhists are drawing from the Śaivites and how much the Śaivites have drawn from them. Even so, what we observe taking place in the Buddhist sources already

---

[1] I have maintained the spellings of these places as they are in the texts in which they are mentioned.

[2] According to the Hevajratantra:

> Jālandhara is said to be a sacred seat (pīṭha), as is Uḍḍiyāna. Paurṇagiri is a sacred seat and so is Kāmarūpa.

pīṭhaṁ jālandharaṁ khyātam uḍḍiyānaṁ tathaiva ca |
pīṭhaṁ paurṇagiriś caiva kāmarūpaṁ tathaiva ca || HT 1/7/12.

[3] Tsuda, Sinichi: The Saṁvarodaya Tantra selected chapters. Quoted in Dhīḥ vol. 1 p. 137.

[4] They are: Vasantatilaka, Jñānodaya, Vajravārāhīyogarājottamarahasya, Śrīcakrasaṁvaraherukābhisamaya, Laghutantraṭīkā, Abhisamayamañjarī, and the Yoginījālamahātantra. See Dhīḥ vol. 1, p. 137-148.

[5] In the Vasantatilaka this place is called Malaya and in the Vajravārāhīrahasya just Pullīira.

[6] Davidson (2002: 209) writes: We have yet to locate the exact position of another of the pīṭhas, Pulliya-malaya (sometimes identified with Paurṇagiri). However its name (malaya) seems to indicate that it was located in South India and was probably a Buddhist name for all the Agastya Malai, the southernmost mountain range of India and very close to the fabled Buddhist pilgrimage site of Potalaka.

[7] See Sanderson 2001.

contributes directly to our understanding of developments in their Śaiva and Kaula equivalents.

Returning to the details of our discussion we can surmise that Arbuda was an important place for the Śaiva, Kaula and Buddhist Vajrayāna Tantras. But although, as we have seen, it is highly regarded in the ŚM, which is an early Kubjikā Tantra, in other Kubjikā sources it is not considered to be a prominent site. The HT relegates it to the thirteenth place in the series of thirty-two places listed there[1] and classifies it as a 'secondary sacred site' (upakṣetra). It appears therefore that the prestige of Arbuda with respect to Kāmarūpa decreased in the other Buddhist sources to which we have referred where it is classified as a primary site (kṣetra) and is the ninth entry out of twenty-four. Moreover, the HT relegates Pūrṇagiri to the third position, which is where it appears in the Kubjikā sources, and lists Jālandhara in its place followed by Oḍḍiyāna. In short, it appears that the standard grouping of these places in the Buddhist sources, like their Śaiva equivalents, tends to be evolving towards the form we find in the KMT. As the KMT develops its own regional, sacred geography by a process of transposition of these four *pīṭha*s, we may assume that the redactor of this portion was influenced by an already well-established tradition of their importance. If this is correct, and the evolution of this model is taking place in parallel in both the Buddhist and Śaiva-cum-Kaula Tantras, it can serve as an indication of the relative dates of these texts. If this is so, the HT is later than the other Buddhist Tantras mentioned above and approximately contemporaneous with the KMT.

The texts reflect, dimly and indirectly, the situation in the outer world, the paradigm largely developed in the ideal world of the Tantras. So it is to the written sources that we must turn to search for precedents. These appear to be more in the Buddhist than the Śaiva Tantras. The presence of this configuration of four seats in the HT is particularly striking if as it is not found in other Buddhist or Śaiva sources. The Kubjikā Tantras consistently relegate Buddhism to the lowest level in the hierarchy of schools. They warn their votaries to avoid Buddhist Kaulas, especially in sacred sites, and to never eat with them. The Nine Siddhas whom the later Kubjikā sources exalt as the second generation of teachers are said to be converted Buddhist monks – as was, according to the ṢSS, their teacher, the 'foolish' (durbodhi) Vajrabodhi. The Buddhists are no less against their Śaiva and Kaula counterparts. But despite these barriers, much filters through from one side to the other. Accordingly, in one place at least, the MBT accepts that mantras learnt from Buddhist Siddhas are effective. Well then, did the HT draw from Kubjikā sources or did the later draw from the former? The second option seems unlikely. It is an unusual configuration for the Buddhist Tantras and is not a particularly significant one even in the HT. Conversely, the KuKh can justifiably boast that:

---

[1] HT 1/7/14.

> The Gestures (i.e. goddesses), the Siddhas and the four sacred seats, have (all) been brought down (to earth) on the Island of the Moon. Little known to any other school (darśana), they are the main (principles) in the Western Tradition.[1]

Although the four sacred seats are already well established in the KMT, we find that the model continues to evolve in the Kubjikā corpus. Conversely, the Kubjikā sources retain an earlier triadic model which we also find, as we have seen, in the Śaiva sources. Although this set-up concurs with the strong triadic tendency apparent in the symbolism of the Kubjikā Tantras, it lacks the symmetry and completeness of a quaternary. The configuration of the sacred seats deployed in the corners of a triangle is unstable, tending naturally towards a set of four by filling the empty centre. As in other traditions, we have noticed an attempt to do this by placing a 'half seat' (ardhapīṭha) there. But this is unusual and is probably a leftover of an earlier view that somehow survived.[2]

According to the Saṁvartāmaṇḍalasūtra, there are only three original Siddhas and three corresponding seats, namely, Oḍḍīśanātha of Oḍḍiyāna, Ṣaṣṭhīśanāth of Pūrṇagiri and Mitreśanātha of Kāmarūpa.[3] The 'missing' seat is, as we would expect, Jālandhara. These three Siddhas correspond to the three Transmissions (krama) handed down through the lineages (oli) founded by them. These are those of the Aged, Youth and the Child, respectively. The scheme of three transmissions does not fit well with that of the four seats. Even so, it appears to be the most basic scheme. This is the layout we find, for example, in one account in the Ṭīkā.[4] The addition of an extra seat skewed this simple symmetry

---

[1] KuKh 60/70.

[2] Apart from the reference from the ŚM cited above, I have been able to trace only one other to the 'half seat' in the Kubjikā corpus. This is found in the SKh where we read:

> The sacred seats beginning with (the one called) the syllable OṀ are said to be three and a half. And the secondary seats and meeting grounds are in the (cardinal) directions, primary and secondary.

oṁkārādyas tu [k, kh: okārādiṣu; g: uṁkārādiṣu] ye pīṭhās trīṇi [k kh g: pīṭhā-] sārdhāḥ [kh: sārddhā] prakīrtitāḥ [g: -tā] ||
upapīṭhāś ca sandohā diśāsu [kh: diśāṣṭa] vidiśāsu [g: vidisāsu] ca || SKh 7/6cd-7ab.

[3] KuKh 2/28.

[4] Ṭ MS K fl. 143bff. This long passage will be presented and analysed in the chapter of this introduction dedicated to the teachers and lineages of the Kubjikā school.

necessitating the addition of an extra transmission, that is, that of the Skyfarers.[1] As the original three seats were Oḍḍiyāṇa, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa, the extra transmission has been linked to Jālandhara. The Skyfarers are the eighteen that make up the Divine Current (divyaugha) of teachers[2] absorbed in the higher, inner states of the goddess and so is said to be 'divine' (divya).[3] Once attained, one achieves liberation.[4] Generally, however, we find, as we would expect, that the Divine Current is associated with the Point in the centre of the Triangle that represents Oḍḍiyāna. But conversely, Oḍḍiyāna is normally the home of the lineage of the Eldest. Even when only three seats are projected into the Triangle, this location is maintained. The Middle lineage is in the southern and northern corners represented by just Pūrṇagiri while that of the Child is associated with Kāmarūpa, which is in the front one.[5]

That Jālandhara is an additional 'empty' place that needs to be filled is suggested by the name of the Siddha who is said to reside here, namely Caryānātha. Of all the names of the Siddhas of these seats this is the only one that is both specific and generic. The name of the Siddha in Jālandhara, as the texts themselves say, is more an epithet than a proper name, derived from his assiduous Tantric practice (caryā). The other three Siddhas could also be called Caryānātha. The title is given, for example, to the original teacher, the First (ādi) Nātha. The development from three to four Siddhas suggests that they were not originally linked to the sacred seats. They became four in order to accommodate them into the triangle, which requires three for the corners and one in the centre. Note that the extra one is not in the centre – which is another indication that this is not an original, basic projection.

The triangle with its sacred seats is well known to the KMT. Even so, the close – indeed, virtually invariable – connection between the seats and the standard three or four Siddhas, seen we see repeatedly in the KuKh and other Kubjikā Tantras after the KMT, has not been established. This is particularly apparent in chapter two of the KMT. Kubjikā goes to places that are linked to the sacred seats of the Triangle and even establishes lineages (lit. generates 'sons' and 'daughters') but the Siddhas there are not the standard ones, although there names do appear here and there in the KMT. Thus, for example, in one place, Ṣaṣṭhīśāna, usually linked with the sacred seat of Pūrṇagiri, makes an appearance as Kubjikā's consort but with no mention of any sacred seat.[6] A less recondite example is Mitranātha. This is the name Bhairava is given when he receives initiation from

[1] See KuKh 6/190cd-191ab.
[2] KuKh 57/28.
[3] KuKh 3/11.
[4] KuKh 57/105cd-106ab.
[5] KuKh 7/93-95ab.
[6] KMT 19/26c.

the goddess. Subsequently, although he retains his status as the First Siddha, he is linked to Kāmarūpa, rather than Oḍḍiyāna, which is generally recognised to be the first seat. As if conscious that this is a novel development, the apparent contradiction is resolved by making this the main seat in this cosmic age and investing Mitranātha with the title of the First Siddha of this age.

The four seats are described in chapter 11 of the KMT as the core of the sixteen vocalic energies of the sphere of Purity (viśuddhi). The Lords of these are the four Siddhas but they are tenuous, nondescript figures, although the KMT seeks to establish the importance of these places as primary symbols for the most elevated metaphysical principles. We shall see that these projections prefigure many that reappear in numerous variant forms in the Kubjikā Tantras. Subsequently, similar equations are formulated in the Śrīvidyā tradition; and so, by the time of its emergence, the model of four sacred seats and their residents is fully established. And as the Śrīvidyā tradition survived and still enjoys an extensive spread and prestige all over India, the four sacred seats became the most universal and standard set.

The later Kubjikā Tantras developed at a time (probably between the 10th and 12th centuries) when these seats were also progressively gaining prestige in the textual tradition. This development in the texts probably does not reflect an analogous one in the outer world. The colophon of the KMT (which may belong to the 9th or 10th century) claims that Oḍḍiyāna is the place where the Kubjikā tradition originated. While the claim may reflect a North Indian origin of the KMT, the ascription may well be ideal. By the beginning of the 11th century the Swat Valley where Oḍḍiyāna was located was overrun by Muslim invaders led by Mahmud of Ghazni.[1] Although the population took its time to convert to Islam, Buddhism there was clearly declining and with it, no doubt Śaivism, even though Tibetan pilgrims in the 13th century did find a few surviving remains of Buddhism and maybe also its Hindu counterparts.[2]

An indication that this decay had already set in earlier is the perplexing confusion we find in the KMT and in the later sources that directly or indirectly

---

[1] The last great pre-Muslim empire to rule this region was that of the Kuṣanas up to the end of the 4th century CE. The following four centuries saw Sasanid rule, then that of the Hephtalites, and the Turkish Shahis. These were followed by the Hindu Shahis who ruled first from Kabul and then Hind on the Indus. By this time there had already been a few Arab incursions that further weakened this divided Afghan empire. In 962 CE the Turk Alp Tegin, a Samamid general, descended from Bukhara followed by his slave Subuk Tegin. They managed to establish themselves in Ghazni and founded an empire that covered most of Afghanistan and reached into Iran. Subuk Tegin was succeeded by his son Mahmud of Ghazni who reigned from 998 to 1030. In the course of establishing his vast empire Mahmud overcome the Hindu Shahis, who had been left to face him without support, and so the Swat Valley fell into his hands. See Tucci 1978: 93-54.

[2] Tucci 1978: 94.

drew from it, between Oḍḍiyāna and Orissa – Oḍra. According to the KMT, after her tour, the goddess finally reunites with the god in a place called Uḍu. According to the edited text of the KMT the god is called, the 'Great Lord of Oḍra' (oḍramaheśāna).[1] At first sight it seems that Oḍra i.e. Orissa is meant here. But unfortunately the readings in these places and elsewhere in the corpus are so varied and numerous that it is not possible to be sure that this reading or place is in fact intended. There may very well have been a close connection between Orissa and the early development of the Kubjikā cult. It is well known that Orissa was, in the period we are considering, a major centre of Śaivism not only Pāśupata and Siddhānta but also Kāpālika and Kaula. But, taking the evidence as whole – especially the fact that clear references to Oḍra are very few, and that these too are subject to confusing variant readings – it would be hazardous to maintain that Orissa is treated as a special region of importance in the KMT in the same way Koṅkaṇa is treated in the later sources.

Let us examine a few sample references. The KuKh refers to the place where the teachings were originally propagated as Uḍapīṭha.[2] Here the three Siddhas, Oḍḍīśanātha, Ṣaṣṭhanātha and Mitranātha, received knowledge. As the first of these Siddhas presides over Oḍḍiyāṇa this may be taken to mean that Uḍapīṭha is a separate place. But the texts imply that the first of these three Siddhas remained where the original transmission took place, whereas Ṣaṣṭhanātha went to Pūrṇagiri and Mitranātha to Kāmarūpa, where they founded separate seats. Again, we find that the first sacred seat, which is normally said to be Oḍḍiyāna or the 'seat of OṀ' (oṁkārapīṭha), is also called Uḍu or Oḍī pīṭha.[3] According to the system of eight seats described in the YKh presented at the end of this chapter, the 'original sacred seat' (ādipīṭha) is called both Oṁkāra and Uḍupīṭha. Moreover, the account in the YKh does not list Oḍḍiyāna separately. The other three main sacred follow in the normal serial order after Uḍu, implying that Oḍḍiyāna and Uḍu are the same. The first seat described in the beginning of chapter six of our text is Oḍḍiyāna but it is called Udri in all but three manuscripts. The reading of the remaining MSs is Uḍi, which is the one that has been accepted.[4] However, the Siddha of this place is called Oḍīśa.[5] The variety of spellings of this place name add to the confusion. Even so, there can be little doubt that we should not distinguish between an original seat and Oḍḍiyāna. The [1] See KMT 2/121cd quoted above, chapter 1, p. 61 note 2. This line is reproduced in KuKh 6/223cd-224ab where the reading is of this name is Oḍḍumaheśāna. Cf. KMT 11/50d where the name is Śrīmadoḍrakuleśvara. In ṢSS 18/66ab Oḍamaheśvara is said to be the lord of Oḍḍiyāna.

---

[2] KuKh 7/58cd-59ab.
[3] The first spelling is in YKh (1) 14/16a and the second is a variant in YKh(2) 5/18a where the same lines appears.
[4] See the Sanskrit text of KuKh 6/6.
[5] KuKh 6/9 and cf. ibid. 6/31.

range of spellings is probably not just the result of copyist errors, although this is a factor. It may well be an indication of some confusion in the tradition itself, which was prone to a degree to consider the land of Oḍra, that is, Orissa, to be an important, if not the original, site of the spread of the teachings.

One could reasonably speculate that this confusion was related to the uncertainty of the location of Oḍḍiyāṇa. Unknown to the Brahmayāmala – which stood on the threshold of the development of the Kaula cults – and of lesser importance in the initial stages, it became one of the most prestigious of all sacred seats (pīṭha) for the Kaula cults and those of the Anuttarayoga that developed in parallel to them amongst Vajrayāna Buddhists. We have already noted that the Kashmiri Kālīkrama is associated with the Uttarapīṭha (the Northern Seat) and, identified with Oḍḍiyāna, is also called Oṁkārapīṭha. The last two associations are repeatedly stressed in the Kubikā Tantras and a connection is tacitly maintained with the Kālīkrama by worshiping Kālasaṁkarṣinī in Uḍu / Oḍīpīṭha,[1] which is clearly Oḍḍiyāna – located, according to these Kālīkrama sources, in the north-west of India. The strange variation in the name of the First Seat persisted in the Śrīvidyā tradition, which adopted the pīṭha system from the Kubjikā cult although it made various additions and changes to it to suit its own lineages. There the First Seat is the Seat of the Command (Ājñāpīṭha); an apt name, we also find it in the Kubjikā sources.[2] According to the Saṁketapaddhati quoted by Vidyānanda in his commentary on the NṢA, the Artharatnāvali, the 'Seat of the Command' is Oḍupīṭha and the cognate Siddha is called Oḍḍu or Oḍunātha.[3]

It is not impossible that Oḍḍiyāna had nothing more than a symbolic existence when the redactors mentioned it as the place of the revelation of the KMT in its concluding colophon. If the Kubjikā cult did originate there, one wonders why it was hardly known in Kashmir in the 10th and 11th century, as the near absence of references from Kubjikā Tantras in Kashmiri Śaiva sources leads one to suppose. The evident shift to the Deccan in general and Koṅkaṇa in

---

[1] See YKh (1) 14/17.

[2] For example, `the Pervasion of the Sacred Seat of the Command (Ājñāpīṭha)' is the name of chapter six of the KuKh.

[3] Vidyānanda (NṢA p. 220) explains that Paramaśiva in the form of Caryānātha presides in the First Seat with his consort Kāmeśvarī. She selects the three Siddhas – Oḍḍu, Ṣaṣṭha and Mitra – and places them in authority in the three seats of Pūrṇagiri, Jālandhara and Kāmarūpa, respectively. These skewed correspondences are the result of same problem that arises by trying to accommodate three Siddhas into four seats. Moreover, in this case also the difficulty is compounded by the ambiguous identity of the First Seat. Although Caryānātha is linked to first seat, it is clear that this is the seat of Oḍḍu. We shall have occasion to discuss this configuration in greater detail in chapter six which is dedicated to the teachers and lineages of the Kubjikā tradition.

particular in the later Kubjikā Tantras presumes that they came from elsewhere.[1] This may have been the north of India, but it may well also have been the eastern Deccan. This possibility is suggested by the prominent status attributed to Śrīśaila in Andhra in the original form of the goddess's myth and, to a lesser extent, to the Sahya forest in central Maharashtra where the goddess projected Pūrṇagiri. Perhaps the shift of emphasis from Oḍḍiyāna to Kāmarūpa, where the teaching is said to be propagated in this cosmic age, is indicative of the former's decline. Just as the Kubjikā and Kālī Kulas are associated with Oḍḍiyāna, Kāmarūpa is associated with Matsyendranātha and the propagation of the Kula modality. Conversely, Jālandhara, which like Kāmarūpa is still functional, figures in the Kubjikā sources as a site of developing importance.

Despite all these uncertainties, the Kubjikā sources consistently maintain that Oḍḍiyāna is the original place where the scriptures were brought down into the world. This is stated repeatedly in the long colophons of the KuKh where the scripture is said to be ādyapīṭhāvatārita, which means both 'brought down into the first sacred seat' and 'brought down from the first sacred seat'. Both translations are correct and, no doubt, both are intended. The scripture originates from the Command, symbolized by the Point in the centre of the Triangle into which Oḍḍiyāna is projected. From there it is 'brought down' into its outer counterpart. Whether its outer location was known or not to the redactors of the texts, Oḍḍiyāna remained throughout the development of the Kubjikā cult, unambiguously the First Seat (ādipīṭha).[2] This remains the case even when Kāmarūpa is mentioned first in the series of the main sacred seats[3] and is promoted as the seat of this, the Age of Strife (kaliyuga), in contrast to Oḍḍiyāna, which was the seat in the First Age.

Accordingly, Oḍḍiyāna enjoys pride of place at the centre of the goddess's triangle. Here the energy of bliss rests on the plane of repose (viśrāmabhūmi).[4] This is the Śāmbhava plane.[5] Beyond even the cessation of suffering attained by the realisation of Nirvāṇa,[6] it is the ultimate end of all bondage. As the Point in the centre of the goddess's Triangle, the First Seat contains all that is most essential of the entire maṇḍala. It is where the seed-syllable of the goddess is located,[7] as is the goddess's Vidyā, which, by extension, is itself said to be the first

[1] The shift of the Kubjikā Tantras to Koṅkaṇa and the Deccan will be discussed in detail in a following chapter.
[2] See e.g. KuKh 38/6b.
[3] See, for example, charts 7 and 9 below on, p. 628 and 631.
[4] KuKh 1/1a, 1/4a.
[5] KuKh 68/125-126ab.
[6] KuKh 21/47.
[7] KuKh 8/71cd-73ab.

of the sacred seats.[1] Other important mantras come from it, including the 'terrible weapon' (ghorāstra) of the Five *Praṇava*s.[2] It is said to be the repository of all the seed-syllables.[3] Similarly, the entire series of letters and their sacred counterparts represented in the Assembly of Sounds (śabdarāśi) are collectively identified with the First Seat.[4] The essence (sadbhāva) of the Krama is said to be 'sealed' or 'stamped' (mudrita) here.[5] Accordingly, the worship of the Krama (kramārcana) in the maṇḍala starts from here[6] and so it is the 'first seat' also in the sense that it is the first to be worshipped. Similarly, just as it contains in a potential form the Krama that spreads out from it, in the same way the deities of all the sacred sites are contained within it.[7] Encompassing all things within itself, the First Seat is the Void said to be 'the womb of Bhairava'.[8]

Pīṭha

In order to understand how this sacred seat and the others are charged with such powerful symbolic significance let us first turn our attention to the original meanings and evolution of the term pīṭha. Although the term 'pīṭha' in the early Siddhāntāgamas denotes the location of a deity, sacred person or entity, it not generally used to denote a sacred site. A pīṭha is a part of the maṇḍala where the deity sits.[9] The NTS refers to the central square of its primary maṇḍala as the pīṭha that is 'the best of seats'.[10] Similarly, the term pīṭha may denote the pedestal on which a Liṅga is placed and bathed (snānapīṭha) in a pavilion erected for that purpose.[11] The same word also denotes the part of the plinth on which a Liṅga is erected. It may be of various kinds and variously named according to its size, shape, layers and the like. Such pīṭhas are described in the Siddhāntāgamas.[12] Pīṭha is also the seat that is

---

[1] KuKh 8/120-121ab.
[2] KuKh 15/30.
[3] KuKh 58/4-5ab.
[4] KuKh 19/20.
[5] KuKh 13/140ab.
[6] KuKh 8/114cd-116ab.
[7] See KuKh 16/99-100ab and note.
[8] KuKh 58/5cd-7ab.
[9] Bhaṭṭa Nārāyaṇakaṇṭha commenting on Mṛgendrāgama, Kriyāpāda 8/30 says that: Pīṭha is the lotus which is the Supreme Lord's seat. pīṭham iti parameśvarāsanaṁ padmam.

See Brunner 1985: diagram 1 for a drawing of the maṇḍala where the pīṭha and its other parts are noted.

[10] caturasram bhavet pīṭham anantaṁ hy āsanottamam |
dharmajñānaṁ ca vairāgyam aiśvaryaṁ ca catuṣṭayam | NTS MS Kh fl. 43a.

[11] śakaṭenānayel [k: kakaṭo-] liṅgaṁ sthāpya tat snānamaṇḍape [k: srāna-] |
*snānapīṭhe [k: srana-; kh: -pīṭha] sthite deve snāpanaṁ [k: * pana] ca [kh: *] * kārayet [k: * rayet]* || NTS MS Kh fl. 46a.

[12] See, for example, chapter 16 of the Kriyāpāda of the Ajitāgama.

offered to the teacher along with other sacred, ritual implements.[1] In a more general sense pīṭha is the locus or place of a metaphysical principle set in relation to other principles similarly located in a maṇḍala.

The term has a number of other meanings conveying the general sense of a container, group or part. The Bhairava Tantras are classified in both the BY and the later JY into four *pīṭha*s, that is, 'groups' or 'containers' of Tantras. The Vidyāpīṭha is said to be the group that contains the Tantras that teach Vidyās i.e. mantras of goddesses. The BY, which belongs to the Vidyāpīṭha, for example, claims that this and the mantra-, mudrā- and maṇḍala- pīṭhas are all represented in it.[2] Accordingly, the BY prescribes that the maṇḍala should be drawn in four parts corresponding to these four groups.[3] The JY also retains the earlier technical sense of the term. Thus the JY refers to the place where the sacrificial jar is placed in the course of a rite as the 'bhadrapīṭha'. [4] The BY refers to the place where the seat is placed for the teacher to sit as the 'yogapīṭha'.[5] The JY uses the same term to denote the seed-syllable OṀ[6] and the innermost part of a maṇḍala.[7] The Kubjikā Tantras do the same both with reference to the external maṇḍala and its internal counterpart in the End of the Twelve. Moreover, the Kubjikā Tantras, like the Siddhāntāgamas, use the same term to denote the pedestal where the scripture is kept and worshipped. [8]

---

[1] Having offered a seat (pīṭha), umbrella, turban and knife, (one should say): "You are the teacher, Śiva's equal; exercise (your) grace in the world."

pīṭhaṁ [k: pīṭha] datvā tathā chatram uṣṇīsaṁ [k: chatraṁ-; -sa] kartariṁ [k: kertarin] tathā || śivatulyas [k: śivantulya-] tvam ācāryo loke cānugrahaṁ kuru | NTS MS Kh fl. 22b.

[2] mudrāmaṇḍalamantrāṇi vidyāpīṭhopalakṣitam ||
sahasrāṇi daśadve ca catuḥpīṭhaṁ tu bhairavam | BY 1/2cd-3ab.

[3] catuṣpīṭhavibhāgena ālikhet maṇḍalottamam | BY 57/60ab.

[4] kṛtvā pūrvoktavad yāgaṁ kalaśaṁ tatra rājatam ||
śatābhimantritaṁ kṛtvā bhadrapīṭhopaveśitam | JY 3/14/226cd-227ab.

[5] mūlāsanaṁ tato nyasya āsanasyopari [k: āsanabhyo] priye |
yogapīṭhaṁ tato pūjyaṁ [k, kh: pūjya] vidyayā [kh: vidyeyā + tu] sādhakottamaiḥ [k, kh: -maḥ] ||
upaviśya guruṁ tatra candanena vilepayet | BY 34/360-361ab.

[6] praṇavaṁ yogapīṭhaṁ tu | JY 1/11/42a.

[7] granthibhir granthir [k, kh: granthi] vai vīro yogapīṭhasamanvitam |
antaḥkoṣṭhārdhabhāgena yogapīṭhaṁ vivarjayet [k, kh: vivartayet] || JY 1/18/35cd-36ab.

[8] The KMT (25/193cd-194ab) declares with respect to itself:

The town of one who possesses (this scripture) is equal to a sacred seat (pīṭha) and the house (in which it is present) should be considered by those possess the tradition to be a Yogapīṭha.

The scripture may be worshipped in the triangular core of the Kramamaṇḍala of the goddess Kubjikā. Hence one of the names of the Yoni, which represents it is 'Yogapīṭha', implying thereby that it is not only the repository of the scripture but also its source. We shall discuss the worship of the Āgama in the last chapter of this introduction and in the course of the

That the body is the abode of deities is an ancient Indian intuition. One of the first references to this view goes as far back as the Atharvaveda, where it is said that the gods reside in the body like cows in a cow-pen. As a pīṭha is the residence of deities, the body or parts of it may be referred to as a pīṭha. Thus we find the expression kāyapīṭha, which literally means 'seat of the body' but denotes specifically the head as the epitome of the body and seat of the deities worshipped on it.[1] The term pīṭha has a special sense in the BY as another part of the body. Also called śaktipīṭha,[2] it is the sacred sexual organ of Śakti, the ritual consort. There the adept 'places', that is, performs his own sacrificial rite (svayāga) of union, which produces the sacrificial substances offered to the deity:

> Having placed Śakti in front, wearing the five insignia (of the wandering ascetic), standing (ūrdhvarūpā) naked, hair dishevelled and firm in the observance of her vow, clean her sacred seat (pīṭha). (Then) having smeared it with perfumes and holy water (astrodaka), fashion there the place (āsana of union). [. . .] Once the excellent adept has cleaned the sacred seat with holy water, he places his own sacrifice there beginning with the (formation of the) place (of union) and the rest. Once done that, O fair lady, he kisses and embraces the sacred seat (pīṭha) and having caused the male organ to enter, preceded by the (formation of the) place (of union) and the rest, he then conjoins the omnipresent (sarvagata) (i.e. sperm), along with flowers, scent and the rest, to it. Then, having aroused the Śakti and collected the sacrificial substance (i.e. sexual fluid) generated from that and then having eaten (some of exposition of chapter thirty of the KuKh, which is dedicated to the rites and other matters relating to the transcription and worship of the scripture.

[1] TĀ 29/15c. Jayaratha explains: the kāyapīṭha is one's own head or that of another. That is said (in the following): "the head is considered to be the foundation of all the deities.

[2] The BY (45/276cd-277ab) directs:

Then having offered libation in the śaktipīṭha and kissed (it), the one who recites mantra should place the penis there and begin to wash (it) mentally.

śaktipīṭhe tato 'rghaṁ tu datvā kṛtvā tu cumbanam ||
liṅgaṁ tatra kṣipet mantrī manaḥkṣālanam [k: mano-; kh: manā-] ārabhet |

Again:

Having deposited (the mantras) on the śaktipīṭha, place that (Śakti) on a seat (āsana). Having kissed and embraced (her), place the penis there.

śaktipīṭhe nyāsaṁ kṛtvā āsane sthāpayet [k, kh: -ye] tu tām [k: mā] || cumbanāliṅganaṁ kṛtvā liṅgaṁ tatra vinikṣipet | BY 40/10cd-11ab.

that) substance and offered libation, he should then offer it (to the deity).[1]

Along with their distinctive sacred geographies, the Tantras developed their own terms to denote their sacred sites. The early usages of the term pīṭha paved the way for its later application to what were considered to be the most important sites where deities, especially, but not exclusively, goddesses and Yoginīs reside. A basic feature of these sites is that they were also all internal. We have noted some examples of projections of the sacred seats into the body. Before we go on to examine others found in the KuKh and the Kubjikā Tantras in general, we may discuss deeper projections. The constituents of the goddess's maṇḍala are explained in chapter two of the KuKh to be those of the psychophysical organism, the senses, mind and its basic states. In the centre of the maṇḍala is the pure energy of the Transmental radiating into the sacred seats in the Triangle representing thus the core energies of consciousness. Symbolic projections of sacred space into the Divine Core of reality are common in other schools as well. According to the Kālīkrama, for example, the supreme power of the deity's divine consciousness is simultaneously both the source and the sacred seat – pīṭha – of its energies:

O Mother! This, the great sacred seat (pīṭha) born from you, is the energized vitality (of consciousness) which pours forth when Śiva becomes one with you by virtue of your perpetually expanding body of energy.

And this, the (divine) intellect, the supreme vitality (of consciousness) is you, O (goddess) Śivā, whose body of light abides within the five elements beginning with Earth and who generates the Wheel of the Sacred Seat (pīṭhacakra) (corresponding to them). You, who alone possess all the powers of the Wheel of the Sacred Seat, abide always and everywhere. Perceived, O Mother, by the wise who

---

[1] agrataḥ śaktim āropya [k: -māṇapa] ūrdhvarūpāṁ digāmbarām [k: diśām-; k, kh: -raṁ] ||
mudrāpañcakasaṁyuktāṁ [k, kh: -yuktaṁ] muktakeśīṁ [k, kh: -śī] dṛḍhavratām |
pīṭhaṁ tu mārjayet [k, kh: mārcayet] tasyā [k: tasmā] astrodakasamanvitaiḥ [k: -tām; kh: -tāḥ] ||
vilepayitvā gandhais tu [k: gandhraistu] āsanaṁ tatra kalpayet |
yāgaṁ pūrvavidhānena aśeṣaṁ tatra vinyaset || [. . .]
astrodakena saṁmājya pīṭhaṁ vai sādhakottamaḥ |
svayāgaṁ tatra vinyasya āsanādipuraḥsaram ||
cumbanāLiṅganaṁ kṛtvā pīṭhasyāpi varānane |
liṅgaṁ praveśayitvā tu āsanādipuraḥsaram [k: punaḥ-] ||
sarvagataṁ [k: sarvāga] tato yojya puṣpagandhādibhis tathā |
kṣobhayitvā tataḥ śaktiṁ dravyaṁ gṛhya tadudbhavam ||
prāśayitvā [k, kh: prāsa-] tato dravyaṁ arghyayitvā tato 'rpayet | BY 45/197cd-199, 247-250ab.

> are at one with the force (of pure consciousness) (udyama), you are the unobscured dawning (of enlightenment).[1]

From this perspective, the Great Reality – Mahārtha – taught in the Kālīkrama is itself Pīṭha. Indeed, it is the entire tradition of the Great Reality and so is consciousness, the inner dimension of the body in the form of the Five Currents (pañcavāha) of the cycles of the goddesses of consciousness[2] as explained in the following passage from chapter two of the Mahānayaprakāśa (3). Notice that all the spheres of reality are included in this one, great sacred seat identified with the syllable OṀ (praṇava) that externally is Oḍḍiyāna. This ranges from the gross elements through to the body, senses, and mind. All the major elements associated with an outer sacred site are incorporated into it: a cremation ground, guardian, the union between Siddhas and Yoginīs that takes place there and the sacrificial rite. Moreover, just as the sacred seat is considered to be the outer foundation of the tradition, for it is there that it is revealed and there that the rites and Yoga are performed with success, so too the Pīṭhakrama – the Transmission of the Sacred Seat – is the foundation of the Kālīkrama, and with it all of reality:

> First comes the exposition the nature of the transmission of the sacred seat (pīṭhakrama), having bowed to it, the supreme secret * * * and true seed of the tradition that comes from the mouth of the most excellent teachers. The ground (saṁsthāna) of the Pīṭhakrama, pleasing to the heart (hṛdayaṅgama), will now be explained in relation to the universe of living beings and (insentient) phenomena (bhāva). (1-2)
>
> The unfolding (sphāra) of the sphere of the (five) goddesses (devīcakra) takes place as the Pīṭhakrama in form of the sequence beginning with the (inner) sacrifice (yāga), the knowledge of which is explained by the teacher. (3)
>
> Daily life (vyavahāra) in the world is predominantly of the nature of action; accordingly, knowledge of the Pīṭhakrama is explained in terms of that. With this intention, the teacher makes the fettered (disciple) (paśu) a recipient of the tradition once he has eaten the sacrificial pap (caru). (4-5)
>
> Here the Pīṭhakrama consists of the Sacred Seat (pīṭha), the Cremation Ground (śmaśāna), the Lord of the Field (kṣetreśa), Union (mela), and the Sacrifice (yāga). (It arises from) from the sacred seats

[1] CGC 76-78.
[2] MP (1) p. 56.

as (the five) beginning with Vyomeśvarī,[1] in due order. (6)

(This group of five) consists of the Void (śūnya), vital breath (prāṇa), intellect (dhī), and the senses of knowledge and action. (These together are) the body (kāya), which as an insentient, external object of the senses consists of the (five gross elements) starting with Space and ending with Earth. It is attended by perfected yogis whose foundation (ādhāra) is the experience of the infinite (anantānubhava).

Located in this, the meeting place (saṁketasthāna), the rays of consciousness are clearly visible, due to which this Pīṭhakrama is thereby (experienced). Thus (the Pīṭhakrama) ranges from the Sacrifice which is the (aggregate of) the organs of action (karmendriya) up to the Void and the sequence beginning with 'exertion' (udyoga)[2] in the body and externally as (the gross elements) beginning with Earth in due order. (7-10)

The great pervasion of each previous one (in the subsequent) takes place everywhere and, (related one to the other as) the support and the supported, abides undivided. (11)

---

[1] Vyomeśvarī, also called Vyomavāmeśvarī or just Vāmeśvarī, presides over four spheres of consciousness that, together with her, constitute the Five Currents (pañcavāha) of the Process of Consciousness (saṁvitkrama). Sanderson (1995: 69-70) explains:

> . . . in Kṣemarāja's Krama, Vāmeśvarī is identified with the power of consciousness in its absolute, uncontracted state and is said to give rise to four circuits of subordinate deities: the Khecarīs, the Gocarīs, the Dikcarīs and the Bhūcarīs. These are the same power of consciousness but projected towards and into plurality on the levels of (1) the subject, (2) the mental apparatus (antaḥkaraṇam), (3) the faculties of sense perception (buddhīndriyam) and action (karmendryam) and (4) the sense elements (tanmātra).

See Singh 1982: 81-82; Dyczkowski 1992 (b): 69-70 and Gnoli 1985: 287-289. In this text the five are called: Vyomeśvarī, Khecarī, Bhūcarī, Saṁhārabhakṣiṇī and Raudreśī.

[2] 'Exertion' (udyoga) is the first of four moments in the act of perception in which, as Dupuche (2003: 59-60) explains:

> consciousness emits the object. The second stage is avabhāsa, the manifestation of reality. The third is the absorption, the relishing or savouring (carvaṇa) of reality. The final stage is dissolution when reality is reabsorbed in its every aspect (viśrānti) of subjectivity. For example,
> . . . at first there is will to perceive a jar (udyoga), then there is actual perception of the jar (avabhāsa), relishing of the perceptive experience (carvaṇa), and finally assimilating the perceptive experience of the jar to the essential nature of the Self.

The reference is from Singh 1988: 197-198, note 7. See also Padoux 1990: 238, note 37. In one place, the MP (3) (3/1) lists these four as 1) udaya – 'arising', 2) avabhāsa – 'manifestation'. 3) kālagrāsa – 'assimilation of time (into non-temporal consciousness)'. 4) svarūpaviśrānti – 'repose in one's own nature'.

The five phases of the Pīṭhakrama are as follows:

1) Sacred Seat / Vyomeśī / Void: Vyomeśī is the undisturbed (anākulā) repose of all (these forms of) consciousness in the essential nature of the Sacred Seat because (her) nature is unobscured[1] and endless. She resides inwardly in the body as the Pīṭha, which is the Void (śūnya). The unfolding of consciousness up to the organs of action has as its support (āśraya) the insentient (body consisting of the gross elements) starting with Space and ending with Earth (which exists) because of its grounding in that (consciousness). (In this case) the energy of the sacred seat of Space is the (one that functions) externally. (12-14)

2) Cremation Ground / Khecarī / vital breath / touch: The energy of consciousness (citi) that pulsates (spandamānā) in the Void (vyoman) (of consciousness) undifferentiated by time which, by the combustion of time, is one, is said to be Khecarī who is the Cremation Ground. Again, the Cremation Ground is said to be the vital breath (prāṇa) within the body that, endowed with the power of the pulsation (of consciousness), devours time in those who are in objectless, deep sleep. The external Cremation Ground (śmaśāna) is the skin because it devours time as time ends without the differentiated perception of objectivity.[2] (15-17)

3) Kṣetrapāla / Bhūcarī / intellect: That (conscious) nature is the supreme field (kṣetra) present on the plane of the light and bliss (of consciousness) * * * [3] (The Guardian of the Field) is within the body as the subject corresponding to the intellect and, because he protects the field consisting of the Void and the vital breath, he is Lord of the Field (kṣetrapāla) who is of that nature. He also protects the field in the outer sphere that consists of the aggregate of light (tejas), touch and space and so that (energy of consciousness) is of that nature. (18-20)

4) Melāpa / Saṁhārabhakṣiṇī: That same (energy of consciousness) is the (goddess) who devours destruction (saṁhārabhakṣiṇī). She is the perception consisting of the manifestation of all things within supreme consciousness in a state of oneness

[1] Read nirāvaraṇarūpatvād for niśāvaraṇarūpatvād.

[2] I suppose that what is meant here is that as touch is a pervasive, undifferentiated sensation, it is not temporal because time is based on differentiated perception.

[3] There is a lacuna in the edited text here. Probably for this reason the name of the goddess of this phase is missing. However, the same series appears in a different context in MP (3) 7/104cd-118. There it is clear that the third goddess is Bhūcarī.

(sāmarasya), and so is Union (mela). (21).

The inner abiding state of the light (of consciousness) as a state of oneness is the withdrawal of (all) manifestations (ābhāsa) (brought about) when this same (energy) has turned in on itself in all respects (samantataḥ). (22)

She is called Saṁhārabhakṣiṇī because she devours (all things) through inner touch.[1] It is where the knowledge consisting of the manifestation of the organs of knowledge, intensified by the wonder that is the experience (ābhoga) of sense objects, comes to rest. (23-24ab).

Pleasing (snigdha) Union (mela) is brought about by the inner Self, which is in a potential state.  Externally it is this (energy) that is capable of perceiving the reflection (of perceptions within the intellect). It is experienced as the Union[2] that is the taste of the inner universal aesthetic delight (rasa) (of consciousness) (24cd-25)

5) Yāga / Raudreśvarī: This (energy) is the Primordial Sacrifice (ādyayāga), the (most) noble and profound plane (of reality). It is intent towards the plane of repose within one's own nature, which is hard to grasp and free of obscuration. It is the wine of Kula (i.e. immanence) and Akula (transcendence) consisting of the flow of the Great Resonance (of consciousness), which is internal and full. It is the abiding condition (sthiti) (of the energy of consciousness) as the unity (sāmarasya) brought about by the purification of objectivity and the latent traces (of the previous phases) when (all) is being destroyed with great force in order to perform the supreme lustration (tarpaṇa). Thus the most excellent teachers consider (this Sacrifice) to be Raudraraudreśvarī. (26-28)

This is the sequence of universal absorption (alaṁgrāsakrama). The place where the Great Force (mahāsāhasa) originates. It is the Violent Union (haṭhamelāpa)[3] that takes place by the most pleasing union (adhikapriyamelāpa) (29).

All the aforementioned states (bhāva), including those in the inner body, are made clearly manifest by the organs of action. Here this Sacrifice, witnessed as it is by it own inherent nature (svasākṣita), is clearly perceived to be in accord with this goddess's nature. It is the inner repose that is the forgetting of those (previous states and

---

[1] 'Inner touch' is the contact the dynamism of individual consciousness, along with its instruments and content, makes with the Process (krama) of universal consciousness which thereby assimilates it and brings it to rest.

[2] Read -melāpā- for -melāvā-.

[3] Read -melāpalakṣanaḥ for -melopalakṣaṇaḥ.

manifestations) that takes place in that moment because all desire (for them) has ceased. (30-31ab)

(The supreme reality is) perceived externally by means of that (energy) due to the cessation the activity of each (of the phases of consciousness). That is the Sacrifice where (all) states subsequently repose. (31cd-32)

Having by means of the Pīṭhakrama entered in this way into objectivity, the nature of which is the insentient (objective world) consisting of consciousness in (its most gross) condensed form (saṁstyānatārūpa),[1] the Wheel of the Goddesses unfolds. (33)

It pervades all things and is directly perceived. It is the foundation of all things from (their) beginning to the end. It is the best of all and bears all things. It is the cause of gracing others and is nothing but the most excellent form of worship. (Thus for all these reasons) it is the Sacred Seat called Praṇava. (34-5)

The Four Sacred Seats

The inveterate love for classification in India has generated from ancient times numerous sets of categories. One of the most common and exemplary is the set of five that corresponds, for example, to the five gross elements, five subtle objects of sense, and the five senses that perceive them. They can correspond to the four directions with the fifth in the centre. Similarly, eight corresponds to the eight directions primary and secondary. We get ten by adding the nadir and zenith and eleven with the centre. Examples could be multiplied at great length. In view of the India love of symbolic representation and exegesis, it is surprising that we do not find works in India on Numerology, that is, the occult symbolism of numbers. But this is not really so. Numbers are manipulated in an analogous way through sacred geometries. Maṇḍalas in this perspective are visual representations of sets of categories whose interrelationship is depicted by the successive layers of geometric forms inserted into one another to form them. Geometric figures serve as empty shelves upon which the archetypical contents of reality can be arranged, for ease of comprehension, manipulation and worship. In this perspective the seats are just that – open sites in which realities may be accommodated.

Indeed, the seats are such open categories that they can contain, in one way or another, most if not all the realities distributed in the micro-and macrocosms. They are not just convenient receptacles, but are themselves sacred in a special way. The worship of the seats is the apogee of all the means to the attainment of accomplishments, even the greatest of them – the Accomplishment of Speech which is liberation itself. In relation to the contemplation of the goddess Parāparā[1] – who is essentially Sarasvatī, the goddess of Speech and learning –the KMT teaches:

[1] Read saṁstyānatā- for smāśyānatā-.

> Intent in this way on (her) visualization (dhyāna), he becomes the Lord of Speech. He speaks in Sanskrit and Prākṛt and utters the profound (secret of) the Vedas and Siddhānta according to the texts and (their) meaning. This happens by practicing in the middle of the sacred seats or by means of them.[2]

In the following pages we will examine a few examples. There is no point in presenting all the many variants we find in the sources; we shall try instead to analyse the kind of permutations that take place by means of these examples. The seats can be treated as 'concrete' mythical sites. They have a history and a geography. The goddess and the Siddha of the place and a range of beings inhabit them. They are also the 'locations' of metaphysical principles of various types. As such they are their symbolic representations and are variously manipulated in relation to these principles and each other in accord with the configurations they may assume. To facilitate this process in the KuKh we find that there may be three, four, five or six seats.[3]

As new forms are added, the old are variously recapitulated in the context of the new. In this way nothing is abandoned from the past, nor does it drag on the present. Just as an extra sacred seat has been added to the four to make five, we find that the texts add up to four more to make eight – a configuration we find exclusively in both recensions of the YKh.[4] The fifth seat is invariably Tisra, also called Trisrota or Mātaṅga, as we find in the KMT. The sixth is either Koṅkaṇa or Candra, which may be implicitly identified with Candrapura. The extra two in the YKh are the sacred seat of Sound (nādapīṭha) and the Unmanifest (avyaktapīṭha),

---

[1] The form of Parāparā described in the KMT is virtually that of Sarasvatī which would be more appropriate for the goddess Parā (see Sanderson 1990: 37ff.):

> Contemplate Parāparā, beautifully white, in the middle of the Wheel. She holds a book and makes the Gesture of Knowledge along with a necklace of crystal. She is adorned with all the ornaments. A garland hangs from (her) neck and she is adorned with a radiant halo. She has two arms and one face. Her light is like that of ten million moons. She utters in a great stream countless scriptures. KMT 6/30cd-33ab.

[2] KMT 6/33cd-35ab. The expression 'pīṭhadvāre' can mean either 'by means of the sacred seats' or 'at the door of the sacred seats'.

[3] The five sacred seats are described in chapter 46 of the KuKh and the six seats in chapter 61.

[4] See chapter nine for a summary of the contents of the main Kubjikā Tantras including the two recensions of the Yogakhaṇḍa of the Manthānabhairavatantra. The latter are labelled YKh (1) and YKh (2). In some cases, such as this one, where the contents of the two recensions are the same, I refer to them together as the YKh.

which, although treated the same way as the other as geographical places, have only an internal, symbolic identity. The most elaborate description of the sacred seats in the Kubjikā corpus is found in this section of the YKh where 64 + 7 constituents for each of the eight sacred seats are listed. The same YKh presents a less elaborate version with just the basic four seats of which there are sixteen constituents. This makes sixty-four units. This modality of worshipping the seats is there said to be the 'division of sixty-four'.[1] The YKh refers to this set collectively as the Śrīpīṭha.[2] The set of six seats is also presented in YKh (1) and is carried over into the KuKh. The four seats are in the Triangle, the six in the Hexagram and the eight in the surrounding eight-petal lotus. Consistent with this progression, YKh does not expound a system of five seats in any great detail, although the seat called Tisra is the fifth in the groups of six and eight seats. For convenience and clarity these will be presented as they appear in the YKh together.[3]

Although according to the KMT the goddess transforms five places into her primary seats, the fifth is distinguished from the other four; it is the seat of the future. So the actual seats are four and the KMT maintains the same configuration consistently. However, although the ṢSS and ŚM generally follow the KMT closely, we find that in a few instances they add the fifth seat.[4] The fifth seat serves as a marker of elevation rising towards transcendence and so is significant. Moreover, in terms of the projection onto the body it fits with the general pattern of distinguishing the trunk from the head. Similarly, we shall see in the following pages that the ŚM adds the extra seat to the basic four described in the KMT as [1] Similarly, sixteen constituents of each sacred seat are worshipped in two sets of mantras presented in the SKh as those of the four sacred seats that make up the first of the six groups that constitute the Krama.

---

[2] The concluding colophon of the exposition of the contents of the four seats says: iti śrīpīṭhacatuḥṣaṣṭibhedabhinnapīṭhacatuṣkam | YKh (1) after 13/9.

[3] See below, p. 702.

[4] For example in one place in the ṢSS the fifth seat, Mātaṅga, is placed above the square maṇḍala of the Earth which contains the four seats. The latter are projected into four parts of the body and the fifth seat into the head. The goddess explains:

I will (now) tell (you) about the external deposition, as it is, in due order. (The adept) should wander carefree once he has recollected the teacher's feet after having deposited the Ages and the sacred seats in the four directions of Earth and the fifth (sacred seat) called the `Outcaste' (antyaja i.e. Mātaṇga the `Sweeper') (above) on the upper path.

bāhyanyāsaṁ pravakṣyāmi yathāvad anupūrvaśaḥ ||
bhūmer yugān tu [k: bhūmairyugastu; kh: bhūmaiyugastu] vinyasya pīṭhāñ caiva caturdiśi |
pañcamam ūrdhvamārge tu yat tad antyajasaṁjñakam [k kh: padaṁtyaja-] ||
gurupādaṁ smaritvā tu paryaṭed aviśaṅkitaḥ | ṢSS 34/15cd-17ab.

part of the centre in body called the Self-supported (svādhiṣṭhāna) located between the genitals and the navel.

While the addition of the fifth seat – already prefigured in the myth of the goddess narrated in the KMT – makes sense, we notice that, nonetheless, the complex system expounded in the KMT actively avoids increasing the number of seats beyond four. Thus, for example, in Place of the Jar (ghaṭasthāna) located in the throat, the four sacred seats are configured in a complex relation to one another so as to occupy six places. But while one could understand the need to do this in a system that does not accept six seats as we find in the later sources, one wonders why the group of four is maintained even in cases when seats are projected into a pentad. In one place, for example, the five faces of Sadāśiva are the loci of projection of the sacred seats.[1] But instead of making use of the 'extra' fifth, the four are projected into the faces set in the four directions and the fifth upper face of Īśāna is treated as the pervasive abode of all sacred sites.[2] This is all the more surprising as the five faces are equated with the Five Praṇavas and with them a series of pentads which in the latter sources, including the KuKh, are commonly equated with the five sacred seats.[3] Groups and cycles of five are [1] Actually in this particular instance two more faces have been added to make seven. Nonetheless, the example holds good as far as the basic five are concerned.

---

[2] The face Sadyojāta is the supreme sacred seat Udyānaka. The sacred seat which is said to be Vāmadeva is Pūrṇagiri. Jālandhara is the sacred seat of Aghora and its light is (like that of) the Fire of Time. One should know that the sacred seat called Kāma is the all-pervasive lord Tatpuruṣa. The abode of all the primary and secondary seats, the meeting grounds (sandoha), primary and secondary sacred fields and the rest is said to be the omnipresent Īśāna.

sadyojātaṁ tu yad vaktraṁ tat pīṭhodyānakaṁ param ||
vāmadevasvarūpākhyaṁ pīṭhaṁ pūrṇagiriḥ [k kh: -riṁ] smṛtam |
jālandharam aghoraṁ [k kh: jālāṁdhara-] tu pīṭhaṁ kālānalaprabham ||
kāmākhyaṁ nāma yat pīṭhaṁ jñeyaṁ tatpuruṣaṁ vibhuḥ [k kh: vibhum] |
pīṭhopapīṭhasandohakṣetropakṣetrakādinām [k kh: – saṁdohā-; -māṁ] ||
ālayaḥ sarvam eteṣām īśānaṁ sarvagaṁ smṛtam | ṢSS 42/58cd-61ab.

[3] These five are called Siddhas and they are Śiva's five currents (of scripture). The gross elements are together with these five and these five are said to be the praṇavas. They are the (five) subtle elements, sound and the rest, the vowels, lunar mansions and planets. The entire universe is pervaded by these Five Siddhas from Brahmā to Śiva right up to the sphere of the Unmanifest (avyakta).

pañcaite kathitāḥ siddhāḥ pañcasrotāḥ [k kh: -śrotāḥ] śivasya ca ||
pañcabhis tair mahadbhūtāḥ pañcaite praṇavāḥ [k kh: praṇavā] smṛtāḥ |
śabdādyās te ca tanmātrās te svarās tithayo grahāḥ [k kh: grahā] ||
pañcabhis tair mahāsiddhair yair vyāptam akhilaṁ jagat |
ābrahmādiśivāntaṁ tad yāvad avyaktagocaram || ṢSS 42/52cd-54.

important in the Kubjikā system, as they are generally in the Indian tradition. Thus, as the sacred seats are essentially repositories of sacred and metaphysical principles, we find that the early sources try to accommodate pentads into the sacred seats. But instead of following the simple route of just accepting the extra fifth seat, they are variously adjusted into the four main seats or into other configurations such as the sixteen 'seats' of the vowels.[1] Although the ṢSS and ŚM do on one or two occasions incorporate a fifth seat into their expansion of the system expounded in the KMT, the groupings into six seats we find in later texts, including the KuKh, is unknown to these sources. Thus a section dedicated to six groups of six in the KMT does not include the six seats.[2] This is a strikingly significant omission in view of the extensive symbolic development of this configuration in the later sources.[3]

Examples of the various configurations of four, five, and six seats are presented below. They have been selected as typical examples of what we find in the texts. Before we begin to analyse particular examples we should first deal with one of the major universal principles operating in the many homologies, namely that the seats are in a special way receptacles of sonic energies. We have observed already that the goddess's Triangle is a matrix of sonic energies. As the origin and ground of all of them, it is the first and foremost of all the seats (ādipīṭha).[4] Accordingly, the tradition that originates from there is the 'transmission of the sacred seat of Yoga'.[5] The Triangle of the goddess becomes, according to the ṢSS, the inner epitome of field, village, town, city and the sacred seats. But these are unnamed, open-ended categories destined to be filled out with fifty sacred seats each with a specific geographic location. Ultimately, all the letters are ascribed to their own sacred seat[6] but in the first formulations just the main four seats are fused with the letters in the corners and centre of the triangle. It is their presence

---

See below, p. 652 for a table (no. 20) drawn from KuKh 21/33ab-34cd ff. in which the five sacred seats are equated with the five elements, praṇavas, Wheels in the subtle body and states of consciousness. Also, see below, p. 631 concerning the Five Siddhas.

[1] The wise know that the (thirty-four) Islands (representing the consonants) are sustained by the energies (kalā) and the (sixteen) sacred seats (representing the vowels) by the Islands. The principles within the (sixteen) sacred seats are the Five Elements.

kalāvadhiṣṭhitān [k kh: -taṁ] dvīpān dvīpaiḥ pīṭhān [k kh: pīṭho] vidur budhāḥ ||
pīṭhāntasthāni tattvāni pañca bhūtāni teṣu vai | ṢSS 35/11cd-12ab.

[2] See KMT 10/63cd ff.

[3] Numerous permutations of this configuration are presented in chapters 28 and 29 of YKh (1). These are reproduced with the usual variants, additions and omissions, as chapters 58, 59, 60 and 61 of the KuKh.

[4] KuKh 8/87.

[5] KuKh 10/33. See note to KuKh 2/18 and 7/47.

[6] See KuKh 6/212cd-219 and notes.

there that transforms the triangular Yoni into a sacred grid of letters (gahvara, prastāra), which serves as the source of the phonemic energies of mantras. Although there are just four seats, they encompass the energies on all sides and sustain them. At the same time all the letters are distributed within them and the seats are considered to be present in them.[1] They may also be arranged in other ways within them and used to generate the syllables of mantras. The seats are charged with the phonemic energies of Speech through which mantras, deities and the orders of reality to which they correspond are emanated. Thus the seats possess the power of mantras and so can, for example, purify from sin, as does the [1] O goddess, I will tell (you what is to be done next) once the letters have been placed in the grid (gahvara). One should know the locations of the sacred seats in the grid by means of the letters in the grid (gāha lit. `innermost recess') (placed there in due order) according to the sequence KĀ (Kāmarūpa), PŪ (Pūrṇagiri), JĀ (Jālandhara) and O (Oḍḍiyāna). The letters that denote (the sacred seats) within the sacred seats beginning with Kāmākhya are the ones beginning with A, O, Jha and Pha.

Commentary: Which are the sacred seats one should know in the Gahvara, that is, the grid? How are they characterized? They are the four – Kāmarūpa, Pūrṇagiri, Jālandhara and Oḍḍiyāna. The four letters that denote them are the letters A Ṛ Ga and Ha. (These) letters should be deposited (in the grid). How? The letter A in the east. The letter Ṛ in the southwest. The letter Ga in the northwest. The letter Ha in the middle. What are the letters that denote Kāmarūpa, Pūrṇagiri, Jālandhara and Oḍyāna? (The ones in) Kāmarūpa are A Ā I Ī U Ū Ṛ Ṝ Ḷ Ḹ E Ai (12). (The letters in) the sacred seat of Pūrṇagiri are O AU AṀ AḤ Ka Kha Ga Gha Ṅa Ca Cha Ja (12). (The letters in) the sacred seat of Jālandhara are Jha Ña Ṭa Ṭha Ḍa Ḍha Ṇa Ta Tha Da Dha Na Pa (12). (The letters in) the sacred seat of Oḍyāna are Pha Ba Bha Ma Ya Ra La Va Śa Ṣa Sa Ha (12).

varṇanyāse kṛte devi gahvare kathayāmy aham ||
*antagāhasthitair varṇaiḥ kā-pū-jā-okrameṇa [k kh: -jā krameṇa] tu |
pīṭhasthānāni caitāni jñātavyāni tu gahvare ||
akārokāramādya [k kh: akārokaracādyā] vai jhādyaḥ [k kh: śadya] phādyas [k kh: mādyaṁ] tu gahvare |
kāmākhyādiṣu pīṭheṣu ete vai [k kh: etad vai] vācakākṣarāḥ [k kh: -rā] ||

(vyākhyā): gahvare prastāre jñātavyāni kāni pīṭhāni kiṁ viśiṣṭhāni kāmarūpa – pūrṇagiri – jālandhara – oḍyānāni [kh: -jālāṁdhara-] iti catvāri || etadvācakāḥ [k, kh: -kāni] akṣarāḥ [k: akṣarāṇi] catvāraḥ [k: catvāri] akāra [k: -raḥ] – ṛkāra [k: -raḥ] – gakāra [kh: -raḥ] – hakāra [k: -raḥ; kh: -raṁ] -varṇāni nyaset || kathaṁ || pūrve akāraḥ [k, kh: -raṁ] || *nairṛtye ṛkāraḥ [k: -raṁ; kh: ṛ * ] || *vāyavye gakāraḥ [k: -raṁ; kh: ga * ] || *madhye hakāraḥ [k: -raṁ; kh: ha * ] || *kāmarūpa – pūrṇagiri – jālandhara – oḍyānavācakāḥ [k: kāmarū -] akṣarāḥ ke te | (kh 17b) kāmarūpe a ā i ī u ū ṛ Ṝ ḷ Ḹ e ai (12) || pūrṇagiripīṭhe o au aṁ aḥ ka kha ga gha ṅa ca cha ja (12) || *jālandharapīṭhe [kh: jālāṁdhara-] jha ña [kh: * ] ṭa ṭha ḍa ḍha ṇa ta tha da dha na pa (12) || oḍyānapīṭhe pha ba bha ma ya ra la va śa ṣa sa ha (12) || ṢSS 8/38cd-40 and commentary.

Cf. ṢSS 34/2-3ab and the commentary. The latter explains that, by projecting the four seats into this diagram, 'instead of a triangle, it is called a Gahvara'.

repetition of the goddess's Vidyā.[1] Indeed, pilgrimage to the seats, whether external, inwardly projected or otherwise represented is invariably coupled with the repetition of the Vidyā. The seats surround the goddess of Speech in which she abides as the energies of Sound. They are the doors through which one has access to higher levels of consciousness and the goddess. Through them the yogi attains the empowered state and the grace of the Command.[2]

The mantra of a deity is the 'sonic body' in which it resides. In this perspective it is its sacred seat. Again, as the mantra is the deity in sonic form, like the iconic form, it may reside in one or more sacred seats. Accordingly, the seats may be projected into mantras and mantras into the seats. In particular, this dual relationship between the container and the contained, reminiscent of that between the goddess's Triangle and the Point, is a primary feature of the goddess's Vidyā in all its forms and parts. Although, surprisingly, this equation is not made in the KMT and its expansions, the later Kubjikā Tantras stress that the Vidyā of the goddess is the 'original seat' where the adept achieves the liberated condition of Flight.[3] Just as the goddess of each of the sacred seats (pīṭheśvarī) is a Vidyā,[4] the Vidyā is the one deity of all the sacred seats. The goddess in the form of her Vidyā is distributed in the seats.[5] This may take place wholly or in parts. Thus, the three parts of the mantra called Trikhaṇḍā, which is considered to be the extensive form of the goddess's main (samayā) Vidyā, are housed in the three major sacred seats.[6] Divided into six limbs, as are all major mantras and Vidyās in general, Kubjikā's Vidyā is projected into the six seats on the corners of 1 (Even one) who drinks blood is purified if he goes (on pilgrimage) to the sacred fields and seats.

---

raktāśī [k kh: -sī] śuddhim āpnoti kṣetrapīṭhān bhramed yadi || ṢSS 8/148cd.

2 See above, p. 586 with reference to KMT 6/30cd-35ab.

3 KuKh 8/120cd-122.

4 See, for example, KuKh 23/21 ff. where the Vidyā of Pīṭheśvarī is described. This is a lengthened, 64-syllable form of the 32-syllable Samayā Vidyā in which the goddess is invoked as Koṅkaṇī – the goddess of Koṅkaṇa where, as we shall see, much if not all of the MBT was probably redacted.

5 The Samayā (Vidyā) is in the four sacred seats. They have all come from there. It is accomplished (easily) without reflection by the (practice of) the Yoga of Stillness (nirācāra).

catuṣpīṭhe tu samayā tatra sarve vinirgatāḥ |
nirācāreṇa yogena siddhyate hy avicārataḥ || ṢSS 13/7.

6 tato vai samayāṁ vidyāṁ triṣu pīṭheṣv anukramāt [g: pīṭhesva-] ||
stutikhaṇḍaṁ tu kāmākhye mātṛkhaṇḍaṁ tu pūrṇake [kh: mūrtake] |
mantrakhaṇḍaṁ tathoḍyāṇe [k: tatho prāṇe] . . . . ||

SKh 5/99cd-110. See note to KuKh 48/85cd-86.

the hexagram.[1] Again, just as the goddess is in the sacred seats, they are also within her. Thus four syllables of her Vidyā are identified in a special way with the four seats.[2] Indeed all thirty-two syllables of the Vidyā are considered to be sacred seats in the later Kubjikā Tantras.[3] Moreover, this was seen to be true of every mantra extracted from the grid of letters as each letter within it came to be located in a sacred site. Thus in the final stage of this development in the Ambāmatasaṁhitā, these inner sites supply the code names for the letters of a mantra presented in a hidden form.[4] Similarly the seats came to be understood as loci of the energies of the letters that make up the goddess in the form of her seed-syllable. Six seats correspond to the letters of the seed-syllable HSKHPHREṀ.[5] Later sources also project six seats into the triangular syllable AIṀ.[6]

Let us return now to the seats in relation to the energies of the letters, especially as they are presented in the KMT and its expansions. Although in some set-ups in the KMT, the seats are associated with all the letters, more often they are especially linked with the sixteen vowels. According to one representation, the vowels are called 'Sacred Seats' and the thirty-four consonants 'Islands' (dvīpa) inhabited by Yoginīs and their lords.[7] Note that although the Islands are specifically identified, the seats remain anonymous in keeping with the general principle in the early tradition of keeping to just four seats. Similarly sixteen Yoginīs reside in the sixteen seats of the vowels. These are, as one would expect, lunar (somātmikā) and correspond to the sixteen energies of the Moon.[8] One is reminded of the goddess who, as Mālinī, is the New Moon (amākalā). She is the

[1] The six limbs of the Vidyā are listed in KuKh 11/42cd-44. See table there and diagram for projection of the seats and limbs into the hexagram.
[2] These are the four nasals Ṅa, Ña, Ṇa and Na. See KuKh 8/59cd-60ab. The goddess's Vidyā, its parts and permutations will be discussed in detail in chapters 8 to 12 of our text.
[3] KuKh 8/85cd-86 and note.
[4] See note to KuKh 6/212cd-219ab. The Śrīmatasāra (2) uses a similar code. But instead of sacred seats (pīṭha), the fields (kṣetra) of the Mothers (mātṛkā) correspond to certain letters.
[5] See KuKh 8/77cd-79ab. Their colours, deity and location in the body are taught in KuKh 9/8-11. See table 22 below (p. 657) in which the ascriptions made there and in KuKh 11/19-21 ab are compared.
[6] See below, p. 654.
[7] Twelve Yoginīs representing aspects of the energies of the consonants combined with the twelve vowels (not counting the 'neuter' Ṛ Ṝ ḷ and Ḷ) reside on each of the Islands along with one guardian (adhipa lit. 'lord'). The name of the Islands and their inhabitants and related matters are taught in chapters 20 and 21 of the KMT and 31 and 32 of the ṢSS. In chapter four of the KRU the number of Islands is expanded to fifty by adding sixteen Islands for the vowels. Like the other Islands each of these is the residence of a guardian and twelve Yoginīs, the names of which generally begin with the vowel of that Island.
[8] ṣoḍaśaitāḥ samākhyātāḥ kalāḥ somātmikāḥ [k kh: – kā] priye | ṢSS 15/22ab.

sacred seat of the Moon[1] surrounded by the vowels, the sacred seats of her sixteen lunar energies:

> (The goddess who is) omniscient and the bestower of all things, is accompanied by the sacred seats and their lords. She is the mother of the awakening of the Command, she who perfects (the yogi's) divine nature.[2]

Especially important are the lords of the sixteen sacred seats of the vowels. Their conjunction with the Lords of the Islands of the consonants empowers the latter, transforming them into the components of a series of seed-syllables.[3] Indeed, in this way every name not only denotes an object, it is also charged with the spiritual energy of sacred place. In this way the initiate manages to adhere to the essential core of his practice, that is, the worship of the sacred seats, although they are not specific places.

The sixteen seats of the vowels and the thirty-four Islands of the consonants can be projected into the head and the trunk of the body, respectively. The latter represents the insentient constituents of the body that require the vitalizing energies of the 'head' to make it sentient, just as the consonants require vowels to be articulated. The body as the repository of the phonemic energies is commonly analysed into these two parts. The Kālīkrama refers to the head as the Liṅga and the body as the pīṭha – its pedestal. The former is the energy of knowledge and the latter of action, because the sense organs (jñānendriya) are located in the head and the organs of action (karmendriya) in the body.[4] The KMT teaches a projection of the four seats into the heart, navel, and right and left parts of the body. Projecting the same seats onto the ears, mouth and nose then completes this projection onto the truck of the body.[5] They are arranged in two

---

[1] amākalā candrapīṭham ucyate | Comm. on ṢSS 28/50.

[2] pīṭhapīṭhādhipair yuktā sarvajñā sarvadāyikā |
ājñāvabodhajananī divyarūpaprasādhanī || ṢSS 28/51.

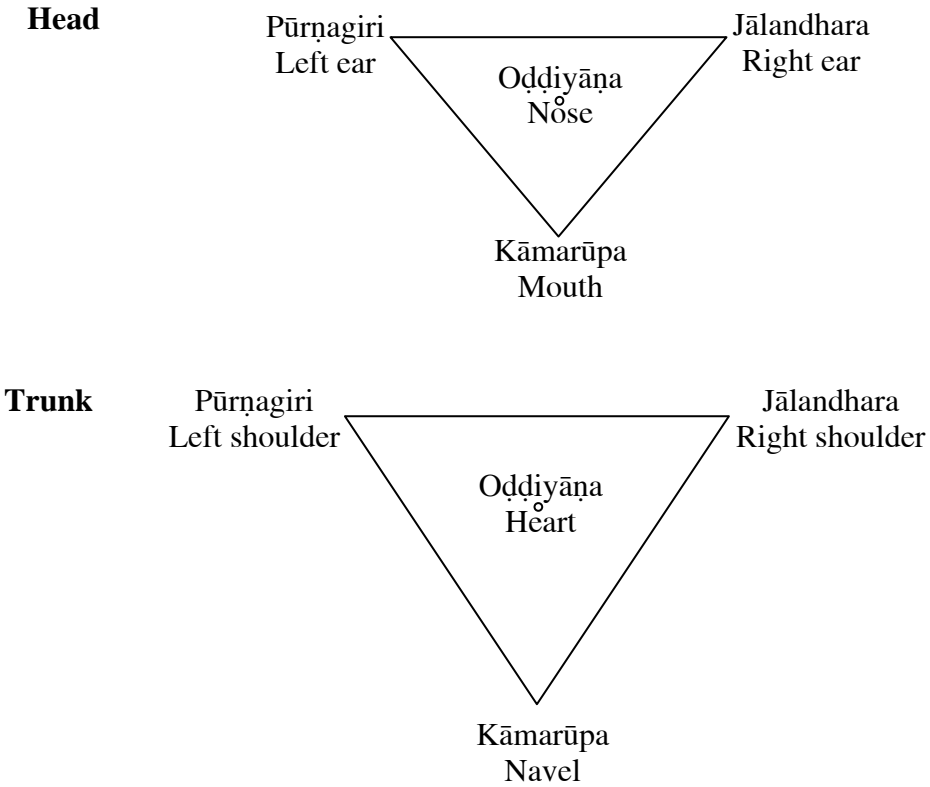
[3] This is done by forming a series of seed-syllables composed of the consonants on the model of KRAUṀ followed by KHRAUṀ and so on. See ṢSS 31/105cd-106ab and commentary.

[4] See MP (1) p. 50-5. Ultimately, this distinction relates to the Self – which is the Liṅga – and the body which is the Pīṭha. Thus Śitikaṇṭha teaches the practice related to these two as follows:

> Just as the Self, which is pure consciousness, presides over one's own body, in the same way there is just one Self, which is pure consciousness within all bodies. One should think that it is one only and present in all living beings like the reflection of the sun in (many) pots of water. MP (1) p. 51.

[5] KMT 17/7ff. We find a similar projection in the CMSS (7/23-26), which attributes it to the Siddhayogeśvarīmata, but this is very unlikely. The four sacred seats, pleasing to the Yoginīs, are each associated with a gesture and are located in the head as follows:

downward-facing triangles, one in the body and the other in the head. The heart is in the middle of the triangle of the body. The navel is in the lower corner. The left and right parts of the body are probably represented by the respective shoulders which are thus in those corners of the triangle. Similarly, on the face, the nose is in the middle, the mouth is in the lower corner and ears in the upper two. Thus:

---


1) Oṁkāra – the mouth. The fists are clenched and the thumbs are extended. This gesture is practiced by Siddhas and Yoginīs.
2) Jāla – right ear. The hands are extended and the fingers are spread. The Yoginīs are pleased by this gesture.
3) Pūrṇa – left ear. The hands, together with the thumbs, are folded together in the form of a pot. This gesture burns away sin.
4) Kāmarūpa – tip of the nose. First one makes the hands into the shape of a triangle with two fingers extended in front. This gesture is pleasing to passionate young women.

A fifth gesture is then described which is for the goddess (devīsaṁketa) and is made whenever the Skyfaring goddesses reveal themselves (khecarīsamadarśana). The index finger is extended upwards and the back of the hand is bent slightly (ibid. 7/29cd-34>>).

Another projection of the seats into the two parts of the body takes into account the phonemic energies the seats contain. As in the previous example, the head is the location of the sixteen vowels and the trunk of the body that of the thirty-four consonants and two sets of four seats are associated with them. The four seats Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa are in the head, on the face as a whole, the top of the cranium, the eyes and the teeth, respectively.[1] The four seats in the head are followed by the four gestures. These are the four gross elements represented by the four semi-vowels.[2] The four Ages in which the teachings of the seats were revealed correspond to the navel, stomach, heart and throat in the truck of the body and the series of remaining consonants.[3] Projecting the seats into the body in this way transforms it into that of Śiva.

---

[1] Oṁkāra is the great sacred seat within the face as a whole. The sky (ka) is the head there and is (the sacred seat) called Jāla. The one called Pūrṇa is in the (group of four) called the eye. The one called Kāma is within the teeth. [. . .]

The four groups of four are said to be, the one which begins with the first (letters) (A to Ī), the fifth (letters) (U to Ṝ), the ninth (letters) (ḷ to AI), and the thirteenth (O to AḤ).

The first group of four on the face is, along with the two cheeks, on the forehead and chin. Your second (group of four) is on the left, right, west, and east. The third deposition, that of the vowels, is at the beginning and end with the two eyes. The fourth set of four is in the row of teeth (below) and above.

Oṁkāraṁ tumahāpīṭhaṁ samaste mukhamaṇḍale ||
kaṁ śiras tatra jālākhyaṁ netrākhye pūrṇasaṁjñakam |
daṁṣṭrāntare [k kh: dṛṣṭāntare] tu kāmākhyaṁ . . . . [. . .] ||
ādyādi [k kh: -dau] pañcamādyaṁ ca navamādyaṁ tathaiva ca |
trayodaśādi catvāri catuṣkaṁ parikīrtitam ||
gaṇḍābhyāṁ bhālacibuke catuṣkamādi sanmukhe |
vāme [k kh: vāma] dakṣe 'pare pūrve dvitīyaṁ te [k, kh: ke] vyavasthitam ||
ādyante netrayugmābhyāṁ svaranyāsaṁ [k: svarānyāsya; kh: svarānyasya] tṛtīyakam [k kh: -ke] | dantapaṅktidharaś cordhve catuṣkaṁ ca caturthakam || ṢSS 19/122cd-123c, 126-128.

[2] According to the commentary on ṢSS 19/123 the four gestures are: 1) La – Earth 2) Va – Water 3) Ra – Fire 4) Ya – Air.

[3] The denotators within the (four) gestures and the rest are located within (the four semi-vowels) La Va Ra Ya. The group of four Yoginīs is (in them and) in the four Ages and four sacred seats. The eight, six, twelve, and eight (consonants) born from the letters Krodha (Ka) onwards (correspond to the four) Ages. I will explain (this) as it truly is both externally and internally. (The four Ages) Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali are in the navel, stomach, heart and throat, respectively. Oḍḍiyāna and the rest, that is, O (Oḍḍiyāna), Jā (Jālandhara), Pū (Pūrṇagiri) and Kāma (Kāmarūpa) are located there. This is said to be the group of four, both internally and externally. O goddess, I have explained that group of four in the domain of Kula. The yogis who are on the plane of Stillness (nirācāra) should know this.

mudrādau vācakās tatra lavarayeṣv avasthitāḥ |
caturyuge catuṣpīṭhe yoginīnāṁ catuṣṭayam ||
aṣṭa ṣaḍ dvādāśāṣṭau ca yugāḥ [k kh: yugaiḥ] krodhādikākṣajāḥ [k kh: -kākajaiḥ] |
sabāhyābhyantareṇaiva kathayāmi yathārthataḥ ||

In another similar example, the main four seats are projected into the same places along the trunk of the body, which in this case is understood to represent the square maṇḍala of the Earth. Mātaṅga, the fifth seat, is the head.[1] The same distinction may be maintained in a triadic arrangement. The four seats are worshipped as a group in three areas of the body arranged on the four extremities of a cross. The triad corresponds to the three Transmissions (krama). The sacred seats are worshipped according to the Transmission of the Child (bālakrama) below the navel in the genitals. They are worshipped in the Middle Transmission (madhyakrama) within the heart. They are worshipped in four places of the head – ears, mouth, nose and above the eyebrows – in the Transmission of the Aged (vṛddhakrama). These three regions – the genitals, heart and head – correspond to the extension of three areas that cover the thirty-six principles of existence. These are 1) the Self (ātmatattva) that extends from Earth to Māyā; 2) Knowledge (vidyātattva) that extends from Pure Knowledge (śuddhavidyā) to Śakti, and 3) Śiva (śivatattva), which is just that one principle.[2] Towards the beginning of most, if not all, Kaula rituals and, indeed, those of the Siddhānta, these three principles are saluted by the officiant as he rinses his mouth out three times to purify himself

---

nābhyudarahṛtkaṇṭhe ca kṛ-tre-dvā-kam anukramāt |
o-jā-pū-kāmarūpiṇya oḍḍi-āṇādisaṁsthitāḥ ||
sabāhyābhyantareṇaiva catuṣkaṁ parikīrtitam |
etat te kathitaṁ devi catuṣkaṁ kulagocare ||
nirācārapadasthānāṁ jñātavyaṁ caiva yoginām | ṢSS 19/129-133ab.

The commentary explains that:

1) The first sacred seat contains the eight letters Ka to Jha. This belongs to the Kṛta Age and is located in the navel.
2) The second sacred seat contains six letters from Jha to Ḍha. This belongs to the Tretā Age and is located in the stomach.
3) The third sacred seat contains the twelve letters from Ṇa to Ya. It belongs to the Dvāpara Age and is located in the Heart.
4) The fourth sacred seat contains the eight letters from Ra to KṢa. This belongs to the Age of Strife and is located in the throat.

[1] (Yoginīs serve) the adept wherever he may wander, whether in sacred seat, town, (or) village, below the navel, belly, heart, and throat, (corresponding to the) Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali (Age), respectively. These four, namely, O (Oḍḍiyāna), Jā (Jālandhara), Pū (Pūrṇagiri) and Kāma (Kāmarūpa), are located in the square (which represents the Earth).

pīṭhe vā pattane grāme paryaṭed yatra sādhakaḥ |
nābhyadhodarahṛtakaṇṭhe kṛ-tre-dvā-kam [k, kh: kṛ-tri-] anukramāt ||
o-jā-pū-kāmarūpiṇyaś caturasre [k kh: -rūpiṇyaś-] caturas tāḥ [k, kh: caturasre] |
ṢSS 34/14-15ab.

The commentary adds that 'the fifth seat is in the head' (pañcamapīṭhaṁ śirasi).

[2] See note to KuKh 2/40-41.

and, in particular, his speech which he is about to use to recite the sacrificial mantras. Accordingly, they are collectively called the 'triple purification' (triśuddhi) because the flames of the purifying fire that burns in the midst of the sacred seats purify them.[1] They are experienced collectively in the Śāmbhava state. The ṢSS teaches:

> (This is) the Śāmbhava Krama which, omniscient, is the place (sthāna) beyond (immanent) Kula and (transcendent) Akula and is, by virtue of the Yoga of the Doomsday Fire, in accord with the teaching of the Lord of the Abyss (gahvareśa). Endowed with the pervasion of all things, (the adept) should worship it with the flowers of the Command.[2]

Entry and movement through the seats projected into the yogic body is thus entry and movement through the goddess herself. The yogi is led from the Self in the heart, which is the core of the yogic body, up into the summit of it where the seats are located and the goddess resides who leads him up into the plane of the supreme deity.[3]

---

[1] I will tell you how (this group of four) abides in its pervasive state. (The sacred seats) Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri, and Kāmarūpa that are in the middle are (situated) on the left, right, in front, and above, respectively. One should worship all this, including the Siddhas, in (their) pervasive state from below the navel (upwards). What is located in the sequence of the sacred seats is in the midst of Dakṣa and the rest (in the heart) above the navel.* One should know (this), the Śāmbhava state, by means of the teaching from the teacher's mouth. One should worship (the sacred seats in the order listed above) in the same way, in the ear, mouth, nose, and above the eyebrows (respectively).

(The four sacred seats) have the aforementioned flames (arci) and the hosts of Siddhas. It is part of the (Sequences of) the Child, the Youth, and the Aged which are is located in the three pure (places – triśuddhi – the genitals, heart, and head) and are associated with the Triple Principle (of the Self, Vidyā, and Śiva, respectively).

etat te kathayiṣyāmi vyāptibhūtaṁ yathāsthitam ||
o-jā-pū-kāś ca [k, kh: -nya] madhye [k kh: madhyā] ye vāmadakṣāgratordhvataḥ |
vyāptibhūtaṁ yajet sarvaṁ nābhyadhaḥ siddhapūrvakam ||
o-jā-pū-kākramāntasthaṁ [k: .ojā-] dakṣādau vāmanābhigam |
upadeśena jānīyād guruvaktrāt tu śāmbhavam ||
evaṁ karṇāsyanāsāsu [k kh: -sāstu] bhruvordhve [k kh: – rdhvaṁ] pūrvavat yajet [k kh: tyajet] |
pūrvoktārcisamāyuktaṁ [k kh: -yuktā] siddhavṛndaiḥ samanvitam ||
bālakaumāravṛddhasthaṁ triśuddhisthaṁ tritattvagam | ṢSS 26/13cd-17ab.
* The commentary explains: vāmanābhigaṁ iti hṛtsthāne.

[2] vāḍavānālayogena gahvareśopadeśataḥ [k kh: gahvareso-] ||
kulākulaparaṁ [k kh: -kulepare] sthānaṁ [k kh: -ne] sarvajñaṁ śāmbhavaṁ kramam | sarvavyāptisamopetaṁ ājñāpuṣpaiḥ prapūjayet || ṢSS 26/17cd-18.

[3] See KMT 4/17-21 quoted above, p. 211 ff. and p. 287.

The Sacred Seats, the Moon, the Vital Breath and Time

The close symbolic connection between the four seats and the sixteen lunar energies embodied in the vowels and the cycle of time is expressed in a series of manipulations of the names of the seats. All four names are made of four syllables, corresponding to as many 'Knots'.[1] The syllables are divided into four groups consisting of the first, second, third and fourth syllable of each name, thus: 1) O JĀ PŪ KĀ, 2) ḌI LA RṆA MA, 3) Ā NDHA GI RŪ, and 4) NA RA RI PA. The Tantra teaches how to assimilate them into metaphysical principles that make up the body of the goddess, and project them both into a geometric figure and into parts of one's own body. They are linked to mantric sounds and enveloped by them in encompassing circles in the figure so as to both reinforce and tap their lunar energy. Projected into the breathing cycle, the sacred seats are also linked with differentiations of time distributed within them to represent the temporal macrocosm.[2] The sixteen syllables correspond to the sixteen phases of the Moon, symbolized, as usual, by the sixteen vowels. The former are the means by which gross time is measured and the latter the means by which the cosmogenic Speech is articulated that generates the cycles of creation. Flowing within the supreme principle, they are phases of its supreme and ultimate energy. Projected into the current of the vital breath, they measure subtle time.

The Kubjikā Tantras teach, in common with those of other schools that developed in the same period, that the cycles of time – day and night, bright and dark lunar fortnight, the two halves of the year etc. – are represented in the microcosm by the cycle of the breath.[3] This is imagined to consist of two paths. One is the Northern Path, which is that of entry of the breath, the Moon and life. The other is the Southern Path, which is that of the exit of the breath, the Sun and death. In accord with the holistic logic of the identity of the container and the contained, just as the four seats are projected into the Yoni, similarly each group of four is itself a Yoni. They represent the first four gross elements and the Yoni that contains them, which is Space. Contained in the original Yoni, each gives rise to an aspect of the attainment achieved by penetrating the Yoni and its sacred seats. The ṢSS explains:

> (The fourfold grouping of the sixteen parts of the sacred seats) differentiate (kalanti) the whole of time according to whether it

[1] The following teachings concerning the Sixteen Knots are found in chapter 17 of the KMT (verses 60 ff.) and chapter 27 of the ṢSS.

[2] ṢSS 4:5/143-150 and Schoterman 1981: 175-176.

[3] One of many versions of this projection is constructed to a large extent on the basis of the SvT by Abhinavagupta in chapter six of his Tantrāloka.

is gross or subtle. Gross, subtle, and ultimate (antima), they resonate (nādanti), established in the essential nature of time.

They arise within the first digit of the moon (tithi) (and continue to arise in the succeeding digits) up to the end of the left (current of vitality to) then again (enter) the right. (In this way) life and death (alternate) in accord with the division of the Moon and Sun (which symbolize the inhaled and exhaled breath, respectively).[1] [. . .]

There is a Knot in each (of these) syllables. (Thus) there is a group of four Knots in each seat. The Yoni consists of the four sacred seats and the entire (universe) consists of the four Yonis. The Knot of the fifth and supreme Yoni is in each part (pada).[2]

All this is (right) in the centre of the causal Fire (kāraṇānala) and is pervaded by (the Yoni). That is said to be the supreme part (pada i.e. syllable) within which all the parts are present. That part is clearly attained by the division of the sixteen syllables.

The first group of four generates the unfailing Command. The second group of four leads to Kubjinī's abode. The third one is called

---

[1] kalanti sakalaṁ kālaṁ sthūlasūkṣmavibhāgaśaḥ |
nādanti [k kh: nadaṁti] kālarūpasthāḥ sthūlāḥ [k kh: sthūla] sūkṣmāḥ [k kh: -kṁa-] tathāntimāḥ ||
tithyādye [k kh: tithyāyā] udayaṁ yānti vāmānte dakṣiṇe [k kh: -ṇāṁ] punaḥ |
candrasūryavibhāgena jīvitaṁ maraṇaṁ bhavet || ṢSS 27/5-6.

The commentary explains: Beginning from the first digit, that is the first day (of the first lunar fortnight), up to the first day of the second (lunar fortnight), there are sixteen (nights). Beginning with the first day of the second (fortnight), (the moon) wanes until the first day of the first (fortnight). Thus there are sixteen (lunar days). This is the movement of the Moon and that of the Sun. These are the vowels. The two movements are life and death. These are also the parts (pada) that are located in the syllables of the sacred seats.

tithyādye pratipadārabhya [k kh: -bho] yāvad dvitīyapratipadaṁ iti ṣoḍaśa [k, kh: -śaḥ] (16) || dvitīyapratipadārabhya astamanaṁ yāvat prathamapratipadam iti ṣoḍaśa [k, kh: -śaḥ] (16) iti candragatiḥ sūryagatiś ca || iti ta eva svarāḥ || gatidvayaṁ jīvitaṁ maraṇaṁ ca (2) || eta [k kh: etad] eva pīṭhākṣarasthānīyāḥ padāḥ ||

[2] There is an important play of words here. The word 'pada' may mean a syllabic unit. It denotes the metric units into which a line of verse or metrical prose is divided. In the case of mantras the same word denotes the units into which it is divided. In this case each 'part' corresponds to one syllable and so there are sixteen parts. These originate from the four 'Yonis'. There is a fifth Yoni. This corresponds to the seat Mātaṅga which is similarly said to pervade the other four seats, just as in this case it pervades all the 'parts'. It is the sound itself of the other parts understood to be grounded in the spiritual reality that pervades them all and thus contains them as their essential sonic nature here understood to be the energy – 'Fire' – which is their ultimate cause and source (yoni). The word 'pada' may also mean a plane or state of being. Thus the expression with reference to this fifth 'part', namely padaṁ paramam means both 'supreme part' and 'supreme plane (of being)'.

> the Vidyā of Power (śakti)[1] and leads to that most excellent abode. The fourth attains the abode which is the Divine Current (divyaugha) and (this cannot be attained) in any other way.[2]

The inhaled breath produces the sound SA and the exhaled HA. Together they make HAṀSA, said to be the Self of every being that breathes. This is to be conjoined to these sixteen parts, represented by the sixteen lunar vowels. As the word 'haṁsa' in Sanskrit is the name of a type of wild gander, this is the Division of the Gander, which the Siddhas of Pūrṇagiri are said to illumine in the KMT.

> The four sacred seats consist of four groups of (four vowels) beginning with the letter A. One should conjoin this group of four seats with HAṀSA. The four sacred seats and the four groups of four (make up) these sixteen parts and the (sixteenfold) Knot which consists of the letters SA and HA. (These) two (letters) should be conjoined to the (sixteen) vowels. (Thus) (all this) resonates in the form of the (sixteen energies of) the digits (of the moon represented by the vowels).
>
> The (lunar) energies within the first lunar day in the beginning (and those energies of the subsequent days), the waxing and waning

---

[1] The Vidyā of Power is the seed-syllable mantra AIṀ that is, as we have seen, the sonic form of the Yoni and one of the two seed-syllables of the main mantra – Samayā Vidyā – of the goddess.

[2] akṣare akṣare [k kh: -raṁ] granthiḥ [k kh: graṁthi] pīṭhe [k, kh: pīṭha] granthicatuṣṭayam |
catuṣpīṭhamayā [k kh: -nayā] yoniś caturyonimayo 'khilaḥ [k kh: yoni- -mayaṁ khilaṁ] ||
pañcamī yā parā yonis [k, kh: yoni-] tasyā granthiḥ pade pade |
tayā vyāptam idaṁ sarvaṁ kāraṇānalamadhyagam ||
tat padaṁ paramaṁ proktaṁ yatra sarve padā gatāḥ [k kh: gatā] |
ṣoḍaśākṣarabhedena tat padaṁ labhate sphuṭam ||
catuṣkaṁ prathamaṁ yac ca amoghājñāṁ [k kh: -jñā] karoti ca |
dvitīyaṁ [k, kh: -ye] yac catuṣkaṁ tu nīyate kubjinīpadam ||
tṛtīyaṁ [k, kh: -ye] śaktividyākhyaṁ nayet [k kh: naye] tat padam uttamam |
caturthaṁ [k, kh: -ye] caiva divyaughapadaṁ prāpnoti nānyathā || ṢSS 27/9-13.

The commentary explains: The Knot of the fifth Yoni possesses sixteen Knots. They should be placed within it, each in (their own) place as everything is pervaded by that (Yoni). That is the supreme plane (pada), which is attained as the sixteen syllables of the sacred seats. There they are the fourfold Yoni. What do they do? The first (Yoni) accomplishes the unfailing Command, the second, Kubjinī's abode, the third what is called the Vidyā of Power, and the fourth, the Divine Current.

pañcamī yoniḥ tasyāḥ grantheḥ ṣoḍaśagranthayaḥ || tās tasyāṁ [k kh: -tasya] sthāne sthāne kartavyāḥ yataḥ tayā sarvaṁ vyāptam || tat padaṁ paramaṁ ṣoḍaśākṣara-pīṭhākṣaratvena labhyate [k kh: labhyante] ity [k kh: tya] arthaḥ || tatra caturdhā [kh: caturddhā] yonayaḥ [k kh: yoniḥ] santi || tāḥ kiṁ kurvanti || prathamā amoghājñāṁ [k kh: -jñā] sādhayati || dvitīyā kubjinīpadaṁ sādhayati || tṛtīyā śaktividyākhyaṁ sādhayati || caturthī divyaughaṁ sādhayati ||

(of the moon) and are (all) here. And (here) the lunar days and the rest reach the (supreme) plane (pada). It is said that the entry (of the breath) is the left and the exit is the right, (corresponding) to the division of the Moon and Sun. One should know that death resides in the exit (of the breath) and that life is in the entry. Exit and entry are (brought about) by these sixteen parts. He who knows this with effort is a yogi who (truly) knows Yoga.[1]

(The four sacred seats) O JĀ PŪ KĀ (correspond to the four elements) from Earth onwards. The Yoni of Space (vyoman) is the fifth. [. . .]. Once the division of the Peak (syllable) has been learned, the god Haṁsa should be applied. That man, O lady praised by the heroes, is the destroyer of time (which he does in this) and no other way.

There are four syllables for each syllable of the name of (each) seat. The Knots accord with the division (of the syllables of) the seats. (The wise) know that (this is) the arising of the seed-syllable HAṀSA.[2]

---

[1] ṢSS 27/16cd-19ab. The commentary explains:

Well then how does this take place in consonance with the movements of the Sun and Moon? When the (the breath) enters (bit by bit) in consonance with the sixteen energies (of the digits of the moon of which it is composed) that is then the Northern Path and emanation takes place. When it exits in consonance with the sixteen energies, it is then the Southern Path and 'death' takes place. Who is it that thus enters and exits? It is the Gander of the Breath (prāṇahaṁsa). The person (puruṣa) who knows how to fashion (kalpayitum) the part (bhāga) of the Gander (haṁsa) of the inhaled or exhaled breath with sixteen limbs, as well as the movement of the Knots, which is the sign of the motion (of the breath and the energies) in each place, is a yogi who is without error.

tarhi [kh: kathaṁ] candrasūryagatyā katham || yathā ṣoḍaśakalānugatyā praviśati tadā uttaramārgaḥ sṛṣṭir bhavati || yadā nirgacchati ṣoḍaśakalānugatyā tadā dakṣiṇamārgo [k kh: -rgaḥ] maraṇaṁ bhavati || ko 'sau tāvat praviśati nirgacchati || prāṇahaṁsaḥ yaḥ punaḥ [kh: missing] puruṣaḥ prāṇahaṁsasya apānahaṁsasya [k: apānaḥ-] vā ṣoḍaśāṅgabhāgaṁ [k: -vaṁ] kalpayituṁ jānāti tathā granthisaṁcālanaṁ sthāne sthāne bhramaṇopalakṣaṇaṁ sa nirbhrāntayogī [k kh: nibhrānta-] ||

[2] catuṣpīṭhavibhedena akārādicatuṣṭayam |
haṁsayuktena kartvayaṁ etat pīṭhacatuṣṭayam ||
*catuṣpīṭhāni yāni * [kh: yā * ] catuṣkāṇi catus tathā [k kh: catuṣpathā] |
padāni ṣoḍaśa hy evaṁ granthiś caiva sahākṣarau ||
svarair yuktau prakartavyau [k: ghakartavyau] kalārūpeṇa śabdati |
kalāḥ [k kh: kalā] pratipadādau tu udayo [k, kh: udayā] 'staś ca atra vai ||
tithyādyāśca padaṁ yānti [k kh: yāti] praveśaṁ vāmam ucyate |
dakṣiṇaṁ caiva niṣkāśaṁ candrasūryavibhāgaśaḥ ||
niṣkāśe maraṇaṁ jñeyaṁ praveśe caiva jīvitam |
padaiḥ ṣoḍaśabhiś caite niṣkāśaṁ ca praveśakam ||

The KMT explains how syllables and mantras should be integrated into the sixteen Knots – that is, the letters of the four seats – so that, projected into the body and the breath, the yogi who practices this may destroy time. The Knots are in the following places in the body:

> The Knot[1] called Ananta, which is HAṀSA, should be placed (on the body). It is at the middle toe of the sixteen parts (of the body). Again, (2) the Knot of Time is below the ankle. (3) Raudrī's Knot is in the channel. (4) Jyeṣṭhā's Knot is below the hip and (5) Vāmā's Knot is (above) on the other side. (6) The Kaula Knot is in the foundation of the anus. (7) The (Knot) called Piṅgā is in the fraenum of the prepuce (sīvanī). (8) (The Knot) called Brahmā is in the penis (svādhiṣṭhāna) and (9) the Knot of the Moon (soma) is in the stomach. (10) The Knot of the Sun is in the navel and (11) the one called the Vital Breath is in its own place (that is, in the breath). (12) The Knot of the Living Being is in the place of the heart, while (13) the one called Viṣṇu is in the throat. Know that (14) the one called Rudra is in the palate. (15) Īśvarī is in the cavity (between) the eyebrows and (16) the one called Sadāśiva (sādākhyā) is in the Sound (nāda). And Vāgbhava (AIṀ) is above the Triple Fort (trikoṭi).[2]

---

yo jānāti prayatnena sa yogī yogavedakaḥ |
o-jā-pū-kā [k: .o-] pṛthivyādi [k: -pi] vyomayonis tu pañcamī || [. . .]
kūṭabhede parijñāte haṁsadevaṁ [k kh: -devo] niyojayet ||
sa pumān kālahantā ca nānyathā vīravandite |
yathā pīṭhanāmākṣarasyaiva ekaikasya catuś catuḥ ||
pīṭhabhedena granthis tu haṁsabījodayaṁ viduḥ | ṢSS 27/14-22ab.

[1] The noun 'granthi' is normally masculine but is treated here as feminine presumably because each Knot is an energy or aspect of the goddess.

[2] nyasanīyā anantākhyā [k: samantākhyāṁ; kh samantākhyaṁ] granthir [k kh: granthi] haṁsasvārūpiṇī |
kālagranthiś ca gulphādho raudrīgranthir [k kh: raudra-] nalāntare ||
jyeṣṭhāgranthir [k kh: -graṁthi] nitambādho vāmāgranthis tathopari [k kh: tathāpare] |
kaulagranthir [k kh: -graṁthi] gudādhāre sīvanyāṁ [k kh: – nyā] piṅgasaṁjñikā [k kh: -kaṁ] ||
svādhiṣṭhāne ca brahmākhyā somagranthis tathodare [k, kh: tat-] |
sūryagranthis tathā nābhau prāṇākhyā ca prāṇe [k kh: pade] tathā ||
jīvagranthir [k kh: -graṁthi] hṛdi sthāne kaṇṭhe vai viṣṇusaṁjñikā | rudrākhyā tāluke viddhi īśvaro [k kh: -rī] bhrūbilāntare ||
sādākhyā nādagā caiva trikoṭyāś cordhve [k kh: trikoṭyo cordhva] vāgbhavam | ṢSS 27/23-27ab.

The commentary explains that the syllables that make up the names of the sacred seats can be arranged in two different sequences. The first is the normal serial order (which the commentary terms `anuloma', lit. `with the grain'), that is, O ḌI Ā NAṀ, JĀ LA NDHA RAṀ, PŪ RṆA GI RIḤ, KĀ MA RŪ PAṀ. Each syllable has a corresponding Knot and location where it is placed on the body. This is the order in which the Tantra lists them. The second sequence (which the

The sixteen Knots are parts of the goddess's body. Accordingly, they are projected into the adept's body to transform it into the Triple Fort, that is, the triangular body of the goddess replete with the energies of the sacred seats. She is both with form, consisting of the letters and mantras, and without form as the Transmental (manonmanī) energy of the god. Just as the goddess is now within it in her differentiated (sakala) immanent aspect, she is also above it in her undifferentiated (niṣkala) transcendental aspect. In her immanent aspect she is differentiated into her full mantric form. In her transcendent aspect she is her seed-syllable:

> In this way, the energy of Māyā is above (the sixteen Knots) flooded with the nectar of the bliss of (the deity's) will. The goddess who has sixteen limbs is the Skyfarer, (indeed she is) the goddess of the Skyfarers (khecarīśvarī). She resides in (each of the syllabic) parts and in the middle of (each) part. She (both) resides in the breath (haṁsa) and transports the breath (haṁsavāhinī). The goddess is both with parts (sakalā) and without parts (niṣkalā). Her body is the Wheel (of the sixteen lunar energies) and she is the Transmental (manonmanī). Situated in the midst of the sequence of the parts, she shines brilliantly with the ornaments of the parts that are (her) limbs. She is the (supreme) plane (pada) attained by (this) mantra of the parts. The goddess, born of the sixteen syllables, playfully attains the eight yogic accomplishments (aṇimāṣṭaka)[1] by (her) power (mahat).[2]

The text goes on to deal with a series of manipulations of the Knots to form a series of mantras. These consists of four Knots each and so, full of the energy of the four seats, they are projected into the body where the Knots are located. The text concludes:

> Linked to the Siddhakrama (i.e. the vowels) and possessing the commentary terms `pratiloma' lit. `against the grain') follows the serial rearrangement of the order of the syllables as described previously (in ṢSS 27/8), that is, O JĀ PŪ KĀ, ḌI LA RṆA MA, Ā NDHA GI RŪ, NA RA RI PU. The commentary lists the corresponding Knots and their location on the body in full in this order.

[1] Concerning these eight yogic powers (*guṇa*s or *siddhi*s) see KuKh 8/122cd-124ab.

[2] māyāśaktis tathā cordhve icchānandāmṛtaplutā || ṣoḍaśāvayavā devī khecarā khecareśvarī |
padasthā [k, kh: padma-] padamadhyasthā [k, kh: padma-] haṁsasthā haṁsavāhinī ||
niṣkalā sakalā devī cakradehā manonmanī |
*padakramasya [k kh: padakrama ] madhyasthā padāṅgābharaṇojjvālā [k, kh: -ṇojvālā]||
padamantrapadā [k kh: -mantraṁ-] labdhā līlayā hy aṇimāṣṭakam |
sādhayen mahatā devī ṣoḍaśākṣarasaṁbhavā || ṢSS 27/27cd-30.

> line of teachers (gurupaṅkti), one should deposit this group of four by means of the vision of knowledge. This is the Kulākula body, supreme and common to all things. It is said to be the body of the parts (padadeha) of the planes (pada) of the enjoyment of the parts (padabhuktipada).[1]

The Four Sacred Seats in the Wheel of Purity

The seats may also be the receptacles of states of consciousness. Their progressive development from one to the other marks the stages of the unfolding of these states related to one another, as are the sacred seats. The four seats projected into the triangle thus represent the states and their corresponding energies that are configured and work together to bring about emanation on the one hand and lead to the liberated condition on the other. We will find several examples of how this works in relation to the six seats in chapters 59 to 61 of our text. The energies and states are represented by letters and symbols set in geometric figures that may be projected along the axis of the body. Each a complex unit, they are juxtaposed to represent the complex layers of networks of states, energies, vital forces, metaphysical principles and phonemic energies.

One example is the Wheel of Purity (viśuddhicakra) described in the KMT and its related sources.[2] A complete, detailed explanation of this complex configuration would lead us too far astray. Here we mention just a few details to illustrate our point. Associated with the elemental Wind, the Wheel of Purity is the centre of the faculty of Speech. There are several modalities of this Wheel, but essentially it consists of the four seats from which emanate the energies of the lunar vowels distributed within them. They are contemplated in the centre of the Wheel of Purity, which consists of the sixteen energies of the vowels each of which corresponds to one of following sixteen principles that together make up the body of the Pure God (Viśuddhadeva).[3] They constitute two parallel 'paths', Southern and Northern, that correspond to aspects or forms of it. The end of each of these ‘paths’ is the End of the Sixteen. The one on the ‘Southern path’ is below

---

[1] siddhakramasamāyuktaṁ gurupaṅktisamanvitam ||
jñānadṛṣṭyā [k: jñānaṁ dṛṣṭvā; kh: jñānadṛṣṭvā] nyaset taṁ tu catuṣkedaṁ kulākulam |
etat kulākulaṁ dehaṁ sarvasādhāraṇaṁ param ||
padabhaktipadānāṁ [k kh: -bhukti-] tu padadehaṁ [k kh: pade-] prakīrtitam |
ṢSS 27/63cd-65ab.

[2] See KMT chapter 11, ṢSS chapter 18 and ŚM chapter 16 (16/71ff). The term in the KMT for this and the other centres in this series is ‘padārtha’ – ‘category of reality’, not ‘cakra’ – ‘Wheel’. However, as the latter term became the common one and the former one was dropped, in order not to confuse the reader I use the latter.

[3] KMT 11/93cd = ṢSS 18/118cd.

in the throat; the other is above the head.[1]

The Northern Path is linked to the power of the will (icchāśakti) and corresponds to the downward entry of the vital breath into the body. The Southern Path is linked to the power of action, which brings about the upward exit of the vital breath. The former takes place by means of Śiva and the latter by means of Śakti, who thus operate together. The phonemic counterparts of both Paths are the sixteen vowels representing the sixteen parts of the Self, which is linked in particular with the Southern Path. The sixteen realities corresponding to the sixteen vowels on the two Paths are similar. Both begin with the Transmental. The first eight members of the series on the Southern Path are levels in the higher development of mantric sound. The following five concern the psycho-physical organism, while the last three are mantra and the supreme principles of Śiva and Śakti, as follows:

1) The Transmental (unmanā), 2) the Equal One (samanā), 3) the Pervasive One (vyāpinī), 4) the Point (bindu), 5) Sound (nāda), 6) the End of Sound (nādānta), 7) the Obstructress (nirodhinī), 8) the Half Moon (ardhacandra), 9) the Self (ātman), 10) mind (manas), 11) the vital breath (vāyu), 12) the channels of the vital breath (nāḍī), 13) the body (piṇḍa), 14) Mantra, 15) Śiva, and 16) Śakti.

While the Southern Path ends with Śakti, the Northern Path ends with Śiva who is, in this case, the End of the Sixteen.[2] Power (śakti) (which should not be confused with the sixteenth entry in the first list) is inserted as an extra stage in the development of mantric sound and so there are not eight but nine members in this series. Again, the Gander (haṁsa), which is, amongst other things, the 'unstruck' sound of the vital breath, is between mind and the breath. These two extra realities account for the elimination of mantra and Śakti that are on the Southern Path.

The ṢSS manipulates these two Paths in a variety of ways, juxtaposing them in complimentary polarities, analysing and grouping the phases of each one. The vocalic energies contained in the sacred seats that correspond to the two Paths are understood to be their counterparts in such a way that they are the northern path with respect to the southern one when that is dominant and the southern when the northern polarity is the focus of attention. Thus:

---

[1] (The Wheel of) Purity (viśuddhi) is the mother of awakened consciousness (bodha). It is the End of the Sixteen above (the head on the Northern Path) and below (in the throat on the Southern Path).

viśuddhir bodhajananī ṣoḍaśānta-m-adhordvataḥ | KMT 11/17ab.

[2] ṢSS 18/25cd.

The Northern (path is as follows): 1) Kula: this is the group of four, namely, the Transmental (unmanā), the Equal One (samanā), the Pervasive, and Power (śakti, i.e. Kuṇḍalinī). 2) Akula: this is the group of five, namely, the Point (bindu), the End of Sound (nādānta), Sound (nāda), the Obstructress (nirodhī), and the Half Moon. 3) Kulākula: this is the group of six, namely, the Self (ātman), mind (manas), the Gander (haṁsa), the vital breath (vāyu), the channels (nāḍī), and the body (piṇḍa). 4) Thus Kula, Akula and Kulākula, the groups of four, five and six (respectively), make fifteen. Then (there is) Śiva who is (all-) pervasive. Both together make sixteen.

The southern one consists of the sixteen vowels. In this way (how the Pure Wheel consists of) sixteen vowels (distributed) in the groups of four, five, and six has been explained in terms of the four sacred seats. Thus, (there are) four vowels in the four sacred seats, (the next) five vowels are in the four sacred seats and in space (ākāśa), the (following) six vowels are in the four sacred seats, in space and in the middle. Thus there are fifteen vowels. Here (in this case) the letter Ḥ is pervasive and completes (the set of sixteen). This is the description of the vowels in terms of the southern path. (Moreover) there are sixteen clear signs of purity (viśuddhi), which are the states of the plane of the Pure (Wheel) such as horripilation and the shedding of tears.[1] This (concludes the exposition of) the Wheel of Purity.[2]

---

[1] These sixteen are: 1) horripilation, 2) shedding of tears, 3) the vision of the Moon during an equinox, 4) a tactile sensation like that of an ant crawling on the skin, 5) a vision of the sun at night, 6) one flies upward with the clouds of the sky, 7) one makes terrible sounds, 8) one attains mastery over speech (vāgīśatva), 9) one speaks nonesense, 10) arousal, 11) conquest of hunger, 12) sleep, 13) the Transmental state from moment to moment, 14) a pleasing body odour, 15) brilliance, and 16) the Accomplishment of Speech (vācāsiddhi).

The KMT (at the end of 11/95-99ab) concludes by saying that: If one experiences these sixteen great states (mahāvasthā) directly, one becomes the beloved of the Kula of the Skyfaring Energies with this body.

Note that the last and presumably highest of these states is the Accomplishment of Speech (vācāsiddhi), which we have seen is understood to be the attainment of liberation.

[2] yathā uttaram || kulam [kh: nāsti] unmanā 1 || samanā [k: śamana] 2 || vyāpinī [k: -ini] 3 || śaktiḥ [k: -śakti] 4 || akulam [kh: nāsti] binduḥ 1 || nādāntaḥ [k: -nta; kh: -ntaṁ] 2 || nādaḥ [k: nāda] 3 || nirodhī 4 || ardhacandraḥ [k: -ndraṁ] 5 || kulākulam [kh: nāsti] ātmā 1 || manaḥ [k: mana] 2 || haṁsaḥ [k: haṁsa] 3 || vāyuḥ [k: vāyu] 4 || nāḍī 5 || piṇḍaṁ 6 || evaṁ [kh: + 6] kulam [k: -la; kh: missing] 1 akulam [kh: akula] 2 kulākulam [k: -la; kh: kulakulākulaṁ] 3 iti trayaṁ [kh: traye] catuṣkapañcakaṣaṭkaṁ [kh: -ṣaṭke] pañcādaśa [k: 15] || tato vyāpakaḥ [k: kaṁ] śivaḥ 1 || ubhau soḍaśa [k: missing] 16 ||

dakṣiṇaṁ yathā a ā i ī u ū ṛ Ṝ ḷ Ḹ e ai o au aṁ aḥ || *evaṁ catuṣpīṭhagatyā ṣoḍaśasvaratvaṁ [kh: -svaraṁ ] catuṣkapañcakaṣaṭkatvena [k kh: -tve] pratipāditaṁ yathā catuḥ svarāś catuṣpīṭhe pañcasvarāś catuṣpīṭhe [kh: + ca] tathākāśe ca [k: ya 2; kh: + 5] ṣaṭ svarāś catuṣpīṭhe*

The commentary on the ṢSS goes on to explain that the sixteen parts are arranged in a hierarchy such that the higher is sustained by the lower starting with Śiva who is supported by the Transmental and the latter by the Equal One and so on.[1] The first three of the four groups relate to each other, as do the means to the goal or as what is indicated in relation to what indicates it. Thus the ascending series, explained in the following summary of a passage in the commentary on the ṢSS, is a journey through the sacred seats leading to Śiva who, in the highest seat, encompasses it all:

> In this way successively (there are three teachings) concerning these sixteen parts. The succeeding one serves as the object of knowledge (prāmāṇya) that is (established) with the three indications (uddeśa). . . . Thus, the first group of four possesses the means of knowledge, which is devoid of indication (niruddeśapramāṇa). The sequence beginning with the Transmental (i.e. the Transmental, the Equal One, the Pervasive, and Power) is not indicated (by anything) (anuddiṣṭa) as it is (the group) which perceives (the others) (tasya grahaṇam). The second, which is the group of five, does have an indication (uddeśa). (This is) the object of the means of knowledge (prāmāṇya) (in relation to the preceding group of four).[2] . . .
>
> In the same way (there are) groups of four, five and six. (These three groups make a whole consisting of) fifteen (parts) and there is Śiva's mantra with its foundation (sādhāra) in the wheel, (thus making the whole) with sixteen parts.[3]

This subtle representation of the Wheel of Purity runs in parallel with a grosser, more 'concrete' modality. In this one also the contents of the four seats are ākāśe madhye ca || evaṁ svarāḥ [k: -rā; kh: -ra] pañcadaśa [k kh: + 15] || *atra sarvavyāpakaḥ śivabhūtaḥ [k: siddhinī-; kh: śivībhūtaḥ] aḥkāra [k: akāra; kh: aḥ * ] iti svarāṇāṁ [k: -ṇā] dakṣiṇagatyā vyāvarṇanam || viśuddhisthānasya padāvasthā [k: paścādadhastho; kh: paścāt avasthā] romāñcaṁ aśrupātam [k: aśrupata] ity ādi ṣoḍaśa sphuṭāḥ [k: -ṭā] viśuddhyupalakṣaṇā [k: viśuddhopalakṣaṇād; kh: -ṇāt] bhavanti || iti viśuddhicakram || Commentary on ṢSS 18/114 ff.

---

[1] uttaramārgaṁ sarvam ādhārādheyarūpam [this sentance is missing in k] ||kathaṁ || yadā [k: yathā] śiva [kh: śivaḥ] ādheyas [kh: ādheyaḥ] tadā unmanā ādhārabhūtā || yadā unmanā ādheyarūpā tadā [k: tathā] samanā ādhārabhūtā [k: -rūpā] || Comm. on ṢSS 18/23ab.

[2] evaṁ krameṇa [kh: sarvvatra + evaṁ] ṣoḍaśāvayavasya [kh: vayavatvasya] uttarotthitasya trayoddeśaiḥ [kh: -ddeśa] prāmāṇyaṁ [k: pra-] || yathā niruddeśo [kh: -śaḥ] dvitīyoddeśaś ca tṛtīyoddeśaḥ [k kh: nāsti] || katham || yathā prathamacatuṣkasya niruddeśapramāṇaṁ [kh: -naṁ] yathā unmanādikramam anuddiṣṭam [kh: -aṁtāddiṣṭaṁ] || tasya grahaṇaṁ yathā unmanā [kh: unmanī] samanā vyāpinī śaktiś ca || dvitīyasya pañcakasya uddeśaṁ [kh: uddeśa] prāmāṇyaṁ | Ibid.

[3] evaṁ [k kh: + nava. kh: + 9] catuṣkaṁ pañcakaṁ ṣaṭkam || evaṁ pañcadaśakaṁ tathā śivamantraṁ [kh: -matra] sādhāraṁ cakre [kh: sarvvatrā] iti ṣoḍaśāvayavam || Ibid.

the entire reality, but of another dimension of existence. The former ranges through the stages of emanation, initially through planes of consciousness down into the psychophysical organism and its vitalizing principles. It runs parallel to the progressive emanation of the lunar vowels, the phonemic energies that generate them. In this modality the four seats are the repositories of the archetypical essences of the primary components of the 'concrete', 'physical' dimension of existence. These are the principles of the four gross elements. The fifth element – Space (ākāśa) – is not directly represented. However, the KMT and ṢSS describe two modalities of Kāmarūpa that contain the element Air. One is this one in the End of the Twelve; the other is above it in the End of the Sixteen. Although the texts do not say so specifically we may assume that the second modality represents Space.[1]

Thus the Wheel of Purity is a complete system in itself that covers the full extent of the micro- and macrocosms displayed in and through the four sacred seats. In their most elevated modality in this scheme they correspond to the four highest principles – the Transmental, Equal One, the Pervasive and Resonance (dhvani), which is more commonly known as Energy (śakti).[2] They generate the other principles and with them all the letters and hence the entire range of existing things. The KMT and its expansions then proceed to evolve a complex series of stages of emanation based, as usual, on the phases of the energies of Sound. These are described and related to the sacred seats as follows:

> Sound (nāda) has arisen from Resonance (dhvani) and is said to be of five kinds as 1) subtle (sūkṣma), 2) very subtle (susūkṣma), 3) manifest (vyakta), 4) unmanifest (avyakta), and 5) artificial (kṛtrima). It is placed within the half-portion of the Self, in the lower place. From there it brings about emanation, which is of many forms. The subtle bliss is in Udyāna.[3] That which is within the very subtle is in Jālākhya.[4] Similarly, the unmanifest is in Pūrṇākhya, the manifest is in Kāmākhya.[5] The artificial (sound) is (brought about) by the [1] Here is another example of how the older tradition, even though it did allow for the possibility of a fifth seat, limited the number to four, even at the cost of complex adjustments.

[2] KMT 11/78cd-79ab.
[3] MS Kh reads: The subtle bliss is in the vital breath.
[4] The KMT (11/81cd) reads: sūkṣmanādo guhāvāsī kālāgnau tu susūkṣmagaḥ |
Subtle Sound is (the goddess) who resides in the Cave. That which is within the very subtle is in the Fire of Time.
[5] The KMT (11/82ab) reads: svasthānasthas tu avyaktaḥ padānte vyakta-m-āśritaḥ |
The unmanifest is in its own place and the manifest is at the end of a syllable (pada).
Note that the ṢSS has modified the readings of its source, the KMT, so as to include a reference to the four seats. The ṢSS departs from the KMT according to which the Transmental, the Equal One, the Pervasive and Resonance (dhvani) constitute the group of four sacred seats (KMT conjunction (of objects) and is located in space (ākāśa).

From that the series of letters which is the play (vilāsa) of Speech comes into being. Once the Self, both manifest and unmanifest, has been aroused by that, this Śāmbhava (state) of subtle being is confined (nirodhita) by it. 1) Thus (the principle) called the Confiner (nairodhika)[1] arose first in the form of a ball (golākāra). 2) The second form (pratimūrti) is that aspect (svarūpa) that is linked to the Self (ātmālagna). 3) Having aroused the Self with that, the Half Moon was made. Oozing divine nectar, it is of benefit to the whole universe. In order to flood it (completely), the three have been intensified with 4) Emission (visargodīrita). The Sun has risen there. He is the lord of the letters. The Lord of the Universe is in the form of a (dimensionless) Point (bindurūpa) beyond action, time, and the qualities (of Nature). He, radiant with energy (suvarcasa), shines intensely and emanates the letters. This fourfold energy (catuṣkala) of the quaternary beginning with the Transmental has arisen (thus). It is disturbed by (this) Krama Yoga and is the pure Śāmbhava body which has sixteen divisions (formed) by (each) group of four individually.[2] 11/79abc). This passage concerns the four forms of Resonance to which 'artificial' sound – i.e. articulated, audible speech is added as a fifth. These five should all be related to just one seat, that is, Kāmarūpa, not all four. The KMT is therefore more consistent than the ṢSS. While this unwarranted modification may be simply understood as a mistake, it nonetheless illustrates the increasing prominence accorded to the projection the sacred seats.

[1] Read with the KMT 'nairodhikaṁ' in place of 'nirodhitaṁ'.

[2] dhvaner nādaḥ [k kh: dhvanir-] samutpannaḥ sa ca pañcavidhaḥ smṛtaḥ (KMT: cānekavidhaḥ sthitaḥ) ||
sūkṣmaś caiva susūkṣmaś ca vyaktāvyaktaś ca kṛtrimaḥ |
ātmano hy ardhakoṭyante [kh: hyarddhaḥ-] hy adhaḥsthāne [k kh: hyadha-] niveśitaḥ ||
tasmāc ca kurute sṛṣṭim anekākārarūpiṇīm [k: -ṇiṁ; kh: – ṇī] |
sūkṣmānandas tathodyāṇe [k: -tathoprāṇe] (KMT guhāvāsī) jālākhye ca (KMT: kālāgnau tu) susūkṣmagaḥ ||
pūrṇākhye caivam (KMT: svasthānasthas) avyaktaḥ [k kh: -kta] kāmākhye (KMT: padānte) vyakta āśritaḥ |
kṛtrimaś caiva saṁyogāt [k kh: -gā] sa cākāśe vyavasthitaḥ ||
tasmād akṣarasantāno vāgvilāsaḥ pravartate |
tena saṁkṣobhya cātmānaṁ [k, kh: mā-] vyaktāvyaktasvarūpiṇam ||
nirodhitaṁ tu tenedaṁ sūkṣmabhāvasya śāmbhavam |
tena nirodhitaṁ [k kh: nairo-] (KMT: nairodhikaṁ) nāma golākāraṁ [k kh: -ra] puroditam (KMT: vyavasthitam) ||
ātmālagnasvarūpeṇa pratimūrti dvitīyakam [k, kh: -kā] |
tena saṁkṣobhya cātmānam ardhacandraṁ (KMT: -candra) vinirmitam ||
sravantam amṛtaṁ divyaṁ sarvasya jagato hitam (KMT: sthitam) |
tasya saṁplāvanārthāya (KMT: -nātyarthaṁ) visargodīritas trayaḥ [k: visargāṅgiritastu yaḥ; kh: visargebhiratastu yaḥ] (KMT visargābhiratastu yaḥ) ||

This Wheel of Purity is thus portrayed as the configuration of energies within the pure states of being epitomized by the four sacred seats. But although these are abstract states of consciousness, it is nonetheless essential for the seats to have some form of 'concrete' physical existence to 'perceive' them inwardly and represent them concretely in the outer maṇḍala. Each seat is the world of the deity who resides there and belongs to the sphere of its corresponding metaphysical principle, experienced in its own part of the yogic body. The four seats are arranged on the three peaks and in the centre of Kailāśa. Each of them contains four vowels distributed in the usual alphabetical order.[1] Each containing a gross element, each possesses the colour associated with it, its geometric form and seed-syllable supplied by the ŚM in code. The variables may be tabulated as follows.

4. Table of the Four Sacred Seats in the Wheel of Purity

Seats	Elements	Colours	Shapes	Directions	seed-syllables
Oḍḍiyāna	Earth	Yellow	Square	Centre	VMLRYŪṀ
Jālandhara	Water	White	Half Moon	South	JLUṀ
Pūrṇagiri	Fire	Brown	Triangle	North	RMRYŪṀ
Kāmarūpa	Air	Grey	Hexagram	Front	KMLVRYŪṀ

The venerable great lord of Oḍra[2] resides in the cavity in the Middle Land. It is (Oḍḍiyāna) the first (sacred seat) and, yellow in colour, it has mountains, forests, and groves, large and small, and is adorned with golden walls. It has rivers and rivulets and many (other) things. It is full of all the seeds and is square all around. It has

---

tatrādityaḥ [k kh: -tya] samutpanno varṇāṇāṁ prabhur īśvaraḥ |
bindurūpaṁ jagannāthaṁ [k, kh: -nātha] kriyākālaguṇottaram ||
varṇasya [k: varṇa] sṛṣṭes [k kh: -ṣṭas] tu kartāraṁ dedīpyantaṁ suvarcasam |
unmanādicatuṣkasya saṁjātedaṁ catuṣkalam ||
kṣubhitaṁ kramayogena [k, kh: śrama-] viśuddhatanu [k kh: viśuddhaṁ] śāmbhavam |
sthitaṁ ṣoḍaśabhir bhedaiś catuṣkeṇa pṛthak pṛthak || ṢSS 18/104cd-114 = KMT 11/79cd-89.

[1] (The sacred seats located) in the south, north and centre are triangular, semicircular, and square (respectively). There is a hexagram in the front part (of Kailāśa). Know the energies (to be as follows). The four, the letters A and the others, are in the middle of the sacred seat of the Earth. There are four in the triangle, four belong to the Half Moon, (and four are) in Kāmarūpa. The four seed-syllables of the sacred seats are below, above, to the left and the right.

dakṣiṇe vāmamadhye tu tryasrārdhenducaturmukham ||
agrabhāge ca ṣaṭkoṇaṁ kalāś caiva nibodhataḥ |
dharāpīṭhasya madhye tu akārādicatuṣṭayam ||
tryasre catvāri cārdhendoś catvāraḥ [k kh: mardhenducatvāraḥ] kāmarūpake |
caturṇāṁ pīṭhabījānām adhordhve vāmadakṣiṇe || ṢSS 18/87cd-89.

[2] KMT: the venerable Kuleśvara of Oḍra.

thunderbolts as door chains and Mālinī (who resides there) holds a thunderbolt (vajra) in her hand. Endowed with the sovereignty of the Wheels, it is the sacred seat (Udyāna) attended by the mistress of the sacred seat.[1]

(Jālandhara) is in the southern corner of (Kailāśa). It shines (like) the moon and has the moon's radiant lustre. Its form is that of the city of the Half Moon. It has deep lakes and rivers full of waves. It contains the ocean of the six planes (ṣaṭpada),[2] and is fearsome (with the many great) waves that wash against its shores. That city of the Supreme Lord is on top of the lord of the principles. It is adorned with snow (white) moonstones (candraśilā) and varied enclosing walls, archways, and palaces (aṭṭāla).[3] It possesses many qualities and wonders. There the god is the lord of the (Water) principle and his form is sustained (adhiṣṭhita) by the goddess. He is dark blue and, possessing great power (sutejas), he holds a noose and has beautiful eyes. It is the foundation of all creation and is on top of the great sacred seat. Full of many (divine) qualities, one should mark the sacred seat of Jālandhara there on Kailāśa's southern peak.[4]

---

[1] madhyadeśe tu randhrasthaṁ śrīmadoḍramaheśvaram [k, kh: śrīmadoḍa-] (KMT: śrīmadoḍrakuleśvaram) |
prathamaṁ pītavarṇaṁ [k, kh: pīṭha-] tu saśailavanakānanam [k, kh: saśailā-] ||
vanopavanasaṁbhūtaṁ (KMT: -samayuktaṁ) hemaprākāramaṇḍitam |
nadīnadasamākīrṇam anekārthasamākulam [k, kh: anekārciḥ-] ||
sarvabījasamākīrṇaṁ caturasraṁ samantataḥ |
vajrārgalasamopetaṁ vajrahastā [k, kh: sasya-] ca mālinī ||
cakrādhipatyayogena (KMT: tatrā-) pīṭhaṁ pīṭheśvarīyutam |
ṢSS 18/66cd-69 = KMT 11/50cd-53.

[2] I suppose that the 'six planes' are the six divisions of the Krama. Groups of six appear in the following two seats also. In Pūrṇagiri, Time has six faces. In Kāmarūpa, the maṇḍala has six spokes.

[3] The 'aṭṭāla' are the upper apartments of a temple or palace. Note that these are all parts of monumental temples.

[4] tasyaiva dakṣiṇe koṇe candrābhaṁ candravarcasam |
ardhacandrapurākāraṁ saritsarasamāvṛtaṁ [kh: -ta] ||
jalakallolagambhīraṁ ṣaṭpadārṇavasaṁkulam |
vīcītaraṅgakallolataṭāsphālanabhīṣaṇam ||
tattvanāthoparisthaṁ tu puraṁ tat pārameśvaram |
himacandraśilābhiś ca samantāt nicitaṁ [k kh: tuvitaṁ] tu tam ||
prākāreṇa [k: -krāreṇa] vicitreṇa gopurāṭṭālaśobhitam |
anekaguṇasaṁcchannam anekāścaryasaṁkulam ||
tatra tattveśvaraṁ devaṁ devyādhiṣṭhitavigraham |
śyāmavarṇaṁ sutejāḍhyaṁ pāśahastaṁ sulocanam ||
ādhāraṁ sarvasṛṣṭes [k kh: -ṣṭis] tu mahāpīṭhoparisthitam |
kailāsadakṣiṇe śṛṅge anekaguṇasaṁkulam ||

(Pūrṇagiri) is on the northern peak of Kailāśa and is full of countless flames. Brilliant like ten million suns, it is as if devouring the Three Worlds. It is brown and burning. Licking things up and destroying them, it is very terrible. O goddess, it is difficult for me to see it – what to say for others! It stands in the middle of the triangular city and is adorned with walls of lightning flashes. That divine city of the supreme Lord is made of pillars of adamantine. It is surrounded by temple arches and palaces of the Fire of Time. It is filled with many forms and adorned with knowledge (vidyā) and (divine) qualities. Possessing many wonders, it is life itself (jīvabhūta) in the triple universe. (All) this is filled by it and so it is called 'Full' (pūrṇa i.e. Pūrṇagiri). (The Fire of Time) has seven tongues (of flame; his) form is Time and has six faces. Possessing the Full Moon, (he) is beautiful. (He is) the Great Vitality (mahāvīrya), holds a spear (śaktihasta)[1] and brings about creation and destruction.[2]

(Kāmarūpa) is the Neuter (napuṁsaka) (absolute) within the qualities. It has emerged as the pervasion (of consciousness) and, in front of the middle seat, is located on the peak in front. (Pleasing and delicate) like a lotus petal, it is radiant (with energy) (suvarcasa) and grey (dhūmra) in colour.[3] It shakes with mighty and fierce currents (of energy) engaged in striking against (it) and rocking (it) all around as it dries up (the entire) universe. The all-pervasive Lord of Kula resides within (this), the maṇḍala of six spokes. There is nothing devoid of that within the sphere of emanation and withdrawal.

[. . .] O goddess, I will (now) tell you about the god of Kāmarūpa. (His) city is fashioned all around with pillars of sapphire.

śrīmajjālandharaṁ pīṭhaṁ tatrasthaṁ lakṣayet priye | ṢSS 18/70-76ab = KMT 11/54-60ab.

[1] The meaning may also be that the god of this seat is the bearer of the power (śakti).

[2] kailāsasyottare śṛṅge anekārcisamākulam [k kh: -kulaḥ] |
grasantam iva trailokyaṁ sūryakoṭisamaprabham ||
piṅgalaṁ dahanāvasthaṁ lelihānaṁ sudāruṇam |
mamāpi devi duṣprekṣyaṁ [kh: duḥprekṣyaṁ] kiṁ punas tv itarair janaiḥ [k, kh: itareṣu ca] ||
trikoṇapuramadhyasthaṁ vajraprākāramaṇḍitam |
vajrastambhamayaṁ divyaṁ puraṁ tat pārameśvaram ||
kālāgnigopurāṭṭālaṁ [k kh: -la] samantāt pariveṣṭitam |
bahurūpasamākīrṇaṁ [k kh: -rūpaṁ-] vidyāguṇavibhūṣitam ||
anekāścaryasaṁpannaṁ jīvabhūtaṁ jagattraye |
āpūritam idaṁ yena tenedaṁ pūrṇasaṁjñakam ||
saptajihvāsamopetaṁ kālarūpaṁ ṣaḍānanam |
*pūrṇimāyāḥ [k, kh: -māyā] samopetaṁ saṁjātaṁ [k: sajāna ; kh: sajātaṁ] (KMT: sāñjanaṁ) cārurūpiṇam ||
śaktihastaṁ mahāvīryaṁ sṛṣṭisaṁhārakārakam | ṢSS 18/76cd-82 = KMT 11/60cd-66.

[3] The KMT says: like smoke (it has) the lustre of copper.

> It has palaces, mansions, arches, banners, goads, and bows. The god holds five arrows and is accompanied by Kāmeśvarī. Without a body[1] and in the form of light, he melts away the entire universe. He is the lord of the fourteen worlds and holds the staff (of authority). Everything, including passion and the rest, takes place impelled by his will. Thus, it is located in the foremost portion, above Mind Beyond Mind (manonmana). O Pārvatī, one should meditate on it above the Cavity of Brahmā[2] within the End of the Twelve.[3]

We have seen that the four seats are also set in the Yoni in the Wheel of the Foundation (ādhāracakra), which serves as the pedestal for Kuleśvara's Liṅga in the Wheel of the Self-supported above it.[4] Thus the seats are both set in the base of the ascent as its supports and at the summit as the doors to the transcendental unity of the liberated Śāmbhava state, of which they represent the immanent cosmogenic aspects. When the seats are internalised in this way and contemplated, they bestow magical and yogic powers just as visiting their outer equivalents is said to do. As in other contexts, these powers are graded and culminate in the supreme accomplishments – mastery of Speech and the liberated condition of flight. The centre of the Command between the eyebrows is an exception. No mention is made of any magical accomplishments attained when one reaches it and so, presumably, it leads solely to liberation.

---

[1] This is the reading in the KMT. The ṢSS says: within the body.

[2] Note that there are two Cavities of Brahmā in the upper part of the yogic body; this leads, at times, to some confusion. One is on the crown of the head and the other is the Void in the End of the Twelve. A third Cavity of Brahmā is the lower entrance of the channel of suṣumṇā at the base of trunk of the body.

[3] napuṁsakaṁ guṇāntasthaṁ vyāptibhūtaṁ vinirgatam ||
madhyapīṭhasya [k, kh: -śṛṅgasya] pūrveṇa agraśṛṅge vyavasthitam |
padminīdalasaṁkāśaṁ dhūmravarṇaṁ suvarcasam (KMT dhūmravat tāmravarcasam) ||
mahāpracaṇḍadaṇḍograsphālanollolalālasaiḥ (KMT: -daṇḍaughaiḥ-) |
dhūyamānaṁ samantāt tu śoṣayanataṁ [k kh: śoṣayesa] carācaram || ṣaḍasramaṇḍalāntasthaṁ sarvavyāpikuleśvaram |
na tena rahitaṁ kiñcit sṛṣṭisaṁhāragocare [k kh: -ram] || [. . .]
kāmarūpasya yad devaṁ tava devi kathāmy aham || (Missing in the KMT)
indranīlamayaiḥ (KMT: -nibhaiḥ] stambhaiḥ samantād racitaṁ (KMT: nicitam) puram | prāsādatoraṇāṭṭāladhvajāṅkuśadhanurdharam (KMT: prākāragopurāṭṭālaṁ-) ||
pañcabāṇadharaṁ devaṁ kāmeśvaryā (KMT: kāmadevyā) samanvitam |
dravayantaṁ jagat sarvaṁ jyotirūpaṁ (KMT: śrutirūpaṁ) tanūjjhitam [k, kh: tanusthitaṁ] ||
caturdaśabhuvanānāṁ [k kh: caturdaśaṁ-] (KMT: caturdaśavidhasyāpi) nāyako daṇḍadhārakaḥ |
tasyecchāpreritaṁ sarvaṁ kāmādyaṁ saṁpravartate ||
tenedaṁ cāgrakoṭisthaṁ manonmanyordhvasaṁsthitam [k, kh: manonmanordhva-] |
brahmarandhordhvagaṁ dhyāyed dvādaśānte tu pārvati || (Missing in the KMT) ṢSS 18/83-86ab, 90-94ab = KMT 11/67-73.

[4] See above, chapter 2, p. 263 ff..

Thus we witness exemplified three principles. Firstly, although the projection of these 'realities' (padārtha) or 'Wheels' along the axis of the body suggests that they are arranged in an ascending hierarchy, nonetheless they may each lead to the supreme state independently. Secondly, although liberation is acknowledged to be a primary and separate concern, here, as in other contexts, it is also understood to be an accomplishment (siddhi) amongst others, albeit the highest one. Thirdly, when the sacred seats are contemplated as the repositories of these configurations of forces within the subtle body, they are activated. Thus the adept becomes not only an accomplished yogi and powerful magician, he also attains liberation.

The Four Sacred Seats and the Krama

The scripture is revealed secretly by the power of the goddess's Command in each of the four Ages in one of the sacred seats. The essential teaching of Kubjikā's scripture is the Krama. In the oldest source – the KMT – there is just one. In the subsequent Tantras the forms of the Krama proliferate. But although we find numerous varieties of the Krama, they all invariably consists of a series – krama – of six groups of mantras that invoke and laud the divine beings and realities worshipped in the Krama.

As the seats are the sources of the Krama, the mantras invoking them and the beings who inhabit them are almost invariably the first group to be worshipped.[1] Moreover, despite the variety of the forms of the Krama, they are virtually always four. It would be tedious and of little use to examine all of the many variants here; one example will suffice. I have selected the description of the four seats in the commentary on the first verse of the KMT found in the ŚM. There we read:

> What is the other group of four? One should know that it is the progressive arising, externally and internally, of the sacred seats. In the (regular forward) order the sequence is O (Oḍḍiyāna) JĀ (Jālandhara) PŪ (Pūrṇagiri) KĀ (Kāmarūpa), and KĀ PŪ JĀ O in the reverse order. They are located (between the) eyebrows, in the cavity (of the mouth), in the throat and in heart, respectively. Pervading one's own body, they are located in the Liṅga, Foundation, the Self-supported and the navel. They should be known to be within one's own (subtle) body in the reverse order.[2]

---

[1] The Krama taught in chapters two and three of the KRU is the most striking exception in this respect.

[2] anyac [kh: anyaś] catuṣkaṁ kiṁ || pīṭhodayaṁ [kh: pīṭhādayaṁ] krameṇa sabāhyābhyantareṇa jñātavyam iti || o – jā – pū – keti [kh: -pūka] kramāt kā – pū – jā – o iti [kh: missing] vyatikramāt

1) Oḍḍiyāṇa: The sacred seat of Oḍḍiyāṇa is in between the eyebrows. It illumines (the surroundings) like a jewel and rotates in the shape of a wheel that shines like the rays of the sun in the form of all things. The venerable and great lord of Oḍu, surrounded by the troupe of Yoginīs, is the emperor (of this seat). The power of the will abides as the essential nature (of all things) within the Wheel as the lordship of the sacred seat.[1] In (this), the first sacred seat, there is a tree, creeper, guardian, cremation ground, monastery (maṭha), gesture (mudrā), cave and the rest (associated with them). Within one's own body it is located between the eyebrows and in accord with the sequence of emanation. One should know (this) the first sacred seat by means of the essential nature of (the deity's) energy.[2]

2) Jālandhara: The venerable sacred seat of Jālandhara is in the locus of the cavity (of the mouth). It is adorned with flames of Fire and shines brilliantly and burns with the Doomsday Fire (vaḍavāgni) in the form of a (radiant) spark (of light). The venerable Cakrīśanātha is the emperor in the middle of the wheel (located here) and is mounted on the power of his knowledge surrounded by many troupes of Yoginīs and is adorned with sixteen energies. (This is the) second sacred seat should be known by means of (the deity's) energy (to be) within the locus of the cavity shining (there) surrounded by a tree,

---

[g: vyakti-] || bhrū-randhra-kaṇṭhahṛtsthāḥ krameṇa svatanu [kh: -tanuṁ] vyāpya sthitā liṅgādhārasvādhiṣṭhānanābhisthā [kh, g: liṁgamā-] vyatikrameṇa [kh, g: iti krameṇa] jñātavyāḥ svadehasthāḥ [kh: -sthā] ||

The forward order is the one in the physical body into which the four seats are projected in a descending sequence, thus: 1) Oḍḍiyāna – between the eyebrows, 2) Jālandhara – throat, 3) Pūrṇagiri – heart, and 4) Kāmarūpa – navel. The seats are projected in the reverse order into the inner subtle body and so are set in an ascending sequence thus: 1) Kāmarūpa – Liṅga. 2) Pūrṇagiri – Wheel of the Foundation. 3) Jālandhara – Wheel of the Self-Supported. 4) Oḍḍiyāna – the Wheel of the City of Gems (maṇipura) which is in the navel.

Note that, as in numerous other instances, Kāmarūpa – the seat of the present Age and Oḍḍiyāna – the First Seat, coincide.

[1] bhrūmadhye oḍḍi – āṇapīṭhaṁ [g: udyāna-] maṇir iva dyotamānaṁ cakrākāraṁ [kh, g: -ra] bhramati ca [kh: bhramanniva] raviraśmir iva dīpyantaṁ viśvākārasvarūpeṇa | yoginīvyūhaparivṛtacakravartī [g: -parivṛte-; kh g: -vartti] śrī – oḍumaheśāna [g: -oḍumaḍaśāra-] icchāśaktiḥ [kh, g: -śakti] svarūpeṇa [kh: svarūpita] cakrānte [g: -nta] sthitā [kh, g: sthite; kh: + svarūpiṇi; g: + svarūpiṇī] pīṭhādhipatyarūpeṇa |

[2] prathamapīṭhe [kh: pīṭhena] vṛkṣa-vallī-pālaka-śmaśana-maṭha-mudrā-guhādayaḥ [kh: -smasāna-; g: -yālaka- -guhādayī] | svadehe bhrūmadhye sṛṣṭikrameṇa śaktyāḥ [kh, g: sṛjantyā] svarūpeṇa prathamapīṭhaṁ jñātavyam iti ||

creeper, guardian, cremation ground, monastery, gesture and cave.[1]

3) Pūrṇagiri: (The third sacred seat) is located in the throat and it illumines as do the rays of the full moon. Moonlight by nature, its purpose is to delight by the currents of nectar (that stream from it into the body) and to (bring about) many forms of emanation. The emperor (who governs from this seat) is the venerable Ṣaṣṭhīśanātha who resides in the middle of the wheel surrounded by sixteen energies. He is mounted on the energy of action and is surrounded by many troupes of Yoginīs.

(This) the third sacred seat, with (its) many diverse modalities (namely) the tree, creeper, cremation ground, guardian, creeper, monastery, gesture, and cave, should be worshipped, contemplated and known by means of (the deity's) energy, in accord with the Kula liturgy (krama) along with him (the lord who is) mounted on the wheel of the aggregate of all the energies.[2]

4) Kāmarūpa: Then (after that comes the fourth sacred seat which) is in the locus of the heart and is surrounded by eight energies, namely Mohā, Āvṛtā, Prakāśyā, Kiraṇā, Rāgavatī, Hṛṣṭā, Puṣṭī, and Krodhā. One should know that it is located in the Wheel of the Heart surrounded by (this) group of energies set around it anticlockwise.[3] (Brilliant) like the rising sun, its purpose is the emanation of the (many) diverse and true Yoginīs by means of (the energy) who (is full of the) attachment and passion (kāma) that comes from the joy of the heart (generated) by the countless energies of (the divine) will

---

[1] *randhrasthāne śrījālandharapīṭhaṁ [kh: -jālaṁndha-] vahnijvālopaśobhitaṁ dedīpyantaṁ vaḍavānalaprajvalantaṁ [g: -lanta + vaḍavānalaprajvalanta] visphuliṅgākārasvarūpeṇa [kh: -limṅgā-;] | śrīcakrīśanāthacakravartī [kh: -cakrīśa * * cakravartti; g: -vartti] cakramadhye svajñānasya jñānaśaktyārūḍho [g: svajñānasvaśaktyā-] nānāyoginīvyūhaparivṛtena ṣoḍaśa-kalālaṅkṛto | vṛkṣa-valī-pālaka-śmaśāna-maṭha-mudrā-guhāparivṛtaṁ [kh: -smasānamaṭhamūdrā-] dedīpyantaṁ [kh: * dīpyantaṁ] | randhrasthāne [kh: -sthānaṁ] dvitīyaṁ [kh: dvitīya] pīṭhaṁ [kh: pīṭha] śaktyā [kh: missingi] jñātavyam iti ||*

[2] *kaṇṭhasthāne [g: -sthāna] pūrṇenduraśmisaṁkāśā [kh g: -rasmi-] prakāśayati jyotsnā svarūpeṇa amṛtapravāhāhlādanārthaṁ [kh: amṛtāhlādanārthaṁ; g: amṛto- -rtha] nānāsṛṣṭihetvarthe [kh: -hetverthe] ṣoḍaśakalāparivṛtena | śrīṣaṣṭhīśanāthacakravartī [kh: -śa * * cakravartti; g: -cakravartti] cakramadhye [kh: -mava] sthitaḥ [kh: sthitaṁ; g: sthita] kriyāśaktyārūḍho [kh: krīyā-; g: -rūḍhā] nānāyoginīvyūhaparivṛtaḥ [kh, g: -vṛtena] | tena [missing in all MSs] vṛkṣa-śmaśāna-pālaka-vallī-maṭha-mudrāguhānānābhedaprakāreṇa śaktyā [all MSs: sṛjantyā] sakalakalāvyūhacakrā-rūḍheṇa [kh: -rūḍhye; g: -ḍhe ] yaṣṭavyaṁ [kh, g: yaṣṭavyā] dhyātavyaṁ [kh, g: -vyā] kulakrameṇa jñātavyaṁ [kh: -vyāṁ; g: -vyā] tṛtīyaṁ [kh, g: tṛtīya] pīṭham [ch: pīpam] iti ||

[3] *tato hṛdayasthāne [kh: hṛtsthāne] cāṣṭakalāparivṛtam [g: coṣṭa-] iti || mohāvṛtā [kh: namocyutā; gh: māhovṛtā] prakāśyā [kh: prakāsya] kiraṇā rāgavatī [kh: -vati] hṛṣṭā puṣṭī [kh: puṣṭi] krodhā ceti [kh: -vanti] || iti kalāvyūhaparivṛtaṁ [kh: -vṛtā; g: -vṛto] hṛccakre [c: -cakre] vāmāvartakrameṇa [kh: * * * krameṇa] jñātavyam |*

(kāmakalā) in order to (emanate) the many and diverse forms of creation (racanā).[1] The venerable Kāmānanda is the emperor in the middle of the Wheel; sustained by the venerable Kāmavatī (the energy of passion) as (his) lordship, in the midst of all the troupes of Yoginīs, (he) generates light with a yellow and red lustre like that of (a freshly) cut sapphire (vaiḍurya). (The seat) is surrounded by the tree, creeper, monastery, gesture and cave. One should know (this), the fourth sacred seat, as emanation by means of the (energy of the deity that) emanates in many ways (the creatures) born of eggs, sweat, seeds and wombs.[2]

The Role of the Sacred Seats in the Teachings of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Now we have cleared the ground by selectively examining some examples of the descriptions of the sacred seats and their function as receptacles of symbolic ascriptions in the practice and doctrine of the early Kubjikā tradition, we move on to our own text. The Kumārikākhaṇḍa displays most of the many new developments that took place after the revelation of the KMT including those concerning the sacred seats. Nonetheless, it maintains a link with the early tradition. This is most evident in chapters three to six of our text, which deal with how the main sacred seats and the other sacred sites were established. But although the seats are the same five described in the KMT and its expansions, their contents and the beings who inhabit them are quite different.

We may conveniently begin our overview of the role of the sacred seats in the complex Tantric system of the KuKh with an analysis of their contents presented in chapter six of the KuKh.[3] These are summarized in the following table.

---

[1] udayādityasannibhaṁ anekakāmakalāhṛdayāhlādakāmarāgavatyā [kh: -kāmārāga-] prabhinna-sadyoginisṛjanārthaṁ [kh: ṣaḍyoni- -rtha; g: ṣaṭyogini-] nānāvicitraracanārthahetave [kh: -rthaṁhetau; g: -rthaṁ-]

[2] śrīkāmānandaś [kh, g: -nanda] cakramadhye cakravartī [all MSs: -varti] prabhutvena śrīkāmavatyādhiṣṭhitena [kh: śrīkāmāvatyādhiṣṭitena] sakalayoginīvyūhamadhyasthitena pītāruṇa-cchaviṁ [all MSs: -vi] bhinnavaiḍūryam [kh: vaidūryyabhinnam; g: – vaiḍuryabhinnam] iva prakāśam utpādayati [kh g: prakāśotpādayanti]* | vṛkṣa-vallī-maṭha-mudrā-guhāparivṛta-nānāprakāreṇa sṛjantyā sṛṣṭirūpeṇa [g: + śrībhairavabharayāmutpādayanti] aṇḍaja-svedaja– udbhij-jarāyujān [kh: -sveḍaja – udbhīja; g: – udbhujaṁ; all MSs: -jaśceti] iti [g: nāsti] caturthapīṭhaṁ [ch: -pīṭha] jñātavyam iti ||

The locations of the sacred seats in the body noted elsewhere in the ŚM are different. They are: 1) heart, 2) navel, 3) the two breasts, and 4) the pit of the throat. This discrepancy is one of several signs that the commentary on the Saṁvartāsūtra was inserted into the text of the ŚM after its initial redaction.

5. Table of the Sacred Seats according to Chapter Six of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred Seats	Oḍḍiyāna (OṀ)	Jālandhara	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa	Tisra
Goddesses	Kubjikā/ Khageśī	Cāmuṇḍā/ Jālā/ Siddha-yoginī	Samarī/ Akṣaciñciṇī	Maṅgalāvvā	Mātaṅgī
Gods	Khageśa	Śavara	?	?	Mātaṅgīśa
Siddhas	Oḍīśa	Caryādeva	Ṣaṣṭhadeva	Mitradeva	*
Colours	?	Red	Yellow	White	*
Secret Seats	?	Puṣpa	Gupta	Ucchuṣma/ Koṁkaṇā	*
Sacred Seats	Oḍḍiyāna (OṀ)	Jālandhara	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa	Tisra
Trees	3 Trees – Vellaka the third	Bilva	?	Kadamba	*
Gestures[1]	Khecarī	Kārālā	Padma	Yoni	Kadambinī
Cremation Grounds	Karavīra	Lakuṭa	Uḍḍāmara	Aṭavīmukha	*
Guardians of the Cremation Grounds	Yogeśvara	?	Vikṛtānana	Śaṅkhapāla	*
Fields	?	Vīrakṣetra	?	Kulakaula	*
50 Attendants	Rudras	Vīras	Bhairavas	Rasasiddhas	*
Female Servants	Khararā Gararā Rarā	Veśyā Muṇḍinī Kaivartī	Khaṭṭikī Kaṇḍukī Rajakī	Śilpinī Cakriṇī Mātaṅginī	*
Maids (cellakā)	-	Lolā Vicitrā Bhābhūtī	Vijayā Damanā Mahimā	Sunandinī Bhadrā Cchiñcchā	*
Male Servants	Kubera, Khagama, Karbura	Kallola Kṛkara Kāmeśvara	Vikrama Ḍobika Sadya	Tāra Vajradhara Kula	*

---

hṛnnābhau [kh g: -nābhi] stanayoś [kh: stanayā; g: stanaye] cobhau kaṇṭhakūpāntimaṁ [kh g: -kupāṁtimaṁ] priye ||
jñātavyaṁ dehamadhye [kh: -madhyan] tu pūjitaṁ bhuktimuktidaṁ [kh: bhuktidaṁ padaṁ] |
ŚM 4/118cd-119ab.

[3] KuKh 6/6-212ab.

[1] These gestures are also listed in KuKh 46/14cd-15. They are the same except Khecarī is replaced by Ghaṭamudrā. See table 12 below p. 633 where the additional features of the sacred seats described in KuKh 46/2-26 are noted.

Ṛṣis	Twenty	Twelve	Ten	Eight	*
Ages[1]	Kṛta	Tretā	Dvāpara	Kali	Middle or End of Kali
Measures	3	2	1	½	*
Locations in Triangle	Middle	Right	Left	Front	End of the Twelve

We notice a number of features of this configuration. First of all we observe that the goddess in each seat is a Śavarī and the god a Śavara. The Śavaras are one of a number of tribes who are commonly associated with the deities, major and minor, in many Tantric traditions of this sort, both Śaiva and Buddhist. Implicit in these associations is that these deities, in this case those of the sacred seats, are related to tribal ones. However, the relationship is typological, not direct, as would be the case if they had been simply directly assimilated from tribal religions. Even so, it is a notable fact that in the outer world many of the sites the Tantras consider to be sacred in which goddesses and Tantric deities are worshipped are, in fact, located in tribal areas.[2]

The implicit, idealized representation of tribal culture in this way is set in apposition to the Vedic by the presence of Vedic Ṛṣis in the goddess's retinue in each seat. Ṛṣis are commonly part of the Kaula assemblies just as they commonly said to be in both Tantras and Purāṇas a part of Śiva's or Bhairava's retinue on mountain Kailāśa along with numerous other saints, supernatural beings and deities, great and small. In one description of an assembly of Yoginīs (yoginīcakra), they are portrayed as singing the Kulāgama, just as they did the Vedas:

> The Kaulika assembly (cakra), made up of (initiates) born into the Kula, is worshipped in this way. It is done with the power (of a state of consciousness) free of thought constructs and so one should not reflect (on whether one is making pure or impure offerings). Brahmā and the other Ṛṣis are there intent on spiritual practice (paricaryā). Some of them dance and sing, some of them desire sex, some play, some are delighted with the fun, some who are experts in the Kulāgama recite (it) sweetly.[3]

---

[1] Trisrota, the sacred sea of the future, is said to appear at the end of the Age of Strife (KuKh 6/68cd-69ab, 183cd-184ab). This implies that Kāmarūpa and the teachings that come from it appeared in the beginning of the Age. However, in one place, at least, we are told that the seats appeared in the world at the end of their respective Ages (ibid. 28/136). Cf. note to KuKh 1/2.

[2] We shall have occasion to discuss these matters in another publication.

[3] tena taṁ pūjitaṁ cakraṁ kaulikaṁ [k, kh, gh: kaulikaḥ] kulajātmakam ||
nirvikalpaprabhāvena [k, kh, gh: nirvikalpaḥ-] vicāraṁ [kh: viccāraṁ] naiva kārayet |

The link the Kubjikā tradition seeks to maintain with the Vedic is exemplified in other actualisations of the paradigm. For example, the four seats are associated with the four Vedas,[1] implying that they also originated from them. Thus, the goddess who descends into each seat is portrayed as singing one of the Vedas.[2] The image, even if evidently only an ideal one, is nonetheless striking. Here we have Vedic Ṛṣis worshipping tribal gods! However strange this may seem, it is not totally out of consonance with reality. In villages all over India Brahmins participate actively in their own way, in local folk cults, and must have also done so in the past.

The other attendants of the goddess reinforce this composite image belying sharp distinctions between 'sanskritic' and 'non-sanskritic'. In this presentation of the sacred seats, we find several other types of attendants apart from the forty Ṛṣis. There are fifty Rudras, Vīras, Bhairavas and Rasasiddhas. The first three are generic names of the gods who preside over the letters of the alphabet. Concretely, the names of the first group – that of the Rudras – correspond to those of the fifty gods who govern the letters of the 'male' alphabet technically called Śabdarāśi – the Assembly of Sounds.[3] We may assume, therefore, that they are all alphabet deities replicated in each seat. Nine of the twelve female servants (three in each of the first four seats), are low-caste women who we find, in other contexts, embody the Mothers (mātṛkā). The maids (cellakā) are Yoginīs and the servants their male counterparts. These replace the spiritual 'sons' and 'daughters' the goddess generates and the guardians she appoints in the sacred seats listed in the KMT. According to the ṢSS the sons of the goddess each have a Śakti. These Śaktis are the goddesses who govern the letters of the 'female' alphabet called Mālinī.[4] Thus the setup in the KuKh seems to have been partly inspired by the idea of mirroring the earlier one. At any rate, the sacred sonic dimension of the seats is evident. The seats are not only located in the goddess's Triangle, they also correspond to 'measures' (mātrā) of the utterance of mantra which extends from the audible sound up through to the higher spheres of the energies of Speech to the End of the Twelve where the seat Tisra is located.

The eight seats described in the YKh[5] include male servants (there called ceṣṭakas, not praticārakas as here) and female attendants. In the YKh the latter

---

kecin [k, kh, gh: kerci] nṛtyanti gāyanti kecin maithunalālasāḥ ||
kecit [k, kh, gh: keciṁ] krīḍanti tatrasthāḥ [k, kh, gh: -sthā] kecid vinodaharṣitāḥ |
paṭhanti kecin madhuraṁ [k, kh, gh: maṁdhuraṁ] kulāgamaviśāradāḥ || brahmādyā ṛṣayas tatra paricaryāparāḥ [k, kh, gh: -rā] sthitāḥ | YKh (1) 5/51cd-54ab.

[1] KuKh 44/17cd-19ab.

[2] See note to KuKh 44/17cd-19ab.

[3] Chapter 19 of the KuKh deals with Śabdarāśi.

[4] These are listed below in appendix II.

[5] See below, p. 697 ff..

are called 'dūtīs' – the name also given to the partner in rites of union. In other set-ups such attendants are not normally listed. Another unusual feature of this setup is the addition of secret seats,[1] but this has not been done very systematically. One 'secret' seat is missing and only one 'secret' Siddha is mentioned. The purpose of this addition seems to be to integrate Koṅkaṇa into the scheme, not an entire set of alternative seats. The centre of the later development of the Kubjikā tradition, Koṅkaṇa is linked in this way with Kāmarūpa, the seat in which the teachings are propagated in this Age.

The presence of a kṣetrapāla – 'Guardian of the Field' – is standard in sacred sites in general. He is a kind of Bhairava. He is often accompanied by Vaṭuka – 'the Boy' who is a form of Skanda, the 'son of the goddess' (devīputra).[2] Skanda, is intimately related to the Mothers who are the original leaders (nāyikā) of the hosts of Yoginīs. These two, along with Yoginīs and ghosts (bhūta), are regularly worshipped in Kaula rites with animal sacrifice (bali) or a substitute. In this case, the guardian of the seat is linked to the cremation ground in each seat. More often in the Kubjikā sources he is not. The Kubjikā cult, which is relatively more domesticated with respect to its forerunners, does not stress the importance of the cremation ground as a place to practice and encounter supernatural beings, as do its most closely related predecessors and fellow cults. This is especially the case in the early phase of its development. Thus the absence of any reference to cremation grounds in the sacred seats described in the KMT and in the early KRU. Subsequently, inevitably, the culture of the cremation ground re-affirms its presence, especially in the MBT and particularly in the YKh. In this case this is apparent by the presence of cremation grounds in the sacred seats. We have noted that the Kālīkrama sources invariably associate the cremation ground called Karavīra with Oḍḍiyāna, the 'northern seat' (uttarapīṭha) where the Kālīkrama is believed to have been originally revealed.[3] The same association echoed here is one of many signs of the considerable and growing influence the Kālīkrama had on the Kubjikā cult in the course of its development.

Like the cremation ground, the remaining 'concrete' contents of the seats in this scheme are not mentioned in the KMT's presentation of the seats. Trees are associated with the first eight of a set of twenty-four places listed in chapter twenty-two of the KMT.[4] These are signs that the goddesses in these places are

---

[1] Cf. table 5 below on p. 627 based on chapter 42 of the KuKh.

[2] The visualized forms of kṣetrapāla and Vaṭuka are described in KuKh 47/1-19.

[3] See above, p. 572.

[4] KMT 22/23-46. See Goudriaan and Schoterman 1988: 125-126 for a table of the contents of the twenty-four seats. Note that the four main seats are not amongst them. The first eight places are those normally associated with the Eight Mothers. They are not mentioned in this context in the KMT. Moreover, the sequential order of these eight places is not the same as the one we find when these places are associated with the Mothers. Nonetheless, the presence of eight kinds of trees in also vegetation spirits as were their popular folk precursors, the Yakṣiṇīs. Some trees are especially loaded with symbolic significance. Foremost are the Tamarind and the Kadamba trees in which Kubjikā herself resides. In the later tradition this is represented by identifying her seed-syllable, placed in the centre of the maṇḍala, with these trees. The KuKh presents the Bilva, along with these two trees, as symbols of a triad of metaphysical principles and states and relates them to the Triangle.[1]

In the broad, most common sense of the term, a 'mudrā' is a gesture made by placing the hands and fingers into various positions in the course of rituals. It normally accompanies a mantra, which is its vocalic equivalent (vācakī mudrā), and sometimes a bodily posture (kāyāmudrā). One is reminded of the hand gestures that accompany the recitation of the Vedas.[2] The formation of these gestures is called 'bandhana' in Sanskrit, which literally means 'binding'. The 'binding' of the fingers and hands together is their placement (racanā) in the required manner. At the same time these gestures serve to 'bind' or 'fix' the energy of the mantras to which they correspond, hence the application of the other meaning of the word 'mudrā', namely 'seal' or 'stamp'. [3] Although not all the mantras uttered in the course of a ritual are accompanied by a corresponding gesture, many are, and so are commonly formed (baddha lit. 'bound') in quick succession. In this context, the gestures are, like the other constituents of the seats, channels through which the deity's energy flows and operates. The goddess, as pure spiritual energy, is herself Mudrā – Gesture. Her residence is the Hermitage or Maṇḍala of Gesture, (mudrā – āśrama/maṇḍala).[4] As this pure energy, the goddess is Khecarī – the Skyfaring Bird Goddess – Khageśī, who, as the fundamental energy of all gestures, is the supreme one. Reflecting in the ultimate sense the outer concomitance of gesture and mantra, the goddess possesses these two aspects – dynamic and sonic. The KMT identifies the latter with Mālinī in the following passage drawn from the TS in which 'mudrā' in this higher sense is defined: the first eight seats marks them off from the rest. It appears that this is an early, standard configuration of sacred sites that developed at a time when the standard associations of the first eight places with the Eight Mothers, although an early one, was not yet universally established. See above, p. 540 ff..

---

[1] See note to KuKh 20/31-32, and ibid. 46/20-21ab.

[2] Vedic schools (śākhā) place various degrees of emphasis on the use and importance of the movement of the hands to mark inflexion and intonation of the Vedic mantras. The followers of the Śukla Yajurveda, for example, who are much more numerous in the North than the South, gesticulate a great deal. Their southern counterparts who follow the Kṛṣṇa Yajurveda consider this practice to be unessential and even deprecate it, although it is highly systematic and has a long tradition.

[3] Concerning mudrā see notes to KuKh 3/11-12 and 3/48.

[4] See note to KuKh 3/57.

> Gesture is said to be Power (śakti). It will melt what has been sealed (mudrita).[1] Therefore, O Supreme Goddess, it is called and said to be 'mudrā'. The 'sealed' is said to be what has been hidden by the power of consciousness which is both inferior and supreme. O fair lady, (from this point of view) Gesture is said to be that due to which one does not know (reality). As long as the soul is bound by the impurity of ignorance, he does not know the Supreme Self and Māyā operates. When the darkness has been rent asunder and a man sees oneness, (that power) is then called 'supreme' and it brings about liberation from bondage. That supreme power is one and she exists by Śiva's will. She frees from the (influence of malevolent) planets etc and she melts the currents of the fetters. The energies are called gestures (mudrā) because (they) release (mocana) and melt (drāvaṇa). Flight always (occurs) by means of the Path of the Skyfarers, which is the elevated state (ūrdhvabhāva). (That energy) is called the Skyfarer because she moves all living being (by this Path). In the supreme state she should be known to be one and she is also said to be threefold. Assuming the form of letters, she is will, knowledge and action. Divided into fifty (letters), she is said to be one. Complete in all her limbs and parts, she abides in the form of (the alphabet) beginning with Na and ending with Pha, having threaded together (mālayitvā) the universe. Thus she is called Mālinī. O Supreme Goddess, the 70 billion mantras that are said to be immeasurable, (each) in their own Tantra (svatantrastha),[2] are all sealed (with the Gesture). Thus she is called Gesture and bestows immediate realisation.[3]

The 'threefold' nature of mudrā is represented by the three main *mudrā*s described in the TS, and in the KMT which draws from it. Each one being derived from Khecarīmudrā and aspects of it, they are called Yoni, Padma and Triśikhā, each of which also has their three aspects. One is the outer gesture. The second, subtle one, is related to the activity of the energy of the vital breath. The third, supreme one, is metaphysical. They need not be described here.[4] It is sufficient in this context to note that the three gestures represent states of empowerment. Guided by the same notion, the Kashmiri Kālīkrama similarly associates a series of mudrās with the five spheres of the unfolding dynamism (krama) of [1] mudrā śaktir iti khyātā mudritaṁ drāvayiṣyati KMT 6/76ab.

---

[2] The expression 'svatantrasthās' may equally be an adjective qualifying mantras meaning 'independent'.

[3] KMT 6/76-86ab = TS 8/76cd-86ab.

[4] For an example, see note to KuKh 13/98cd-99 for a description of the third aspect of Yonimudrā.

consciousness. In the Kubjikā tradition their association with the sacred seats implies this. Indeed, in this configuration we find three out of the four main ones related to separate seats. One wonders whether the odd one out – Kārālā, which is associated with Jālandhara – may not be Triśikhāmudrā.

The features of the seats presented in chapter six of our text are part of a more extensive model to which we may now turn our attention. We have seen that each of the seats described in the commentary on the Saṁvartāsūtra in the first chapter of the ŚM are said to have a tree, creeper, cremation ground, guardian, monastery, gesture, and cave that are emanated together with the seats by the deity's energy of which they are aspects. The contents of the seats are not elaborated in this way in the KMT, the ṢSS or the rest of the ŚM, which we may take to be one of several indications that this passage is an interpolation. The most elaborate form of this model is found in the YKh and is outlined further ahead. Perhaps this is where it appears for the first time. Such features are commonly transferred from one Tantra to another as a Tantric text develops in the hands of its redactors.

If the scheme in the YKh is not the first example of this model, the other most likely candidate is found in chapter ten of the KRU, which is an early Tantra of the Kubjikā corpus. There the seats constitute the penultimate group of a Krama, which although it consists, as usual, of six groups of mantras, is very unusual in that it is configured into groups of 5-6-7-5-4-1. The unit at the end consists solely of Mātaṅgapīṭha which symbolizes, as it normally does, the transcendent that is portrayed in this case as the condition of Stillness (nirācāra). It is appropriately worshipped in the western direction, the one that is emblematic of the Kubjikā tradition and the plane of existence from which it issues forth and to which it leads. Beyond this world, this seat is governed directly by the goddess who assumes the form of Mātaṅgī – the Sweeper – and resides there along with her consort.[1] We may assume that the four sacred seats that make up the preceding [1] The venerable (sacred seat called) Mātaṅga is Stillness (nirācāra) and should be worshipped on the head. It has one form and is associated with Mātaṅgī and Vīra. It has the Seed of Power (AIṀ) and should be worshipped in the west. It is associated with the Siddha called Vaṭapura, whose power is astonishing.

---

śrīmātaṅgaṁ [g: -ṅga] nirācāraṁ mūrdhni [g: mūrddhni] deśe prapūjayet |
ekākāreṇa sampannaṁ mātaṅgīvīrasaṁyutam ||
pūjyaṁ vāruṇadigbhāge śaktibījasamanvitam |
yuktaṁ [g: muktaṁ] vaṭapurākhyena [kh: -khye(ra)] siddhenādbhutatejasā || KRU 10/70-71.

The presence here of Vaṭapura is interesting. A Siddha by this name is the fifth of the sixteen Siddhas who are considered to be the third generation of teachers after the Siddhas of the main sacred seats.

unit represent aspects of the condition that leads to this transcendent seat and the liberated state it enshrines.

In this set-up each of the four sacred seats corresponds to a cosmic age and has a tree, creeper, cave, monastery (maṭha), goddess, Siddha, and guardian of the field.[1] The layout can be tabulated as follows.

6. The Four Sacred Seats according to Chapter Ten the Kularatnoddyota

Pīṭhas (locations)	Oḍḍiyāna	Jālandhara	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa
Pīṭhas (types)[2]	Mudrā	Maṇḍala	Mudrā	Vidyā
Mothers	Oḍḍāmbā	Jālāmbā	Pūrṇāmbā	Kāmeśvarī
Goddesses	Bhaṭṭadevī	Jayantikā	Śakunī	Kumārikā
Siddhas	Uḍḍīśa	Caryādeva	Ṣaṣṭhanātha	Mitrānanda
Caves	Kadamba	Śrīśilāśekhara	Campakā	Kāma
Mudrās	Kadamba	Manthāna	Campakā /Śaṅkha	Kāmaguhā / Siddha
Kula Trees	Kadamba	Karañja	Kaha	Ciñciṇī
Maṭhas	Anādi	Manthāna	Śaṅkha	Siddha
Vallis	Anādimudrā	Devadālī[3]	Viṣṇukrānta	Śakravāruṇī
Guardians	Oghāmbu	Jaṭila	Kulavaṭu	Kambala
Yugas	Kṛta	Tretā	(Dvāpara)	Kali
Devas	Ādhāra/ Mahānanda	Cakrīśa	Kuraṅgīśa /Ṣaṣṭhanātha	Madāndha
Devīs	Raktā/ Kujā	?	Caṇḍākṣī/ Kujā	Kubjikā

In this presentation fourteen variables are linked to each seat. An omission we have noted already is the cremation ground. On the other hand we notice a few extra features with respect to the presentation in chapter six of the KuKh. One is the cave linked to each seat. The model for this is, no doubt, the cave in which the goddess assumed the form of a Liṅga and received the Command. Called the Kadamba Cave in this scheme, as in others, it is appropriately linked to the First Seat. According to the YKh and other sources,[4] the cave in the First Seat is called Śṛṅgāta – the Water Chestnut – that, due to its shape, is a common name for the goddess's Triangle, which is commonly symbolized by a cave.

---

[1] These seats are described in KRU 10/56cd-69.
[2] Cf. above, p. 578.
[3] MS G reads Devadāru.
[4] See below, p. 675 ff, for a table of the seats described in the YKh.

Another extra feature in this and other similar presentations is the presence of a monastery (maṭha) in the seats. The Tantras were studied, and probably a good many were redacted, in monasteries. It makes sense, therefore, that they are amongst the symbolic features of the main sacred seats where the original transmissions of the teachings are said to have taken place. The sacred creeper worshipped in the seats reinforces their vigorous vegetal symbolism represented by the presence of the sacred trees. This is more evident in the eight seats described in the YKh, which also include a sacred tendril, root and even a Yakṣiṇī, a female vegetal spirit. A more complete example of this model is found in the commentary on the ṢSS. On the basis of hardly more than a hint in the ṢSS, it outlines a scheme of sixteen parts for each seat, conscious, no doubt, that this is an ideal number.[1] The commentary normally limits itself to do no more than explain what is presented in the text. This is one of the few instances it adds substantially to its contents. Presumably this is because when it was written the presentation of the features of the seats on this model was the accepted norm.

The distinction made between the Mother (ambā) of the seat and the resident goddess (devī) and that between the Lord (nātha) and the god (deva), reflects a historical development. The Mother and Lord derive their names simply from that of the seat they govern. The goddesses of the seats are those Kubjikā meets there in the course of her tour described in the first chapters of the KMT. The names of their male counterparts are not the same as those listed there. But they do coincide with those in the version found in the ṢSS.[2] We notice that they occasionally appear, as the goddesses do, in the mantras invoking the sacred seats in some of the numerous forms of the Krama.[3] The goddesses are a carry-over from the cult of the BY in which they embody syllables of the mantra of

---

[1] All the ṢSS says is:

(One should worship) the sacred seats, the lords of the sacred seats, the Siddhas, and the mothers of the sacred seats associated with the Traditions (pīṭhāvvāmnāya).

The commentary simply states that: '(this is what is meant by saying that they are) `associated with the Traditions' and so there are sixteen parts (pada) for each sacred seat.' It then goes on to list these sixteen 'parts' (pada) in each seat.

pīṭhāḥ [k kh: pīṭhā] pīṭhādhipāḥ siddhāḥ [k kh: siddhā] pīṭhāvvāmnāyasaṁyutāḥ [k: pīṭhāṁvā-; k kh: -tā] || ṢSS 29/64cd (= KMT 19/109ab).

Commentary: ity āmnāyasaṁyutāḥ [kh: iti āmnāya-] || yena pratipīṭhasya ṣoḍaśapadā bhavanti.

[2] Although not exactly the same, it is clear that the same set is meant. In ṢSS 1/53ff. they are: Oḍḍiyāna: Ādhārīśa; Jālandhara: Kuṇḍalīśa; Pūrṇagiri: Kuraṅgīśa and Kāmarūpa: Cakrānanda. Schoterman suggests that these names, all of which end with '-ānanda', may be the secret names (guptanāma) of the four Siddhas most commonly associated with the first four secret seats. See below, table 28 on p. 722.

[3] See below appendix VIII and IX to vol. 3 part 2 of the edition and translation, where various forms of the Krama are presented.

Caṇḍākāpālinī.[1] Although the names of the goddesses in the four seats according to the ṢSS differ, the commentary points out that these are only alternative names for these ones.[2] Did the redactor of the ṢSS understand these, as the commentator implicitly suggests, to be aspects of Caṇḍākāpālinī?

Finally we notice that this scheme, presented in the table below, relates the Yuganāthas to the four seats. The Yuganāthas are the teachers who are worshipped as the original propagators of Kaulism in the four Ages. As the seats are founded in the four Ages and the teachings of that Age are transmitted from there, their presence implies that the Kaulism they taught was essentially that of the Kubjikā tradition. Moreover, just as Matsyendranātha and his disciples propagated the previous Kaula tradition (pūrvāmnāya) with respect to the subsequent (paścima) one of the goddess Kubjikā in this Age, the same took place in the previous Ages in the same sacred seats.

7. Table of the Contents of the Four Sacred Seats according to the Commentary on Chapter Twenty-nine of the Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṁhitā.

Sacred Seats	Oḍiyāna	Jālandhara	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa
Seats of Scripture	Mudrāpīṭha	Maṇḍala	Mantra	Vidyā
Lords (nātha)	Oḍḍīśa	Jālīśa	Pūrṇīśa	Kāmeśa
Mothers (ambā)	Oḍāmbā	Jvālāmbā	Pūrṇāmbā	Kāmāmbā
Gods	Ādhārīśa	Cakrīśa	Kuraṅgeśa	Śrīmadandhrīśa
Goddesses	Raktā	Karālī	Caṇḍākṣī	Mahocchuṣmā
Monasteries (maṭha)	Śaṅkha	Jyoti	Yakṣiṇī	Anāmaya

[1] See Sanderson 1988: 672.

[2] One should (also) worship with effort the goddess in the middle of the sacred seats accompanied by the four goddesses and Siddhas. Worship the goddesses Caṇḍeśī, Mahācaṇḍā, Cāṇḍālī, and Caṇḍikā to the sides (of the goddess) ranging from the east to the north.

Commentary: Who are those (four)? (They are) Ādhārīśa and the rest along with the four, the goddess Raktā and the rest. They are present here with a different name, that is, as Caṇḍeśī, Mahācaṇḍā, Caṇḍālī, and Caṇḍikā. These are the goddesses. Four directions pertain to these goddesses, namely, the east, south, west, and north. The reference to the directions (implies) a reference to the four sacred seats.

pīṭhamadhyagatā devī catuḥsiddhasamanvitā |
caturdevīsamāyuktā pūjanīyā prayatnataḥ ||
caṇḍeśī ca mahācaṇḍā caṇḍālī caṇḍikā tathā |
pūrvādi cottarāntā vai devyaḥ pārśvagatā yajet ||
(vyākhyā) ke te || ādharīśādayaḥ [kh: ādhārīśā-] catus [k kh: catuḥ] tathā raktādevyādayaś catvāraḥ || atra punaḥ nāmāntareṇa tiṣṭhanti yathā caṇḍeśī [kh: caṇḍeśā] 1 mahācaṇḍā 2 caṇḍālī 3 caṇḍikā 4 iti devyaḥ || tāsāṁ [k kh: + tāsāṁ] devīnāṁ diśaś catvāraḥ yathā pūrvadakṣiṇapaścimottarāḥ || *iti diśāgrahaṇena [kh: -ne ] catuṣpīṭhagrahaṇaṁ || ṢSS 29/65-66 and commentary.

Trees	Kadamba	Bilva	Ciñca	Kaṭāha
Creepers	Indravāriṇī	Devadāyī	Cakrāṅkitā	Aparājitā
Gestures	Khecarī	Bhaga	Triśikhā	Hastamudrā
Caves	Kadamba	Nirvāṇa	Siddha	Manodbhava
Cremation grounds	Karavīra	Laguḍa	Dīpa	Bhayāvaha
Vaṭukas	Siṁha	Kapila	Piṅgala	Kṛśodara
Guardians	Agnimukha	Agnimukha (?)	Pūrṇīśa	Kāmeśa
Ages	Kṛta	Tretā	Dvāpara	Kali
Lords of the Ages (Yuganātha)	Khagendra	Kūrma	Meṣa	Matsyendra
Mothers of the Lords of the Ages	Vijāmbā	Maṅgalāmbā	Kāmamaṅgalā	Koṅkaṇāmbā

We find several examples of this model of the features of the seats in our sources, although none of them coincide exactly in every detail. One is the implicit presentation of the four seats in their mantras in one of the Kramas. This is an interesting example because we find many features are common with those of the first four seats in the system of eight seats taught in the YKh, which we shall have occasion to examine further ahead.[1]

Triads, Tetrads, and Groups of Six Pentads

The triad is a prominent paradigm in the symbolic system of the Kubjikā Tantras. One of the main forms in which it appears is as the three Transmissions (krama) and the Siddhas who propagated them in their three sacred seats. We have seen that it is constantly liable to adjustment in order to produce a more stable fourfold one. Even so, the triadic model repeatedly re-emerges, echoing the presence of one of the major inputs into the Kubjikā cult, the triadic system of the Trika Tantras. This is clearly evident in chapter twenty of our text which deals with the Triple Vidyā – Parā, Parāparā and Aparā – the classic Trika triad of goddesses. The chapter concludes with a list of triads related to the three sacred seats, Oḍḍiyāna, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa, thus integrating Trika doctrine into that of the Kubjikā Tantras.[2]

The classic grouping into four seats is the one most commonly projected into the goddess's Triangle. Centred on a description of this Triangle, the three versions of the Root Sūtra in chapters 26, 38 and 42 outline its features. The reader is referred to the text and notes for a detailed account. Here we observe the manner the seats are presented in these three versions. The version in chapter 42 refers to only four sacred seats with which the following simple equations are made. Note particularly the so-called 'secret seats'; these correspond to the four categories of Bhairava Tantras,[1] implying that the sacred seats in Kubjikā's Triangle are their source.

[1] See below, table 23 on p. 673-674 where the two are compared.
[2] See note to KuKh 20/31-32 and cf. ibid. 39/60cd-62.

8. Table of the Four Sacred Seats according to Chapter Forty-two of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred seats	Locations in the triangle	Meta-physical locations	Secret seats	Natures	Accomplish-ments
Oḍḍiyāna	Centre	Energy	Māyā of Yogatantra	Haṁsa	*
Jālandhara	South	End of Sound	Vidyā	Solar / tejas	Knowledge
Pūrṇagiri	North	Mantra	Mantra	Lunar	Knowledge
Kāmarūpa	Front	Drop	Gesture	Brahmātattva	Body (piṇḍasiddhi)

The other two versions of the Root Sūtra present six sacred seats. Even so, we can still discern the initial, basic triadic and tetradic projections inspired by the Triangle described in the TS[2], which tends towards the fifth, transcendental, seat. The following table presents the triads equated with the three seats in chapter twenty-six.

9. Table of Three Sacred Seats according to Chapter Twenty-six of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Corners of the Triangle	Letters	Gods	Devī	Sacred seats	Places in the body	Bodily fluids	Channels
Right	A	Brahmā	Jyeṣṭhā	Jālandhara	Forehead	Semen	Iḍā
Left	K	Viṣṇu	Vāmā	Pūrṇagiri	Heart	Blood	Piṅgalā
Below	TH	Maheśvara	Raudrī	Kāmarūpa	Yoni	Kṛcchra	Suṣumṇā

These triads delineate the encompassing body of the goddess, which is wrapped around the Supreme Energy (parakalā) in the centre represented by the seat Oḍḍiyāna. The fifth seat, Tisra, is above the Triangle in the form of a Point (bindu) that contains all the energies of the Triangle of seats below. The Wisdom Sūtra, which follows the Root Sūtra in chapter 26 and comments on it, explains that these five correspond to: 1) Oḍḍiyāna – Bliss (ānanda), 2) Jālandhara – Drop of Bliss (ānandabindu), 3) Pūrṇagiri – the Imperishable (akṣara), 4) Kāmarūpa – the Supreme Energy (paramā), and 5) Tisra – (pure) Energy (kalā). In order to reach the more stable grouping of six that can be related to the sixfold Krama, these five are understood to be Kula pervaded by Kaula, the sixth, which consists of Śiva and Śakti.[1] Beyond Tisra, this is the seat called Candra or Koṅkaṇa.[2] This addition is, no doubt, the result of the movement of the tradition to this region of India where this version of the Root Sūtra was written. Indeed, we are told that this maṇḍala – the Yogapīṭha – has been explained (ākhyāta) in Koṅkaṇa.[3]

---

[1] See Dyczkowski 1988: 54-55 and 120.

[2] These groupings epitomized by the energies, Vāmā, Jyeṣṭhā, Raudrī and Ambikā are described in the first chapter of the TS, most of which is reproduced in chapters 40 and 41 of our text.

The same shift from triad to quaternary can also be observed in the cosmogony outlined in chapter 35 of our text. The goddess who is the embodiment of Śiva's will (icchā), the Divine Command, emerges out of her transcendental abode within the godhead. In this way the One becomes Śiva and his Energy from which issues the 'triple emanation (sṛṣṭi)'. When the goddess, as the text says, 'assumes three parts, the triple world is emitted in a moment'.[4] The creation of the world includes also that of all the sacred sites, which are emitted as are the hosts of living beings. Amongst them are the first three sacred seats Oḍḍiyāna, Pūrṇagiri, and Kāmarūpa along with a series of triads governed by Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Maheśvara. Through them the goddess brings about emanation and withdrawal of 'the triple universe, the most excellent City of the Triangle'.[5] In the centre is Kaulinī. The centre in this case is represented by an obscure seat named after the city of Ujjain. It seems that the intention was to avoid a fourth major seat in order to maintain the basic triad. The effort the redactor has put into this task illustrates the importance of the original triad and its instability. These and the correspondences discussed below can be tabulated as follows.

10. The Four Sacred Seats according to Chapter Thirty-five of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred Seats	Kāmarūpa	Pūrṇagiri	Oḍḍiyāna	Ujjain
Sides	Left	Right	Middle	Centre
Energies	Will	Action	Knowledge	* * *
Wheels	Self-supported	Anāhata	Command	Point
Parts of the Body	Lower	Middle	Upper
Yoginīs	Rākinī, Dākinī	Kākinī, Lākinī	Hākinī, Śākinī
Devīs	Vāmā	Jyeṣṭhā	Raudrī	* * *
Gods	Brahmā	Viṣṇu	Maheśvara
Channels	Iḍā	Piṅgalā	Śivā
Qualities	Sattva[6]	Rajas	Tamas

[1] KuKh 26/12cd-15.
[2] KuKh 38/2-3.
[3] KuKh 38/29.
[4] KuKh 35/9-15.
[5] KuKh 35/17.
[6] According to KuKh 39/35cd-36 Kāmākhya is sattva, Pūrṇagiri is rajas and Jālandhara is tamas. Oḍḍiyāna is there considered separately to be the 'mantric body' (piṇḍa) in the triple universe which is, presumably, identified with the other three seats.

The main topic of chapter 35 is the projection of the seats into the Six Wheels of the subtle body, each of which is governed by a Yoginī. However, although placing them in pairs in each seat implies this simple linear development of the Wheels from the three seats, two by two from each one, the correspondences are soon skewed. Further ahead in chapter 35, the Wheels (cakra) in the body are again presented in relation to the sacred seats. But there, without any apparent reason, the seats have again become the standard four. Moreover, although the text names only four seats, it refers to them as six.

The supreme state is symbolized in chapter 35 by the Island of the Moon, which is presumably in the End of the Twelve. It corresponds to the State Beyond the Fourth.[1] It oozes nectar and generates Oḍḍiyāna, which, as Unstruck Sound, is the Half Moon. Then the energy of the will that emerges from that travels down, opening a way for itself along the channel of Suṣumṇā to the palate from which the nectar drips into the body. The text does not say so, but we may presume that these are three separate seats. They are followed in descending order by the Wheel of Unstruck Sound (anāhata) in the heart corresponding to Jālandhara. Then comes the City of Jewels (maṇipura) in the navel. This is followed by Kāmarūpa in which the entire Triangle is located, it seems, in the Wheel of the Foundation (ādhāra) at the base of the spine.[2] According to chapter 11 of the KuKh,[3] the Wheels correspond to the seats as outlined in the following table.

11. Table of the Six Sacred Seats according to Chapter Eleven of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred Seats	Wheels	Locations
Oḍiyāṇa	Command	Between the eyebrows
Kāmākhya	Janmacakra	(Between anus and genitals)
Pūrṇagiri	Svādhiṣṭhāna	(Belly)
Jālandhara	Maṇipura	(Navel)
Tisra	Viśuddhi	(Throat)
Candra	Lambikā	Palate
	Anāmā	End of the Sixteen

A glance at the above table is enough to see that the layout in chapter 11, although similar, is not the same as the one in chapter 35. In the latter, the systems of Wheels and sacred seats are simply juxtaposed. Just as the seats are described without reference to the Wheels, the Wheels are also treated independently of them. Thus, somewhat clumsily, after describing the seats essentially as Wheels (although it declares that they are seats) the text proceeds in chapter 35 to outline

---

[1] Concerning this, the liberated state, in relation to the Wheels of the body, see note to KuKh 3/113.

[2] KuKh 35/35cd-47ab.

[3] KuKh 11/19-21ab.

the Six Wheels.[1] Chapter 36 then describes these Wheels in some detail. Here too there is no reference to the sacred seats. In chapter 39 the two schemes are related 'externally'. Four sacred seats are projected into the Triangle in the maṇḍala and the Six Wheels in the Hexagram that surrounds it.[2] This implies that the six parts of the Krama worshipped in the corners of the Hexagram can be projected into the Six Wheels. This is the most common scheme. The four sacred seats are linked to the progressive emanation of the parts of the Triangle associated with the goddess's seed-syllable AIṀ, which is technically called the 'emergence of the Yoni' (bhagodaya).[3]

Elsewhere the Six Wheels are related to the six lineages of teachers founded by the disciples of Matsyendranātha.[4] The later is the last of the Lords of the Ages (yuganātha) who established Kaulism in each of the four Ages. These four Lords of the Ages are easily and naturally linked to the four seats, which are commonly related to the four Ages.[5] In this way the seats are understood to be the places where all Kaulism, not just the Kubjikā tradition, originated. This scheme is found in the ṢSS (but not in the KMT or ŚM). The four Lords of the Ages are identified directly with the Siddhas in the four sacred seats by simply declaring them to be their alias. In this scheme, presented in the following table, we notice that, as in several other instances, Kāmarūpa is given precedence. In this case this is done by presenting it as the seat of the first (kṛta) Age. Oḍḍiyāna (here spelt Oḍyāna), which is normally privileged in this way, is displaced to the position of the seat of the present Age of Strife (kali), which is normally Kāmarūpa.[6]

[1] KuKh 35/47cd-54.
[2] KuKh 39/23.
[3] See, for example, KuKh 39/46. Also, KuKh 5/74cd-75ab and note.
[4] KuKh 39/68-71ab.
[5] Cf. above table on p. 126-127.
[6] Based on ṢSS 43/19-22ab and commentary.

12. Table of the Sacred Seats and the Lords of the Ages

Sacred Seats	Ages	Yuganāthas	Siddhas	Second Names of the Siddhas
Kāmarūpa	Kṛta	Khagendra	Mitranātha	Caryānātha
Jālandhara	Tretā	Kūrma	Caryānatha	Kuraṅgīśa
Pūrṇagiri	Dvāpara	Meṣa	Ṣaṣṭhanātha	Kuṇḍalīśa
Oḍyāna	Kali	Macchendra	Oḍḍīśa	Ādhāranātha

We find an interesting variant of this layout in chapter 43 of our text. Here the Siddhas of the four seats are identified with four of the Five Siddhas. The latter, according to the KMT, are aspects (aṁśa) Bhairava assumes when he enters the world to teach.[1] One would expect the Siddhas of the seats to be commonly identified in this way. Instead, the Five Siddhas usually figure as precursors of the Siddhas of the seats who taught before the seats were established. Possibly, then, the four Ages to which they are related in this scheme precede those of the current cycle. Another possibility is that each Age is understood to consist of four Ages. This would explain how all four Lords of the Ages are considered to be the disciples of Śrīkaṇṭha, the teacher in this Age of Strife.

Śrīkaṇṭha is an important and well known founder figure. He appears in the Mahābhārata as the form of Śiva who established Pāśupata Śaivism.[2] According to Abhinavagupta, this is the form of Śiva from which the five currents of Āgamic Śaivism originate.[3] The colophons of the version of the ŚM called Gorakṣasaṁhitā declare that the Kubjikā tradition (the Kādibheda) of the Kulakaulamata was brought down to earth by him.[4] Thus like the Siddhas of the previous Ages, Śrīkaṇṭha also had disciples. These were the Lords of the Ages who are said to be four aspects of the First Siddha who descend into the world in the last Age, each into a 'particular division'.[5] Related to one another and the sacred seats in this way, the first Kaula teachers are worshipped both in the inner Triangle of the maṇḍala and projected into the axis of the body.[6]

---

[1] KMT 3/94-100ab.
[2] See Dyczkowski 1988: 20.
[3] TĀ 37/13cd-17.
[4] Ibid. p. 191, note 231.
[5] KuKh 43/29-30.
[6] See KuKh 43/1-28.

13. Table of the Four Sacred Seats according to Chapter Forty-three of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred Seats	Ages	Siddhas	Types of Being	Disciples
Oḍḍiyāna	Kṛta	Sādākhya	Gods	Amara, Ajara, Oṁkāra, Amṛtodbhava
Jālandhara	Dvāpara	Śaṅkara	Siddhas	Aruṇa, Varuṇa, Varada, Sacava
Pūrṇagiri	Tretā	Piṅgala	Celestial musicians (Gandharva)	Vijaya, Vindhyanātha Mārtaṇḍa, Meṣa
Kāmarūpa	Kali	Śrīkaṇṭha	Men	Khagendra, Kūrma, Mīna, Macchendra

The Five Sacred Seats and the Five Elements

One of the most basic associations with the sacred seats in general and the five seats in particular are the Five Elements. In the following passage from YKh (1) the Elements are also implicitly adapted to the Triangle:

> Earth, Water, and Fire as well as Wind and Space – these are the five great sacred seats that give rise to Day and Night. (The seat named after) the syllable OṀ is the Earth Principle. Water is the venerable Pūrṇagiryaka. The Fire Principle is called Jāla. Wind is the venerable Kāmarūpaka. Space is said to be Tisra. The seats that have arisen from the Kula (the matrix of energies) are five. [. . .] Fire is above. Water is below. Slanted (to the side) above is Wind. Earth, in the middle, is the immobile Vidyā and Space is everywhere.[1]

The Elements, and hence in this context the sacred seats, are emblematic of a series of pentads well known to the Indian tradition as a whole. The five sensations linked to the Elements generate the five senses that perceive them to

---

[1] pṛthivy āpas [k, kh: āyas] tathā tejo vāyur ākāśam eva ca ׀ *pañcaite * mahāpīṭhā udayanti divāniśim [k, kh: -niśiṁ]* ׀׀
.okāraṁ [k, kh: uṁkāraṁ; gh: ukāraṁ] pṛthavītattvaṁ āpaḥ [k, gh: āya; kh: āpa] śrīpūrṇagiryakam ׀ tejastattvaṁ [k, kh, gh: stejas-] tu jālākhyaṁ [k, kh, gh: -kṣyaṁ] vāyuḥ [k, kh, gh: vāyu] śrīkāmarūpakam ׀׀ ākāśaṁ tisram ity uktaṁ [k, gh: tiśrīm itkektaṁ; kh: tiśrīm ity uktaṁ] pañca pīṭhāḥ [k, kh, gh: pīṭhā] kuloditāḥ ׀ [. . .] YKh (1) 5/24-26ab.
ūrdhve agnir adho [k, kh, gh: -dhā] nīras tiryag [k, kh, gh: nīra tirya] ūrdhve prabhañjanaḥ [k, kh, gh: -naiḥ] ׀ dharā madhye 'calā [k, kh: -calāṁ; gh: -madhyacalāṁ] vidyā [k, kh, gh: -yān] nabhaḥ sarvatra saṁsthitam [gh: -ta] ׀׀ Ibid. 5/35.

which the five organs of action respond. The inner mental organ, that is, mind, ego and intellect, along with Nature (prakṛti) and the individual soul (puruṣa), make another group of five.[1] These pentads are associated with the five seats in two places in our text. According to one scheme, outlined in the following table,[2] the principles, linked to the seats, become part of the Liṅga in the form of the goddess's Yoni.[3]

14. Table of the Five Sacred Seats and the Twenty-five Principles

Sacred Seats	Great Elements	Subtle Elements	Organs of Action	Organs of Knowledge	Mental Organs and the rest
Kāmarūpa	Earth	Smell	Speech	Nose	Intellect
Pūrṇagiri	Water	Taste	Anus	Tongue	Nature
Jālandhara	Fire	Form	Genitals	Eye	Mind
OṀ	Air	Touch	Body	Skin	Ego
Tisra (= Candrapura)	Space	Sound	Feet	Ear	Person

Another scheme tabulated below is similar to this one but, as usual, the equivalences are not all the same. The principles of existence and the other entities, along with the sacred seats to which they correspond, constitute the goddess's maṇḍala as follows.[4]

15. Table of Five Seats according to Chapter Forty-six of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred Seats	Oḍḍiyāna (Oṁkāra)	Jālandhara	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa	Tisra	Pervasive
Directions	Middle	South	North	In Front	Above
Elements	Air	Fire	Water	Earth		Space
Sensations	Sound	Form	Taste	Touch	Smell
Organs of Action		Feet	Genitals	Hand	Anus	Speech
Organs of Sense	Eye	Ear	Skin	Tongue	Nose
Ornaments of Kula	Person	Ego	Intellect	Mind	Nature

[1] Concerning the five seats and the 25 principles see KuKh 67/25ff and the chart in the notes of that section.
[2] Based on KuKh 67/25-35.
[3] KuKh 67/36.
[4] Based on KuKh 46/2-21ab.

		Tamas	Rajas	Sattva
Five Jewels[1]	Sadāśiva	Rudra	Viṣṇu	Brahmā	Īśvara
Secret names[2]	Sādākhya	Śrīkaṇṭha	Ananta	Śaṅkara	Piṅgala
Gestures	Ghaṭa	Karālā	Padminī	Yoni	Kadambinī
Colours	Dark blue	Red	Yellow	White
States	Immobile	Mobile	Immobile and mobile	Stable
Ages	Kṛta	Tretā	Dvāpara	Kali
Trees[3]		Bilva	Ciñcā	Kadamba

The most basic group of five is that of the gross elements that are accordingly equated with the sacred seats. In this perspective the elements are understood to be five forms or aspects of the fundamental energy of the goddess who emanates in a series of pentads in and through the sacred seats to assume through them concrete physical, corporeal, sensorial, mental and hence spatial and temporal forms. Emitted from the one source (yoni), they are themselves sources of their evolutes. Sharing in the sacred cosmogenic energy of the goddess, the pentads of which the Five Elements supply the basic paradigm are sacred and so, like the goddess herself, are their abodes, the sacred seats. As the residence of sacred entities and divine beings they are referred to as 'hermitages' (āśrama).[4] Present in the microcosm, they are distributed in five centres or 'wheels' in the subtle body.[5]

We have seen that the Five Elements are already equated with the sacred seats in the goddess's myth narrated in the KMT. There Mātaṅga, also called Tisra or Trisrota, is the extra seat that will be revealed in the future. It is not amongst the four in the world but as it represents the fifth element, Space, it pervades them. Even so, as we have noted, the KMT and its most closely related Tantras stick to a fourfold scheme. In the following example, drawn from the ṢSS, which presents the four seats (pīṭhacatuṣka) as the first group of four that constitutes the Krama of Twenty-eight, Earth is simply omitted. This configuration can be tabulated as follows:[6]

---

[1] The Five Jewels in this case are the Five Praṇavas discussed in the following section, of which Sadāśiva and the rest are the presiding deities.
[2] The secret names are those of the Five Siddhas who are commonly associated with the Five Elements.
[3] Concerning these three trees, see KuKh 46/20-26.
[4] KuKh 21/37. Concerning this analogy, see note to KuKh 5/21.
[5] KuKh 21/35-48.
[6] ṢSS 47/15cd-24.

16. Table of the Four Seats of the Krama according to the Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṁhitā

Sacred Seats	Elements	Locations	Goddesses	Character of the Goddesses
Oḍḍiyāṇa	Space	Cavity of the head (karandhra)	Oḍāmbā	Produces light at night.
Jālandhara	Fire	Glottis (carvīpura)	Jālāmbā	Like a firefly – seen all of a sudden
Pūrṇagiri	Air	Inhaled and exhaled breath (jīvapura)	Pūrṇāmbā	Causes nectar to flow from the head
Kāmarūpa	Water	Between Sun, Moon and Fire	Kāmāmbā	Inspires the ecstasy of the energy of passion (kāmakalā)

In this scheme, the sequential order of the correspondences between the seats and the Elements with respect to the one in the first two chapters of the KMT has been reversed.[1] In that scheme Earth corresponds to Oḍḍiyāna and so on in such a way that Space is naturally equated with the fifth seat that is 'pervasive' and so is not counted separately. By maintaining the same sequence of correspondences, the omission of the fifth element could have been tacitly explained in the same way. Presumably the reason why this was not done was to represent the pervasive, transcendent voidness of the First Seat, which is the source of the others and the original abode of the goddess who 'wanders in the Void' (khecarī).

Generally, the relationship of the Elements with the sacred seats is so fundamental that even when the seats are just the four worshipped in the central triangle, complex adjustments are made to accommodate all five into them. For example, in another configuration, governed by the pervasive deity of consciousness, the four sacred seats are projected into the five directions and so, implicitly, into the Five Elements to which they correspond.[2] In this case the maṇḍala is the Liṅga of Sadāśiva whose five faces view the directions and fill them with their energies so that the seats, identified with them, can be worshipped in a pervasive, directional modality. On the horizontal plane they are the four seats. As usual, the upper plane pervades and encompasses all the sacred sites. Thus colonized by the sacred seats and sites, the five-faced Sadāśiva of the Siddhānta is reformed into a Kaula deity:

---

[1] See below, table 28, p. 721.
[2] See table 14 on p. 639.

The face Sadyojāta (in the west) is the supreme sacred seat Udyānaka.[1] The sacred seat which is said to be Vāmadeva (in the north) is Pūrṇagiri. Jālandhara is the sacred seat of Aghora (in the south) and its light is (like that of) the Fire of Time. One should know that the sacred seat called Kāma is the all-pervasive lord Tatpuruṣa (in the east). The abode of all the primary and secondary seats, the meeting grounds (sandoha), primary and secondary sacred fields and the rest is said to be the omnipresent Īśāna (above).[2]

The model of four seats pervaded by the Five Elements, despite its obvious difficulties, is occasionally maintained in the later sources probably in view of its precedents in the earlier ones. In the following example, drawn from the KuKh, the missing element not directly represented by a seat is Air. However, it is present in all of them as the lunar and solar breath with which the seats are 'marked'. The four seats, presumably projected into the Triangle, are understood as aspects of the goddess's Command contemplated in its Wheel in the head. Below in the body the same set is reproduced in an ascending sequence with Kuṇḍalinī (here called the Stick) as Fire and Mālinī as Space:

And the five Great Elements are endowed with these four pervading (seats). Thus, (all the five) beginning with Space (vyomatattva) (correspond), in due order, to the sequence that begins with (the sacred seat of) OṀ. The (sacred seat of) OṀ is established in Space, JĀ (i.e. Jālandhara) resides in Fire (tejas), PŪ (i.e. Pūrṇagiri) is in Water while KĀ (i.e. Kāmarūpa) is in Earth. Place Energy (śakti) below them by means of (Kuṇḍalinī) the energy that resides in the lower limb. Below them (all) is the Earth, (then comes) Water, the Stick (daṇḍa) and Mālinī. Divided thus into the four sacred seats and marked with the Sun and Moon, this, the Command placed in the head, is said to be the four sacred seats.[3]

---

[1] As the First Seat in which the teachings originated, it is appropriately located in the western quarter, which is that of the Kubjikā tradition.

[2] sadyojātaṁ tu yad vaktraṁ tat pīṭhodyānakaṁ param ||
vāmadevasvarūpākhyaṁ pīṭhaṁ pūrṇagiriḥ [k kh: -riṁ] smṛtam |
jālandharam aghoraṁ [k kh: jālāṁdhara-] tu pīṭhaṁ kālānalaprabham ||
kāmākhyaṁ nāma yat pīṭhaṁ jñeyaṁ tatpuruṣaṁ vibhu [k kh: vibhum] |
pīṭhopapīṭhasandohakṣetropakṣetrakādinām [k kh: – saṁdohā-; -māṁ] ||
ālayaḥ sarvam eteṣām īśānaṁ sarvagaṁ smṛtam | ṢSS 42/58cd-61ab.

[3] KuKh 28/5-8.

The Five Praṇavas and the Five Sacred Seats

The pentadic template is reinforced by the association of five seed-syllables called the Five Praṇavas with the Five Elements. These are the seed-syllables of both the Elements and their presiding deities – Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Rudra, Īśvara and Sadāśiva[1] who are called the Five Brahmās or Five Instruments (karaṇa). The Praṇavas and the gods who preside over them,[2] as well as the Five Siddhas[3] the Kubjikā Tantras associate with them, are called the Five Jewels.[4]

Chapter forty of our text, which is drawn from the first chapter of the TS, outlines a series of ascents. One of these is called the Abandonment of the Instruments (karaṇatyāga). We have seen in the previous chapter[5] that the same process is described in the SvT, which probably inspired the version in the TS. In the SvT the Instruments are assimilated, as are the Praṇavas, to stages in the utterance of OṀ. The lower Instruments, progressively abandoned, merge into the higher ones leading to Śiva who is beyond them. This state, which is the liberated condition 'beyond the five', the TS calls Beyond Merger (layātīta).

The Kubjikā Tantras link the Five Instruments with the five main seats, which are their sacred 'abodes'. This chain of identifications is so common in the later sources that it becomes a fundamental feature of the five seats. Accordingly, the Sūtra of the Five Praṇavas, which is chapter 54 of our text,[6] is entirely dedicated to the Five Praṇavas and their seats. They are considered to be such a powerful series of sacred sounds that the KMT enjoins: '(The name) Kubjikā (should be uttered) along with the Five Praṇavas. There is no utterance (of mantra) without them on the great path of Kujā's tradition'.[7] Although additions, they are also an essential part of the goddess's Vidyā. If the Vidyā is recited without the Five Praṇavas at the beginning and end, it will not bear fruit.[8] Accordingly, they are presented twice in our text,[9] in both cases just after the extraction of the goddess's Vidyā. The Five Praṇavas that precede and conclude the recitation of the Vidyā and, indeed, are normally prefixed and, sometimes also suffixed in reverse order, to the mantras of the Kubjikā cult, came to be represented by the five sacred seats. In this way the Five Praṇavas that energize

---

[1] KuKh 65/43cd-44ab.
[2] KuKh 39/63.
[3] KuKh 46/10cd-14ab.
[4] These Five Jewels should not be confused with a group of five mantras with the same name dedicated to the Yoginīs of the five worlds. Concerning these mantras see chapter 62 of the KuKh.
[5] See above, p. 394 ff.
[6] The Pañcapraṇavasūtra is section 48 of YKh (1).
[7] KMT 25/208.
[8] KuKh 9/53-55; see also ibid. 10/13.
[9] In KuKh 8/93-105 and ibid. 9/20-22.

(dīpana) the mantra to which they are attached are, as the five sacred seats of the Vidyā, the energizers (dīpaka) of the mantras of the Kaula liturgy (kulakrama).[1] Prefixed and suffixed by these five, the mantra is filled with the energy of the sacred seats from which it, like all other mantras of the Kubjikā tradition, originate.

The goddess's Vidyā in particular came to be understood to be related in a special way to the primary sacred seats, which are considered to be the 'first sacred seats of the Vidyā'.[2] Each of these syllables was originally taught in the corresponding seat and so the initiate is admonished to go to them and repeat the Five Praṇavas there. In this way he attains the accomplishments (siddhis), magical and yogic, of the seats. The most excellent amongst them is union with the goddess Khecarī, mystical flight (khecaratva) and the 'accomplishment of Heroes', that is, the expanded, liberated consciousness called the Great Pervasion (mahāvyāpti). In this way he attains the immortal abode and will be Rudra himself[3] and, reaching the Supreme Principle, never grieves.[4]

As a standard group, the Five Praṇavas are sometimes called the 'group of five seats' (pīṭhapañcaka)[5] or their 'convention' (pīṭhasaṁketa),[6] that is, teaching. A good example of their special power is the goddess's own Vidyā. Vakrikā in her sonic form as the Vidyā, enjoys pre-eminent authority amongst the mantras and, what amounts to the same thing, the deities of the Kubjikā Tantras. Even so, she is sustained (adhiṣṭhitā) by the Five Praṇavas.[7] The Krama, consisting as it does of a series of mantras, is powerless devoid of the Five Praṇavas. Understood as laudatory invocations, they are the means by which the Krama is worshipped. Devoid of them the Krama could not be worshipped and the adept has no hope of achieving liberation.[8]

They are extracted in several places in the literature.[9] Although each is a separate seed-syllable, the five together can also be treated as a single unit called 'Pañcapraṇava' – 'the (one called) Five Praṇavas', [10] 'Pañcārṇa' – 'the (one

---

[1] KuKh 8/111-120ab.
tatrādau praṇavāḥ [kh: praṇavāṁ] pañca mantrāṇām ādidīpakāḥ [gh: -kaḥ] | KRU 6/6ab.
pañcapraṇavam uddhāraṁ sarahasyaṁ prakāśitam ||
mantrāṇāṁ dīpanaṁ hy etad yathākramaṁ [k kh: -kāmaṁ] niyojayet | ṢSS 7/268cd-269ab. See also KMT 5/4.
[2] KuKh 8/111.
[3] KuKh 8/117cd-124.
[4] KuKh 8/108cd-109ab.
[5] KuKh 9/22.
[6] KuKh 9/31cd.
[7] KuKh 2/39.
[8] KuKh 8/114cd-116ab.
[9] See, for example, YKh (2) 14/95-105, KMT 5/34-40 and ṢSS 7/242-256.
[10] For an example of this usage see KMT 5/42d.

called) Five Letters' or simply 'Pañcaka' – 'the Group of Five'.[1] As such the five together are sometimes treated as a single mantra in its own right called 'Pañcākṣarī Vidyā' – 'the Vidyā of Five Syllables'.[2]

The Praṇavas have several names. They also have a number of variant forms. Some of these names can be tabulated as follows.

17. Table of Names and Correspondences of the Five Praṇavas

Elements	Earth	Water	Fire	Air	Space
Five Brahmās[3]	Brahmā	Viṣṇu	Rudra	Īśvara	Sadāśiva
General	Vāgbhava	Māyā	Lakṣmī/ Śaktibīja
Ṭīkā	Rudraśakti	Māyā	Maṅgalā	Kālīpiṇḍa
Secret Names KuKh 9[4]	Kāmarūpa	Māyā / Tūṣṇikā / Mudrā/ Guhā	Rudrabīja	Khecara	Bhairava[5]
KuKh 8[6]	Kuleśvarī/ Bhagavatī/ Vahnivāsinī/ Vāgbhava[7]	Mahāmāyā	Śāṅkarī/ Śrībīja	Khecarī/ Khecara	Bhairavī/ Bhairava
YKh (2)[8]	Vāgbhava	Māyā/ Kāmeśvarī	Lakṣmī/ Śāṅkarī Vidyā (Anākhyā)	Khecarī	Kaulīśa
KuKh 24[9]	Kaulinī / Unbroken	Raudrī / Inferior	Śaṅkarī / Endless	Khecarī / Imperishable	Bhairava / Akula

Although rooted in the originally male-oriented Śaiva tradition, the Five Praṇavas are commonly understood in the later sources to be female energies and are accordingly referred to collectively as the 'fivefold Kaulikī Vidyā'[10] and so is not part of the earliest presentations in the Kubjikā Tantras, although it is an

[1] Examples of this usage are found in KuKh 8/118-120ab and 18/19cd-20.
[2] See, for example, KuKh 8/114cd-116ab, 8/125-126, 9/61-62ab and 11/26-28ab and Ṭ (MS K 5b), evaṁ pañcapraṇavena pañcākṣarī vidyā. They may also be called 'the Five Letters' (pañcārṇā pañcavarṇāḥ pañcapraṇavās te Ṭ MS K fol. 7a).
[3] See KuKh 65/43cd-46 where the Five Brahmās are treated independently.
[4] KuKh 9/19cd-22.
[5] Called Bhairavarāja in KuKh 54/11.
[6] KuKh 8/111-120ab.
[7] Called Brahmā's mantra in KuKh 3/103.
[8] YKh (2) 14/95-105.
[9] The first series of names are those given to the syllables in KuKh 24/52cd-59 where they are presented in code. The second set of names is drawn from KuKh 24/42-43.
[10] KuKh 8/108cd-109ab.

emergent possibility. The ṢSS distinguishes the basic Five Praṇavas from another set of Five Praṇavas to which it refers as being of the Kaula type, with respect to the former that are of the Tantric type (tantrabheda).[1]

As phases in creation, the gross elements, and as sources of mantric energy, they are said to be five wombs (yoni).[2] However they are never referred to as sacred seats (pīṭha) either in the KMT or the ṢSS, and only in one place in the ŚM.[3] Although the Five Praṇavas are known to earlier Tantric traditions, they are not as prominent a feature of their mantric system as they are in that of the Kubjikā Tantras. Indeed, they can be said to be one of the distinguishing features of their mantric system. We may illustrate this point in relation to the earlier Trika school. In chapter 30 of the TĀ Abhinavagupta expounds what, presumably, he must have considered to be the most important mantras of the mantric system (krama) of the Trikakula.[4] Although he describes Navātman[5] and even the formation of its six limbs,[6] the Five Praṇavas are conspicuously absent in his exposition. Moreover, they are unknown to the Mālinīvijaya, which Abhinava considered to be one of the most authoritative Trika Tantras.

More significant in this context is their absence in the Tantrasadbhāva. This important Trika Tantra is a major source for the KMT, which incorporates a great deal from it with the usual additions, omissions and other changes of its own. These changes are in several cases significant and planned in such a way as to assimilate the teachings of the TS to the Kubjikā cult. We have seen how this works with respect to the development of the Triangle and the projection of the seats into it. Here we notice that the Five Praṇavas are as much a part of the Kubjikā system as is the Triangle with the sacred seats, so that they too are integrated into the teachings of the TS. Let us see how this is done.

Chapter five of the KMT, which corresponds to chapter six of the TS, begins with the presentation of a long mantra called Umāmaheśvaracakra or Trikhaṇḍā Vidyā.[7] The KMT follows the TS closely but after the exposition of the Vidyā, the KMT inserts a passage in which the Five Praṇavas are extracted in code.[8] This passage concludes by acknowledging this insertion saying: 'the Five

---

[1] See ṢSS (7/257-264) presented in code they are 1) HSRAIṀ 2) HSRĪṀ 3) HSĀṀ 4) PHSA (?) 5) HSRAUṀ.
[2] KMT 5/82cd = ṢSS 8/79cd.
[3] pañcapīṭhasvarūpeṇa pañcadaivatyam eva [kh: daivatyaṁ pañcam eva] ca || ŚM 5/71cd.
[4] atha yathocitamantrakadambakaṁ trikakulakramayogi nirūpyate | TĀ 30/1ab.
[5] See TĀ 30/11cd-12ab which is a paraphrase of MVT 8/21cd-23ab. The form of Navātman according to the MVT is not quite the same as we usually find in the Kubjikā Tantras. Variant forms of Navātman will be discussed in a following chapter.
[6] TĀ 30/15-16ab.
[7] This passage ends with KMT 5/33 and TS 6/39ab.
[8] KMT 5/34-42.

(fold) Praṇava (pañcapraṇava) has been extracted (incidentally) in connection with (prasaṅgena) the Vidyā'.[1] The following passage eulogizes the power of the Trikhaṇḍā Vidyā to purify from sins. Again, this is largely the same in both texts with a few additions and omissions. Towards the end of this passage the KMT inserts a verse which, referring to Kubjikā's Vidyā, serves to integrate the teachings of the TS with those of the Kubjikā tradition:

> Just as the atonement (prāyaścitta) (for sin) is said (to take place) in the Kula tradition (by means of) Trikhaṇḍā, in the same way, those who know the truth should do (the same) by means of (Kubjikā's Vidyā consisting of) thirty-two syllables.[2]

The two texts go on to describe another long mantra called Tadgraha.[3] This is formed from the syllables of the triple Vidyā – Parā, Parāparā and Apara – to which are added the letters from the two alphabets Mālinī and Śabdarāśi. According to the version in the TS these letters should be conjoined with the syllable AIṀ. Called the 'seed-syllable of power' (śaktibīja), it serves to energize them. Indeed, said to be in the form of the Yoni (yonirūpā), it is implicitly understood to be their source. So changes or additions in this part of the mantra are very significant. Let us see what has happened. In the TS we read:

> The letters that are part of the body of that Vidyā that has been explained previously as (conjoined with Mālinī, that is,) with the sequence (of letters) beginning with Na and ending with Pha, should be conjoined, O beloved, with mantra. Each letter, in due order, is just to the left of (the syllable AIṀ which has) the form of the Yoni.
>
> Bhairava, consists (of the letters) beginning with A and ending with KṢa, and so is Śabdarāśi. Having encapsulated each of those letters individually with the seed-syllable of power (śaktibīja) . . . [4]

---

[1] KMT 5/41cd. Then KMT 5/42cd picks up again from TS 6/45ab.
[2] KMT 5/69cd-70ab. This verse is inserted between lines 6/75cd and 6/76ab of the TS.
[3] Tadgraha is presented in chapter 23 of the KuKh.
[4] yā vidyā kathitā pūrvaṁ [k: pūrvā; kh: pūrvān] nādiphāntakrameṇa [k: ādi-] tu ||
taccharīragatā varṇā bhedavyā manunā [k, kh: bhedaye jānunā] priye |
vāmāgraṁ [k, kh: -grā] yonirūpāyā varṇam ekaikasaṁkhyayā ||
bhairavaḥ śabdarāśis tu ādikṣāntasvarūpataḥ |
varṇās te śaktibījena saṁpuṭitvā pṛthak pṛthak || TS 6/79cd-81.

The modified version in the KMT says:

> The letters that are part of the body of that Vidyā that has been explained previously as (conjoined with Mālinī, that is) with the sequence (of letters) beginning with Na and ending with Pha, are conjoined with the Five Praṇavas. And so each letter, in due order, is (united) with the essential nature of the one fivefold Yoni.
>
> Bhairava as the sequence (of the letters) beginning with A and ending with KṢa is Śabdarāśi. One should encapsulate each of those letters individually with the Five Praṇavas.[1]

The syllable AIṀ is the first of the Five Praṇavas. It has retained its special prestige as the syllable that represents the triangular womb (bhaga) of the goddess and so is her seed-syllable.[2] Thus it is considered to be a particularly powerful seed-syllable in the Kubjikā tradition, as it is in the TS, and continued to be in the Śrīvidyā system that developed subsequently. Even so, it seems that those who constructed the mantric system of the Kubjikā tradition sought to strengthen their mantras further by adding not just one goddess syllable (yoni) to them but five in the form of the Five Praṇavas. The TS does enjoin the addition of a praṇava to several of the mantras it describes but this is the Vedic syllable OṀ. In this perspective also the mantric system of the Kubjikā Tantras came to pride itself as being superior to that of its predecessors in so far as it avoids the use of this and other Vedic syllables. The later texts, including the KuKh, came to condemn this as part of Tantric practice (tantrācāra), which they consider to be inferior to Kula practice (kulācāra). The single Vedic praṇava was accordingly replaced with five more powerful praṇavas.

A connection between the original Vedic praṇava and these five is found in the SvT. Arraj points out that many of the rites described in the SvT use the praṇava which is considered to be the niṣkala form of Svacchanda Bhairava.[3]

---

[1] yā vidyā kathitā pūrvaṁ nādiphāntakrameṇa | taccharīragatā varṇāḥ pañcapraṇavabhedataḥ ||
pañcayonyāḥ svarūpeṇa varṇaṁ ekaikasaṅkhyayā |
bhairavaḥ śabdarāśiś tu ādikṣāntakrameṇa tu ||
te varṇāḥ pañcapraṇavaiḥ saṁpuṭe[c] ca pṛthak pṛthak | KMT 5/74-76ab.

[2] The first (praṇava) has been explained. (It is) Vāgbhava that is worshipped by the gods. It is the supreme syllable called the Womb (bhaga) and is the seat (āsana) of the Krama.

prathamaṁ tu samākhyātaṁ vāgbhavaṁ surapūjitam ||
bhagākhyaṁ paramaṁ bījam āsanaṁ ca kramasya ca | ṢSS 7/243cd-245ab.

[3] Arraj 1988: 32-33 notes that:

> These rites in which the practitioner meditates upon the various components of this formula in conjunction with the movements of his breath show the clear influence of both earlier

Goudriaan reports that, in his commentary on the SvT, Kṣemarāja explains the meaning of the term Praṇava as follows:

> Praṇava is called this because in a pre-eminent way (pra-) it acknowledges (nava-), i.e. praises i.e. contemplates in its ultimate unity, the nature of the Supreme Lord which encompasses the cosmic totality; as such it is the Indivisible Lord; Praṇava also stands for the syllable OṀ, the mystic pervasion of which is inseparably connected with it.[1]

Here it seems that Kṣemarāja is referring to just one, original praṇava i.e. OṀ. But in actual fact, as it possesses five states, this one praṇava is presented in the SvT as the Five Praṇavas.[2] Despite this fundamental difference, we find several carry-overs in the doctrines associated with this fivefold praṇava in the Kubjikā system, thus exemplifying the pervasive influence the cult of Svacchanda Bhairava has had on it, as it has on all the major cults that have their roots in the Bhairava Tantras. The first notable feature the two systems have in common is that the SvT teaches that the fivefold praṇava should be placed before the mantra of Svacchanda Bhairava (also called Bahurūpa or Aghora) for it to be fruitful.[3] This is why it dedicates most of chapter six to this subject.[4] Kubjikā's Vidyā is modelled in some respects on Svacchanda Bhairava's mantra. They both consist of 32 syllables and the goddess is addressed in it as 'having the face of Aghorā (aghorāmukhī)', that is, the consort of Svacchanda Bhairava, and in some versions as just Aghorā also.[5] So we can think of it as a female version of Svacchanda

---

Vedic traditions that condensed the study of the Vedāḥ into a meditation on the Praṇavaḥ, and of interiorized ritual, in rites such as the prāṇāgnihotraḥ focused on the inner breath.

For the early Vedic development of the practice of personal meditative recitation, and in particular the concentration on praṇava, see Malamoud 1977: 24, 86-87.

[1] Goudriaan 1986: 146.

[2] Praṇava is in a fivefold state. It possesses three letters (of which there are) three deities. (Moreover) praṇava is uttered conjoined with the Point and Sound. SvT 6/22.

[3] Bhairava assures the goddess in the SvT (6/3):

O lady of good vows, having recited the syllables of Bahurūpa 100,000 times in conjunction with the fivefold praṇava (pañcapraṇava), by repeating (the mantra) one is certainly successful.

[4] Chapter six is called 'Concerning the Fivefold Praṇava' (pañcapraṇavādhikāra). SvT 6/1-52ab describes it. The rest of the chapter (up to verse 97) deals with the offerings that should be made to the fire in conjunction with its recitation.

[5] The goddess's Vidyā with its variant forms and permutations is analyzed in chapters 8 to 12 of the KuKh to which the reader is referred.

Bhairava's mantra. Moreover, the Kubjikā system prefaces its main Vidyā with its own form of the Five Praṇavas to follow the same model established by the SvT.

The several features the two systems have in common demonstrate clearly that the one in the Kubjikā Tantras is an expansion of the one in the SvT, which we know is the earlier of the two. The common features centre on their fivefold nature. This is emphasized in the SvT that projects five pentads into its fivefold praṇava[1], which we may tabulate as follows.

18. Table of the Fivefold Praṇava according to the Svacchandatantra

Components	Lengths of utterance	Deities	Principles	States
A	Short	Brahmā	Earth	Waking
U	Medium	Viṣṇu	Nature	Dreaming
M	Long	Rudra	Māyā	Deep sleep
Point (bindu)	Very Long	Īśa	Īśvara	Turīya
Sound (nāda)	Extremely Long	Sadāśiva	Sadāśiva	Turīyātīta

The five states of consciousness are not correlated with the Five Praṇavas in the Kubjikā Tantras, which are generally not very concerned with them. The principles are also not the Five Elements, as one would expect. Even so, the deities are the same. Moreover, at a higher level all the essential metaphysical principles of the two coincide. These are listed in the following verse in the ṢSS:

> O goddess, the Five *Praṇava*s are said to be Power (śakti), the Pervasive One (vyāpinī), the Equal One (samanā), the Partless One (niṣkala), and the Transmental (unmanā).[2]

This verse is not found in the KMT or in the ŚM, its first expansion, but it appears in the SvT.[3] Clearly the redactor of the ṢSS, who inserted this verse into his text, was well aware of the close relationship between the two systems.

Now we have determined the immediate precursors of the Five Praṇavas let us move further back in time to see where they originated. In the Kubjikā Tantras they are equated to the five Brahmās who are related to Sadāśiva's five faces represented by forms of Śiva called Sadyojāta, Vāmadeva, Aghora, Tatpuruṣa and Īśāna. The earliest appearance of these five as a group is in the Taittirīyāraṇyaka were they are invoked through a series of five mantras.[4]

---

[1] Present in the body in differentiated (sakala) and undifferentiated form (niṣkala), (praṇava) possesses five pentads. SvT 6/13cd.

[2] śaktiś ca vyāpinī caiva samanātmā ca niṣkalam || unmanā ca tathā devi praṇavāḥ pañca kīrtitāḥ | ṢSS 42/55cd-56ab.

[3] SvT 6/26.

[4] These are:

These mantras were considered to be so basic to Śaiva practice that they were incorporated into Pāśupata Śaivism. Thus they conclude each of the five chapters of the Pāśupatasūtra, which may have been compiled as early as the third or fourth century CE.[1] Each one is introduced there as a 'brahman' that should be repeated as a mantra (japet). In this context 'brahman' means a Vedic utterance or mantra. The term persisted in the succeeding Śaiva traditions but was understood to mean the creator god Brahmā. The first of the series of five presiding deities, he typifies their function as 'causal instruments' (karaṇa) of the cosmic process, from which they derive their other name, that is, the group of Five Instruments (karaṇapañcaka). The Siddhāntāgamas carried over the five aspects of Śiva by projecting them into Sadāśiva's five faces.[2] Note also that the mantra of Aghora of the TaiĀ is the same as that of Svacchanda Bhairava who is also called Aghora.[3]

The Purāṇas, inspired by the Śaivāgamas, refer to the fivefold creation that is emitted from Sadāśiva's five faces as that of the Five Brahmās. The five faces neatly accommodate the five pentads that together constitute the most basic form of the Sāṁkhya scheme of twenty-five principles as follows:[4]

19. Table of Sadāśiva's Five Faces according to the Liṅgapurāṇa

Faces	Directions	Higher Principles	Senses	Organs of Action	Sensations	Gross elements
Īśāna	Above	Puruṣa	Hearing	Speech	Sound	Space
Tatpuruṣa	East	Prakṛti	Touch	Hands	Touch	Air
Aghora	South	Intellect	Sight	Feet	Form	Fire

sadyojātaṁ prapadyāmi sadyojātāya vai namaḥ bhave bhave cātibhave bhajasva māṁ bhavodbhvāya namaḥ | (1)
vāmadevāya namo jyeṣṭhāya namaḥ śreṣṭhāya namo rudrāya namaḥ kālāya namaḥ kalavikaraṇāya namo balavikaraṇāya namo balapramathanāya namaḥ sarvabhūtadamanāya namo manonmanāya namaḥ | (2)
aghorebhyo 'tha ghorebhyo ghoraghoratarebhyaḥ sarvataḥ śarvasarvebhyo namas tu rudrarūpebhyaḥ | (3)
tatpuruṣāya vidmahe mahādevāya dhīmahi tan no rudraḥ pracchodayāt | (4)
īśānaḥ sarvavidyānām īśvaraḥ sarvabhūtānāṁ brahmādhipatir brahmaṇo 'dhipatir brahmā śivo' stu sadāśivaḥ | (5) TaiĀ 10/43–47.

[1] Sadyojāta: PāSū 1/40-44; Vāmadeva: ibid. 2/22-27; Aghora: ibid. 3/21-26; Tatpuruṣa: ibid. 4/22-24 and Īśāna: ibid. 5/42-47. Note that the serial order is the same as we find in the TaiĀ and is regularly maintained subsequently in the Siddhāntāgamas.

[2] See the introduction to the Rauravāgama vol. 1, p. 24. The mantras of the five faces are found in the Mahānārayaṇīyopaniṣad (section 16-22) and the Pañcabrahmopaniṣad is entirely dedicated to them.

[3] Aghora mantra is expounded in SvT 1/41-43 where we are told, as we would expect, that it should be prefixed with OṀ.

[4] Liṅgapurāṇa 2/14/32 ff.

Vāmadeva	North	Ego	Taste	Genitals	Taste	Water
Sadyojāta	West	Mind	Smell	Anus	Smell	Earth

We turn now to the Five Praṇavas as we find them in the Kubjikā sources to see how they are related there to the five sacred seats and other pentads. We begin with an overview based on the presentation in the Ṭīkā which, omitting any reference to the seats in relation to the praṇavas, follows the older sources. The form of the seed-syllables presented first is that found in the KMT.[1]

1) AIṀ Commonly known as Vāgbhava, this seed-syllable represents the goddess Kubjikā herself. It is the triangular Yoni (bhaga) of the goddess, which is the central core of her maṇḍala and so is the seat of the entire tradition and sequence of mantras (krama).[2] The Ṭīkā[3] refers to it as Rudraśakti, an important aspect of Kubjikā, which connects her, as do numerous other features, with the Trika school. It is the seed-syllable of Brahmā and corresponds to the Earth element, although its colour, according to the Ṭīkā, is vermilion (sindūra), rather than yellow, which is the usual colour of this element.

2) HRĪṀ This is the seed-syllable of Māyā and Lakṣmī. It belongs to Viṣṇu and corresponds to the element Water. Its form is like a wheel of fire (alātacakra). According to the ŚM[4] it is the heart of the rays of the light of the deity. It attracts all things towards itself and gives the power to control others, poetic genius, and the power to hear at a great distance. It serves as an antidote to poison and arouses the body and mind (purakṣobha). It performs many wonders for the man who keeps it in his heart. There is no realisation (pratyaya) without it. The KMT also attributes magical powers to the Five Praṇavas, which are said to bring about sexual arousal (drāvaṇa), disturbance (kṣobha), delusion (moha), sleep (jṛmbhana) and the desiccation of the enemy's body (śoṣaṇa), respectively.[5]

3) ŚRĪṀ This is the seed of the goddess Īśā who is also called Maṅgalā and is identified with the energy of Rudra (rudraśakti) to whom this seed-syllable corresponds. It is said to be brilliant like a million moons.[6] According to the ŚM[7] this is the seed-syllable of sovereign glory (śriyābīja). It gives royal power (śrī), satisfaction (puṣṭi), beauty, good fortune (saubhāgya) and pleases kings. It gives

---

[1] Extracted in KMT 5/34-40.
[2] Cf. ṢSS 7/243cd-244ab quoted above, p. 642, note 2.
[3] Ṭ MS K fol. 5b.
[4] ŚM 5/54-56ab.
[5] KMT 5/83 = ṢSS 8/80.
[6] Ṭīkā MS K fl. 5b.
[7] ŚM 5/58-60ab.

all people pleasure (āhlāda) and bestows every accomplishment. Without it, one cannot acquire wealth (dhanasiddhi).

4) PHREṀ This seed-syllable corresponds to Īśvara and the element Fire. This is the form of this syllable given in code in the KMT and ṢSS. Although we do find it in the mantras of the later Kubjikā Tantras, it is largely replaced by the variant KHPHREṀ as it is already in the ŚM[1] where it is called the seed-syllable of Śivā. KHPHREṀ is an important seed-syllable. Abhinavagupta refers to it as the seed of destruction (saṁhārabīja) and couples it with SAUḤ, the seed-syllable of emanation (sṛṣṭibīja) and the goddess Parā. Also called Piṇḍanātha or Pañcapiṇḍanātha, it is the seed-syllable of the goddess Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī. The Ṭīkā, no doubt aware of this connection, calls it the seed-syllable of the goddess Kālī (kālīpiṇḍa). Thus we may surmise that the change in the form of this praṇava was inspired by the desire to integrate the energy of Kālī into the mantras of the Kubjikā cult just as Abhinava integrates it into his Trika.

According to Abhinava, when it is uttered correctly, everything dissolves away into Kālasaṁkarṣiṇī's abode.[2] Abhinava, who is generally unconcerned with magical and yogic powers (siddhi), makes no reference to the power it possesses to bestow magical accomplishments (siddhi). The Kubjikā Tantras, on the contrary, in consonance with the positive attitude towards these goals that all Tantric traditions share, stresses their value. Thus the repetition of this praṇava is eulogized as capable making others attached to oneself and attracts them. It engenders conflict (bheda) between enemies and paralyses them.[3] Moreover, it is used in the magical acts of murder and expulsion (uccāṭana). It is the main part of the practice (sādhana) related to the Śākinīs ('witches') and brings about the accomplishment of Vetālas, Rākṣasas and Lāmās and other reformed demons.

---

[1] ŚM 5/60cd-61.

[2] śrīkālasaṁkarṣiṇīdhāmni līyate tadaikātmyena prasphuratīty arthaḥ |

Comm. on TĀ 4/189cd-191ab.

Abhinava outlines the phases of this process from the point of view of the yogi's experience as follows:

> Abandoning dependence on actions directed towards a goal and attaining contentment in the Void (Kha) nature (rūpa) which is external and internal (at the same time, the yogi) should rest on the expanded plane of Sound (Pha). Thus, (by means of that transcendental plane of Sound, he should) bring about in the proper manner the expansion of the inner face of consciousness, by virtue of which the Wheels of perception, the senses and vital breaths become one with the object of knowledge. This object of knowledge is destroyed by the Fire of Consciousness (Ra) and, thus annulled, merges into this, the Fire of Power, the Triangle (E). The yogi perfectly content in the noble awareness of the essential being of the Point (Ṁ), resting in the seed of withdrawal (KHPHREṀ) becomes the Supreme Reality. TĀ 5/75–78.

[3] ŚM 5/62-63.

5) HSAUṀ This is the seed-syllable of Sadāśiva and corresponds to the element Space. This seed-syllable has several variants. The two most common ones are HSŪAUṀ and HSVŪAUṀ, both of which are probably derived from variant ways of pronouncing the basic form of this syllable. Other rare variants are noted in the Ṭīkā. One is HSMRAṀ which is said to have been revealed in the Vidyāsaṅketasūtra. This is the form of the seed-syllable when it is used as a Peg (kīla)[1] to 'fix' and energize the mantra into which it is inserted. 'Fixed' in this way, the mantra is accessible only to those who know its use. Other variants are HSMVŪAIṀ, HSMVAṀ[2] and HSRŪAUṀ. The latter, called the Bhairavī or Bhairava Vidyā, is the form we find in two places in the KuKh.[3] According to the ŚM, this praṇava gives all the accomplishments (siddhi) including that of the Skyfarers (khecarīsiddhi). It gives one control of others, attraction, arousal (kṣobha), tranquillity and fulfilment (puṣṭi). In addition, it gives a person the knowledge of how to hear and see for great distances.[4]

We turn now to the presentation of the Five Praṇavas in relation to the five sacred seats we find in the KuKh. First of all we notice that the groups commonly associated with the Five Praṇavas are not always found together. In one place, for example, we find only the Five Brahmās. These are projected into the body from the heart centre up to the glottis where Sound and the Point are located. Beyond that is the Skyfaring goddess Khecarī who, as Kaulinī, contains the energies of the Yoni within which the four sacred seats are deployed.[5] Thus, the seats are not coupled with the Five Brahmās, but are beyond them in the Wheel of the Skyfarers (khecarīcakra).

Conversely, the Sūtra of the Five Praṇavas, which is chapter fifty-four of our text, is concerned solely with aligning the praṇavas with the seats and placing them along the axis of the body. According to this sūtra, each of the Five Praṇavas has its own colour and corresponds to a state of attainment evidenced by signs of possession (āveśa). They are projected into five places along the vertical axis of the body, which, in some cases, correspond to the locations of the inner Wheels[6] implying thereby that they mark stages in the ascent of Kuṇḍalinī through them. Their presence in the body is important because they must be placed there along with the projection of the thirty-two syllables of the Kubjikā's Vidyā and their presiding goddesses.[7] We notice, moreover, that the latter are

---

[1] Ṭ MS K fol. 5b.
[2] See mantras in the Ṭīkā (ibid.) for the form of the fifth praṇava.
[3] This is extracted in KuKh 8/104cd-105 and given in full in ibid. 9/22.
[4] ŚM 5/65cd-67.
[5] For details see KuKh 64/28cd-49ab.
[6] See, for example, KuKh 8/92cd ff..
[7] KuKh 11/2.

projected onto the outer parts of the body. Thus the praṇavas mark vital centres within the body and, integrated into the sonic body of the goddess, they energize it inwardly. The same principle guides the drawing and worship of the goddess's maṇḍala. Analogously, the Five Praṇavas are placed in the middle of it before the other mantras.[1] The correspondences in this case can be tabulated as follows.

20. Table of the Five Praṇavas according to Chapter Fifty-four of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Praṇavas	Colours	Seats	Locations in the Body	Ages	Signs
Vāgbhava	White	Kāmarūpa	Centre of Yoni	Kṛta	Arousal (kṣobha)
Second	Morning sun	Jālandhara	Navel	?	Paralysis (stobha)
Third		Pūrṇagiri	(Heart)	?	Inebriation (ghūrṇi), Arousal of the Body (purakṣobha)
Fourth	Black	Tisra	Throat	End of Kali	Controlled Possession (vaśyāveśa)
King Bhairava	Red	Udyāna	Between the eyebrows	?	Yogic Sleep (yoganidrā)

In chapter nine of the KuKh the praṇavas are only correlated with the seats and five vowels.[2] They are recited along with the goddess's seed-syllable HSKHPHREṀ into which six seats are projected that are distributed along the axis of the body,[3] and so they need to be adjusted into a scheme of six units. These are the five gods who preside over the Five Praṇavas with Śiva beyond them, as we find in the SvT. Externally, the six seats radiate into the corners of the hexagram from the goddess's seed-syllable in the centre of the Kramamaṇḍala, in which the deities are worshipped.[4] The Gurumaṇḍala, in which the teachers are worshipped, is generated analogously from the Five Praṇavas and Navātman, the god's seed-syllable, which are also projected into the worshipper's body. In this case they correspond to the Five Siddhas with Ādinātha, the First Siddha, as the sixth.[5] These correspondences can be tabulated as follows.[6]

---

[1] KuKh 11/26-28ab.
[2] See KuKh 9/19cd-26ab.
[3] See chart in note to KuKh 9/11.
[4] See table 18 below, p. 650.
[5] KuKh 27/16-19.
[6] This table summarizes KuKh 27/14-19.

21. Table of Five Praṇavas and Navātman of the Gurumaṇḍala from Chapter Twenty-seven of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Praṇavas	The Five in the *Maṇḍala	Wheels	Siddhas
AIṀ	Maṇḍala	Foundation	Śrīkaṇṭha
HRĪṀ	Authority	Yoni	Śaṅkara
ŚRĪṀ	Siddhas	Navel	Ananta
KHPHREṀ	Rule	Unstruck Sound	Sādākhya
HSAUṀ	Yoginī	Throat	Piṅgala
HSKṢMLVRYŪṀ		Head	Ādinātha

The praṇavas are loaded with many more correspondences. In chapter eight of the KuKh they are one of five groups of five.[1] These are: 1) the Vidyā which consists of the Five Praṇavas listed with their names in the first two columns. 2) The visualizations (dhyāna), which these are the colours and locations of each of the praṇavas in the Wheels listed in columns six and seven. 3) The sacred seats listed in column three. 4) The Siddhas who reside in the seats listed in column four. 5) The gestures that serve to arouse Kuṇḍalinī and stimulate her transition from one Wheel to the next are listed in column five. As usual, movement through these stations engendered by the utterance of the praṇavas brings about states of possession (āveśa) and their accompanying attainments along with the full range of yogic powers.

22. Table of the Five Praṇavas according to Chapter Eight of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Praṇavas	Names of the Vidyās	Sacred Seats	Siddhas	Gestures	Colours	Locations
Vāgbhava AIṀ	Kuleśvarī/ Vahni-vāsinī	Kāmarūpa	Maitrīśa	Yoni	Light red	Between Foundation and City of Jewels
Māyā HRĪṀ	Mahāmāyā	Jālandhara	Caryā-deva	Śaṅkhinī	Fire	City of Jewels
Śrī ŚRĪṀ	Śāṅkarī	Pūrṇagiri	Ṣaṣṭhīśa	Padma	White	Unstruck Sound
Khecara KHPHREṀ	Khecarī	Oḍiyāna	Oḍa	Kapāla	Dark blue and red	Pure Wheel
Bhairava HSRŪAUṀ	Bhairavīi	Tisra	Tūṣṇīśa	Ghaṭa	Red lac	Between the eyebrows

[1] KuKh 8/111cd ff..

A problem arises here with the order in which the seats are listed. The usual one is, as one would expect, the order in which the goddess visits the seats in the myth narrated in the KMT namely: 1) Oḍḍiyāna, 2) Jālandhara, 3) Pūrṇagiri, 4) Kāmarūpa and 5) Tisra. However, this is not always clearly so[1] and in several cases is evidently intentionally altered. For example, the sequence of correspondences between the praṇavas and the seats presented in chapter eight and sixty-seven of our text is: 1) Kāmarūpa, 2) Jālandhara, 3) Pūrṇagiri, 4) Oḍiyāna and 5) Tisra.[2] According to chapter fifty-four as well, Kāmarūpa is AIṂ, the first praṇava, and it was revealed in the Kṛta Age and so comes first. There the serial order of the seats is: 1) Kāmarūpa, 2) Jālandhara, 3) Pūrṇagiri, 4) Tisra and 5) Udyāna. The reason for the change in the usual serial order in such instances may be because Kāmarūpa is felt to be a more appropriate seat for AIṂ as it is also the syllable of the goddess as the Yoni, which is the energy of the will (icchā). The sacred seat 'whose form is desire' – Kāmarūpa – is thus identified with it. Again, the texts repeatedly stress that Oḍḍiyāna is the first seat (ādyapīṭha) from which the teachings originally spread. The change in its position in relation to the other seats in chapter eight may be justified by its association with flight[3] and so fits with the fourth Praṇava, that of the Skyfarer, KHPHREṂ. Another reason for this change is because Kāmarūpa is the seat of the revelation in this cosmic Age and so is given precedence over the other seats even though the teachings originated in Oḍḍiyāna in the first Age.

In these schemes there is no reference to the Five Elements in relation to the praṇavas. In another projection of the praṇavas along the axis of the body presented in chapter twenty-one of the KuKh, this correlation is explicit. However, in this case the correspondences differ. The usual serial order of the seats has been reversed so that they begin with Tisra and end with Oḍḍiyāna.[4] Moreover, there is no regular serial correspondence between them and the Five Elements or the Five Praṇavas. The reason for this, I suppose, is that there are two conflicting aims of this projection. One is to establish the Five Elements in a linear sequence from gross to subtle in an ascending order along the axis of the body. The other is to accommodate the cycle of emanation. This begins with the transcendent condition of Extinction – nirvāṇa – which is equated with the element Earth, possibly to represent that it is as the fundamental and supremely stable ground of the cycle of emanation. The corresponding praṇava is the fourth one – KHPHREṂ – which is also the seed-syllable of Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī in whom the cycles of emanation are extinguished and so may represent the transcendent,

---

[1] See, for example, KuKh 9/24-26ab and note.
[2] KuKh 8/112cd–114 and KuKh 67/25-35.
[3] See note to KuKh 6/31-33ab.
[4] See KuKh 21/46-47.

precosmic condition. We have seen that Kāmarūpa is sometimes related to the first praṇava, which is the seed-syllable of emanation (sṛṣṭibīja). However, the order of the following two syllables has been reversed so that ŚRĪṀ, which is normally the seed-syllable of withdrawal, has become that of persistence, which is normally the function of the seed-syllable HRĪṀ that in this scheme has become the seed-syllable of withdrawal. Perhaps this is simply a mistake. But Oḍḍiyāna, in this case the seat of the fifth praṇava, is not inappropriately equated with Space and hence with the pervasive state of repose. The resulting correspondences can be tabulated as follows.[1]

23. Table of Five Praṇavas according to Chapter Twenty-one of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Five Praṇavas	Elements	Seeds	Places – Wheels	Sacred seats	Colours of the Praṇavas	States
KHPHREṀ	Earth	Energy	Root	Tisra	Green	Extinction (nirvāṇa)
AIṀ	Water	Moon	Yoni	Kāmarūpa	White	Arising
ŚRĪṀ	Fire	Sun	Navel	Pūrṇagiri	Yellow	Persistence
HRĪṀ	Air	Drop	Heart	Jālandhara	?	Withdrawal
HSAUṀ	Space	Sound	Between the eyebrows	Oḍḍiyāna	Dark blue	Repose (viśrānti)

The locations of the sacred seats in the body according to the following scheme presented in chapter twenty-eight of the KuKh[2] are the same as the one above. Even so, Oḍḍiyāna is the only seat that corresponds to the same element in the two schemes.

24. Table of Four Seats according to Chapter Twenty-eight of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Elements	Seats	Faces	Locations
Space	OṀ	Aghora	Between the eyebrows
Fire	Jālandhara	Tatpuruṣa	Heart
Water	Pūrṇagiri	Vāmadeva	Navel
Earth	Kāmarūpa	Sadyojāta	Yoni

Just as the colours of the praṇavas are not consistent in all the schemes, similarly the correspondences between the sacred seats and the Wheels in the body are also variable. Compare, for example, the scheme of six seats related to the Six Wheels outlined in chapter eleven[3] of our text presented above.[1] We notice

[1] See KuKh 21/31ab-47; cf. ibid. 60/62.
[2] KuKh 28/4-11.
[3] KuKh 11/19-21ab.

in that sequence of the Wheels – as opposed to the one in chapter twenty-one charted above, and in general – the absence of the Wheel of the Heart. It is also absent in the scheme presented in chapter twenty-seven.[2] In the latter case the reason is simply because there are only five seats. However, in the scheme presented in chapter twenty-one, which is also based on five seats, the throat centre has been omitted, probably for the same reason. While the serial order of the seats in the scheme outlined in chapter twenty-one is simply the reverse of the usual one, the order in the one in chapter eleven is not only reversed, but in addition Tisra and Oḍḍiyāna (there spelt Oḍiyāna) have exchanged places. Even so, Oḍḍiyāna in both schemes is between the eyebrows.

Finally, we note an interesting variant of this sequence that recurs repeatedly in the accounts of the Wheels in the Kubjikā Tantras. This is the placement of the Wheel of the Command between the eyebrows at the beginning of the sequence. One could understand this as a simple reversal. However, in such cases, the following Wheel is usually that of the Foundation (ādhāracakra) in the genital region at the other extremity of the body. The sequence then proceeds in a linear ascending order. I suppose that the reason for this is that the ascent through these Wheels is initiated by the empowering Command located in the Wheel between the eyebrows. When this Wheel is activated the adept can perceive and participate in the processes taking place within and through the remaining Wheels, which are marked by the ascent of the same Command, as Kuṇḍalinī, through them.

The Six Sacred Seats

We have seen that just as the Five Seats are a major template for the projection of the Five Praṇavas, the Six Seats serve the same function for the Six Wheels in the body. While this is a common paradigm, the seats may be also be projected along the axis of the body independently of them. We find both possibilities exemplified in our text in the schemes in chapters nine and eleven. These may be conveniently treated together as they both relate to HSKHPHREṀ, the seed-syllable of the goddess. In both cases the six letters of the seed-syllable are equated with six seats. In chapter eleven the latter are positioned in the Six Wheels, whereas in chapter nine they are not – although the places in the body where they should be projected are noted, as we can see in the following comparative table.[3]

---

[1] See table 8 on p. 629 and table 22, p. 654.
[2] See above, table 18 on p. 650.
[3] The reader is referred to the text and notes in chapters nine and eleven of the KuKh for the details summarized in this table.

25. Table of Six Seats of the Goddess's seed-syllable according to Chapters Nine and Eleven of the Kumārikākhaṇḍa

Sacred Seats	Letters Chapter Nine[1]	Natures Chapter Nine	Locations Chapter Nine	Deities	Natures Chapter Eleven[2]	Locations Chapter Eleven
Jālandhara	Ra	Fire	Heart	Brahmā	Fire	Navel
Pūrṇagiri	Pha	Red Flower	Throat	Viṣṇu	Sound	Hexagram
Koṅkaṇa / Candra[3]	Kha	Autumn Sky	Uvula	Rudra	*	Palate / Circle of the Drop
Kāmarūpa	Sa	White	Palate	Īśvara	Lunar centre	Birth of Energy
Oḍḍiyāna	Ha	Mirror	Between the eyebrows	Sadāśiva	Bindu-maṇḍala	Between the Eyebrows
Tisra/ Trisrota	E	Heated Gold	Cavity of Brahmā/ Wheel of Space	Śiva	*	Viśuddhi

Groups of six are popular in the Kubjikā Tantras because they can be conveniently projected into the corners of the hexagram that surrounds the central triangle of the goddess's maṇḍala. Chapter 11 of our text describes the projection of six seats in this way. As the worship of the sacred seats is particularly important they are worshipped in both the central triangle and the hexagram. Graphically represented by the hexagram, that is, two juxtaposed triangles, the origin of the six seats from the central triangle is evident in its geometric representation. As usual the sonic form accompanies and reflects the geometric, even as it excels it, just as sound is believed in India to excel sight.

The Great Icon (mahāmūrti) of the goddess is the sonic one, not the one that can be visualized and formally represented. In the following passage it is the syllable AIṀ into which the six seats are projected. Just as the Triangle accommodates the seats and develops into the Hexagram without losing its essential triangular form, the same syllable can contain both the four seats when it represents the triangular Yoni of the goddess as well as her developed hexagonal body. In this way it encapsulates the Triangle both internally and externally:

> Oṁkāra is in the place of the Point (in the centre). The (seat) called Jāla is to the right of it. The (seat) called Pūrṇa is in the north

[1] KuKh 9/3cd-4; 8-11.
[2] KuKh 11/19-21ab.
[3] Candrapīṭha, replaces Koṅkaṇa in chapter 11.

> and Kāmākhya in front of it. The one called Candra is above that. Trisrota is in the Circle of the Womb. The group of six sacred seats has emerged (in this way) supported by the Great Form (of the Goddess) (mahāmūrti).[1]

Symbolic adjustments are required in order to accommodate the six seats into AIṀ, which is a sign that this is an ulterior projection that emerged as the system developed. This is not the case with HSKHPHREṀ, which is unknown to the KMT but was probably adopted and adapted from the store of such syllables common to all schools, with the six seats in mind. While the shape of the triangular graphic form of the syllable AIṀ makes it a natural sonic symbol of the triangular Yoni, the six letters of HSKHPHREṀ naturally represent the Hexagram, which is the epitome of the goddess's maṇḍala of 'six parts' (ṣaṭprakāra). It is the Tree of Life in which the goddess resides. Growing from the Point in the centre of the Triangle it contains in a potential form the six 'parts' (prakāra). In their 'expanded' state, the six seats in the corners of the hexagram house the six wheels (cakra) in the body[2] and the six limbs and faces of the goddess in her 'full' form as the Thirty-two syllable Vidyā.[3] The latter is divided into six parts that are set both along the vertical axis of the body in descending order from the face to the feet and can be projected into the Hexagram. These six seats are also coupled to the group of five, which are represented by the Five Praṇavas at the beginning and end of the Vidyā. So the development of the seats from a group of four, to five and six marks the unfolding of the three major aspects of the goddess's 'Great Icon' (mahāmūrti) – corporeal, graphic and sonic.

The six seats in the hexagram may also serve as the locations of the six parts of the Krama. The spread of the Krama is represented by the development of the maṇḍala and its worship from the Triangle to the Hexagram, that is, from the four to the six sacred seats that contain and signal its 'parts' (prakāra). This process is described in following hymn called the 'Salutation to the (Maṇḍala of) Six Parts (ṣaṭprakāranamaskāra)'. As the devotee recites it, he traces the development of the maṇḍala through the spontaneous deployment of its divine

---

[1] oṁkāraṁ [k, kh, gh: uṁ-] bindudeśe [ṅ: -deve; 2: mūrti-] tu [ṅ: śa] jālākhyaṁ [ṅ: jalā-] tasya dakṣiṇe |
*pūrṇākhyaṁ cottare [k, gh: cāṁtare; ṅ: * * *] deśe [ṅ: * *; 2: deva] kāmākhyaṁ [ṅ: * * *] ca [ṅ: ta; 2: tu] tadagrataḥ [k, kh: -gutaḥ; gh: * dagutaḥ; ṅ: vada-]* ||
tadūrdhve [ṅ: tadurddhaṁ; 2: tadūrdhvaṁ] candranāmākhyaṁ [ṅ: catu-] trisrotaṁ [k, kh, gh: tisrotaṁ; ṅ: tisrātaṁ; 2: k: triśrotaṁ; kh: triśrotraṁ] garbhamaṇḍale [2: -maṇḍalam]|
nirgataṁ pīṭhaṣaṭkaṁ tu [2: kh: + ma] mahāmūrtyāvadhiṣṭhitaṁ [k, kh: -dhiṣṭitaṁ; ṅ: mahāmūrtāvadhiṣṭhitaṁ; 2: k, kh: -maviniśritam] ||

YKh (1) 13/10-11 = YKh (2) 4/1-2 (variants labelled '2').

[2] KMT 11/19-21ab.

[3] See KuKh 11/40-44 and notes.

mantric energies embodied in the praṇavas. The goddess, represented by her syllable AIṀ, emerges as the triangular Wheel of Fire in union with her partner who, in relation to her, is the Water of the Ocean of her energies in which she is immersed. The Mothers, who in this case are the seven Yoginīs[1] who govern the vital constituents of the gross body and are the energies of the Six Wheels (cakra), reside in the centre of it in a potential form. From there they spread out to fill the corners of the Hexagram with their energy. There the seats emerge from the Triangle in the centre and its sonic energy even as they remain within it. The four seats are the sources of the four categories (pīṭha) of the Bhairava Tantras.[2] These are the Vidyā-, Mantra- and Mudrā- *pīṭha*s, which correspond to Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri and Kāmarūpa, respectively.[3] The fourth pīṭha of the Bhairava Tantras – the Maṇḍalapīṭha is represented here by the Merupīṭha. This is Oḍḍiyāna in the centre.[4] Finally, we notice that although the hymn is dedicated to the 'Six Parts', that is, the Hexagram, this also includes the Point in the centre and the Triangle that surrounds it from which the Hexagram is derived and of which it is an integral part. Again, just as seed-syllables are used to generate the seats and so are part of them, the 'six parts' correspond to six series or 'currents' (ogha) of mantras that flow through each seat and are recited to worship them and the 'currents' of teachers who come from there.

> The venerable Tree (HSKṢMLVRYŪṀ), called the Teacher's Sandals, endowed with the energy of passion, (AIṀ) is the First Lord (Ādinātha) of Bhairava's Command. His will is the divine seed (AIṀ), which is pure with (the direct) experience (of deity), and is the Wheel of the Fire of Time. The principle of Water has arisen which, filled with the energy of the Lord's feet (HSKṢMLVRYŪṀ), is the principle of the Self. When the Moon is destroyed, the pure and divine disc of the Full Moon invariably dawns.
>
> The Seat of Yoga (yogapīṭha), which is the Heart of the Goddess (AIṀ), (is formed) by (their) conjunction. Pure, it consists of the three and a half measures (of Speech). In the middle is the seat of OṀ, which is that of the divine syllable (kūṭa) of the Mothers, ḌĀ

---

[1] These Yoginīs are called the Seven Mothers in KuKh 63/10. They will be described in the following chapter in which the Yoginīs are discussed.
[2] See Dyczkowski 1988: 49 ff. and above, p. 576.
[3] Cf. table 23 p. 672-673.
[4] The scriptures of the Kubjikā tradition have come down along the 'Path of Meru' (merumārga). In other words, they originated in Oḍḍiyāna, the First Seat (ādipīṭha). Thus, the Kubjikā Tantras are implicitly related here to the Maṇḍalapīṭha. More often they are linked to the Mudrāpīṭha although it would be more accurate to link them to the Vidyāpīṭha. See Dyczkowski 1988: 54-55 and 120.

> (Ḍākinī), RĀ (Rākinī), LĀ (Lākinī), KĀ (Kākinī), SĀ (Sākinī), HĀ (Hākinī) and YĀ (Yākinī). (The seed-syllable of) Māyā (HRĪṀ), called Jālandhara, is the manifest energy of the Age of Strife and the descent (into the world) of the Seat of Knowledge (vidyāpīṭha). That mantra (ŚRĪṀ) which is in Pūrṇagiri is in the abode of Śiva's energy and is the treasure (kośa) of mantras that has been filled (pūrita) (with it).
>
> The Seat of Gesture (mudrāpīṭha) is the Lord of the Elephants (i.e. KHPHREṀ), the pure Cave of the Moon that has fashioned itself in Kāmarūpa. Above is the seat Trisrota that generates the bliss of the teaching (samayasukha). It is the half-measure of the Seed of Sound (HSAUṀ). The seat of Meru (merupīṭha) is in the Point. It is power (śakti), the seed of bliss (AIṀ), which is the mouth of the Lotus of Kula. There is the Divine Current (divyaugha) divine, that of the seats (pīṭhaugha) and above that the entire Current of the Siddhas and the Current of Kula. The Current of the Teachers is in Candrapurī, and the authority (adhikāra) is in Koṅkaṇa at the beginning of the Age of Strife. It is this Tradition (anvaya) that is present in the three lineages (oli). I bow constantly to (this) maṇḍala made of six parts.[1]

Like the pedestal of a Liṅga or icon or the 'seat' (āsana) made for the sacrificial implements and offerings, the six seats are appropriate locations for the six parts of the Krama. In most forms of the Krama the first unit consists of the

---

[1] śrīvṛkṣaṁ pādukākhyaṁ madanakalayutaṁ bhairavājñādināthaṁ
tasyecchā divyabījaṁ anubhavavimalaṁ so 'pi kālāgnicakram | saṁjātaṁ āpatattvaṁ prabhucaraṇakalāpūritaṁ ātmatattvaṁ
naṣṭe candre ca nityaṁ udayati vimalaṁ pūrṇimādivyabimbam [kh: -vīvaṁ] || saṁyogād [g: -t] yogapīṭhaṁ bhagavatīhṛdayaṁ [k, g: bhagavati-; kh: bhavatihi-] śuddham adhyuṣṭamātraṁ [g: suddha-] tanmadhye divyakūṭaṁ ḍaralakasahayaṁ mātṛ-oṁkārapīṭham [k kh: mātṛṁ; g: mātrimoṁkāra-] | māyājālandharākhyaṁ [g: -jālāṁdharākhyaṁ] prakaṭakalikalā [g: prakaṭakakali-] pīṭhavidyāvatāraṁ tan mantraṁ pūrṇagiryāṁ [k kh g: -giryaṁ] śivasakalapure [g: siva-] pūritaṁ mantrakośam [g: -kosaṁ] || mudrāpīṭhaṁ gajendraṁ vimalaśaśiguhākāmarūpe [g: -sasi-] kṛtātmā ūrdhve trisrotapīṭhaṁ [k: tiśrotra-; kh: trisraṣṭa-; g: trisrotra-] samayasukhakaraṁ rāvabījārdhamātram [g: -vījārdva-] | bindusthaṁ merupīṭhaṁ [kh g: -pīṭhe] kulakamalamukhaṁ śaktir ānandabījaṁ [g: sakti-] divyaughaṁ [g: divyoghaṁ] pīṭha-oghaṁ tadupari sakalaṁ siddha-oghaṁ kulaugham [g: kuloghaṁ] || gurvoghaṁ candrapuryāṁ [k, g: -purye; kh: -puryaṁ] prathamakaliyuge koṅkaṇe [kh: -ṇā] cādhikāraṁ [g: dhādhikāraṁ] trīṇyolyām [g: trilyolyām] anvayo 'yaṁ [k: manūyoyaṁ] praṇamata satataṁ maṇḍalaṁ ṣaṭprakāram [k, kh, g: -prākaram] | SKh 17/1-4ab.

four sacred seats. From here the rest of the Krama is emitted just as the recitation of the remaining mantras follows those of the four seats. In this way the four seats represent the source of the Krama and the six seats its completion. Conversely, containing the four seats, the six are their foundation and source, just as in the three-dimensional Kramamaṇḍala the Hexagram is the pedestal of the Triangle which rises up, as it were, out of it. Thus, cryptically, the Tantra explains:

> There are six sacred seats and six parts (prakāra) of the maṇḍala) and even though the seats have arisen externally from the transmission (krama) with six parts, they are considered to be the first (and most important) in the tradition. They are the outer rays of many forms (made manifest) by the transmission (krama) of the Rule. They are famous and should be known as the first (and most important constituents) of the maṇḍala. The remaining (parts) are (made manifest) after that, separately and in due order. Once one knows the group of six seats, first of all, then one becomes a (true) member of the tradition. Without knowing it, one is never successful. The group of six sacred seats is the cause (of all success). Now I will tell (you) how they are realised on the subtle path. The great sacred seat is within one's own body. It is the one seat that is of six kinds.[1]

We need not discuss here at length the contents of the six seats or aspects of the one seat to which this passage is specifically referring. They will be examined in due course when we come to them in chapters sixty and sixty-one of our text. They are presented in those chapters as the sacred seats of the Kula of consciousness present in the very Self of all living beings as aspects of the dynamism of the unfolding of their vital force and consciousness. This, on the one hand, animates the mind and body and, on the other, is the flow that leads to the one supreme reality. Thus the seats as aspects of this flow are present in the Self in order to 'illumine all that should be known'.[2] Oḍḍiyāna is the Supreme Space. Pure undivided oneness, it is the abode of the liberated Skyfarer. Jālandhara is the

---

[1] ṣaṭ pīṭhāḥ [k, kh: – pīṭhā] ṣaṭ prakārāś ca ṣaṭprakārakramād api [k, kh: -kamādapi] |
bahiraṅgoditāḥ [k: -tā; kh: vahiraṁgoditā] pīṭhā anvaye prathamā matāḥ [k, kh: matā] ||
samayasya krameṇaiva bāhyarūpā gabhastayaḥ |
maṇḍalasya prasiddhyanti jñātavyāḥ [k, kh: -vyā] prathamās tu te ||
śeṣāṇi ca tataḥ paścāt [kh: paśve ? t] kramaśaś ca [k, kh: kramasoda] pṛthak pṛthak |
pīṭhaṣaṭkaṁ purā jñātvā bhaved anvayikas tadā ||
ajñātvā naiva siddhyeta pīṭhaṣaṭkaṁ ca [k: pīṭhakatkañca] kāraṇam [k: kāraṇa] |
sūkṣme 'dhvani [k, kh: nyani] prapadyante [k, kh: -dyete] sāṁprataṁ te vadāmy aham ||
svadehe ca mahāpīṭhaṁ pīṭham ekaṁ ca ṣaḍvidham [k: ṣaṭ-; kh: dhadvidhaṁ] |
YKh (2) 34/10-14ab.

[2] KuKh 60/91cd-92ab.

source of the energy of the City of Jewels, that is, the Wheel in the navel where Kuṇḍalinī resides. Pūrṇagiri is the bliss of the Full Moon represented by the sixteen energies of the vowels. Kāmarūpa is the supreme bliss of the active flow of the transmission (uditogha). Tisra is in the Cavity of Brahmā above the three currents of the flow of the breath. Koṅkaṇa pervades the solar and lunar breaths and is in the centre between them. It is represented by the fusion of the vital energies of Śiva and Śakti (kuṇḍagolaka). Above the triangular flow of the energies of the Yoni, it is at the apex of the breath and, checking this triple flow, induces merger into the supreme state.[1] Thus from the Void of Oḍḍiyāna arises the undifferentiated (niṣkala) exhaled breath (prāṇa) of the Sun in Jālandhara. Its movement generates the Moon of inhaled breath (apāna), which is full and 'filling' (pūraka) in Pūrṇagiri. These three are Rudra's undivided fertilizing energy, which is Kāmarūpa present within the pure seminal potency of consciousness. Tisra is the bliss of the Yoni (bhagāhlāda). Finally, Koṅkaṇa is the condition of supreme repose. It is the supreme state where the Yoga, transcendent and immanent, that penetrates into the Space (ākāśa) of supreme reality, practiced in the seat Tisra attains its ultimate goal. Thus is it the symbol (bimba) of renunciation (tyāga) of the other seats and their states, which is the liberated condition.[2]

Similarly, elsewhere we find the six seats equated with six Liṅgas. The first five correspond, amongst other things, to the five gross elements. Tisra, the fifth as Space represents the flow (prasara) of pure extinction (nirvāṇa). The Koṅkaṇa Liṅga bestows repose in Koṅkaṇa, that is, liberation.[3] Each of the seats contains a Kula, that is to say, a goddess or 'energy'. The one Kula is sixfold as the six Kulas. These six are the Divine Current of the sacred seats, their inner form within the stream of the energy of the goddess. Projected into the corners of the hexagram, together they form a single Kula. At the same time they are six, each represented by a goddess and her corresponding energy (kalā or mudrā) along with the six Siddhas who are the Current or Transmission of the Siddhas (siddhaugha, siddhakrama).[4]

---

[1] KuKh 60/62 ff..
[2] KuKh 60/83ff..
[3] KuKh 58/52cd-53ab.
[4] KuKh 61/23 ff. These groups of six are part of six groups epitomized by the six seats and projected into the hexagram surrounding the triangle in the centre of the maṇḍala. Summing up our text says:

> The six sacred seats are the six blisses. (In fact there is only) one sacred seat which is of six kinds*. (These aspects are made manifest) by the awakening of the sixfold reality (artha) and reflection of the four parts (pāda of the central Triangle).
>
> The six sacred seats, the group of six Siddhas, the six kinds of goddesses of the sacred seats, the six Gestures, the (maṇḍala with) six parts, the six Ages: (these are all) termed groups of

Just as the fifth seat is almost invariably Tisra, otherwise called Mātaṅga,[1] the sixth is Candra or Koṅkaṇa.[2] In the least sophisticated, more basic presentations, Candrapīṭha is the Point (bindu) that, along with the Half Moon (represented by Trisrota), crowns a seed-syllable mantra.[3] As the sixth of the set of eight seats described in the YKh, it is identified with the centre above the palate that drips Śiva's lunar nectar.[4] 'Externally' one would expect it to be also identified with Candrapura, but this is not the case probably because it was first conceived solely in the context of the evolving abstract symbolism of the system.

The sacred seat of the Moon is unknown to the KMT and the ŚM. The commentator on the ṢSS discerns references to it in the ṢSS in a couple of places. In one place the ṢSS refers in a nondescript way to the 'venerable seat' (śrīpīṭha) where the six disciples of the earlier Kaula tradition founded by Matsyendranātha are the custodians of its 'pure knowledge' (vimalajñāna).[5] The commentary explains that: 'The pure knowledge of the Siddhas is in the venerable sacred seat, that is, the sacred seat of the Moon'.[6] In this context the seat of the Moon may be identified with the Island of the Moon where Matysendranātha propagated the Kaula teachings. Elsewhere the ṢSS says of Mālinī who resides in the 'ocean of (lunar) nectar' in the Void of the End of the Twelve and impels the movement of the vital breath[7] that:

This is the Moon (candrā)[8] of the Womb of the Moon, the six. The six with (their) thirty-six divisions constitute the illumination of the knowledge of the group of six. KuKh 60/98-100ab.

---

*Cf. KuKh 60/49cd-50.

[1] See KuKh 6/171cd-172ab. Although the fifth of the set of six seats described in chapters sixty and sixty-one of the KuKh is called Tisra there (KuKh 60/28, 67cd-68), rather than Mātaṅga, the goddess who resides in that seat is called Mātaṅgasamayā – lit. the Rule of the Sweepers (KuKh 61/14cd-15ab) or just Mātaṅgī (KuKh 61/27, 35cd-36ab).

[2] Koṅkaṇa is the third seat out of the six that form the audible part of the syllable HSKHPHREṀ. All the seats in this case are in a peculiar serial order, accounting for this unique exception. See KuKh 9/3cd-4.

[3] This is the case with AIṀ noted above, p. 106.

[4] See below, p. 702.

[5] Pure knowledge is in the venerable seat by the (grace of the) Command of the Kula of the jewel-like Siddhas that is, by (the six Siddhas) Ānanda and the rest (who were Matsyendra's disciples) by the gracing and restraint of the (whole) universe.

śrīpīṭhe [k kh: -pīṭha] vimalajñānaṁ [k kh: -na] siddharatnakulājñayā |
ānandādyena [k kh: -khyena] jagato nigrahānugraheṇa ca || ṢSS 44/75.

[6] śrīpīṭhe candrapīṭhe vimalajñānaṁ [kh: -na] nirmalajñānaṁ siddhānām | Comm. on ṢSS 44/75ab.

[7] ṢSS 28/42-48ab.

[8] Note the feminine form of this normally masculine noun.

> moonlight of the plane of the Doomsday Fire (vāḍavīpada). Fire is within the Womb of the Moon. She has arisen out of the middle of that. That is the sacred seat and she is in the middle of it possessing the Womb of the Moon.[1]

The commentary explains that the goddess Kubjikā is Mālinī who is Kuṇḍalinī and the Doomsday Fire (vaḍavāgni) in the centre of the 'Womb of the Moon', that is, in the Triangle in the End of the Twelve. The energy of the New Moon (amākalā) is called the sacred seat of the Moon.[2]

An account of the six seats in the YKh similarly identifies the sacred seat of the Moon with Kālī's abode, where she resides as the 'crooked' Kuṇḍalinī 'endowed with Śiva's energy (śivakalā)'.[3] We have seen that Kālī is the New Moon and Kubjikā's original identity when she goes to the Island of the Moon. Similarly, the two identifications are coordinated in the later sources by attributing the creative energy of the First Seat, which is generally Oḍḍiyāna, to this one. We find a precursor of this conception in the ṢSS, which says:

> The group of four (sacred seats) that has originated from the sacred seat on the peaks of the Stone has brought down the divine Krama into the triple universe.[4]

The Stone (śilā) is where the goddess assumed the form of a Liṅga on the Island of the Moon. It is the Mountain of the Moon, the Triple Peak Mountain – Trikūṭa. We have seen that this is the Triangle at the End of the Twelve, which in later sources is sometimes identified with the sacred seat of the Moon – thus implying that the entire Triangle with all the seats is worshipped as Candrapīṭha. In this perspective, the Ṭīkā explains with regard to the triangular grid (prastāra) of fifty letters, each located in its own seat:

> There are fifty sacred seats. There, amongst (them), a group of six seats is the essence (of the others), namely: 1) Oḍḍiyāṇa 2)

---

[1] candragarbhasya candreyaṁ vāḍavīpadacandrikā ||
candragarbhe sthito hy agnis tasya madhyāt samutthitā |
tat pīṭhaṁ tasya madhyasthā candragarbhasamanvitā || ṢSS 28/48cd-49.
[2] tad eva amākalā candrapīṭham ucyate | Ibid. commentary.
[3] YKh (1) 15/80ab.
[4] śilāśekharapīṭhāc ca yaj jātaṁ [k kh: jñātaṁ] tu catuṣṭayam ||
tenāvatāritaṁ divyaṁ kramaṁ caiva jagattraye | ṢSS 43/20cd-21ab.

> Jālāndhara 3) Pūrṇagiri 4) Kāmarūpa 5) Trisrota and 6) Candrapīṭha. This is the group of six sacred seats (pīṭhaṣaṭka). [. . .] The group of four seats out of the group of six seats is (their) essence. However, in order to be able to bring them together collectively (saṁgrahaṇārtha), the seat Oḍḍiyāṇa is in the middle of the three and, its nature Bhairavī, pervades (them): (as such, it) is the one main sacred seat (mūlapīṭha). The main sacred seat is the source (yoni) (and aggregate of all of them together in a potential form). The sacred seats have arisen from its presence, that is, from the will (icchā) with the three seats, that is Kāmarūpa, Pūrṇagiri and Jālandhara in the grid (prastāra). Oḍḍiyāṇa is in the centre and pervades (them). For this reason, it should always be worshipped with (these) three seats as an aspect that is equal (to each one of them) (samāṁśena).
>
> (It is said that) 'Pervasion (vyāpti) proceeds from Candrapīṭha.' The pervasion and emanation (sṛṣṭi) of these four sacred seats arises from Candrapīṭha, that is, from the aforementioned Triple Peak mountain, which is the bliss of the supreme light.[1]

Unlike Candrapīṭha, Koṅkaṇapīṭha is clearly intended to be understood as both the geographical region and inner seat. Initially, however, Koṅkaṇa appears as just one of eight secondary seats (upapīṭha)[2] in relation to the system of eight major seats described in the YKh. This is probably because when this part of the YKh was redacted Koṅkaṇa had not yet become the main centre of the Kubjikā tradition where most of the subsequent texts and a large part of the YKh itself were redacted. Unknown to the KMT as a seat, subsequently, when the later parts of the YKh were produced, Koṅkaṇa comes into its own as the sixth and most prestigious seat.[3] In chapter thirty-eight of the KuKh, which is one of the three

---

[1] pañcāśat [k kh: pañcāśa] pīṭhāḥ | tatra madhye pīṭhaṣaṭkaṁ sārabhūtaṁ | yathā oḍḍiyāṇa [k kh: au-] – jālandhara [k kh: jālāndhara] – pūrṇagiri – kāmarūpa – tristrota [k kh: tisrota] – candrapīṭhā [k kh: -pīṭha] iti pīṭhaṣaṭkam | [. . .] pīṭhaṣaṭkamadhye [kh: -ṣaṭkaṁ-] pīṭhacatuṣkaṁ sārabhūtaṁ vartate || kintu teṣāṁ saṁgrahaṇārtham oḍḍiyāṇapīṭham [k kh: -ṇārthaṁ auḍḍi-] trayāṇāṁ madhye bhairavīrūpaṁ vyāpakaṁ mūlapīṭhaṁ bhaved ekam | iti mūlapīṭhaṁ yoniḥ | tatsakāśād [k: -sād] icchārūpāt pīṭhā [k kh: pīṭhāḥ] utpannās tribhiḥ [kh: tibhiḥ] pīṭhair iti [k kh: pīṭhāḥ iti] kā – pū – jāprastāre | oḍḍiyāṇaṁ [k: uḍiyāṇaṁ; kh: ūḍḍiyāṇaṁ] madhye vyāpakam | etasmāt kāraṇāt [kh: tāraṇā] tribhiḥ pīṭhaiḥ [k kh: pīṭhāḥ] samāṁśena pūjayen nityaṁ [k: pūjayet-; k kh: – niścayaś] | candrapīṭhād [k kh: -ṭhā] bhaved [kh: bhavet] vyāptiḥ | ity eṣāṁ [k kh: ityeṣā] pīṭhacaturṇāṁ candrapīṭhāt [k: -pīṭha; kh: -pīṭhā] pūrvoktatrikūṭaparvatāt paraprakāśānandarūpād [k kh: paraṁ prakāśamā-] vyāptiḥ sṛṣṭir bhavati [k kh: sṛṣṭibhavanti] || Ṭ MS K fl. 4a-4b.

[2] See below, p. 697, note 1.

[3] Perhaps the manner in which the Liṅga is characterized in the following reference as 'just born' reflects also the outer historical reality of the founding of a new but nonetheless most important versions of the Root Sūtra, Candrapīṭha is identified with Koṅkaṇa. It is located, as usual, above Tisra.[1] In several schemes in the MBT, it replaces Candrapīṭha. Thus the KuKh proclaims that even if one worships the other five seats, success is impossible without worshipping this one.[2] Accordingly, it is projected into the very centre of the maṇḍala – the place reserved for the first seat from which the power and authority of the other five seats are derived.[3] The sources correctly locate it in the Deccan.[4] Moreover, we are told that it was revealed by Ṣaṣṭhīśa.[5] Normally the Siddha called Ṣaṣṭha is associated with Pūrṇagiri. Here, perhaps, we have a covert reference to the Kadamba king Ṣaṣṭhadeva who ruled Koṅkaṇa in the eleventh century when Candrapura was the capital.[6] So just as this now becomes the supreme seat, the epitome of liberation itself, Kubjikā is here in her supreme form as Koṅkaṇā[7] who, portrayed as the tribal Śavarī, is the goddess of all the seats.[8]

The Six Sacred Seats of Tripurabhairavī

One projection of the sacred seats, described in YKh (1) is of special historical interest and so worth mentioning here. It is part of the liturgy (krama) of the goddess Tripurabhairavī who in this modality is worshipped alone (ekavīrā), without her partner. This goddess, who is an immediate precursor of the much better-known goddess Tripurasundarī, is not worshipped in Śrīcakra. An intermediary between the goddess Kubjikā and Tripurasundarī (i.e. Śrīvidyā), she emerges from the same pleroma of divine forms, as does the former. Thus we notice the presence of some of the divine forms, namely the goddesses Raudrī, Mālinī, Klinnā and Raktā that are also incorporated in the goddess Kubjikā. Tripurabhairavī's seed-syllable is AIṀ as is that of Kubjikā who precedes her in time and Śrīvidyā who appears after her. Note also that the triangle in the centre of Tripurabhairavī's maṇḍala is called the 'city of three cities' (tripurapura) from seat: Just born, (it bestows) authority and repose in Koṁkaṇa. Then it is Koṁkaṇa Liṅga. KuKh 58/52cd-53ab.

---

[1] KuKh 38/3.

[2] KuKh 60/74.

[3] In the place where their authority will be is the best sacred seat, namely Koṁkaṇa that bestows authority. KuKh 60/78.

[4] KuKh 60/71.

[5] KuKh 60/73.

[6] All these and other matters related to Koṅkaṇa and its capital Candrapura will be discussed at length in another chapter of this introduction.

[7] Established in the centre of Śiva who is perfectly complete, she is Koṁkaṇā, the deity of the left (vāma). The energy (kalā) Śāṅkarī manifests by the conjunction of the left and the right (currents of the breath). KuKh 61/25.

[8] KuKh 61/10-12ab.

which she derives her name. Although not evident in this passage, this Triangle is the same as the one in the centre of both Kubjikā's maṇḍala and Śrīcakra. Thus Tripurabhairavī's maṇḍala mediates between the two traditions. Śrīvidyā retains her link with the earlier Tripurabhairavī by incorporating her liturgy (krama) into that of the ascending series of goddesses worshipped in the preliminaries to her worship. Essentially the youthful goddess Kāmeśvarī, she is assimilated into the goddess Kubjikā as one of her three aspects, which we will have occasion to discuss further ahead. The following passage describes the progressive emanation of the Triangle and Hexagram in which the goddess is worshipped. The goddesses, like those in Śrīcakra, are without partners. They emanate in a series from one another and take their place in the inner sacred sites emitted with them in the maṇḍala. Tripurabhairavī, as Ekavīrā is the Yakṣiṇī Raudrī in the centre.

> That Yakṣiṇī who is Raudrī, the energy of Supreme Śiva[1] is aroused by the five arrows (of Kāmadeva). She plays in the Wheel of Fire and moves in the first day of the bright lunar fortnight into the hexagram. By churning (the two breaths), Sun and Moon, she looks beautiful in the Triangle within the maṇḍala and is endowed with the six (parts of the Hexagram). Above time and in front within the excellent city of the three cities (tripura) (i.e. the Triangle), she is divided into the divisions (of the triangle and the hexagram).[2]
>
> She who is one and who flows forth perpetually in many aspects (bheda) is the Transmental, (the goddess) called Bhagā. Vāgbhava (AIṀ), which is the passion (kāmarūpa) of the universe and the first of the three seed-syllables (kūṭa),[3] arises within her. In this way there are three Siddhas[4] in the beginning who, possessing the passion of the Moon, are on the upper path. She is the pure plane in the sacred seat and, endowed with the body of (all the) energies (sakala), is Mālinī on the upper path.[5]

---

[1] MS G reads: paramathitakalā – i.e. the energy that has been churned by the supreme (god).

[2] *yā sā yakṣiṇī [k: rakṣāni; gh: rakṣā ; ṅ: raktāni] raudrī paramaśivakalā [g: paramathita-] kṣobhitā pañcabāṇaiḥ krīḍantī vahnicakre carati pratipade [k, gh, ṅ: -daṁ] śuklapakṣe ṣaḍaśre | trikoṇe maṇḍalānte raviśaśimathanāt śobhate [k, gh: sobhave; ṅ: sāṁbhave] ṣaṭprayuktā *kālasyordhve purastāttripurapuravare [ṅ: tri -] bhedabhinnasvarūpā || YKh (1) 43/1.

[3] Assuming that the other two syllables, like the first are part of the same triad (trikūṭa) projected into Kubjikā's triangle, they are HRĪṀ and ŚRĪṀ.

[4] Presumably, the three Siddhas in this case are the three seed-syllables.

[5] ekā sānekabhedaiḥ [k, gh, ṅ: -dai] prasarati satataṁ [ṅ: śa-] unmanā sā bhagākhyā [k, gh, ṅ: -kṣī]
*tasyāṁ [gh: tasyā] kūṭatrayādyaṁ [k, gh: -pādhyā; ṅ: -trayāvyā] udayati jagato vāgbhavaṁ kāmarūpam [k, gh: kāma * *; ṅ: kāmaṁ * ] |

In the centre, in the sacred seat called Kāma, passion (madana) gives rise to passion (madayati) and is the seat of Uḍa within power (kalā). The venerable (seat) Pūrṇa is in the wheel on the left and emanates the energy of the Moon in the seat of the Moon (candrapīṭha) in front of that. The divine seat of Kulūta emanates (its energy) (kalayati) into the energized (sakala) head of Kolla on the right. (The energy of the goddess) penetrates into the venerable Ujjayanī on the left in due order  with the six sacred seats beginning with that. She who is in the Wheel of the Hexagram is Bhairavī, the mother of persistence and destruction; by the expansion of consciousness (bodhavṛddhi), (she is also) Avvā, Klinnā, Raktā, Bhagavatī, and Pulinī: I bow (to her who, in all these forms, is) the venerable Ekavīrā.[1]

Diagram 7. The Six Seats of Tripurabhairavī

---
santy evaṁ [k, gh, ṅ" śakty aivaṁ] trīṇi siddhāḥ śaśimadanayutā ūrdhvamārge purastāt [k, gh, ṅ: purastā]
pīṭhe [ṅ: pīṭhai] śuddhā daśā ca [k, gh, ṅ: daśaiśca] sakalatanuyutā mālinī ūrdhvamārge ||
YKh (1) 43/2.

[1] madhye kāmākhyapīṭhe [k, gh, ṅ: kāmākṣapīṭhe] madayati [k, gh, ṅ: jamayati] madanaṁ [k: yadanaṁ; gh, ṅ: padanaṁ] uḍapīṭhaṁ [k, gh, ṅ: ḍaḍa-] kalāyām śrīpūrṇaṁ vāmacakre sṛjati śaśikalāṁ [k, gh, ṅ: -lā] candrapīṭhe [gh: cadra-; ṅ: pīṭha] tadagre [ṅ: bhedagre] | *pīṭhaṁ [k, gh: pīṭha] kaulūtadivyaṁ kalayati sakale [ṅ: -laṁ] dakṣiṇe kollaśīrṣe [ṅ: ko * śīrṣe]*
*vāme śrī – ujjayanyāṁ [gh: -nyā] kramati kramavaśāt [k, gh, ṅ: -vaśā] * tatpīṭhādi [ṅ: tapīṭhādi] ṣaḍbhiḥ [k, gh: sadbhiḥ]* || yā vai [k, gh, ṅ: vye] ṣaṭkoṇacakre sthitilayajananī bhairavī bodhavṛddhyā [k, gh: -vṛdyo; ṅ: -rūpā] avvā [k, gh, ṅ: adhvā] klinnā tu [k, gh: sta; ṅ: su] raktā [k, gh: rakṣā] bhagavatipulinī śrī – ekavīrāṁ [k, gh: evavīrā; ṅ: evavīrāṁ] namāmi || YKh (1) 43/3-4.

The Major Seats according to the Yogakhaṇḍa

Although the YKh manipulates the configurations of four, five and six seats in a manner common to the rest of the later Kubjikā Tantras and also in novel ways,[1] it teaches an alternative, parallel set of rites and mantras linked to the sacred seats in sets of four, eight and six seats.[2] The set of eight seats is the most 'complete' scheme. A maṇḍala – called 'Śrīpīṭha' – is drawn especially for them which is the focus of a complex and extensive rite to which the YKh repeatedly refers as basic to its distinctive praxis. The set of four seats, morphologically closely related to that of eight, although differing in several details, appears to be a 'condensed' (or original?) form of it that can be used with greater ease in shorter, less complex rites. The group of six seats is more closely related to the seats described in the first chapters of the KMT, although distinct from them. It appears to function, partially at least, as a bridge between the other two schemes in the YKh and the one in the KMT.

The basic model of sixteen units we have observed in relation to the seats in the KMT may well have influenced the scheme of the contents of the four seats in YKh each of which consists of sixteen entities. This layout is most extensively worked out in the YKh first in relation to the four seats and then in relation to the expanded worship of eight seats. Together the sixteen units of each seat make a total of sixty-four – another significantly symbolic figure. This configuration, with different contents, is projected into the expanded version in such a way that each of the eight seats consists of sixty-four units governed by eight goddesses. We notice that this format appears already in the maṇḍala of the Brahmayāmala, although there is no reference to the sacred seats there. It is replicated in the deployment of the sixty-four Yoginīs governed by eight Mothers of which one of the earliest examples is in chapter thirteen of the TS.[3] Note also in the following eulogy of the four seats in the YKh, their combination with four principles. These are essentially the extra four seats that make up the set of eight seats in the expanded version. Thus Oḍḍiyāna in the condensed version of four seats is related

---

[1] The group of five seats are also occasionally worshipped in relationship to the Five Elements and the Five Pranavas. While that is common practice, an interesting connection is made in the YKh, not found elsewhere (even though the Tantra declares that they are essential), between the five seats and the fingers of the hand and the goddess's faces. Oḍḍiyāna, Jālandhara, Pūrṇagiri, Kāmarūpa and Tisra are projected onto the fingers of the left hand from the thumb to the little finger, respectively. The right hand similarly accommodates five of the goddess's faces with the sixth transcendent beyond. These projections serve to energize the conjunctions of the fingers and hands when they are formed into the gestures (mudrā) that are displayed in the course of the rite of adoration. YKh (1) 24/99-104ab.

[2] See above, p. 584-585.

[3] These points will be discussed in detail in another publication.

to the Supreme Energy. This is Kālikā who 'descends' into the seat Tisra that is located at the End of Sound. Jālandhara is said to be the Unmanifest – avyakta – that is the eighth seat. Pūrṇagiri is associated with the principle of Sound – nāda – this is the seventh seat. Kāmarūpa is linked to the principle of the lunar Point (bindu) that corresponds to Candrapīṭha – the Seat of the Moon, which is the sixth one.

> Oṁkārapīṭha – Oḍḍiyāna:[1] (The sacred seat) Oṁkāra is in the centre.[2] It is white and is the supreme energy. Oḍikā, (the goddess who resides here) is the mother Carcikā (of this seat). The god is called (Navātman) Bhairava and (his) body is formed with nine (letters). (This is) the sacred seat, the great current of the Command. (The goddess here is) Raktāvvā. The division is that which begins with KĀ. The House is the House Apara and the tree is the Kadambaka. The cave is called Śṛṅgāṭa (Water-chestnut) and the cremation ground is Kāravīra, the monastery is the Mathanakula (Kula of Churning). The gesture is Kārālyā and it sustains the Krama that is supreme (transcendent) and inferior (immanent) and the Samayā Raudra. The current is that of the Aged, the mother is Maṅgalā who removes the impurity of the Age of Strife. (This), the First Seat (ādipīṭha), is Śivahood. (This) is the sacred seat of the Rudra called Ucchuṣma. It is endowed with the most excellent Vaṭuka and the guardian of the field is called Vara. I praise the first sacred seat, the abode of many qualities, divided into sixteen divisions.[3]

---

[1] The following account of the sacred seats is given in verse set to the metre śardūlavikrīḍita.
[2] mūrdhni jātaṁ lit. ' on the head'.
[3] The variants labelled '2' are those of the version of this passage in YKh (2).

.okāraṁ [k, kh, gh: uṁkāraṁ] mūrdhni [k, gh: sūpti; ṅ: mūrtti] jātaṁ sitaparamakalā [ṅ: śita-]
.oḍikā [k, kh, gh: ūḍikā; ṅ: uḍikā] carcikāvvā [k: -kārthā; kh: caccikārthā; gh: -ryā; ṅ: -rā] devaṁ śrībhairavākhyaṁ navatanuracitaṁ pīṭham ājñāmahaugham [k, kh, gh: -mahoghaṁ; ṅ: -mājā-] | raktāvvā [k, kh, gh: -dvā; ṅ: rakṣātvā] kādibhedaṁ [gh: -bhede; 2: kālikāmvā] gṛham aparagṛhaṁ vṛkṣa-kādambakaṁ ca śṛṅgāṭākhyā [k, kh: -dhākhyā; gh: -dyakhyā; ṅ: -khyāṁ] guhā ca maṭha-mathanakulaṁ [gh: mayamakulaṁ; ṅ: maḍha-] kāravīraṁ śmaśānam [kh: śmāsānaṁ; gh: missing; ṅ: sma-] || kārālyā [ṅ: karāṇyā] nāma [sarve: vāca] mudrā kramam aparaparaṁ samayāraudraṁ [k, kh, gh: camayā-; ṅ: samapa-] bibharti [k, kh, gh: vibhaṁti] *vṛddhaughaṁ [k, kh, gh: vṛddhoghaṁ; ṅ: vṛddhokaṁ] maṅgalāvvā [k, kh, gh: rthā; ṅ: maṅgalā ] kalikaluṣaharā ādipīṭhaṁ [k, kh, gh: -pāṭhaṁ] śivatvam [kh, ṅ: śivatve] | ucchuṣmākhyaṁ [all MSs: -khyā] rudrapīṭhaṁ [ṅ: raudra-] varavaṭukayutaṁ kṣetrapālaṁ [k, gh: -pālāṁ; kh: -pālā] varākhyam

Jālandhara: The sacred seat Jāla is the Unmanifest (avyakta). It is well placed[1] in the southern quarter. It is black and called the most excellent (vara). The mother (avvā) is the venerable lioness (śrīsiṁhā)[2] Kālikā. It bestows the boon of the mantra of nine (letters i.e. Navātman).[3] The tree is called Bilva. The cave is called Ratnā; it contains the best Rule (samayavarabhṛtā) and is well known by the name 'Vīra'. The cremation ground is called Laguḍa. The sacred seat (i.e. maṭha?) Ūṣma, very fierce, is pure in heaven and on the earth. The gesture is Vikārālyā, which removes the fear of phenomenal existence. Conjoined with the (secret) language and the Choma, this is the unstruck sound (anāhata) of Jālāvvā. Well known as the Vidyā(-pīṭha), the three worlds bow to it. Accomplished, divine, with six faces, giving supreme bliss, the guardian of the field is called 'Jaya'. I praise the sacred seat Jāla, revered by the gods, which is divided into sixteen divisions.[4]

---

*vande 'haṁ ādyapīṭhaṁ [gh: -ṭha; 2: ādi-] bahuguṇanilayaṁ [k, kh, gh: bahugukta-; ṅ: va * guṇa-] ṣoḍaśair [gh: ṣoḍaśer] bhedabhinnam* || YKh (1) 13/2-3 = YKh (2) 3/2-3.

After the passage describing a seat in the YKh we note the corresponding mantra in the SKh (see MS G fol. 49b-50a). The mantras are presented in the reverse order in the SKh with respect to the YKh, that is, beginning with the mantra of Kāmarūpa and ending with that of Oḍḍiyāna.

aiṁ 5 śrīparamakalātattve śrī – oḍḍiyāṇapīṭhe *[k: -āṇa-; kh: oḍiyāṇa-; k, kh, g: -pīṭha] śrī oḍḍāvvā [k: oḍḍāṁvā; kh: oḍāvvā; g: missing] śrīcarcikādevī hyrlvhrai/ [kh: hslai/; g: hyayalavahraiṁ] śrīmahāmudrāpīṭha śrīmaṅgalāvvā [k: -lāṁvā] śrī – ādhāranātha śrīraktāvvā [k: -raktāṁvā] śrī [g: missing] udayanātha [g: missing] śrīkadaṁbavṛkṣa śrīśṛṅgāṭaguhā śrīmanthānamaṭha śrīkaravīraśmaśāna śrīkarālamudrāyai śrīmahāraudrasamaya [g: -samamayama] śrīvṛddhakrama [k: śrīvṛkṣa-; kh: śrīvṛkṣa; g: missing] śrīvṛddhakramādhikāra-pādukāṁ [k: * * * *ādhikārapā; kh: * vṛddha-; g: yīvṛddha-] pūjayāmi* ||

[1] YKh (2): blissful (mudita).

[2] Kālikā, like Kubjikā, is said to be a lioness. This is because these goddesses are the leaders (nāyikā) of a Kula tradition (āmnāya) each of which is said to be a 'teaching of the Lion' (śiṁhadarśana) as they are all based on the transmission of the Command which takes place by means of the teacher's empowering gaze, as fierce and powerful as that of a lion (siṁhāvalokana).

[3] The readings in YKh (2) (i.e. MS k: navamunalatanu and MS kh: navamunastatanu) suggest the emendation navamṛdulatanu, that is, '(the seat whose) body is new and tender'.

[4] avyaktaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: avyakte] jālapīṭhaṁ yamadiśi sugataṁ [2: muditaṁ] kṛṣṇavarṇaṁ [k, kh, gh: kṛṣṇaṁ-] varākhyaṁ [sarve: varekhyaṁ]
śrīsiṁhā [gh: śrīsiddhāṁ; 2: k: madhya; kh: madhye] kālikāvvā [k, kh, gh: kālikārthā; ṅ: -kārvā] navamanuvaradaṁ [k, kh: mananucavaradaṁ; gh: manunucavaradaṁ; ṅ: manatuvaradaṁ; 2: k: navamunalatanu; kh: navamunastatanu = navamṛdulatanu] bilvavṛkṣābhidhānam [k, gh: -nāṁ; kh: vilvaṁ- -nāṁ; ṅ: vituvṛkṣābhidhānaṁ] | *ratnākhyātā [ṅ: yannākhyātā] guhā yā [k, kh, gh: guhāṁ ; ṅ: -yāṁ] samayavarabhṛtā [k, kh, gh: saharabhapadaṁ; ṅ: sahavarabhayaṁ] vīrasaṁjñā prasiddhā [k, kh, gh: prasiddhāṁ; ṅ: prasiddhaṁ; 2: prasiddhaṁ]

Pūrṇagiri: Pūrṇapīṭha is called Sound (nāda). Endowed with all the energies, it is yellow and on the path on the left. (The Mother there is) Pūrṇāmbā and is the Mantrapīṭha. The three worlds bow to the famed Caryānātha (who resides here). The tree, (well) known on the surface of the earth, is called Kārañja.[1] The mother here is called Carcikā. The cave is called Vyāghrā; (well) known in the three worlds, it bestows accomplishment (siddhi) to Kaulikas. Śrīnātha is there in (that) sacred seat, his ninefold body[2] replete; he is famed in the Middle Lineage (oli). The cremation ground, which brings fear to the fettered, is Ekakoṇa. The gesture there is Kiṁkiṇī. (It possesses) divine authority in the Kaula (tradition), endowed with the most excellent Vaṭuka, (while) the guardian of the field is Pauṇḍara. It is well known (as being) in the left part (of the Triangle) and, divided into sixteen divisions, bow (your) head (to it).[3] śmaśānaṁ [k, kh, gh: smaśāṁtaṁ; ṅ: smaśānaṁ] laguḍākhyaṁ [k, kh, ṅ: laṁgulākhyaṁ; gh: laṁgulākhya] divi [gh: ṭhivi] bhuvi vimalaṁ ūṣmapīṭhaṁ [k, kh, gh: ūṣpa-] mahogram || *vikarālyā [k, kh, gh: vikanālā] ca [k, kh: viva; gh: vi ] mudrā bhavabhayaharaṇī bhāṣayā chomayuktā [k, kh, gh: chodmayuktā; ṅ: chomayuktā]

jālāvvānāhato 'yaṁ [k, kh: jālārthā-; gh: jālārthānāhatoya; ṅ: jālādhvā-] tribhuvananamitaṁ vidyayā [k, kh, gh: vidyayo] suprasiddham [all MSs: -siddhi] | *siddhaṁ divyaṁ ṣaḍāsyaṁ [ṅ: ṣaḍāśa] paramabhayakaraṁ [k, gh: -suṣakaraṁ; kh, ṅ: -sukhakaraṁ; 2: kh: -bha * karaṁ] kṣetrapālaṁ jayākhyaṁ [k, kh, gh: -khya]*
vande 'haṁ jālapīṭhaṁ tridaśasuranutaṁ [k, gh: tridaśamuranutaṁ; ṅ: -tutaṁ; 2: -gaṇanutaṁ] ṣoḍaśair bhedabhinnam [kh: -bhiḍaṁ; ṅ: -tedativraṁ] || YKh (1) 13/4-5 = YKh (2) 3/3.
aiṁ 5 śrī – avyaktatattve śrījālandharapīṭhe *[k, kh, g: -pīṭha] śrījālāvvā [k: -lāṁvā; g: -jālavvā] śrīmahākālī [g: -kāli] devī hyrlvhrūṁ [k: hyrlvhū/; kh: shlvhrūṁ; g: hyayaralavahrū] śrīmahāsamayapīṭha [kh: śrīsamaya-] śrīvimalāvvā [k: -lāṁvā; kh: -viśālāvvā; g: -visāllāvvā] śrīcakrīśanātha [g: -cakrīsa-] śrīkarālāvvā [k: -lāṁvā; kh: -kamalāvvā] śrī – anantanātha śrīkalpavṛkṣa śrīratnaguhā śrīśaṁkhamaṭha [g: -saṁkha-] śrīlaguḍaśmaśāna [k: -laṅguvyu-; kh: -laṁguḍa-; g: -laguḍā-] śrīvikarālamudrāyai śrīmahāvīrasamaya [k g: * mahā-; kh: -samayavīra] śrīkhecarakrama śrījñānādhikārapādukāṁ [g: -nājñādhikārapā ] pūjayāmi aiṁ 5 [g: 3] || dakṣakoṇe [k: dakṣiṇa-]

[1] According to YKh (2), the tree here is the Kāṭāha.

[2] Each of the Siddhas of the sacred seats is an embodiment of the seed-syllable Navātman and so their body is 'ninefold'.

[3] *nādākhyaṁ [k, kh, ṅ: -khye; gh: -khya] pūrṇapīṭhaṁ [*Missing from here to mantrapīṭhaṁ in YKh (1)] sakalakalayutaṁ vāmamārge ca pītaṁ pūrṇāmbā mantrapīṭhaṁ [2 k, kh: matra-] tribhuvananamitaṁ caryanāthaṁ [k, kh, gh: caryanārtha] prasiddhaṁ | vṛkṣaṁ kārañjakākhyaṁ [2: kāṭāhasaṁjñaṁ] viditabhuvi [ṅ: -tuvi] tale carcikākhyātra [ṅ: carccikākṣātra; 2: -khyā ca] avvā [k, kh, gh: arthā; ṅ: aṁvā; 2: pūrvā + śrīnāthaṁ tatra pīṭhe navatanuracitaṁ ājñayā suprasiddham] vyāghrākhyātā [ṅ: vyāghrākṣyātā] guhā ca [k, kh, gh: va] tribhuvanaviditā [ṅ: -vaditā] siddhidā [gh: -kā] kaulikānāṁ ||

Kāmarūpa: Kāmarūpa, beautifully red (surakta), the abode of many qualities, is in authority over the principle of the Point. (Present there is) Kāmāvvā, who is passion (kāmabhūtā), and Siddhayogeśvarī, the mother of the fear of the fettered. Navātman is the reality. Uḍḍīśa is the Siddhanātha, adorned with all the qualities and very large (bhūribhūta), he is the Lord Navātman who removes the impurity of the Age of Strife. (This seat) is well known as the Mudrāpīṭha. Passionate (rakta), it is called Mahocchuṣma to which the three worlds bow, and the cave is called Candra. This is the auspicious and best of monasteries (maṭha) and it is accomplished (siddha) on the basis of the lineage (santānapūrva) of Siddhas. The guardian of the field is the lord (īśa) Kāma. The gesture (here) is called 'Kāma'. I praise the Vaṭukanātha Piṅgala (the Tawny One) who is on the same plane as the Innate (sahaja). I praise Kāmarūpa, which gives much bliss and is divided into sixteen divisions.[1]

śrīnāthaṁ tatra pīṭhe navatanubharitaṁ [ṅ: tavatanuracitaṁ] madhyamolyāṁ [k, kh, gh: madhyamālyāṁ] prasiddham | [This and the previous line replaced in 2 by: vyāghrākhyātā [k, kh: vyāgrākhyānā] guhā vaktraṁ [k: vaktrama] divi [kh: cakra-] viditaṁ khecaraṁ suprasiddhaṁ [k, kh: suprasīdaṁ]
śmaśānaṁ [ṅ: smaśānaṁ] hy ekakoṇaṁ [k, kh: eka ekolaṁ; gh: eka ekonaṁ; ṅ: ekakoṭāṁ] paśujanabhayakṛt [gh: -ta; 2: paśubhayajananaṁ] kiṅkiṇī tatra [kh: tratra] mudrā [2: kiṅkiṇīmudrayā ca] |
kaule [k, kh, gh: kāle] divyādhikāraṁ [k, kh: divyodhikāraṁ; gh: divyāṁdhikāraṁ; 2: kauloghādyādhikāraṁ] varavaṭukayutaṁ [gh: -yute; 2: mada-] pauṇḍaraṁ [gh: poṁḍara] kṣetrapālam [k, kh, gh: kṣatra-; ṅ: kṣetravālaṁ] vāmāṁśe ca [ṅ: na; 2: tat] prasiddhaṁ praṇamata śirasā ṣoḍaśair bhedabhinnam [ṅ: poṣagair] bhedabhinnam || YKh (1) 13/6-7 = YKh (2) 3/6-7.
aiṁ 5 śrīnādatattve śrīpūrṇagiripīṭhe [k, kh, g: -pīṭha] śrīpūrṇāvvā [k: -ṇāṁvā] śrīmahālakṣmī [g: -lakṣmi] devī hyrlvhrī/ [kh: mhrlvhrī/; g: hyaralavahrīṁ] śrīmahāmantrapīṭha śrīkamalāvvā [k: -lāṁvā] śrīkuraṅgīśanātha śrīcaṇḍākṣī avvā [k: aṁvā] śrīpiṅgalanātha śrībilvavṛkṣa śrīvyāghraguhā śrīvimalamaṭha śrīkoṅkaṇaśmaśāna [g: -pakoṇa-] śrīkiṅkiṇīmudrāyai śrīmahāyogasamaya [k g: nāsti] śrīkaumārakrama śrīkulādhikārapādukāṁ [k g: -kārapādā] pūjayāmi || vāmakoṇe ||
[1] bindos tattvādhikāre [k, kh, gh: viṁdoṣṭālvorddhajālaṁ; ṅ: viṁdos tānyodhvajātaṁ] bahuguṇanilayaṁ kāmarūpaṁ [k, kh, gh: -pa] suraktaṁ
kāmāvvā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: kāmāsāt] kāmabhūtā [k, kh, gh: -tāṁ; ṅ: -dūtaṁ] paśubhayajananī [k, kh, gh: pasu-] siddhayogeśvarī [gh: siddhi-] ca | navātmānāthabhūtaṁ [k, kh, gh: -nārthabhūtaṁ; ṅ: -nāścabhūtaṁ; 2: navātmānandadevaṁ (k: nama-)] kalimalaharaṇaṁ [2: navatanuracitaṁ] pīṭhamudrāprasiddhaṁ *uḍḍīśaṁ [k, kh, g, 2: ūḍīśaṁ] siddhanāthaṁ [k, kh, gh: -nārthaṁ] sakalaguṇagaṇālaṅkṛtaṁ [kh: sakā * guṇa-] bhūribhūtam [kh: bhraribhūtaṁ]* || *mahocchuṣmākhyaṁ [k, kh, gh: mahochuṣmākhya; ṅ: mahochuṣpara] raktaṁ [ṅ: kṣa ] tribhūvananamitaṁ candranāmā guhā ca [k, kh, gh: cā]
*siddhaṁ santānapūrvaṁ [k: -pūrve; gh: -pūrva] pravaramaṭhaśubhaṁ [kh: -bha] kṣetrapaṁ [k, kh, gh: -yaṁ; ṅ: kṣa yaṁ] kāmam īśam [k, kh, gh, ṅ: īsaṁ] |

This is the group of four sacred seats divided into the sixty-four divisions of Śrīpīṭha.[1] The text here of both recensions of the YKh is lacunose and corrupt, and so a number of entries are missing. Fortunately, there is another description of this system of four seats in the SKh. There we find four mantras addressed to them in which their contents are listed. These omit some units recorded in the version in the YKh just as, conversely, the SKh supplies units not mentioned in the YKh. The mantras of the SKh do not mention the colour of the seats, nor do they refer to Vaṭuka and the Guardian (kṣetrapāla). In their place, they note the 'sandals' – pādukā, that is, the sphere of authority (adhikāra) of each seat. The YKh does not name the Siddhas in all the seats, preferring instead to refer to their common, fundamental identity, that is, Śrīnātha or Navātman Bhairava.[2] However, the mantras in the SKh list two Siddhas and their consorts for each seat. These are labelled Mother and Siddha (1) and (2). Siddhas (1) and Mothers (2) are those the goddess finds when she visits the seats according to the KMT. Those names of the goddesses and Siddhas that agree with those in the KMT are marked with an asterisk in the following table. Variants are recorded in the notes. Three out of the four Siddhas (2) are amongst the Five Siddhas, the incarnations of Bhairava and first teachers according to the KMT. Perhaps Mothers (1) should go with Siddhas (2), if Siddhas (1) go with Mothers (2). All these, except the entry for Mothers (2), are listed in the YKh for the first seat but not for the other three.

---

*mudrā kāmābhidhānā [k, kh, g: -naṁ; ṅ: yo * bhidhānaṁ; 2: yogābhidhānaṁ] sahajasamapadaṁ piṅgalaṁ vaṭukanāthaṁ [k: -nātheṁ; kh: -nārthaṁ* ||; gh: -nārthaṁ]
vande 'haṁ kāmarūpaṁ bahusukhakaraṁ [k, kh, gh: vahusukhaṁdakāraṁ; ṅ: vahusukhadakaraṁ] ṣoḍaśair bhedabhinnam [kh: -bhinvaṁ] || YKh (1) 13/8-9 = YKh (2) 3/8-9.

[kh: + aiṁ 5] aiṁ hrīṁ śrīṁ [g: śrī] khphreṁ [g: khaphreṁ] hsvūauṁ [k kh: hsrūaṁ; g: hsrūauṁ] śrībindutattve [g: + kī] śrīkāmarūpapīṭhe [k, kh, g: -pīṭha] śrīkāmāvvā [k: – kāmāṁvā] śrīsiddhayogeśvarī devī [g: missing] hyrlvhrā/ [kh: hayaralavahrāṁ; g: hyaralavahrīṁ] śrīmahāvidyāpīṭha śrīmadanāvvā [k: -nāṁvā] śrīmadandhranātha [k: śrīmaṁdhranātha; kh, g: -śrīmadandha-] śrīmahocchuṣmāvvā [k: -ṣmāṁvā; g: ?] śrīkaṇṭhanātha [k kh g: śrīśrīkaṁṭha-] śrīciñciṇīvṛkṣa śrīcandraguhā [kh: -candraprahā] śrīsiddhamaṭha śrīkāmaśaraśmaśāna [k, kh: -kāmeśvara-; g: -kāmasaraśmaśāna] śrīyogamudrāyai [kh: -mudrā] śrīmahāsamaya śrībālakrama [k: -kramaṁ] śrīyogādhikārapādukāṁ pūjayāmi || mastake [g: -ka] trikoṇāgre ||

[1] *śrīpīṭhacatuḥṣaṣṭibhedabhinnapīṭhacatuṣkam [k, gh: -catuṣyaṣṭi-; kh: -catuṣyaṣṭibhedabhinnapīṭhacatuhyaṁ; ṅ: * pīṭha-] iti.* This colophon appears in YKh (1) between verses 13/9 and 13/10 and at the end of chapter 3 of YKh (2) where the nine verses describing the four seats are called the *Pīṭhāvatārasūtra. The mantras of the four seats recorded in the SKh are labelled in the same way. There the colophon reads: iti catuḥṣaṣṭibhedabhinnaṁ pīṭhacatuṣkam || SKh MS G fl. 50a, last line.

[2] See KuKh 2/29-30ab.

The entries in bold are common to both sources. Entries in bold italics are found only in the YKh and those in plain italics only in the SKh. Variants in the SKh are noted in brackets.

26. Table of the Four Sacred Seats according to the Yogakhaṇḍa

Seats	Oṁkāra / Oḍḍiyāna[1]	Jālandhara[2]	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa
Locations	Centre	Right	Left	? (on the head in front of the triangle)
State	Śivahood (Paramakalā)	Unmanifest	Sound	Point
Seats of Scripture	? (Mudrāpīṭha)	Vidyāpīṭha (Mahāsamaya)	Mantrapīṭha	Mudrāpīṭha (Vidyāpīṭha)
Colours	White	Black	Yellow	Red
Goddesses[3]	Carcikāvvā	Kālikā (Mahākālī)	Carcikā (Mahā-lakṣmī)	Siddhayogeśvarī
Mothers	Oḍikā (Oḍḍāvvā)	Jālāvvā	Pūrṇāmbā	Kāmāmbā
Bhairavas	Navātman	Navātman	Śrīnātha / Caryānātha[4]	Navātman / Uḍḍīśa[5]

[1] The house here is said to be Apara. As no House is listed for the other seats, it has not been listed separately. It is called Ājñāmahaughapīṭha – the Seat of the Great Current of the Command. It is also called the 'seat of the Rudra called Ucchuṣma' and 'Ādyapīṭha'.

[2] The language (bhāṣā) in this seat is said to be chomā. This is the 'hidden' language in which the Siddhas and yoginīs communicate when they meet in the seats (see KuKh 42/60cd-64ab and notes). Thus, common to all of them, it is not mentioned again and is not one of the specific sixteen features of the seats.

[3] The YKh refers to the deity of this entry as a 'mother' (ambā) and that of the following entry as a goddess (devī). The SKh, that reverses these appellations, makes more sense.

[4] Caryānātha is usually the name of the Siddha of Jālandhara. Cf. following note.

[5] Uḍḍīśa is here said to be the Siddhanātha of this seat. One would expect this to be the name of the Siddha of Oḍḍiyāna.

1) Mothers	Maṅgalā[1]	Vimalāvvā	Kamalāvvā	Madanāvvā
1) Siddhas	Ucchuṣma Rudra *Ādhāra-nātha[2]	Cakrīśa-nātha	Kuraṅgīśa[3]	Andhranātha
2) Mothers[4]	Raktāvvā	Karālāvvā	Caṇḍākṣī	*Mahocchuṣmā
2) Siddhas	? Udayanātha	Ananta-nātha	Piṅgalanātha	Śrīkaṇṭhanātha
Trees	Kadamba	Bilva (Kalpa)	Kārañja[5] (Bilva)	Mahocchuṣma[6] (Ciñcinī)
Caves	Śṛṅgāta	Ratnā	Vyāghrā	Candra
Cremation Grounds	Karavīra	Laguḍa	Ekakoṇa (Koṅkaṇa)	? (Kāmaśara)
Samayās	Raudra	Vīra	? (Mahāyoga)	? (Mahāsamaya)
Monasteries	Mathana-kula	Ūṣmapīṭha[7] (Śaṁkha)	? (Vimala)	Pravara (Siddha)
Gestures	Kārālyā	Vikarālyā	Kiṁkiṇī	Kāma (Yoga)
Currents / Olis	Aged[8]	(Skyfarer)	Middle	(Child)
Vaṭukas	Vaṭuka	Vaṭuka	Vaṭuka	Piṅgala
Guardians	Vara	Jaya	Pauṇḍara	Kāma
Pādukās	Vṛkṣakrama	Śrījñāna	Kula	Yoga

The Eight Sacred Seats according to the Yogakhaṇḍa

The configuration of eight sacred seats we now turn our attention to is unique to the YKh of the MBT. Central to the specific praxis of the YKh, the passage where this scheme is described is common to both recensions of the YKh.

---

[1] This is the goddess of Mātaṅgapīṭha according to the KMT. See table in appendix I.
[2] Ādhārīśa is the Lord of this seat according to the ṢSS.
[3] This is the name of the Siddha of this seat according to the ṢSS. In the KMT he is called Cakrānanda, which is the name of the Siddha of Kāmarūpa in the ṢSS. In the KMT he is called Candrānanda.
[4] These Mothers are the goddesses of the seats according to the KMT. See table 28 below in appendix I.
[5] According to YKh (2) the tree here is the Kāṭāha.
[6] The MSs read: mahocchuṣmākhyaṁ [k, kh, gh: mahochuṣmākhya; ṅ: mahochuṣpara] raktaṁ [ṅ: kṣa *]. This literally means 'the one called Mahoccuṣma is red'. But this does not make much sense. We could perhaps emend to 'vṛkṣaṁ' but there is no tree by this name. According to the KMT (2/101-105ab) Mahocchuṣma is a forest in which Kāmarūpa and Mātaṅgapīṭha are located. See above, p. 95, 98, 100 and 104.
[7] This may also be an alternative name for Jālandhara.
[8] The variant reading 'śrīvṛkṣakrama-' replaces 'śrīvṛddhakrama-' in the SKh. Śrīvṛkṣa – 'the venerable Tree' – is the syllable Navātman (SKh 17/1, quoted above, p. 657).

But although it receives repeated attention throughout the first recension of the YKh, the scheme of eight seats is not mentioned again in the second one, which was probably redacted after it, and is unknown to the rest of Kubjikā corpus.

In general, the YKh insists that the sacred seats should be honoured and respected as are the teacher and the scriptures. Knowledge of the seats and travelling to them is an essential characteristic of the teacher.[1] More specifically, the teacher should not only know and explain the Krama (kramadarśin), he should also know this group of eight sacred seats.[2] It is considered to be so fundamental by YKh (1) that the worship of it is listed as one of the characteristics of the Western Tradition.[3] Indeed, in the first (kṛta) Age, Śrīkaṇṭha, the first Siddha of the original Śāmbhava tradition, worshipped the maṇḍala along with the eight seats on mount Kumāra for three nights in the midst of the Krama.[4] At the end of the description of the eight seats we are told that all the Five Siddhas are present together on mount 'Kaumāra which is on the peak of Meru'.[5] This is the location of the eighth seat – the Unmanifest (avyaktapīṭha).[6] Thus mount Kaumāra is the supreme, transcendent state that, in relation to manifestation, is its unmanifest source. The goddess began her journey from here. At the very summit of Meru, Kaumāra, which is both in the centre and at the apex of all things, contains the fullness of all that is to come, deployed in the sacred space that unfolds as the goddess moves through it from place to place. On mount Kaumāra, the first teacher worshipped the complete unfolding of this sacred universe marked not just in the four directions with the sacred seats of its primordial source – the Yoni – but also with the four seats that are the vessels of the intermediate spaces. Thus,

---

[1] *ādhāraś cakralakṣaś [k, kh, gh: -lakṣāś; ṅ: -ku * laś] ca pīṭhabhramaṇatatparaḥ* |
īdṛśo [all: idṛśaṁ] deśikaḥ [k, kh, gh: deśikaṁ; ṅ: daśikaṁ] sākṣāt bhuktimuktipradāyakaḥ [all: -kaṁ] || YKh (1) 9/13.

[2] oṁkāramāditaḥ [k, kh: uṁkāra-; gh: ukāra-] kṛtvā avyaktāntaṁ tathāvadhiḥ [all MSs: tu yāvadhiḥ] |
pīṭhāṣṭakaṁ tu vijñeyaṁ [gh: vijñayaṁ; 2: vijayaṁ] deśikaiḥ [ṅ: -kai] kramadarśibhiḥ [ṅ: -darśitaṁ] || YKh 14/13.

[3] (The Western Tradition includes) the eight Houses (of the Mothers), Kula practice and is endowed with the group of eight sacred seats.
gṛhāṣṭakaṁ [k, kh, gh: -ka] kulācāraṁ pīṭhāṣṭakasamanvitam || YKh (1) 4/232 cd.

[4] kṛte śrīśāmbhavaḥ [k, kh, gh: -vaṁ] siddhaḥ [k, kh, gh: siddhaṁ] paścimena tu yad [k, kh, gh: tad] guruḥ [k, kh, gh: guruṁ] |
pūjitaṁ tena cakraṁ tu kumāraparvate tu [k, kh, gh: ṣu] ca ||
pīṭhāṣṭakena bhedena trirātraṁ kramamadhyataḥ | YKh (1) 4/283-284ab.

[5] This group of eight sacred seats is on (mount) Kaumāra which is on the peak of Meru. It gives both worldy enjoyment and liberation.

. . . . kaumāre [2: kaumāraṁ] merumūrdhani [k, kh, gh: -mūrdhaniḥ] |
pīṭhāṣṭakam idaṁ śaṁbho bhuktimuktipradāyakam || YKh (1) 15/72bcd.

[6] divyamerūrdhvapīṭham || YKh (1) 15/56d.

radiating from the centre, the eight seats encompass and protect all creation. Inseparably linked to the whole of creation and its source, it is not surprising that the liturgy of the sacred seats (pīṭhakrama) is a major part of the Kaula rite (krama). Indeed, it is declared to be the best part of it[1] and has 'come with the Kula'.[2] In particular, although, of course, the YKh (1) considers the worship of the Kramamaṇḍala (kramarcana) of the goddess to be the main one, it values this form of the liturgy of the sacred seats so highly that it equates it with the Kula liturgy – the Kulakrama[3] – itself.

---

[1] There is nothing higher than the scripture of the Command. Nothing is superior to the liturgy of the sacred seats and the teacher's mouth. All the rest should be abandoned like rotten meat.

ājñāśāstrāt [gh: -strat] paraṁ nāsti pīṭhakramāt [k, ṅ: pīṭhacakramāt] paraṁ na hi |
guruvaktrāt paraṁ nāsti śeṣaṁ tyajyaṁ [all MSs: tyajya] palālavat [ṅ: parāla-] ||

YKh (1) 34/133.

[2] The liturgy of the sacred seats has come with Kula and should be worshipped in the pattern of emanation.

pīṭhakramaṁ [ṅ: -ma] kulāyātaṁ [g: kalāyātaṁ] sṛṣṭinyāyena arcayet || YKh (1) 37/43cd.

The Krama in the Kramamaṇḍala is also worshipped in 'the pattern of emanation', that is, part by part progressively in the forward order. Cf. KuKh 1/1 and note.

[3] The description of Kāmākhya, the fourth of the eight seats, ends with the following colophon: this is the sūtra called 'concerning the Kulakrama' (iti kulakramādhikāranāmasūtram). This colophon may well have originally been at the end of the entire section dealing with the eight seats.

The Maṇḍala of the Eight Sacred Seats

The worship of the eight seats 'in the midst of the Krama' inaugurated by Śrīkaṇṭha probably involves the projection of the eight seats onto the petals of the lotus surrounding the Hexagram in the centre. In the Kramamaṇḍala these are occupied by the Eight Mothers with which the seats maintain, as we shall see, an indirect link. The eight seats, coupled with the groups of four and six seats, respectively projected into the Triangle and Hexagram, can also be worshipped in the Kramamaṇḍala, transforming it into what could be called a Pīṭhakramamaṇḍala. Again, the eight seats may also be worshipped independently in Bhairava's maṇḍala. The Bhairava who embodies the Śrīmata, that is, the Kubjikā tradition and its scriptures, is visualized 'surrounded by a hundred Rudras and adorned with the eight sacred seats'.[1] The Bhairava in the Pīṭhakramamaṇḍala is, like him, surrounded by the sacred seats. In this maṇḍala Bhairava dominates so strongly that although his consort accompanies him, she is barely mentioned. Moreover, he is never directly identified as Kubjikā's consort who is, similarly, simply called Bhairavī and not identified with Kubjikā. They are, no doubt, understood to be them and are directly identified in the parallel projections of the seats and deities into the fire-pit into which the oblations are offered that accompany the recitation of the mantras used to worship the members of the maṇḍala. Their absence here and their tenuous presence in the rite we shall examine next, that is even more centered on the eight seats, suggests that this configuration of seats is strongly influenced by an earlier rite that was not part of the Kubjikā tradition. In fact, we shall see in a subsquent publication, where we attempt to mark the phases of the development of the Yoginī cults in their Śaiva Tantric sources, that a configuration of eight Yoginīs surrounding a solitary Bhairava is one of the earliest. The permutation of that paradigm embodied in this maṇḍala can be understood to be a late one in which many layers of groups of eight are conjoined. Thus they assume – as in their earliest form and even more so – a dominant role, even with respect to the deity in the centre who, although their ultimate source which sustains them, is more sustained and protected by them than they are by him.

The following visualization of the Bhairava in the centre of the maṇḍala is somewhat confused. He is at once seated on a ghost (preta) and dances. His partner is next to him and yet she is also his seat (āsana). These ambiguities are possibly the result of the conflation of more than one visualization. Nonetheless, they serve to underscore that the god in the centre is somehow both single (ekavīra) and in the company of his consort:

> He has eight faces and, very powerful, shines like a white

[1] śatarudrāvṛtaṁ devaṁ pīṭhāṣṭakavibhūṣitam | YKh (1) 20/8ab.

lotus. He is mightily proud and has sharp teeth and great body. He is terrible and fierce and his face is deformed. O Śambhu, he has twenty arms and the goddess sits on his lap. He holds a sword, mallet and noose, a double-headed drum, a dagger, the Kaustubha jewel, a rosary, a skull bowl full of fruit and the like and a piece of human flesh.

I will tell you (what he holds) in his other (ten hands).[1] (He holds) an ascetic's staff, a spear (abhipaṭṭīśa),[2] a book, a shield, a head, a large sword (kālagrāsa), the moon, the scripture and the earth. His body is adorned on the left (by his consort)[3] and he is adorned with a garland of wild flowers. He wears earrings made of snakes and his sacred thread is Vāsuki. The Lord is adorned with tinkling anklets and sits on a ghost in the lotus posture. He is adorned with the five insignia and a garland of severed heads that hangs from his neck up to his feet. He dances with the bliss of wine and is accompanied by heroes and Bhairavas. Sixty-four Yoginīs and great mothers encompass him. He is endowed with sixty-four energies and adorned with ghosts and demons (vetāla). O Śambhu, Bhairava is said to have as his seat (āsana) the Supreme Goddess.[4]

---

[1] As far as I am able to make out the text lists only nine attributes for the previous set of hands and the same number for these ones.

[2] According to Monier-Williams a paṭṭiśa is 'a spear with a sharp edge or some other weapon with three points.' He does not list the word abhipaṭṭiśa.

[3] The text reads vāmāṅgabhūṣitam qualifying bhairavam (masc. > neuter). I understand this to mean 'vāmayā aṅgabhūṣitam' and suppose that 'vāmā' ('woman' 'she who is on the left') refers to his consort. Another possible translation is the 'the left part of (his) body is adorned', which makes little sense.

[4] aṣṭavaktraṁ mahātejaṁ sitapadmasamaprabham |
daṁṣṭrotkaṭaṁ mahākāyaṁ bhīmograṁ vikṛtānanam ||
viṁśabāhu sthitaṁ śambho devyāś [k, kh, gh: devyā] cotsaṅgadhāriṇam [kh: -ṇa] |
asitomarapāśān [k, kh, gh: -pāsaṁśvaṁ] ca bibhrate ḍamarukārmuke ||
kaustubhaṁ cākṣamālāṁ [k, kh: -mālā] ca kādyaṁ phalādipūritaṁ [k, gh: kādya phalvādi-; kh: kādya phallvādi-] |
mahāpiśitakhaṇḍaṁ tu aparaṁ [k, kh, gh: apare] kathayāmy aham ||
khaṭvāṅgam [k, kh, gh: khaṭkāṅgam] abhipaṭṭiśaṁ [kh: -paṭṭīśaṁ] pustakaṁ kheṭakānanam |
kālagrāsaṁ tathā candraṁ sāgamaṁ pṛthavī saha ||
vāmāṅgabhūṣitaṁ [k, kh: vāmāṁgaṁ-] devaṁ [k, kh: deva] vanamālāvibhūṣitam |
sarpakuṇḍalalambanaṁ vāsukiś [k, kh, gh: vāsukiṁ] copavītakam ||
tatra tatkiṅkiṇīdhāranūpuraiḥ [k, kh, gh: -ḍoraṁ-] śobhitaṁ prabhu [k, kh, gh: prabhuṁ] |
pretapadmāsanasthaṁ tu pañcamudrāvibhūṣitam ||
muṇḍamālāṁ [k, gh: ruṁḍa-; kh: ruṁjamālā] gale badhvā yāvat pādāvalambinīm [k, kh, gh: -nī] |
madirānandanṛtyantaṁ [k, kh: madirāṇaṁdena-; gh: madirāṇāṁdena-] vīrabhairavasaṁyutam ||
catuḥṣaṣṭis [k, kh, gh: catuṣaṣṭis] tu yoginyo mahāmātṛbhir āvṛtam |
catuḥṣaṣṭikalair yuktaṁ [k, gh: -kālair; kh: catuṣaḥṣṭikālair] yuktaṁ bhūtavetālaśobhitam ||
*parādevyāsanaṁ śambho [k, kh, gh: śo ] bhairavaṁ parikīrtitam | YKh (1) 1/144-152ab.

Each of Bhairava's eight faces has eight energies embodied in as many Yoginīs. Shining like halos around them, they constitute the Wheel of Sixty-four Energies of Bhairava's eight faces.[1] Moreover, he is surrounded by the seventeen energies of the Moon and the twelve energies of the Sun and a set of energies that, together with his consort, Śuṇḍikā (not Kubjikā!), from which they emanate, make sixty-four. Along with them there are another sixty-four consisting of the twenty-five energies of Mālinī that emanate from her four of aspects, namely, Sarasvatī (8), Herambā (4), Vahnikā (8) and Anaṅgā (5). These along with the thirty-eight energies of Bhairava make a third set of sixty-four. The configuration of sixty-four (especially 8 x 8), is a very powerful one. In this case it is triple, thus heavily reinforcing the powers of the deity's surrounding protectors. These are the eight goddesses who are the female guardians (dikpālikā) or deities of the quarters (digdevatā). They are accompanied by ten Bhairavas who, like 'great kings', surround them.

The maṇḍala is held together by the pervasive unity of the goddess's Vidyā. The goddesses of the directions share in the conjunction (yoga) of the parts of the maṇḍala, and the sacred universe it represents, brought about by the Vidyā that 'is the abode of Bhairavī, sustained by the eight sacred seats'. The text stresses that 'one should worship each one with the division of sixty-four', that is, with it contents and energies.[2] The seats are represented by eight jars (kumbha) while the deities of seats and the quarters are in pitchers (vardhanī), which, I suppose, are placed next to them.[3] The seats represent all the sacred sites and all eight types of them. Thus this maṇḍala is not so much a cosmos as the world of human habitations – the world full of sacred places where the deities reside in the midst of men. There the goddesses of the seats stand at the doors of the quarters, primary and secondary and encompassing towns, villages and the localities within them in protective circles.[4]

---

[1] iti mahāmūrtibhairavasya vaktrāṣṭake catuḥṣaṣṭikalācakram ǀ

Colophon following YKh (1) 1/163.

[2] These are presented below on p. 697 ff..

[3] anena mantrayogena digdevyāmantraṁ [k, kh, gh: -maṁtra] vinyaset ǁ mantro 'yaṁ [k, kh, gh: maṁtra-] bhairavīdhāma pīṭhāṣṭaka-m-adhiṣṭitam ǀ catuḥṣaṣṭiprabhedena aikaikaṁ [k, gh: ekaikaṁ] saṁprapūjayet ǁ ye kumbhās te mahāpīṭhā vardhanyāḥ [k, kh: vardhanyā] pīṭhadevatāḥ ǀ digdevatās [all MSs: -tā] tathā pūjyāḥ devyāstraṁ [all MSs: -strat] tam anusmaret ǁ

YKh (1) 1/67cd-69.

[4] One should worship them at each door (of the quarters). If they are worshipped they bestow accomplishments. If they are not worshipped they give rise to obstacles. They should be worshipped in the village, town, primary sacred seat, (sacred) field, crossroad, and places of accomplishment (siddhisthāna). They certainly destroy obstacles.

Worshipped and installed (pratiṣṭhitā) they give extensive accomplishment. One should worship the eight goddesses accompanied by the guardians of the field.

The Eight Goddesses of the Sacred Sites

The goddess of each seat is a form of Maṅgalā who thus has eight aspects. Maṅgalā is a Yoginī who, identified with Kālī, is the goddess who transmitted the Kashmiri Kālīkrama to Jñānanetra, its earthly founder.[1] Accordingly, Jñānanetra begins his 'Hymn to the Five Wheels of Emptiness (khacakrapañcakastotra)' with a verse dedicated to Maṅgalā, the supreme goddess:

> I bow to the Great Reality (mahārtha), the venerable (goddess) Maṅgalā, she who is the mother of all things, the energy of Śiva, the awesome (caṇḍa) power (tejas) of consciousness. (I praise her) the great wave of the Great Reality filled with all things, (she who is) the light of the Inexplicable, the Sun, Moon and the Fire of (universal) destruction.[2]

Arṇasiṁha provides a didactic etymology of goddess Maṅgalā's name that explains and eulogizes her supreme status in the Kālīkrama:

Jayā, Vijayā, Ajitā, Aparājitā, Jayantī, Jayalakṣmī, Jayaśrī, and Jayamaṁgalā: these are (their) secret names, revealed in the form of mantras. (These are the goddesses) who reside in the doors (of the quarters) and abide in the places of the primary and secondary doors along with the primary and secondary sacred seats, meeting grounds (saṁdohas) and fields (kṣetra).

 * * * * * * dvāre dvāre [k, kh, gh: dvārāya dvāra] prapūjayet [k, kh, gh: * pūjayet]* |
*pūjitāḥ [k, kh: -tā] siddhidās te 'pi vighnadāś ca apūjitāḥ [gh: pūjitāḥ] || grāme ca [k, kh, gh: vā] nagare cādyapīṭhe [k, kh, gh: vādya-] kṣetre catuṣpathe |
siddhisthāne tathā pūjyāḥ [k, kh, gh: pūjya] vighnān [k, kh, gh: vighno] hanti na saṁśayaḥ ||
dadanti vipulāṁ siddhiṁ pūjitāś ca pratiṣṭhitāḥ [k, kh, gh: pratiṣṭitāḥ] |
kṣetrapālāyutāṣṭau tu pūjayed [k, kh: -ye] dvāravāsinīḥ [k, kh: -nī; gh: -nīṁ] ||
*jayā ca vijayā [kh: vi * yā] caiva ajitā cāparājitā* |
jayantī jayalakṣmī ca jayaśrī jayamaṅgalā ||
etāni guptanāmāni [k, kh, gh: guptā-] mantrarūpāḥ prakāśitāḥ [k, kh: prakāśilāḥ] |
pīṭhopapīṭhasandohaiḥ [k: pīṭhoyapīṭha-] kṣetropakṣetram eva ca [k, kh, gh: cā] ||
dvāropadvārasthāneṣu tiṣṭhanti [k, kh: tiṣṭaṁti] dvāravāsinyaḥ [k, kh, gh: -nī] |
YKh (1) 1/72b-77ab.

[1] Maheśvarānanda (MM p. 95) attributes the origin of the Krama school to which he belongs to the goddess Maṅgalā who is the first teacher. According to Śitikaṇtha, Jñānanetra received the order (ādeśa) of the goddess (makāradevī i.e. Maṅgalā) in the 'best of sacred seats' – that is Uḍḍiyāna, which is located in the north (MP (3) 2/37). Graced by the goddess in this way he experienced her presence directly within himself, and outside himself as the Krama (MP (2) p. 49).

[2]yā sāntakāgniravisoma – anākhyabhāsāṁ
niḥśeṣapūritamahārthamahotkallolām [k, kh: -maholkalolām] | ciccaṇḍatejaśivaśaktim aśeṣamātāṁ [k, kh: -tejaḥ- -śakti aśeṣa-] śrīmaṅgalāmiti [k, kh: śrīmaṅgalīniti] mahārthaṁ [k, kh: mahārtha] prati [k, kh: pratiṁ] praṇaumi ||
KhCPS 1.

I take refuge in the Goddess Maṅgalā whose unique nature is the expansion of the current of the Sky (of Consciousness) who, as she transcends all the differentiated forms (kalanā) of meditation and the rest, is Akula (the transcendent). She is called Maṅgalā here (in this world) because she quickly frees (gālayati) (the fettered) from Māyā. Seated on the Hero's (i.e. Svacchandabhairava's) Five Faces, she is intent on the Great Union.

(Again, She is called Maṅgalā because she is) the intense inebriation (madana) brought about by the flux of the juice of the aesthetic delight (rasa) penetrated by the Supreme (experienced) by moving in the Supreme Space (paramākāśa), which is free of the differentiated manifestation (kalanā) of (the phases of) emanation and the rest. She is ever the Inexplicable (anākhyā state) of the Supreme Principle whose body is the Wheel (of consciousness). Thus she is called Maṅgalā (Auspicious) here (in the world), and her nature is free of obscuration.[1]

The Yonigahvaratantra, which was 'brought down to earth' by Jñānanetra, starts with a similar verse, set in the same metre, addressed to Kālī:

I bow to Kālī, the Supreme who illumines (all things) with her own Light (svābhā); to her who is the Light (bhā) that arises from the Void (kuhara) (within which) burns the Fire of (universal) Destruction; (I bow to her who is) established in the centre of the (reality that) contains the three paths of Moon, Sun and Fire and whose state is one in which consciousness (cit), the object of thought (cetya), the mind (citta), the objects of sense (viṣaya) and the senses (akṣa) have dissolved away.

See the catalogue of the Asiatic Society of Calcutta (Chakravarti 1940: vol. 1, p. 107) where this verse is transcribed from the only known manuscript of this Tantra. The text is very corrupt but fortunately can be reconstructed by referring to the Devīdvyardhaśatikā by the Kashmiri Vimalaprabodha that begins with the same verse. There it reads:

yā sāntakāgnikuharotthitabhāsvarūpām
somārkavahnitripathodaramadhyasaṁsthām [k: somākka-] | ciccetyacittaviṣayākṣavilīnabhāvāṁ [k: cicceta- -virīnabhāvāṁ] svābhāvabhāsakiparāṁ [k: -bhāvaki-] praṇamāmi kālīm || DDŚ 1.
[1] dhyānādikalanātītarūpatvād akulātmikām ||
ambaraughavikāsaikadharmiṇīṁ [amvarāgha- -ṇī] maṅgalāṁ [-lā] śraye |
māyāto gālayatyāśu [-su] maṅgaleha tataḥ smṛtā ||
vīrapañcānanārūḍhā mahāmelāpatatparā |
paravidharasaughena madanaṁ [madanāṁ] cetasi bhṛśam [niśaṁ] ||
gamanāt paramākāśe sṛṣṭyādikalanojjhite |
sānākhyā [k: lānākhe] cakravapuṣaḥ paratattvasya sarvadā ||
maṅgaleha tataḥ khyātā nirāvaraṇadharmiṇī | MP (2) 75cd-79ab.

Maṅgalā's presence here is another sign of the close connection between the Kālī and the Kubjikā cult. The following descriptions of the forms Maṅgalā assumes in the eight seats is therefore of interest also to those who study the Kālī tradition.

> 1) East – Kāmarūpa: (Kāmahā)[1] the Maṅgalā from Kāmarūpa has four faces and is very powerful. She has two arms and sits on a ghost. She makes gestures of fearlessness and boon bestowal; she is well adorned with all the ornaments and has a large, pleasing and auspicious face.[2]
>
> 2) South – Jālandhara: (Jvālāmaṅgalyā), the goddess born of Jāla is very dignified and powerful. She has five faces, four arms, and sits on a white lion. She holds sword, club, fetter, and goad and is adorned with jewels. She wears clothes of various colours, is fierce (bhīmā) and, when worshipped, bestows boons.[3]
>
> 3) West – Uḍu: The auspicious Uḍumaṅgalyā in the west has six faces and eight arms and is auspicious. She is beautiful, her hair is dishevelled and she is adorned with all the ornaments. She holds an ascetic's staff, a javelin, a cup (pātra) and double-headed drum in her right hands, (and) a skull (kādya), a bow and sword along with a severed head in the left. She sits on a ghost and, when worshipped, she destroys the enemy.[4]

---

[1] The names of the goddesses are listed first in the following reference and then their appearance is described when, in some cases, they are named again. If a goddess's name is not mentioned in the course of her description or the name in the list is not the same, it is noted in brackets. The secret names of the goddesses are listed in YKh (1) 1/75, which is translated above on p. 678, note 4.

paścime uḍumaṅgalyā [k, kh: juḍu- gh: juhumaṁgalyā] pūrṇacandrā [k, kh, gh: pūrva-; gh: caṇḍā] tathottare |
dakṣiṇe jvālamaṅgalyā [k, kh, gh: jvali-] kāmahā [gh: -hāṁ] kāmarūpataḥ ||
bhadrakālī tathāgneyāṁ [k, kh, gh: -yā] tisrapīṭhodbhavā śubhā [k, kh, gh: śubhāḥ] |
candramaṅgalā [all MSs: maṅgalācaṇḍa] vāyavyāṁ nairṛte [k, kh: naiṛtai; gh: nairṛtai] jñānamaṅgalā ||
*vinayākhyā [k, kh, gh: vināyakhyā] īśe [k, kh, gh: īśa] koṇe dvāre dvāre [k, kh, gh: dvārāya dvāra] prapūjayet [k, kh, gh: * pūjayet]* | YKh (1) 1/70-72ab.

[2] caturmukhā [k, kh, gh: -bhujā] mahātejā [k: -ja] dvibhujā [k: -ja] pretavāhinī | varadābhayahastā tu sarvābharaṇabhūṣitā ||
prasannavadanā [k, kh: prasana-] divyā viśālavadanā śubhā | sarvamaṅgaladātārī maṅgalā kāmarūpataḥ || YKh (1) 1/78-79.

[3] pañcavaktrā mahodaryā [k, gh: vahodaryā; kh: vvahodaryā] caturbāhur [k, kh, gh: -vāhu] mahotkaṭā ||
*śvetasiṁhāsanāsīnā [k, gh: ṣeta-; kh: * * ? hāsa-] khaḍgakheṭakadhāriṇī |
pāśāṅkuśadharā devyā ratnamāṇikyabhūṣitā [k, kh, gh: -māṇiṣṭa] ||
citrāmbaradharā bhīmā pūjitā varadā bhavet | YKh (1) 1/80cd-82ab.

[4] paścima uḍumaṅgalyā ṣaḍvaktrāṣṭabhujā [gh: ṣaṭvaktrāṣṭhabhujā] śubhā ||

4) North – Pūrṇagiri: (Pūrṇacandrā), the goddess who resides in the door in the north is Pūrṇā Maṅgalā. She has five faces and ten arms and sits on a lion. She wears the full moon on her head. The left hands make gestures of fearlessness and boon bestowal, and hold a mirror, a noose, and goad. In the right hands she holds a dagger (kārmuka), bow, sword, pestle, and a fearsome spear (paṭṭiśa). She bestows boons in the north.[1]

5) South-east – Tisra: (Bhadrakālī) has one face, three eyes, and two arms in which she holds an ascetic's staff and severed head. She sits on a crow and bestows boons in the south-east. She is Maṅgalā who is in the triple sacred seat and is worshipped by the lords of the gods. (Through her) one attains the tranquil plane that bestows liberation and worldly benefits.[2]

6) South-west – (Candra):[3] Candramaṅgalyā (Jñānamaṅgalā) is in the south-west. She sits on an owl. She has one face and three eyes. She has matted hair, which is (adorned with a) Half Moon. She holds a pestle and trident in her left and right hands, respectively. She wears a garment of human skin and she resounds with the sound of (her) anklets. When the goddess is worshipped in the south-west she consumes inauspicious accidents.[4]

---

surūpā muktakeśā [k, gh: muktākeśā; kh: muktākaśā] ca sarvābharaṇabhūṣitā |
khaṭvāṅgaṁ śaktipātraṁ ca ḍamaru [k, kh, gh: ḍamaruṁ] dakṣiṇe kare ||
vāme kādyaṁ dhanuḥ khaḍgaṁ [gh: khaḍge] sārdhaṁ muṇḍaṁ [k: muṁḍa; kh: muḍa] tathottare [k, kh: tathoṁtare] |
pretāsanasamārūḍhā pūjitā cārikṛntanī || YKh (1) 1/82cd-84.

[1] uttare ca tathā pūrṇā maṅgalā dvāravāsinī |
pañcavaktrā daśabhujā [k, gh: -ja] siṁhārūḍhā ca saṁsthitā ||
pūrṇacandrakṛtāṭopā abhayavaradarpaṇam |
pāśāṅkuśadharā vāme apare kathayāmy aham ||
kārmukaṁ ca [k, kh: vaṁ; gh: va] dhanuḥ [k, kh: dhanu] khaḍgaṁ [k, kh: khaḍga] mudgaraṁ bhīmapaṭṭiśaṁ [k, kh, gh: bhiśi-] |
dakṣiṇe ca kare tasyā varadā caiva cottare [k: cotare] || YKh (1) 1/85-87.

[2] ekavaktrā trinetrā ca muṇḍakhaṭvāṅgadhāriṇī | dvibhujā kāka-m-ārūḍhā agnikoṇe varapradā ||
maṅgalā ca tripīṭhasthā pūjitā tridaśeśvaraiḥ [k, kh: -ra; gh: -raḥ] |
padaṁ ca labhyate [k, kh, gh: labhate] saumyaṁ bhuktimuktiprasādhakam || YKh (1) 1/88-89.

[3] Although the directions in which the goddesses reside are listed, the seats are not always noted. Even so, they can be inferred from the name of the goddess or other indications.

[4] nairṛtye [k, kh: nairṛtya] candramaṅgalyā ulūkāsanasaṁsthitā |
ekavaktrā trinetrā ca jaṭājūṭārdhacandrikā [kh: jaṭārjū-] || muśalaṁ ca triśūlaṁ ca vāmadakṣiṇataḥ sthite [all MSs: -tau] | naracarmaparīdhānā nūpuradhvaninādinī [k, kh, gh: nupura-] ||
nairṛtye [k, kh: nairṛtya] pūjitā devyāśubhasaṅghātabhakṣaṇī [gh: devī-; k: -sambhu-; kh: -śambhu-; gh: -sabhu-] | YKh (1) 1/90-92ab.

7) North-west – (Avyakta): Pūrṇā (Maṅgalā) is in the north-west and she sits on a vulture. She has one face, three eyes and two hands in which she holds a sword and, in the left, a severed head. She is a female warrior (vīrā) and, extremely fierce, she laughs loudly. She wears a deerskin. (Here) in the north-west, she destroys fear. Worshipped, she quickly bestows the boons and fruits of the adept's (practice).[1]

8) North-east – (Nāda): Nādamaṅgalyā (Vinayā) is in the north-east. She has the face of a bird (khaja) and three eyes. She sits on a pig (sūkara). She has ten arms and is very fierce. In the right hands she holds a sword, lance (tomara), bow, double-headed drum, and skeleton; in the left, a dagger, a skull (kādya), trident, fetter, and goad. She has matted hair and is the goddess who bestows boons in the north-east. Worshipped, there is success (siddhi) in whatever one desires. Full of the sixteen energies, she, the guardian of the door (dvārapālī), is beautiful.[2]

The Fire Pits and the Sacred Seats

The eight seats appear again in the triangular fire pit constructed along with this maṇḍala. Representing the Yoni, facing downwards, the Six Paths that constitute the cosmic and mantric order are located in the middle of the pit and all the deities of the Kula and Kaula traditions in general as well as those of Kubjikā's western (paścima) tradition in particular, reside there along with Bhairava and Bhairavī.[3] Encompassed by a circle, representing Parā, who is also

---

[1] vāyavye [k, kh, gh: vāyavyo] nāma pūrṇā tu gṛdhrasyāsanasaṁsthitā [k, kh: gṛdhrasyo-; gh: gṛdhrasyausanasaṁ-] ||
ekavaktrā trinetrā ca dvibhujā [k: -ja] khaḍgadhāriṇī |
vāme muṇḍadharā [k, kh, gh: ruṁḍadharā] vīrā atyugrā [k, kh, gh: -grām] aṭṭahāsinī ||
mṛgacarmaparīdhānā [k: -carmāñcaradharā; kh: carmāvaradharā; gh: -carmāṁvaradharā] vāyavye [k, kh, gh: vāyave] bhayanāśanī |
pūjitā varadā śīghrā sādhakasya phalapradā || YKh (1) 1/92cd-94.

[2] īśāne nādamaṅgalyā khajavaktrā [k, kh, gh: khaṁja-] trilocanā |
daśabāhvī mahābhīmā sūkarāsanasaṁsthitā [k, gh: ṣṭakarāsana-; kh: sūkarāsanasaṁ-] ||
khaḍgatomaranārācaṁ [k, kh, gh: -ṇārāca] ḍamaru [k, kh, gh: -ruṁ] kaṅkālaṁ [k, kh, gh: -la] dakṣiṇe |
vāme ca kārmukaṁ kādyaṁ triśūlaṁ pāśam aṅkuśam ||
jaṭājūṭadharā [kh: -ro] devyā [k, kh, gh: devya] īśāne ca varapradā |
pūjitā bhavate siddhir [k, kh: siddhi] yā kācin manasepsitā [k, kh: manaseśitā] ||
kalāṣoḍaśasaṁpūrṇā dvārapālī manoramā | YKh (1) 1/95-98ab.

[3] yoniṁ ca kathayiṣyāmi yāṁ [all MSs: yo] sthitā [all MSs: -tā] divyarūpikām [all MSs: -pakā] |
ṣaḍadhvaṁ bhuvanādyantaṁ madhye [k: madhya; kh: madhyesya] kuṇḍasya tiṣṭhati [k: tiṣṭati] ||
ye kecid [k, kh: keci] devatāś cānye kule kaule tu paścime | called Anāmā, the three main seats are placed in the corners with their lords, that is: 1) Ūdupīṭhā – Śrīkaṇṭha, 2) Pūrṇā – Śaṁkara, and 3) Kāmarūpā – Ananta.[1] One should conceive the eight Mothers to be present in this pit, although only six are listed. They are stationed at varying depths within it progressively. Thus Brahmāṇī is at four fingers, depth, then comes Māheśvarī, then Kaumārī, at six fingers and so on up to Mahālakṣmī. This, the group of Eight Mothers of the Kula (kulāṣṭaka) is present there along with the sacred seats. So, although the model for the latter may well originally have been the former, they are distinguished even as they are set in close relation to one another. Thus the Mothers are stationed along with their attendants (parivāra) in the 'fields', 'great locations' (mahāsthāna) or 'houses' (gṛha) in the directions where the eight sacred seats are located. The order of correspondences in relation to the directions is the same as the one in the series of Vidyās. Eight fire pits of different shapes are dug around the main one in the eight directions. Offerings made in them give the power to perform magic rites successfully and other accomplishments (siddhi).[2] Although this is not said directly, we may infer that these fire pits and the seats are related. The former on the outside, protecting and bestowing magical powers, and the latter within, as the seats of the Mothers encompassing the deities who reside in the centre of the main, triangular pit, just as they do the Krama in the maṇḍala with Kujā and Kujeśa in the middle.

27. Table of Correspondences between Fire Pits, Sacred Seats and Magical Powers

Directions	Sacred Seats[3]	Shapes of the Fire pits[4]	Lords of the Fire pits[5]	Magical Powers
E	Kāmākhyā	Round	Śrīkaṇṭha	Paralysis
SE	Tisra	Square	Śaṁkara	Murder
S	Jala	Octagon	Ananta	Enmity
SW	Candra	Hexagram	Sādākhya	Control
W	Udyānaka	Triangle	Piṅgala	Pacification
NW	Nāda	Eight-petal Lotus	Nāgāri	Expulsion
N	Pūrṇagirya	Lotus	Amṛta	Nourishment
NE	Avyakta	Half Moon	Kāla	Powers and Flight

tiṣṭhanti [k, gh: tiṣṭaṁti] kuṇḍamadhye tu bhairavo bhairavī saha || YKh (1) 1/182-183.

[1] These are the first three of the Five Siddhas. All the Five Siddhas appear below (see following table) as the Lords of the first five fire pits and hence of the corresponding seats. However, there the serial order of the seats has changed whereas the usual one of the Five Siddhas has been retained. As a result, the order of correspondences with respect to the seats in these two cases differs. YKh (1) 1/179cd-181.

[2] YKh (1) 1/184-188 and ibid. 1/198cd-200.

[3] YKh (1) 1/184-188. The four main seats are set in the primary directions and the other four are in the secondary ones.

[4] YKh (1) 1/173cd-174ab. I assume that the shapes correspond to those of the fire pits, although all the text says is that the fire pits may be of any of the shapes listed in this column.

[5] YKh (1) 1/203cd-205.

Lustration and Animal Sacrifice (bali) in the Eight Sacred Seats

The offering of animal sacrifice (bali) to the Mothers worshipped as a group (mātṛmaṇḍala) at crossroads is a practice that is attested in literary sources that date back to the 4th century CE. Offerings made to local deities, particularly animal sacrifice – bali – is a practice that is much more ancient. This practice, like many others inspired by local 'small' or 'folk' traditions, serves as an important model for Tantric rites in general and Kaula rites in particular. Animal sacrifice, whether literal or by means of substitutes, is commonly integrated to varying degrees into Tantric rites of all schools. Ritual procedure in general distinguishes between offerings made to the main deity and those to its attendants. In some cases, even when the main deity accepts only vegetarian offerings, the attendants may be offered animal sacrifice. But, even if animals are sacrificed, or cooked meat or substitutes are offered to the deity, this is considered to be a distinct type of offering from the animal sacrifice offered to attendants. This distinction, in the Sanskrit sources (but often not in common parlance), is underscored by using the term 'bali' only for offerings made to those attendants to whom it should be offered. In the Śaiva context, these are, broadly speaking, the members of Śiva's and Bhairava's host: ghosts and various types of demonic beings (graha) along with the Mothers and the many kinds of Yoginīs who can induce possession, cause sickness, epidemics, madness, natural disasters and so on. This kind of offering is variously prominent depending on the nature of the cult. In Siddhānta temple ritual, beings to whom bali is offered may be propitiated and worshipped by making offerings at a distance in the directions around the main deity or in a separate maṇḍala called balipīṭha. In line with the normally vegetarian cult of Sadāśiva practiced in these temples, they receive animal substitutes, such as balls of boiled rice coloured yellow with turmeric powder. Although Siddhānta liturgies do not ignore them, generally they receive relatively little attention and are simply propitiated to remain tranquil attendants and protectors of the main deity – the god who is worshipped in the Liṅga. However, offering of bali to such beings is, on the contrary, a major feature of Kaula rites.

The main Kaula rites are centred on the maṇḍala in which the Krama is worshipped. Conceptually and historically we may distinguish between two types of liturgy. One includes the rites of adoration (pūjā, arcana) and fire sacrifices (yajña, yāga, yajana) that concern the main deity and their close attendants. The other type is concerned with the offering of bali to protectors, male and female and also, sometimes, as they are the guardians of the tradition, the lineages of teachers and the congregation of initiates of various types and rank. These are the beings who reside in sacred places and move around from one to another. Śaivism right from its earliest recorded forms in the Veda where the god is Rudra, has always been closely linked to the worship of the type of beings who receive bali.

Entering its Tantric phase, Śaivism branched out into two directions. In one the tendency was to 'clean up' the deity and his cult and hence reduce the emphasis on the worship of his attendants who crave bali and other similar elements of the cult. Developing in the other direction these same elements were, on the contrary, emphasized. Concretely in this context, we can think of the sacred seats as being, in a sense, 'balipīṭhas'. As in the Siddhānta, the seats treated in this way are worshipped separately in the example we are about to examine, but they may also be worshipped in the very core of the Krama, that is, in what would be for the Siddhānta, and is even referred to as such in our sources – the Liṅga.

In the following representation of the teacher, the ideal model for every initiate to emulate, he is portrayed as a yogi engaged in the wayfaring life observing his Kaula vow – a mystical fusion of continence and ritual union. The rite he practices in the course of his peregrinations to the sacred sites is the bali offering. But note that he also worships the Krama, that is, the Kramamaṇḍala, which can easily be drawn wherever required. This is important. The accomplishment (siddhi) he attains comes from eating the sacrificial pap (caru) offered to the Krama. Although in such types of Kaula rites it is a meat offering, this is eaten, not the bali. Formally and historically the offering of bali and the worship of the deity in a maṇḍala – or, for that matter, in an icon – are clearly distinguishable and can be performed independently. Kaula ritual juxtaposes them even as it lends prominence to one or the other, according to the context, but never allows the older bali rite to supersede that of the Krama, which is centered on the deity of the Kula.

> The teacher (ācārya) in the western house is one who belongs to the sequence of the line (of teachers). (He is) a yogi who, intent on Yoga, observes the Rule (samaya). Free of duality and thought constructs, he is intent on the practice of ritual union (caryākrama). He eats what he has begged and, free of aversion (ghṛṇa), he is pure and intent on the practice of chastity.[1] Established in Bhairavī's vow, he is born from the womb of a Yoginī. He wears an antelope's hide and white clothes. He is adorned with a white garland and his limbs are smeared with lead paste (nāgacūrṇa). He holds a stick and wears anklets. Being a yogi thus mounted on the proclamation of the Kula (teachings), he wears a hat and cloth and wanders in the sacred sites (of the Eight Mothers) (kṣetra) (engaged) in the practice of the Lords of the Heroes (vīreśasādhana). He practices his meditation (dhyāna) in each house and that utterance (of mantra) in particular. (His) duty is (determined) by the command of a true teacher and he should beg > from (the Yoginīs and Mothers). O Kauleśa, he is successful by maintaining this attitude (bhāva).

[1] See note to KuKh 3/63-64ab.

>
> He should offer bali at a crossroads, (at the foot of) a solitary tree or a cremation ground or at the gathering of the Mothers (mātṛmelaka). He does this once he has placed the sacrificial food (caru) (there) and eaten a little of it in front of the Krama (maṇḍala). Within six months (he attains) success, and in eight (he becomes) pure. Satisfied, (the Yoginīs) give (him) whatever he desires. Success is to be found in the sacred seats, primary and secondary, or in the meeting grounds (saṁdoha) and in the gathering of (initiates) of the Rule (samayamelaka) as well as in the eight houses (of the Mothers) for one who is fearless and not otherwise.[1]

Generally the focus of a maṇḍala is on the centre where the main deity is worshipped. However, the maṇḍala we will examine now in which the bali offering is made serves, not so much as a representation of the abode of the main deities as that of the meeting places (melāpasthāna) of their attendants. Here the innumerable beings who populate the universe at all levels, from the hell-worlds to the heavens, in human settlements and lonely haunts, and who are the deity's encompassing hosts, gather together. These beings include a wide range, from the

---

[1] pāramparyakramasthas [k, gh: pāraṁparyaṁkramasthā; kh: -kramasthā] tu ācāryaḥ [k, kh, gh: ācāraṁ] paścime gṛhe ||
yogino yogayuktātmā samayapratipālakaḥ [k, kh, gh: -kāḥ] |
nirdvandvo [k, kh: nirdvaddho; gh: nirdvaṁddho] nirvikalpaś ca niśi caryākrame [k, kh, gh: -hane] rataḥ [k, kh, gh: ratāḥ] ||
bhikṣāśī [k, kh, gh: -sī] nirghṛṇaḥ [k, kh: ni-] śuddhaḥ brahmacaryāparāyaṇaḥ [k, kh: vraplacarya-] |
bhairavīvratasaṁstho [k, gh: tālavīvrattasaṁsthau; kh: tālavīvrartasaṁsthau] vā yoginīgarbhasambhavaḥ ||
ajīnaśvetavastrāḍhyaḥ [k, kh: ajanaścetavasvāḍhyaṁ; gh: -ḍhyaṁ] sitasragdāmabhūṣitaḥ [k, kh, gh: -śragdāma- -taṁ] |
nāgacūrṇena liptāṅgī [k, kh, gh: liptāṁgaṁ] daṇḍanūpuradhāriṇam ||
kulaghoṣaṁ ṭopikāpaṭṭaṁ [k, gh: -ya ṭūṁ; kh: -paṭūṁ] tathārūḍhaṁ ca yoginam |
tathāsau kṣetrakānyaṣṭau [k, kh: kṣatra-] vīreśasādhane [k, kh, gh: vareśasyādaye] bhramet ||
gṛhe gṛhe svakaṁ dhyānaṁ taduccāraṁ [k, kh: taducāraṁ] viśeṣataḥ |
kartavyaṁ sadgurvājñayā [k, kh, gh: saṅgucorājñā] tāsāṁ bhikṣāṁ [k, kh, gh: -kṣā] samācaret ||
etadbhāvena [k, kh, gh: -bhavena] kauleśa tena bhāvena siddhyati |
catuṣpathaikavṛkṣe [k, kh, gh: -padyeka-] vā śmaśāne mātṛmelake ||
baliṁ dadyāc caruṁ sthāpya svalpaṁ prāśya kramāgrataḥ |
ṣaṇmāsāc ca bhavet siddhir nirmalaṁ [k, kh: -siddhinirmalaṁ] cāṣṭa [k, kh: vāṣṭu] vartate ||
yat kiñcid vāñchitaṁ kāmaṁ saṁtuṣṭās te dadanti hi |
pīṭhakṣetraupapīṭhe vā saṁdohe [k, kh, gh: saṁdohai] samayamelake ||
gṛhāṣṭake [k, gh: gṛhe 'ṣṭake; kh: gṛhaṣṭake] siddhidaṁ syān nirbhayasya na cānyathā |
YKh (1) 3/29cd-38ab.

common gods like Brahmā and even Brahminical goddesses like Sandhyā and Gāyatrī and the common supernatural beings of the Purāṇas like Vidyeśvaras, Kinnaras, Gandharvas and Nāgas. Along with them we find the Bhairavas, Rudras and Vīras, ghosts, demons and the constellations and planets and many other beings, such as warlocks, wizards and witches together with hosts of Yoginīs and the Mothers from whom they originate – all of whom exert malign influences or, conversely, act as protectors from them. Initially these beings are invoked into the sacred seats and libations (tarpaṇa) are offered to them as one would offer water or liquid refreshment to honoured guests.[1] In this way they are persuaded to join the gathering and remain to receive the bali in the hope that they will be satisfied by it.

The eight seats in this respect not only represent all the sacred sites, as the receptacles of the directions and abodes of their protectors, they are also emblematic of the universe in which these beings reside. Peripheral in other cults, they assume key roles in Kaula ones. Indeed, the main deity itself emerges from their ranks and possesses their characteristics even as it is endowed with the highest attributes of a supreme deity. Thus, just as we observe what seems at first a paradoxical blend of high and low attributes in the main deities due to the mixed models that inspire them – 'high' Brahminical on the one hand and 'low' popular on the other – the same is reflected in their rites.

The sacred seats also share in this dual character. We have seen that they and the beings who reside in them play a central role in the rites and every aspect of the Kubjikā cult, as they do in all Kaula cults. They are the repositories of all the highest principles, the supreme divine forms, the universe and energies through which it is created, sustained and destroyed. At the same time, as the emblems of the places where supernatural beings gather, they are the cardinal sites where they can be propitiated and thereby obtain benefits, worldly, magical, shamanic and, by extension, also yogic accomplishments (siddhi). But however much the power of these sacred places (or their representations) and their deities are extolled, according to our sources, they are powerless independently. Whatever benefits and powers they may give depend entirely on the goddess's Command. The two modalities – one represented by the worship of the Krama

---

[1] I will (now) talk about the offering of libation (tarpaṇa) to the deities in the gathering (melaka), sacred seats, primary and secondary, the fields, or in the maṇḍala and in the middle of the wheel. Libation should be offered (in these places) with the waters of meat, liquor, kuśa grass and sesame seeds. The gods who are fierce, tranquil and valorous are (all) pleased by this.

tarpaṇaṁ kathayiṣyāmi devatānāṁ ca melake ||
pīṭhopapīṭhakṣetre [gh: -kṣatre] vā maṇḍale cakramadhyataḥ |
tarpaṇaṁ ca prakartavyaṁ palālikuśatilodakaiḥ [k, kh: -kai] ||
prīyante devatā raudrāḥ saumyā ghorātivikramāḥ [k, kh, gh: ghorāṁti-] | YKh (1) 3/38cd-40ab.

and the other by the offering of bali – must go together. Without the power that comes from the goddess by the worship of the former, the latter is fruitless.[1]

The worship of the Krama, which is centred on the supreme deity, is the core, regular (nitya) rite of the Kubjikā Tantras. Nonetheless, for the aforementioned reasons, the rite we are about to describe, centred on the eight seats, is considered to be so important that although the formal distinctions (common to all Śaiva ritual) between rites that are regular (nitya), occasional (naimittika) and magical (kāmya) are maintained, in this case they overlap. The occasional character of the rite is evident not only from its form but the prescriptions for it. Different animals should be offered on the fourth, eighth, thirteen and fourteenth days of the lunar fortnight.[2] The best times to make the offerings are during a solar or lunar eclipse[3] and special feast days (parvan), especially those when the teacher is worshipped.[4] Mirroring Vedic ritual, the rite should also be performed during the new and full moon. We have seen that the Kaula adept is most intensely engaged in his practice when he is observing the vow of the Kaula pilgrim. All the time spent wayfaring in this condition is a special, sacred time. Accordingly, the Tantra permits him to offer bali through the

---

[1] Thus the goddess enjoins that after feeding the initiates, teachers and Yoginīs, in front of the Krama -

> then one should offer the bali outside in the ten directions, in due order. It should first be held in front of the god and the Mothers. In this way, (the rite is) freed of obstacles, (the worshipper) has a long life and certainly obtains the desired fruit by the power of my Command.

tato [k: tatā] bāhye [k, kh, gh: vāhya] baliṁ dadyād [k, kh, gh: dadyā] daśadikṣu tv [k: dhv; kh: ṣv; gh: sv] anukramāt ||
devāgre dhārayet [k: -yat] pūrvaṁ mātṜṇāṁ [k: mātṛṇāṁ; kh: mātṛṇā] ca ataḥ param |
tena nirvighnatāṁ [kh: -tā] yāti cirāyuḥ kāmikaṁ phalam ||
labhate nātra sandeho mamājñāyāḥ [k, kh: -yā] prabhāvataḥ | YKh (1) 1/23cd-25ab.

[2] YKh (1) 3/112cd-115.

[3] Eclipses are dangerous times when demons and the consequences of sinful action are especially powerful. But they are also times when, participating in the cosmic battle between light and darkness, they can be most easily overcome. One should therefore take special care then to pacify evil influences by offering bali.

[4] (Bali is offered) in the sacred seats, primary and secondary, in a sacred field, in a cremation ground, at a crossing of three or four roads, (under) a solitary tree, on the banks of a river, to a Siddha Liṅga, on roads, in the directions, in the Wheel of the Transmission (kramacakra), during an eclipse of the sun or moon, and on all important sacred days (mahāparvan), particularly on those concerning the teacher.

pīṭhopapīṭhakṣetre [kh: -trai] vā śmaśāne [k, kh, gh: smaśāne] vā [k, kh, gh: mya] tricatvare ||
ekavṛkṣe nadītīre [k, kh, gh: ṇadī-] siddhaliṅge [k, kh, gh: siddhi-] patheṣu [k, kh, gh: hyade-] ca |
digbhāge kramacakre vā grahaṇe candrasūryayoḥ [k, kh: cadra-] ||
mahāparveṣu [k, kh, gh: -praveṣu] sarveṣu guruparveṣu viśeṣataḥ | YKh (1) 3/70cd-72ab.

channel of these seats at anytime on his journey. Thus for the renouncer, this rite becomes a regular one. Again, the Tantra suggests that bali be offered by the householder in his home at dawn, midday and at night which virtually makes it a regular rite for him as well. Again, it may also be a purely magical (kāmya) one when, for example, it is performed prior to a battle for victory. Performed regularly by kings, they become mighty and manage to keep their subjects and others under their control – a basic goal of all magical rites.

In general, bali serves to propitiate the myriad beings who may cause trouble and so obtain their assistance against the misfortunes they themselves cause. Protected by them, one is not afflicted by the evil influences of the planets, by ghosts and demons, bad dreams, and misfortune (alakṣmī). Protected by them, the magic of others is ineffective and their, otherwise destructive, mantras can do no damage. Not assailed by them, one naturally lives a long and healthy life. Free of the obstacles they cause and those that they destroy, all mantras become propitious and all one's tasks are quickly and well accomplished.[1] By offering libation, whatever work has been begun, that will be, or has been done, will all be successful.[2] The unobstructed attainment of one's goals, the Tantra repeatedly promises to those who make the bali offerings, need not only be worldly ones. These rites may also help to achieve more elevated goals. By offering libations and bali, one destroys sins and acquires merit.[3] Accordingly, they are offered in the course of initiation both to protect the neophant and also to help him achieve his spiritual goal, which requires the removal of the impurities of sin. Indeed, while the Tantra warns that one should not do this without the prescribed method (vidhi), it also promises that, if done correctly, one attains the liberated state of flight (khecaratva).[4] Animal sacrifice is offered correctly by combining it outwardly with the practice of mantra and the rest that is associated with the worship of the Krama, and inwardly with Yoga and the awakening of Kuṇḍalinī. As the Tantra teaches:

Intent on (the practice of) the deposition (of mantra) (nyāsa),

---

[1] YKh (1) 3/117 ff..

[2] yat kiñcit karmam ārabdhaṁ [k, kh, gh: -dhvaṁ] yat kariṣyati yat [all MSs: kariṣyāmi tat] kṛtam| tat sarvaṁ [gh: sarve] siddhyate tasya vidhinā caiva tarpaṇāt || YKh (1) 3/64.

[3] The offering of libation gives accomplishment and destroys sin and evil deeds. The ancestors are helped and one clearly attains the merit one desires.

tarpaṇād dadate siddhiṁ [k, kh: siddhi; gh: siddhir] hanti pāpaṁ ca duṣkṛtam [k, kh, gh: duḥkṛtaṁ] ||
pitarottāraṇaṁ [k, kh: pitaroṁtāraṇaṁ] puṇyaṁ [kh: puṇyaṁr] vāñchitaṁ [k, kh: vāṁsitaṁ] labhate sphuṭam | YKh (1) 3/42cd-43ab.

[4] vidhihīnaṁ na kartavyaṁ vidhiyuktena khegatiḥ | YKh (1) 3/129ab.

> meditation, and the repetition (of mantra), he is successful by virtue of (his) association (yoga) with the Krama. By the practice of the offering of bali to the sacred seats, (the goddess) Kuṇḍalinī (Taraṅginī) is full (and satisfied). One should worship (anuṣṭhāna) (in this way) if one wishes the most excellent accomplishment. Already knowing the purification of the mantras, one should then begin to practice Yoga.[1]

The sacred seats, like all Kaula sites, are the residence of guardians and Yoginīs who, adequately worshipped and propitiated, protect, entire community, just as they do the worshipper. In one section YKh (1) deals with evil signs and portents (aniṣṭa). This is a common topic for Tantras of this sort, centered as they are on the cults of deities who are essentially protectors. Lightning, poltergeists, and the sight of heavenly bodies during the day: these and other omens forebode calamities that can be averted by worshiping the sacred seats (pīṭhayāga) and reciting the Stavarāja[2] in praise of them.[3] This may be done by simply worshiping the four seats in the Triangle, which serves to pacify evil influences.[4] The worship of the eight seats is even more effective in this respect.[5] In this case, the eight seats, as before, represent all the other sacred sites.

---

[1] nyāsadhyānajapārūḍho siddhyate kramayogataḥ |
pīṭhabaliprayogena [k, kh, gh: pīṭhāvali-] atha pūrṇā taraṅgiṇī [k, kh, gh: pūrṇe taraṅgiṇīm] ||
anuṣṭhānaṁ [k, kh: anuṣṭā tu; gh: anuṣṭā tuṁ] prakartavyaṁ [kh: prakattavyaṁ] yadīcchet [k, kh, gh: yadiche] siddhim uttamām |
mantraśuddhiṁ [k, kh: matra-] purā jñātvā paścād yogaṁ samārabhet [k, kh, gh: samāharet] ||
YKh (1) 3/138-139.

[2] Everything is pacified and, delighting, he enjoys the earth. Subsequently, he should worship the (eight) seats with the powerful influence of the Stavarāja.
bhavate śāntikaṁ sarvaṁ nandate bhuñjate mahīm [k, kh, gh: mahī] ||
paścāt tat pūjayet pīṭhān stavarājaprabhāvataḥ [ṅ: -rājaḥ-] | YKh (1) 8/46cd-47ab.

[3] One version of the Stavarāja is found in the KMT 2/23-46 in which twenty-four seats are praised. An extended version of the same in which another forty seats and their residents are eulogized is found in the KuKh 16/24 ff. The reader is referred to that and the notes in which other versions of the Stavarāja are presented and discussed.

[4] If a conflagration without a fire (that starts it) begins suddenly in a village, the offering of beef (mahāphalgu) into the Triangle with clarified butter a million times (brings about) great peace and that prevails over the whole earth.
anagnijvalanaṁ grāme akasmāc ca [k, kh, gh: akasmān na; ṅ: akasmāta] prajāyate || *trikoṇe tu mahāphalgu [k, kh: -phalguṁ; ṅ: mahā * *] ayutaikaṁ [ṅ: ayate *] ghṛtaiḥ [k, kh: ghṛtai; gh: ghṛtaṁ; ṅ: * ] saha | mahāśāntiḥ [k, kh, gh: -śāṁti; ṅ: -śāntiṁ] pravarteta sakale [k, kh, ṅ: savale; gh: savalaṁ] pārthivasya tu || YKh (1) 8/55cd-56.

[5] Examples are:

If one sees a very terrible sight or the family is being destroyed, one should worship the sacrifice of the sacred seats; then peace comes and troubles are destroyed.

Let us now turn our attention again to the rite. Two forms are described in YKh (1). The first is the fire sacrifice we have outlined already. In that case, a Liṅga is installed in the midst of the eight fires, possibly reflecting the origin of this rite in an earlier cult in which the Liṅga, rather than the Kramamaṇḍala, was the residence of the deity. But note that even if this is the case, this is meant to be a replica of the Bhairava Liṅga in which the goddess resides.[1] Clearly this, the more elaborate of the two rites, is more suited to the householder than the wandering ascetic. Indeed, that this is the case is made explicit in the text itself in the course of describing the preliminary procession that heralds the ritual, where we read:

> The man who offers the sacrifice (yajamāna) along with his wife, the teacher and a sculptor goes at an auspicious time with elephants, horses, and chariots to the dwellings, temples, and doors taking (with them) some things (as an offering), which bestow what is auspicious. They do this with the sounds of conches, trumpets and the like, with the sound of singing and dancing while reciting auspicious hymns and (giving their) blessings with auspicious gifts. [. . .] Then (after having made offerings in the directions) one should install the Liṅga and worship the teacher vigorously.[2]

---

mahāghorabhayaṁ [ṅ: mahācaurabhayaṁ] paśyed athavā ca kulakṣayam |
pīṭhayāgaṁ [ṅ: pīṭhajāgaṁ] prapūjyeta [k, gh: prapūjayaita; kh: prapūjayyaita] paścāc chāntiḥ [ṅ: -chāntiṁ] prajāyate ||
tataḥ prajāyate [gh: prajānyate] śāntiḥ [ṅ: śānti] pralayaṁ yānti duḥsahāḥ [k, kh: -hā; gh: -sadā; ṅ: -sahaḥ] | YKh (1) 8/52-53ab.

If one sees stars or, even more so, planets during the day, one should make a sacrifice to the sacred seats; like this, (premature) death will be averted.

divā ca tārakān paśyed [k, kh: paśed; gh: peśed] grahāṁś [gh: grahāś] cāpi viśeṣataḥ |
pīṭhayāgaṁ [gh: -yoga] prakurvīta atha mṛtyuṁ hanet [gh: hane] tadā || YKh (1) 8/59.

[1] It is clear that this is the goddess's Liṅga because the hymns intoned before it are addressed to the goddess. Amongst them is the Mālinīstava, which Bhairava recites in front of the Liṅga in order to evoke the goddess out of it. Note also that according to the myth narrated in the beginning of the KMT, the Liṅga is a Bhairava Liṅga and it is Bhairava, as we have seen, who is visualised in this rite in the midst of the Yoginīs and sacred seats.

[2] śaṅkhatūryādinirghoṣair [k, kh, gh: -nirghoṣai] gītanṛtyādiniśvanaiḥ [k, kh: -niścanaiḥ] ||
māṅgalaiḥ [k, kh, gh: -lau] stotrapāṭhaiś ca [k, kh, gh: caḥ] āśīrvādaiḥ [k, gh: -vādai] śubhair varaiḥ [k, kh, gh: subhaiḥr varai] |
yajamānaṁ [k, kh, gh: -nai] sapatnīkam ācāryaṁ śilpinaṁ tathā [k, kh, gh: tatho] ||
sumuhurte [k: sumurhlater; kh: sumuhlatai?; gh: sumuhūrtai] śubhe [k: bhute; kh: bhūtai; gh: bhruktai] sārdhaṁ gajavājirathais tathā |
prāsādadvāravāseṣu [k, kh, gh: -vāmeṣu] kiñcin [k, kh: kiñci] nītvā śubhapradam || [. . .]

The second form of the rite is compact and 'portable'. It is eminently suitable for the wandering ascetic (or the householder who imitates him in his home), eulogized at the beginning of the prescription for its performance.[1] This begins with the installation of a vessel (pātra) full of the sacrificial substances offered as bali. Ideally this should be a skull bowl but a duly consecrated substitute may replace it. The sacrificial food, which in this case consists of a variety of spicy cooked meat and fish preparations, is offered in the skull bowl – the classic eating vessel of the itinerant Kāpālika. The skull bowl represents Mahākaula, that is, the Western House of the Teacher. This is Kubjikā's tradition, where the Siddhas and Yoginīs assemble and is the source of the eight sacred seats and the beings who reside in them. As such it is worshipped with the eight mantras that invoke the goddesses of the eight seats.[2] Offerings are made of both the usual perfumes, flowers, incense and food offerings (naivedya) as well as various kinds of wine and cooked meat, including beef (mahāmāṁsa).[3]

A square is drawn next with sandal paste, intersected with two vertical and two horizontal lines set at equal distances from one another, in such a way as to make nine compartments. This is a common grid. It is easyly drawn and can conveniently house beings, arranged in the primary and secondary directions around a centre. The seats are installed first in the eight surrounding squares, invoked there by drawing seed-syllables and figures that represent them in the eight directions.[4] Then the skull is placed in the centre.[5] After the seats, along with tataḥ saṁsthāpayel [k: -ye] liṅgaṁ [kh: ?] deśikaḥ [k: daśikaṁ; kh: ?; deśikaṁ] pūjayed [k: -yad] bhṛśam | YKh (1) 1/25cd-27, 29ab.

---

[1] See above where this passage has been translated.

[2] I will tell you the mantras that are accomplished in the Western House. Those eight that are in the house of Mahākaula should be worshipped there. Each of them bear the form of the mantra that is in the assembly (melaka) of Siddhas and Yoginīs. The Krama of every one of them is the House of the Teacher. It is the support (āśraya) that begins with the teacher.

mantrāś ca kathayiṣyāmi ye siddhāḥ [k, kh: siddhā] paścime gṛhe ||
mahākaulagṛhe ye ca aṣṭau tatra prapūjayet |
mantrarūpāś ca te sarve siddhayoginimelake [k, kh, gh: siddhi-] ||
gurugṛhaṁ ca sarveṣāṁ kramaṁ gurvādyam āśrayam | YKh (1) 3/76cd-78ab.

[3] Mahāmāṁsa – the 'great meat' – denotes both beef and human flesh. See note to KuKh 6/84.

[4] These are: 1) North: the Seed of the Moon. 2) North-east: the Sun. 3) South-west: Saṁvartaka. 4) South: Kāla. 5) East: the Thousand-syllable mantra. 6) South-east: the letter R. 7) North-west: Vāli. 8) West: (the mantra of) the ascetic's staff. 9) Middle: (the mantra of the) spear (vedhaka).

[5] The eight sacred seats with their corresponding Yoginīs in this Wheel (cakra) are listed in the last three columns of the following table (see YKh (1) 3/83-84). The text first lists the seats in relation to their placement in the directions. Then it goes on to list the goddesses and the seats in relation to the directions. The variant correspondences are presented in the last three columns of the table. These are compared with the directions allocated to the eight seats projected into the fire pits that are recorded in the second column.

their sixty-four components, have been worshipped, the supreme goddesses of the seats who 'bring about universal pervasion' are invoked. Accompanied by their entourage they come forth out of the eight sacred seats craving for the bali.[1] Their mantras 'born of the Krama' address then as the mistresses (nāyakī) of each seat. They are asked to accept the offerings of scent, flowers, and incense, and eat the liquor and sacrificial meat entreated to destroy obstacles and bestow all the accomplishments. Each is worshipped as the mother Mahāraktacāmuṇḍā. She is

28. The Seats, Fire Pits and Goddesses

Directions	Order of Seats in the Fire pits	Order of Seats in the Wheel	Order of seats In relation to the Goddesses	Order of the Goddesses
E	Kāmākhya	Kāmākhya	Kāmākhya	Śāvarī
SE	Tisra	Tisra	Tisra	Tisrā ambā (?)
S	Jala	Jāla	Jāla	Jvālākāminī
SW	Candra	Candra	Nāda	Mātṛnāyakī
W	Udyānaka	Oṁkāra	Udyāna	Campanī
NW	Nāda	Avyakta	Candra	Rañjanī
N	Pūrṇagirya	Pūrṇagiri	Pūrṇagiri	Pulindī
NE	Avyakta .	Nāda	Avyakta	Ekavīrā

The order of the seats in relation to the fire pits corresponds to the one implied in the passage in which the seats are described in detail. This is also the order one would expect. The first four major seats are arranged in the primary directions, beginning with the east moving around clockwise. Similarly, the four secondary seats, beginning with Tisra in the south-east, follow clockwise with Candra, as usual, in the sixth place followed by Nāda and then Avyakta. The detailed account of these seats, presented in the next section, implies that the serial order of the last two is determined, as one would expect, by their metaphysical identity. The description of the maṇḍala specifies the directions with respect to the goddesses in every case, but only in some cases with respect to the seats. The latter has been inferred from the names of the goddesses. We are told that Candramaṅgalyā is in the south-west. We may reasonably assume that she is the goddess of Candrapīṭha, in accord with the corresponding order of the seats with respect to the fire pits. The same reasoning leads one to suppose that Nādamaṅgalyā, who is in the north-east, is the goddess of Nādapīṭha. This leaves Jñānamaṅgalā / Pūrṇā in the north-west who should therefore correspond to Avyaktapīṭha. If this is correct, as it would appear to be, the order of the seats Nāda and Avyakta has been reversed. In the case of the placement of the jars, Nāda has changed places with Candra.

[1] āvāhayet [k, kh, gh: -ye] tato devyāḥ [k, kh, gh: devyāṁ] sarvavyāptikarāḥ [k, kh, gh: -karāṁ] parāḥ [k, kh, gh: parāṁ] ||
pīṭhāṣṭakasamudbhūtāḥ [k, kh, gh: -tāṁ] parivāreṇa saṁyutāḥ [k, kh, gh: -tāṁ] |
pañcāsaneṣu [k, kh, gh: -netu] tāḥ [k, kh, gh: bhāṁ] sarvāḥ [k, kh, gh: sarvā] sthātavyā balikāṅkṣiṇāḥ [k, kh, gh: -ṇāṁ] || YKh (1) 3/85.

The five seats (āsana) on which the goddesses are said to sit are the Five Praṇavas that are recited at the beginning and of each of their mantras.

the consort of Kāpālīśa Bhairava, the god of the Brahmayāmala. Moving through the centuries from one tradition to the next, she retains a special importance. We have seen that according to the KMT she is the goddess of Oḍḍiyāna. Just as Oḍḍiyāna, as the first seat from which the others originate, represents all the seats, so too the goddess there is emblematic of the one Supreme Goddess (Parā) from whom the others originate and are her aspects.

We should note finally that the configuration of eight around a centre is a common and powerful one. Here it appears in a relatively obscure representation, nonetheless we perceive echoes of the common, basic grouping of the Eight Mothers and their eight sacred sites (kṣetra, gṛha) and also that of the eight groups of eight Yoginīs derived from it.

Before moving on to the contents of the seats, let us conclude with the prayer addressed to them:

> May they, whom I have recollected and are satisfied, accept the vessel of the bali. All that is the Great Gathering (mahācakra) and (these are) the divine beings in the gathering (melaka). Present in gross and subtle bodies, they are incarnated in women (striyāṁśu) and their forms are mantras.
>
> Accompanied by Śrīnātha, they bestow boons and fame (prasiddhi). O god, they bestow gifts and accomplishments (siddhi) to those who are devoted to the teaching and worshipping the teacher and to those engaged in the practice (of consuming) the sacrificial pap (carucaryā).[1]
>
> O god! the bali has been offered to (them to chastise) those who despise the heroes, Siddhas and yogis on the surface of the earth here in the gathering of the practice of the Rule (samayācāra). May they destroy the hearing, memory, mind, sight, fat, flesh, bones and life of the wicked in the great gathering of the Rule!
>
> O god, the bali has been offered to the Yoginīs in the congregation of (Bhairava's) host of the eight sacred seats beginning with Oṁkāra and in the secondary seats and to those born of the sacred fields and in the secondary fields and, O lord of the gods, in the gatherings (that take place) in the primary and secondary doors on the surface of the earth and underground in the Egg of Brahmā, and within all the other places.

---

[1] Caru is the sacrificial food that the Yoginīs offer to their male counterparts in the sacred sites. Notice the contrast between this food and the bali that is offered to the Yoginīs. The sacrificial meal is an exchange of food. The worshipper makes his offering to appease, propitiate and worship the deity that responds by giving him sacred food in return that empowers and transforms him.

(May) those who are engaged in union (yoga) with the Yoginīs, the adepts (sādhaka) intent on (the observance of the) Rule, the Siddhas, apprentices (putraka), teachers and yogis intent on spiritual discipline, (the beings) in the town or village, in the forest, the confluence of rivers, or in a well, (at the foot of a) solitary tree or in a cremation ground, the Circle of Mothers (mātṛmaṇḍala) and those who are of many forms as well as those who are born of the earth and everyone else, may they, well pleased, always accept the bali. May all my tasks, (including) the work I have started, will do and have done, be successfully accomplished; may all my defects be destroyed and my intentions be satisfied by (this) offering of bali and flowers.

May the task that has been started be accomplished by the grace of Śiva and Śakti, by the power of the three Vidyās and by the grace of the venerable mother Kujā.[1]

---

[1] balipātraṁ pragṛhnantu saṁtuṣṭā mama cintitāḥ [k, kh: cititā; gh: -tā] ||
etat sarvaṁ mahācakraṁ tathā devyāś [k, kh, gh: divyāś] ca melake |
sthūlasūkṣmaśarīrasthāḥ [k, kh: sthalasūkṣmaśarīrasthā] striyāṁśumantravigrahāḥ ||
*śrīnāthena [k, kh: -the ] tu saṁyuktā [k, gh: saṁmuktā] varadās te [k, kh, gh: varadā me] prasiddhidāḥ [k, kh, gh: -dā] |
ye bhaktā śāsane deva gurupūjārcane ratāḥ ||
carucaryāprasaktānāṁ [k, kh, gh: -praśaktānāṁ] teṣāṁ [kh: tepāṁ] siddhivarapradāḥ [k, gh: -dā; kh: siddhivaṁrapradā] |
vīrāṇāṁ siddhayogīnāṁ [k, kh, gh: siddhi-] ye dviṣanti mahītale ||
te dattātra [k, kh, gh: daṁtātra] balir [k, kh, gh: valiṁ] deva samayācāramelake |
śrutismṛtimanodṛṣṭimedamāṁsāsthijīvitam [k, kh: -manādṛṣṭirmeda-; gh: -sanādṛṣṭirmeda-] ||
niḥkṛntayantu duṣṭānāṁ mahāsamayamelake |
tā [k, kh, gh: te] dattā [k, kh, gh: daṁtā] ca balir [k, kh: valī] deva yoginyā [k, kh, gh: yoginyāṁ] gaṇasaṁkule ||
oṁkārādyaṣṭapīṭhānāṁ upapīṭheṣu [k, kh, gh: -pīṭhāstu] kṣetrajāḥ [k, gh: -jaṁ; kh: -jāṁ] |
upakṣetreṣu deveśa dvāropadvāramelake ||
mahīpātālabrahmāṇḍe [kh: -braplāṁḍe] sarvasthānāntare 'pare |
yoginīyogayuktā yāḥ [k, kh, gh: tmā] samayaniṣṭhasādhakāḥ [k, kh, gh: samaye tiṣṭhati] ||
siddhaputraka – ācāryāḥ sādhanakṣiptayoginaḥ [k, kh, gh: sāndhusaṅkṣiprayoginī] |
nagare vāpy atha vā [k, gh: cā] grāme 'tavyāṁ saritacatvare ||
vāpīkūpaikavṛkṣe vā śmaśāne [k, kh, gh: sma-] mātṛmaṇḍale |
nānārūpadharā ye [k, kh, gh: nye] ca bahujātyādi [k, kh, gh: -jātyādhi] yāni ca ||
te ca sarve [k: sarvva] susaṁtuṣṭā baliṁ [k: vali] gṛhnantu sarvadā |
prārabdhaṁ yan mayā karma [k, kh, gh: kramya] yat kariṣyāmi yat kṛtam ||
baliṁ puṣpapradānena saṁtuṣṭā mama cintitāḥ [k, kh, gh: -tān] |
sarvakāryāṇi siddhyantu [k, kh, gh: siddhāntu] sarvadoṣāḥ naśyantu [k, kh, gh: praśatu] me ||
*śivaśaktiprasādena [k, kh, gh: -deṇa] vidyātrayabalena [k: ṛdyatrayavanena; kh: ṛdyatrayavalena; gh: ṛdyatrayave * na] ca* |
prārabdhaṁ siddhyate [k, kh: siddhyaṁte] kāryaṁ śrīkujāmbāprasādataḥ [k, gh: śrīkujāmvvā-; kh: śrīkujāvvā-] || YKh (1) 3/86cd-98.

The Eight Sacred Seats

The eight seats are the main group of eight groups of eight types of sacred sites.[1] A long section found in both recensions of the YKh describes the liturgy of the eight seats – the pīṭhakrama. This is essentially a description of the eight seats beginning with Oṁkāra, i.e. Oḍḍiyāna and ending with the Unmanifest (avyakta).[2] The second recension of the YKh divides the exposition of the eight seats into as many sūtras. Each of these begins with a couple of verses, set in the metre śardūlavikrīḍita, in which the seat is described. These have been translated for the first seat as an example of the others that all follow basically the same form. The verses that come next are set in the common śloka metre and, similarly uniform, list the beings and other entities that are generated in each seat and are part of it.[3]

---

[1] The following is the list of these places and their types (cf. above, p. 541, note 1) we find it in chapter 3 (verses 2-11) of YKh (1):
Pīṭha: 1) Uḍa 2) Jāla 3) Pūrṇa 4) Kāmarūpaka 5) Tisra 6) Nāda
7) Avyakta 8) Candra Upapīṭha: 1) Kailāśa 2) Kulūta 3) Mandara 4) Arbuda 5) Śrīparvata
6) Nepāla 7) Koṁkaṇa 8) Kośala Saṁdoha: 1) Vijaya 2) Bimba 3) Lāṭa 4) Puṇḍravardhana
5) Brahmavāha 6) Sopāra 7) Karṇākhya 8) Śvetaparvata Kṣetra: 1) Prayāgā 2) Varuṇā 3) Aṭṭahāsā 4) Jayantikā
5) Kolla 6) Caritra 7) Ekāmra 8) Devikoṭaka Upakṣetra: 1) Eruḍa 2) Viraja 3) Sindha 4) Ḍāragaru (?)
5) Antarvaidyā 6) Purastīra 7) Bhṛgu 8) Elāpura Upadvāra: 1) Ṣaṭkoṇa 2) Rohatīka 3) Kollāpura 4) Bāluka
5) Mahendra 6) Malaya 7) Adhva 8) Suvarṇākhya

Only six groups out of eight are listed in the MSs, but this is in all probability due to the faulty transmission of the text. The figure sixty-four is a common ideal number as it is often configured into eight groups of eight. Although no mention is made of the eight upasaṁdohas, the goddess does announce that she will list the eight *Dvāra*s, confirming that the text is lacunose.

Note that the eight fields are the places where the eight Mothers are said to reside. Interesting also is the presence of Nepal as a secondary seat. Despite its evident importance for the Kubjikā tradition as its sole home for centuries, this is virtually the only reference to it in the Kubjikā sources.

[2] pīṭhakramaṁ [ṅ: -ma] pravakṣyāmi [2: -vakṣāmi] paścimāmnāyanirgatam [k, kh, ṅ: -varjitam; gh: paścimāmnāyaṁ-; 2: kh: (?)] ||
catuḥṣaṣṭiprabhedena [2: catu-] ekaikaṁ [k, kh, gh: ekaukaṁ; 2: kh: (?)] saṁvyavasthitam |
oṁkāram [k, kh: uṁkāra-; gh: ukāra-] āditaḥ kṛtvā avyaktāntaṁ [k, kh, gh: avyaktāntaṁ; 2: avyaktātaṁ] tathāvadhiḥ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: tuyā-] ||
pīṭhāṣṭakaṁ [2: pīṭhātmakaṁ] tu vijñeyaṁ [gh: vijñayaṁ; 2: vijayaṁ] deśikaiḥ [ṅ: -kai] kramadarśibhiḥ [ṅ: -darśitaṁ; 2: kramatatparaiḥ] | [2: kh: ?]

YKh (1) 14/12cd-14ab = YKh (2) 5/14-15.

[3] The Yoginīs, for example, in the first seat are said to be born from it (pīṭhajā) – yoginyaḥ pīṭhajāṣṭau YKh (1) 14/15c.

Each seat houses both the main god and goddess. The goddess or mother (avvā) of each seat is Kubjikā, also variously called Caṇḍikā, Śrīdevī, Vakrikā, Khañjinī, Ciñcinī, or just Parameśvarī (the Supreme Goddess) or Parā. She manifests in six aspects (prakāra), collectively called 'Parā's group of six' (parāṣaṭka). This is in consonance with Kubjikā's nature whose body is commonly represented as sixfold. For example, she is such as the embodiment of the six groups of mantras that make up the Krama. The hexagram into which this is projected, is emblematic of the entire maṇḍala, which is said to be in 'six parts' and so, accordingly, is the goddess's body. Her sixfold nature is also the result of the fusion of six goddesses who are represented by Kubjikā's six faces. Thus these six and the goddess herself are reckoned collectively to be just one unit.

The same is the case with the god of each seat who is Śrīnātha, that is, Navātman Bhairava, although he is embodied in two Siddhas. One is the Lord of the Kula of that seat, who is most directly identified with him. The other is the leader of the eight Bhairavas there who encircle and attend on him. Note that the names of the Lords of the Kula and the Siddhas are basically those of the Siddhas in the seats described in the beginning of the KMT.

The attendants on the divine couple of each seat are six groups of eight Bhairavas, Yoginīs, heroes (vīra), their Kaula consorts (dūtī), guardians, and servants (ceṭaka).[1] who are said to be 'extremely fierce'.[2] All together these make forty-eight which, along with the god and goddess, make fifty. To these we should add the fourteen entities associated with each seat listed in the table below and discussed above. In this way we get sixty-four units (bheda) in each seat, as follows.

1) Oṁkārapīṭha

This sacred seat, also called Oḍḍiyāna, Ādipīṭha or Uḍapīṭha[3] is:

> Born from the syllable OṀ of the Transmental, it is like the rays of the moon and is divided into sixty-four units. The divine Śrīkhañjinī, who is the treasure of the qualities of Praṇava, and whose form is the energy of the Void (khakalāmūrti), has arisen (there). The Yoginīs who are born from (this seat) with (beautiful) newly formed bodies are eight, along with the eight Bhairavas and eight heroes

[1] Ceṭa- or ceṭaka- (the variant ceṣṭaka) mean 'servant', `slave', `anyone who does a set task', and `paramour' I have translated the word simply as `servant'.
[2] atyugrāś ceṭakāṣṭau YKh (1) 14/70d. This is said of the servants in Kāmarūpa. We may assume that this is how they are in the other seats also.
[3] MS Ṅ of YKh (1) reads: uḍupīṭhaṁ. Both MSs of YKh (2) read: oḍīpīṭhe.

> (vīra) together with the eight divine maids (dūtī) spread out in the ten directions. There are eight servants (ceṭaka) and a monastery. There is the Command with the teacher's mantra along with the Cave and an excellent tree. There is a creeper (valli), root (kanda) and a tendril (latā). There is the (secret) language (cchommabhāṣā) and the Gesture. It possesses the most excellent Vaṭuka. There is a Yakṣiṇī and an attendant (kiṁkara). The cremation ground here in (this) sacred seat brings fear to the fettered and is (especially) to be feared at night. I praise the Primordial Seat (ādipīṭha) that is endowed with a flood of accomplishments (siddhi) and to which the three worlds bow.[1]

The following deities and beings reside in this seat, the remaining entities in this and the other seats are recorded in the table below:

The six Goddesses (parāṣaṭka): Uḍāvvā, Raktā, Kālyā, Karālinī, Kālasaṁkarṣaṇī, and Kubjikā who is the supreme goddess (parameśvarī).[2]

The eight Bhairavas (bhairavāṣṭaka): Niṣkala, Asitāṅga, Saṁvarta, Ānandabhairava, Niṣtaraṅga, Karāla, Amogha, Khecara.

---

[1] *unmanyoṅkārajātaṁ [k, kh, gh: unmanyāṁkāra-; ṅ: * nmanyo-; 2: unmanyāṁ- -ta] śaśikiraṇanibhaṁ [k, gh: saśīkiraṇa-; kh: sa-; 2: k: -mibhaṁ; kh: (?)] catuḥṣaṣṭibhedabhinnaṁ [gh: * tu saṣṭibhedabhimantra; 2: k: bhedāścatuḥ-; kh: ?]*
divyā [ṅ: devyā; 2: devī] śrīkhañjinī [2: k: śrīkubjimvā; kh: ?] ca [2: missing] praṇavaguṇanidhiḥ [k, kh: -nidhaiḥ; gh: -nidheḥ; ṅ: -nidha; 2: pravaraguṇanidhir (kh: ?)] khakalāmūrtir jātā [k, kh, gh: khekalāmūrti yātā; ṅ: khaikarāmūrtti jātā; 2: k: aṣṭadhāmūrti jātā; kh: ?] | [2: + dithai ītyaṣṭayuktaṁ daśadiśi vidita caiṣṭakā (kh: ?) tathaiva (kh: ?)] yoginyaḥ pīṭhajāṣṭau navatanuracitā [k, kh: -taturucitaṁ; gh: navatatadrucitaṁ; ṅ: -racitaṁ] bhairavāṣṭāṣṭavīrair divyadūtyaṣṭayutaṁ [k, kh, gh: -vīrai divyaidūtyavyayuktaṁ; ṅ: bhairavāṣṭāvravīrair divyair dūtyaṣṭayuktaṁ] daśadiśi vivṛtaṁ [k, kh, gh: vavṛtaṁ; ṅ: -ta] ceṭakāṣṭau maṭhaṁ [k, kh, gh: maṭhāś; ṅ: paṭāś] ca || [2: missing] ājñāsācāryamantro [k, kh, gh: ājñāmā- traṁ; ṅ: -mācāryamaṁtra; 2: -mānandayuktaṁ] varataru ca guhā [k, kh, gh: varucaguhā; 2: varatanuguhayā] kandavallī [k, kh, gh: -varṇā; 2: kundarṇāṁ] latā ca [ṅ: cca; 2: namāmi] *cchommabhāṣā [k, kh, gh: komyabhyāṣā; ṅ: cho ā?bhāṣā; 2: sthāmmābhāyāṣā; kh: ?] ca [2: kh: ?] mudrā [2: kh: ?] varavaṭukayutā [k: -vaṭu * -; 2: k: -yutaṁ; kh: * * * ?kayutaṁ] yakṣiṇī kiṅkaraś [all MSs: kiṁkarāś; 2: kiṅkarāś] ca |
*śmaśānaṁ [ṅ: sma-] cātra [2: trātra] pīṭhe paśujanabhayakṛd [2: k: -bhayadamahān; kh: paśubha * * * ?] bhīṣaṇīyaṁ niśānte [k, kh, gh: niśāṁta; ṅ: tritātaṁ; 2: mahāntam]
*vande 'haṁ [k, gh: vaṁdaṁhaṁ] ādipīṭhaṁ [k, kh, gh: āda-] tribhuvananamitaṁ [2: kh: tribhuvanana ? taṁ] siddhasandohayuktam [k, kh, gh: siddhi-] ||

YKh (1) 14/14-15 = YKh (2) 5/16-17.

[2] The goddess in this seat is the energy of the New Moon (umākalā i.e. amākalā) which has the following six additional aspects: Mahāmudrā, Yoga, Pīṭha, Mahārṇava, Ādya, and Yugmapīṭha.

The eight Yoginīs (yoginyaṣṭaka): Jayā, Vijayā, Jayantī, Aparājitā, Nandā, Bhadrā, Bhīmā and Śrīdevī

The eight heroes (vīrāṣṭaka): Karāla, Kanda, Vimala, Rudrāṅga, Kamalekṣaṇa, Vicitra, Citra, Bhānu

The eight Kaula consorts (dūtyaṣṭaka): Śivā, Ahutyagnidūtī, Koṭarākṣī, Kapālinī, Muktakeśī, Devadūtī, Tīkṣṇadaṁṣṭrā, Bhayaṁkarī.

The eight guardians (kṣetrapālāṣṭaka): Kāla, Ḍāmara, Laṁboṣṭa, Daṁṣṭrin, Dundhubhi, Dāruṇa, Durdhara, Raudra

The eight servants (ceṭāṣṭaka): Cañcala, Bhāsura, Bhīma, Lampaṭa, Chadmakāraka, Mahākruddha, Vyakta,[1] Ūrdhvakeśa.

2) Jālandhara

Jālandhara is in the southern quarter. It looks like a Half Moon and waves of flames come from its radiant energy (tejas). The goddess is the mother Caṇḍikāvvā who is divided into six aspects on the Path of the Transmission (kramamārga). These six goddesses belong to the Vidyāpīṭha, which is unstruck sound, and each one governs a letter of the seed-syllable HAYARALAVAHRĪṀ. They, and the other beings in this seat, are:

The six Goddesses (parāṣaṭka): Jālāvvā, Tīvrā, Tīkṣṇā, Caṇḍikā, Aghorā, Amarā.

The eight Bhairavas: Ruru, Kāla, Bahurūpa, Pracaṇḍaka, Tryambaka, Tripurānta, Ūrdhvakeśa, Aghora.

The eight Yoginīs: Divyayoginī, Mahāyoginī, Siddhayoginī,[2] Gaṇeśvarī, Śākinī, Kālarātrī, Ūrdhvakeśī, Revatī

The eight heroes: Ananta, Jvāla, Jṛmbhaṇa, Stambhana, Mohana, Stambhakārī, Saṁkarṣaṇa, Vighnāntaka

The eight Kaula consorts: Jambhanī, Stambhanī, Kṣobhanī, Mohanī, Saṁkarṣaṇī, Bhrāmaṇī, Drāvaṇī, Bhīmā

The eight guardians: Agnivetāla, Jayanta, Jvālāmukha, Bhīmanāda, Ghora, Meghanāda, Mahākāla, Khaga

The eight servants: Ali, Cīvara, Raktākṣa, Kṛṣṇa, Pakṣa, Khāṭaka, Somāda, Dhūmaka

---

[1] MS ṅ of YKh (1) (14/27c) reads: "Sakra.

[2] divyayogī [k, gh: -yogi; 2: k: -gi] mahāyogī [gh: -gi] siddhayogī [gh: siddhi-] gaṇeśvarī [2: maheśvarī] | YKh (1) 14/40ab. The deviant forms of the names 'divyayogī', 'mahāyogī' and 'siddhayogī' are the result of accommodation to the metre. I have emended them to the regular forms.

3) Pūrṇa(giri)pīṭha

This is located in the northern quarter. It is like a spark and is born from the Vidyā called Vyāpinī (the Pervasive One). The goddess is Śrīdevī, the 'beautiful' (suvāmanā) Vakrikā, whose form is knowledge (jñānamūrti).

The six Goddesses: Pūrṇāvvā, Pulindinī, Jyeṣṭhā, Caṇḍā, Cakreśī, Klinnā

The eight Bhairavas: Candrapūrṇa, Tṛpta, Triśira, Triśikha, Trimūrti, Trailokya, Ḍāmara, Mārtaṇḍa

The eight Yoginīs: Gambhīrā, Bhīṣaṇī, Mahānādā, Jvālāmukhī[1]

The eight heroes: Chadmaka, Pramāthin, Prakṛṣṭa, Pramodin, Śaṅku-karṇa, Gokarṇa, Saṁvatsara, Mahotsava

The eight Kaula consorts: Lokadūtī, Mahāmālā, Lalitā, Sāgarā, Laṁkadūtī, Lampā, Bhīmā, Ucchuṣmā.

The eight guardians: Agnijihva, Pralamba, Vidyādhipa, Viśeśvara, Sumukha, Mahāmuṇḍa, Mahodara, Pinākin

The eight servants: Pulinda, Śavara, Unmatta, Palāśana, Ulūka, Mārīca, Sumatta, Bhayaṁkara.

4) Kāmākhya

Kāmākhya corresponds to the eastern face of Bhairava. It is red like the rising sun and triangular (trirasra).

The six Goddesses: Kāmārtā, Retasā, Trimūrti, Ūdhikā, Nityā, Mahocchūṣmā

The eight Bhairavas: Krodhīśa, Candragarbha, Kuṇṭīśa, Amṛteśvara, Tumburubhairaveśa, Somānanda, Tridaṇḍīśa, Ardhanārīśa

The eight Yoginīs: Viśālā, Pārthivā, Yakṣī, Dhūrjaṭī, Viṣabhakṣaṇī, Sarvasiddhipradā, Tuṣṭi, Icchā, Siddhipradāyakī

The eight heroes: Vimala, Viśāla, Mahāṁśuka, Mṛgāṁśaka, Makara-dhvaja, Anaṅgābha, Padmākṣa, Sarvavikrama

The eight Kaula consorts: Anaṅgamekhalā, Anaṅgamadanāturā, Anaṅgakusumā, Anaṅgamadanā, Bhuvanapālikā, Śaśirekhā, Khagavegā, Vāyuvegā

The eight guardians: Heruka, Kumāra, Kamala, Ṣaṇmukhāntaka, Kadamba, Lalita, Lambodara, Devasena

The eight servants: Śaṁkhapāla, Kaṁkāla, Viśālaka, Ajaya, Vijaya, Vīrabhadra, Raktākṣa, Kasmāla

---

[1] A part of the text, it seems, is missing, along with the names of the remaining four Yoginīs.

5) Tisrapīṭha

Tisra is located in the End of Sound (nādānta). Khañjinī is on the peak of the snowy mountain and has six aspects (prakāra). Kālī has descended down into the land of Bhārata here in the Age of Strife at the end of the Dvāpara Age. The god here is Tuṣṇīśanātha.

The six Goddesses: Tisrāvvā, Aghoranāyikā, Ghorā, Ghoratarāvvā, Yakṣiṇī,[1] Khañjinī
The eight Bhairavas: Candragarbha, Arghīśa, Mahānanda, Kāmāri, Pralamba, Viśveśvara, Śrīkaṇṭha, Vilamba
The eight Yoginīs: Rākṣasī, Ghoraraktākṣī, Viśvarūpī,[2] Bhayaṁkarī, Dhvāṁkṣī, Raudravetālī, Śuṣkāṅgī, Narabhojanī
The eight heroes: Ṭaṅkadhārīśa, Koṭīśa, Sundara, Śaśāṅkin, Kṛtavāsa, Vasanta, Saṁtoṣa, Kusumāyudha
The eight Kaula consorts: Revatī, Bhagavatī, Rāmā, Rohiṇī, Kṛttikā, Khecarī, Khaṇḍinī, Kṣānti
The eight guardians: Śrīdhara, Bhāsura, Raudra, Durācāra, Śāntika, Kṛttika, Kālavṛṣṭi, Vasiṣṭha
The eight servants: Caṇḍākṣa, Lampaṭa, Kṛṣṇa, Vikṛta, Bhāsurānana, Kapila, Kālaka, Bhramara.

6) Candrapīṭha

Also called Candrapīṭhapura, it is white and oozes Śiva's nectar from above the palate. The Lord here is called Ciñcanātha and the goddess, Khañjinī.

The six Goddesses: Mantrāṅgī,[3] Candradevyāvvā, Khecarāvvā, Varānanā, Somāvvā, Amṛtāvvā
The eight Bhairavas: Ciñciṇīnātha,[4] Someśvara, Amṛta, Śaṁkara, Trimūrti, Amareśvara,[5] Bhārabhūti, Atithi
The eight Yoginīs: Oṁkārā, Dīrghā, Dhūmrākṣī,[6] Dhūmrā,[7] Kalahapriyā, Vyālākṣī, Kākadṛṣṭī, Tripurāntakī

---

[1] YKh (2) (5/63cd) reads Caṇḍākṣī.
[2] Note the deviant Sanskrit – Viśvarūpiṇī, would be correct.
[3] YKh (2) (5/80cd) reads Citrāṅgī.
[4] YKh (2) (5/82a; cf. 24/15d) reads Vijñānabhairava.
[5] YKh (2) (5/82d) MS K reads Parameśvara.
[6] Instead of this and the previous entry YKh (2) (5/83cd) reads Bhīṣaṇī and Raudrā.
[7] YKh (2) (5/83cd) reads: Dhūmākṣī.

The eight heroes:[1] Vibhūti, Varavīreśa, Sarvajñakamala, Kāmeśa, Kaustubha, Kāmārta, Tripurāntaka, Anaṅga

The eight Kaula consorts: Anaṅgā, Anaṅgadūtī, Vidyādūtī, Nādadūtī, Nirācārā, Mālinī, Samayā, Śaktidūtī

The eight guardians: Niśānta, Nigraha, Dhanañjaya, Dhaneśvara, Karāla, Vaḍavāmukha, Vikarāla, Sugrīva

The eight servants: Capala, Lelihāna, Mahākāya, Hanumata, Mahābala, Mahotsāha, Devadatta, Durāsada.

7) Nādapīṭha:[2]

This seat is one of a pair, it seems, along with the following one. Thus, this one is said to be born from the manifest principles[3] and is even called the Seat of the Manifest,[4] whereas the following one is the Seat of the Unmanifest (avyaktapīṭha). The goddess is Khañjinī.

The six Goddesses: Nādāvvā, Parameśvarī, Vijayā, Deveśī, Kulasundarikā, Ḍāmarī.[5]

The eight Bhairavas: Amogha, Mahānāda, Aṅkura, Śivottama, Ekarudra, Lakulīśa,[6] Sūkṣmīśa, Ekanetra

The eight Yoginīs: Vīrabhadrā, Kālī, Kapālī, Vikṛtā,[7] Kroṣṭāṅgī,[8] Vāmabhadrā, Vāyuvegā, Hayānanā[9]

The eight heroes: Vīreśa, Sumaṅgala, Mahājaṅgala, Huṁkāra, Suśānti, Parama, Prabodha, Praśānta

---

[1] The heroes (vīra) here are called `leaders' – nāyaka.

[2] Just as Candra, the previous seat, is associated with the city of Candrapura, this one is identified with Kulūta.
*nādapīṭhaṁ [2: kh: nā * pīṭhaṁ] kulūtakam [k, gh: kulutakaṁ; 2: kulūmakam (k, kh: -mak)]* ||
YKh (1) 15/54d.

[3] pīṭhaṁ [k, kh, gh: bhādvaṁ; ṅ: devaṁ; 2: kh: pīṭha] nādābhidhānaṁ [k, kh, gh: najābhidhānaṁ] navatanuruciraṁ [2: kh: ?] vyaktatattvādijātaṁ [k, kh, gh, ṅ: vṛkṣatattvādi-; 2: kh: ?]
YKh (1) 15/36a.

The emendation from vṛkṣatattvādi- to vyaktatattvādi- is based on the reading in YKh (2. It is confirmed in the line quoted in the following note.

[4] *śrīnādākhyavyaktapīṭhe [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -khyā- -pīṭhasya; 2: śrīnādākhyā – * * vyakta] nādāvvā [k, kh, gh: nādārthā; ṅ: nādāmvā; 2: .anādāmbā] parameśvarī [2: kh: ?]* | YKh (1) 15/38ab.

[5] Ḍāmarī is said to be supreme and is made blissful with the bliss of Navātman.
ḍāmarī paramā proktā navātmānandananditā [k, kh, gh: -tāḥ; ṅ: -naṁditī; 2: -taṁ] |
YKh (1) 15/39ab.

[6] YKh (2) (5/103a) reads: Kulākula.

[7] YKh (1) (MSs K, Kh and Gh 15/42b) reads: Vikarā and Līvilā (MS ṅ).

[8] YKh (2) (5/104c) reads: Kroṣṭukī.

[9] YKh (2) (5/104d): Bhayānanā.

The eight Kaula consorts: Nivṛti, Pratiṣṭhā, Vidyā, Śānti, Kāladūtī, Mahārāvā, Rati, Prītikarī

The eight guardians: Ekapāda, Budbuda, Ghaṇṭāvādanaka, Ghora, Gharghara,[1] Valkala, Līla, Laṅkeśvara

The eight servants: Śuṣkaruṇḍa, Dīrghajaṅgha, Digambara, Mālādhara, Mahāmuṇḍa, Caṇḍa, Caṇḍaparākrama, Śukatuṇḍa

8) Avyaktapīṭha – The Unmanifest Seat

This sacred seat is the act of churning (manthāna). The abode of the three worlds, it can only be attained by contemplation.[2] It is the sacred seat above the divine Meru.[3] The Bhairavas and aspects of the goddess in this seat are consonant with its nature as a receptacle of the most elevated and 'unmanifest' energies and aspects of the deity and ultimate reality. Thus the six aspects of the Supreme Goddess – Parameśvarī – of this seat relate to her metaphysical identity rather than her divine forms. These aspects characterize her essentially as possessing iconic forms (sākārā) even as she is ultimately devoid of them (nirākārā) and has many forms. Again, the goddess is essentially the power of Speech. As such she is the goddess of the sonic energies of Speech (kalādevī) strung along the four vocalic measures (pādamātrā), namely, three whole ones (mātrā), of audible mantra i.e. sacred Speech and the half measure (ardhamātrā) beyond up into the Transmental and ultimate reality.[4] Similarly, the god and Lord (nātha) is Kuleśvara. As in the other seats, he has two aspects. One is Navātman. As such he is the Lord of Yoga who, eternal, is both manifest as the entire universe and unmanifest as the one transcendental reality. In this seat his other aspect, as the leader of the group of eight Bhairavas, is the Siddha Meghānanda.[5] As in the other

---

[1] YKh (2) (5/109cd): Ghargharārāva.

[2] manthāno [k, gh: yaṁthāno; 2: manthānaṁ-] 'vyaktapīṭhaṁ tribhuvananilayaṁ yogināṁ [k, gh: yogīnyāṁ] dhyānagamyaṁ | YKh (1) 15/55a.

[3] YKh (1) 15/56d, quoted above on p. 675, note 3.

[4] See above, chapter 2, p. 381 ff..

[5] *[k, gh: + aiśrī; ṅ: + aiṁ śrī] avyaktasya [k, gh: avyakta *] hi [k, gh, ṅ: nāsti] pīṭhasya ṣaḍvidhā [k: ṣaṭvidhā; gh, ṅ: ṣadvidhā; 2: k, kh: ṣaṭvidhā] parameśvarī [2: kh: parame * ?] |
*sākārā [2: kh: ?] ca nirākārā [2: k, kh: -kā *] anekākārarūpiṇī [2: k, kh: anekā * ra-]* ||
*ekamātrā [2: k: rāka-] dvimātrā [k, gh: di-; ṅ: trimātrā] ca [ṅ: *] trimātrā cārdhamātrikā [ṅ: * rddhamātrikā]* |
pādamātrā [2: k: pādā-; kh: pādāpātrā] kalā devī [2: kh: devā] nāthaś caiva [ṅ: -caivā; 2: nāthātra] kuleśvaraḥ [2: akule-] ||
*navātmānāthayogīndro [k, gh: -yogīṁdra; ṅ: -yogindraṁ; 2: k: -nāthanārtheduṁ; kh: navātmā * * ?nduṁ] vyaktāvyaktaṁ [k, gh: -kta] sanātanam* | *meghānandaṁ [k, gh: soghonaṁdaṁ; ṅ: mo * naṁda; 2: k, kh: -nandas] tathā siddhaṁ [2: nāthaṁ] bhairavāṣṭakasaṁyutam* || YKh (1) 15/57-59.

seats, the Bhairavas are his aspects – but here, in the Seat of the Unmanifest, they are embodiments of his theological attributes as the Supreme God who is eternal (nitya), Divine Sound (nāda), Unborn (aja), the universal cause (kāraṇa), imperishable (avyaya), omnipresent (sarvaga), perennial (śāśvata) and the firm foundation (sthāṇu) of all things. Another important and exceptional feature of this seat with respect to the others is that, in a sense, it is itself and all the others combined. This holistic encapsulation of the system is brought about symbolically by identifying the eight Kaula consorts with the eight Mothers (mātṛkā). They govern each of the sacred seats, reminding us that the eight sites (kṣetra) of the Mothers are amongst the earliest represented in the Bhairava Tantras and the Kaula Tantras that developed from them. Indeed, the Tantra implies that the eight Mothers are the original form of the goddesses of the sacred seats. Again, each one of the eight is herself eightfold in each seat, presumably as the Kaula consorts there. Thus we get the classic scheme of 'eight times eight' Yoginīs, derived from the eight Mothers. [1]

---

[1] Concerning these eight, the YKh says:

Know that this is the group of eight Dūtīs and Siddhas. (They are) incomparable and are very famous. Making Brahmāṇī first, Lakṣmī is pervasive and in the field of the lords of the directions. Pervasive, she is eightfold; being action (by nature), she is the Supreme Goddess. Each one in each of the seats is established eightfold. She is the first in each seat, proud with (her) powerful strength. These reside individually in (each) secondary sacred seat with various names. They should be known by means of their different letters (or 'colours'- varṇa). These eight have (each) become eightfold. They all have a terrible (ghora) form, bestow yogic and magical power (siddhi) and are full of compassion.

dūtīsiddhāṣṭakaṁ [k, gh: -ka] viddhi [k, gh: viddhiṁ] anaupamyā [2: k, kh: amau-] mahāyaśāḥ [ṅ: -śā; 2: k: -yasāḥ] |
brahmāṇī [ṅ: -ṇi] āditaḥ [k, gh, ṅ: māditaḥ] bhūtvā [ṅ: kṛtvā; 2: kṛtvā] lakṣmī digīśagocare [k, gh: devīśagocare; ṅ: devisagocare] || *vyāpinī [k, gh: vyāpiṇī] cāṣṭadhā [k, gh: cāṣṭapā; 2: muṇḍadhātrī] bhūtā [2: * ca] yā kriyā parameśvarī* |
ekaikasya [k, gh: ekokasya] tu pīṭhasya ekaikā [k, gh: ekekā] saṁvyavasthitā [k, gh: -tāḥ] ||
ekaikā cāṣṭadhā bhūtvā pīṭhe [k, gh: nāsti] pīṭhe vyavasthitā [k, gh, ṅ: -tāḥ] |
pīṭhe pīṭhe 'griṇī [k, gh: pīṭhaṁ yogigaṇo; ṅ: pīṭhaṁ yogigaṇā] bhūtā [k, gh: bhūtāḥ] pracaṇḍabaladarpitā [k, gh, ṅ: -tāḥ] ||
upapīṭhe sthitā hy ete [k, gh: hūte] nāmabhedaiḥ [k, gh: -deḥ; ṅ: nāgabhedaiḥ; 2: k: -dai] pṛthak pṛthak |
varṇabhedais tu te [2: k, kh: -daistato] jñeyā aṣṭāv ete [k, gh: aṣṭādhitā; 2: aṣṭau te] aṣṭadhā [2: cāṣṭadhā] gatāḥ [ṅ, 2: gatā] ||
ghorarūpāś ca [k, gh, ṅ: -rūpā ca] sarveṣāṁ [k, gh, ṅ: -ṣā] siddhidāḥ [k, gh, ṅ: -dā; 2: -dā] karuṇākulāḥ [k, gh, ṅ: kiraṇākulā; 2: k, kh: karū-] | YKh (1) 15/63-67ab.

The six Goddesses: Sākārā, Nirākārā, Ekamātrā, Dvimātrā, Trimātrā, Ardhamātrā

The eight Bhairavas: Nitya, Nāda, Aja, Kāraṇa, Avyaya, Sarvaga, Śāśvata, Sthāṇu.[1]

The eight Kaula consort: Brahmāṇī, Vaiṣṇavī, Raudrī, Mātaṅgī, Carcikeśvarī, Vārāhī, Nārasiṁhī, Śivādūtī

The eight heroes: Kaṁkāla, Nirāpekṣa, Kurūpa, Kārtikeśvara, Kunda, Kumāraka, Vīra, Vīreśa

The eight Yoginīs:[2] ?

The eight guardians: * ? Lambha, Bhūta, Triśūlāṅka, and Ajara

The eight servants: Ceṭaka, Dhuṁdhukāra, Nāgāri, Rikta, Rohiṇa, Aṭṭahāsa, Kadamba,[3] Sukhabhogin

---

[1] YKh (1) (15/60c) reads: Bhānu.

[2] Part of the text has been lost. The eight Yoginīs are not mentioned at all and the names of only four of the guardians are listed with Ajara last who is expressly said to be the eighth.

[3] YKh (2) (5/133a) reads: Kabandha.

29. Chart of the Contents of the Eight Sacred Seats according to the Yogakhaṇḍa[1]

The Seats	Oḍḍiyāna	Jālandhara	Pūrṇagiri	Kāmarūpa	Tisra	Candra	Nāda	Avyakta
Mothers	?	Caṇḍikāvvā	Śrīdevī / Vakrikā	Vakrā	Khañjinī	Khañjinī	Khañjinī	Parameśvarī
Lords of the Kulas	Mitra	Caryānātha / Jālākhya	Ṣaṣṭhanātha	Uḍunātha[2]	Tūṣṇīnātha	Ciñcanātha	Kulanātha[3]	Kuleśvara
Siddhas	Ādhāra-nātha	Cakrīśa	Kuraṅgīśa	Madādhīśa	* * *	* * *	Maruta	Meghānanda
Transmissions	Eldest		Middle	Child
Trees	Kadamba	Śukacañcuka	Ṭādaka,[4] Kaṭāha	Ciñciṇī	Karvīraka	Vaṭa	Pāpītaka	Triśākha
Roots (kanda)	* * *	* * *	Kṣipra	Drāvaka	Rakta-pravāhaka	Kūrma	Trikaṇṭa	Vṛkodara[5]
Tendrils (valli)	Devadālī	Viṣṇukrāntā	Somā	Amṛtā	Tumburī	Amṛtā	Lambaśākhā	Trailokya-santati
Creepers (latā)	Hemāṅkurā	Nāginī	Rakta-kañcukā	Kāmā	Kumudā	Tilakā	Vasantā	Brahmāṇḍa-gāminī
Caves	Śṛṅgāṭakā	Ratna-saundaryā	Vyāghra	Siddha[6]	Tripurāntakī	Saṁjñakā[7]	Candra-prakāśitā	Bhagodarī
Maṭhas	Manthāna	Śaṅkha	* * *	Siddha	Vijaya	Gokarṇa	Vibhūti	Bhūtālaya

[1] Drawn from YKh (1) 14/1-89 (end) and 15/1-72 = YKh (2) 5/14-166 (end).
[2] One would expect Uḍunātha to be the Lord of the first seat. Kāmarūpa is often identified with the first seat, as it is the seat of the present Kali Age. Perhaps this exchange of roles is implied in this way here.
[3] Kulanātha is the Ājñāsiddha and Maruta is the teacher (ācārya).
[4] This is the name of the tree according to the introductory verse.
[5] YKh (2) (5/162d) K: trikoṭaram; Kh: trikodaraṁ.
[6] MS Ṅ reads: Siddhi.
[7] YKh (2) (5/95c) reads: Siṁhikā.

Yakṣiṇīs	Kumārī	Raktalālasā	Pramodā	Ghaṭā	Vijayottamā	Dhanadā	Ajayā	Tri-jagāmbikā
Mantras	Raudra and Vyomā-krānta, Harakhecara	Raudra	Mahā-samaya,[1] Vyāpinī	Vāgbhava, Kāmarāja	Bhairava	Bhairavaka	Bhāvā	Trailokya-ḍāmara
Gestures	Karālinī	Karālā	Kiṁkiṇī	Yoga-vidhāyinī	Bhairavī	Taraṅgiṇī	Bhaga	Brahmāṇḍa-śaṅkhinī
Commands	Śāmbhava	Śāktā	*	Āṇavājñā	Prasāda	Adhikāra	Anaṅga	Ananta-śakti
The Vidyā	Khecarī-hṛdaya[2]	Māyā	Laghvībīja, Mahotsava[3]	*	*	*	Caitanya[4]	*
The Secret Languages (bhāṣā, chomma)[5]	?	Mārjārakā	Aja	Gaja	Cīvarajā	Siddha-saṁketa	Garji-pravāhiṇī	Kāmikā, Bhūta-bhāvanā
Vaṭukas	Piṅgala	Piṅgala	Piṅgala	Piṅgala	Amara	Sundara	Sundara / Khagagāmin	Jaṭālaya
Servants (kiṁkara)	Bhīmanāda	Māyādhara	Mahāmukha	Kṛśodara	Mātaṅga / Mārtaṇḍa	Rakta-bhūtika[6]	Kāpālin/ Asthi-bhaṁjaka	Śatakratu
Cremation Grounds	Karavīra	Laguḍa	Pūrṇa,[7] Ekakoṇa	Kāmaśara	Bhayāvaha	Amara	Kampa / Vimala	Kāla / Māyā

[1] Is this the name of another cave?
[2] This Vidyā is said to be a very powerful Śāmbhavājñā.
[3] The rule (samaya) common to all is the seed-syllable Laghvī (YKh 2: Laksṁī), (otherwise called) Mahotsava.
samayaṁ sarvasāmānyaṁ laghvībījaṁ [2: lakṣmībījaṁ; kh: + laghvībījaṁ] mahotsavam [ṅ: -vīṁ] || YKh (1) 14/68ab
[4] This is the Principle of the Command, also called Anaṅga.
[5] Concerning 'chommabhāṣā' – the 'secret language' see KuKh 42/60cd ff. and notes.
[6] The MSs of YKh (1) (15/35b) read: raktapriyaḥ but it does not fit the metre.
[7] This is the name of the tree according to the introductory verse.

Another Set of Six Sacred Seats according to the Yogakhaṇḍa

The group of eight seats is a special feature of the praxis of the YKh. Even so, it does not supersede the other major groupings of the seats into four and six; both continue to be important. Indeed, the high degree with which the latter is invested with symbolic meaning makes it, like the symbolism of the Triangle and the Liṅga, one of the major developments in the system after the KMT. Viewed in a different perspective from the group of eight, the six seats are especially the focus of attention for YKh (1). They are not places to offer bali; instead, in two substantial chapters, YKh (1)[1] expounds (in great detail and no less cryptically) mystical states and the relationship between them that the six seats symbolize and 'contain'. Another dimension symbolically represented or 'contained' in the six seats is, as we have seen, the sacred sound of the sonic body of the goddess. In this case the seats are presented as receptacles of mantras, metaphysical principles, phases of manifestation or yogic states. In their own way, they replicate the seats of the goddess's myth.[2] We may close our account with these seats and their myth, having gone full circle, to return where we began.

In terms of our human time this is a later version of the myth, but in mythical time it recounts earlier events. Although the Siddhas and goddesses of the seats are recognisably those of the goddess meets the tour narrated in the KMT,[3] we realise when we get to the last seat – the Seat of the Moon, which is linked to her descent into the world in her 'eighth birth', that these events are those of an earlier cycle. As in the myth narrated in the KMT, the goddess is the Divine Virgin – Kumārī – the young Kālī, as yet unmarried to Bhairava. As the account of the seats unfolds, and with it the myth, we move from one to the other through sacred time. The marvellous events that take place in each seat are witnessed by the Siddha there who, awed and transformed by them, worships the goddess. One with Śiva, each is the First Siddha and the foremost teacher of his Age. Contemplating the goddess in his own seat, he embodies the realised state of [1] I am referrring to chapters 28 and 29 of YKh (1) which are reproduced in chapters 58 to 61 of the KuKh.

---

[2] We should note that while the group of four and eight seats in this presentation are evidently closely related, the group of six is not as clearly linked to them as the contiguity of their exposition in YKh (1) suggests. Their omission in the second recension of the YKh strengthens this impression. Apart from possible causes related to the formation of the text of YKh (1), it is quite possible that YKh (2) does not reproduce this passage because the version of the myth implied in the presentation in YKh (1) differs from the one in the second recension (see above, p. 158 ff.).

[3] The Siddhas and goddesses in Oḍḍiyāna and Jālandhara are almost the same as those in the KMT. Instead of Caṇḍavegā, the goddess in Pūrṇagiri according to the KMT is Caṇḍākṣī. Instead of Viśvanātha, the Siddha in Pūrṇagiri is Cakrānanda according to the KMT and Kuraṅgīśa in the ṢSS. The Siddhas and goddesses in the remaining seats except Tisra are not mentioned in this account.

his disciples in which they discover their fundamental identity with him and hence with deity.

The phases of the cosmic cycles of creation and destruction occur in the places where the scenes of the goddess's myth unfold. Set in cosmic time, they are sacred seats. In the seats, where sacred place and time intersect, the goddess radiates the Command, which she embodies as the goddess of the seat. Thus each seat also marks a phase in the revelation of scripture. The goddess sings the Vedas in the first four seats. They are the revelation that heralds the Kaula one in the next two seats that belong to the current era.

There, in the sphere of the higher revelation, time blends into the mystery of eternity where past, present and future merge into one another. This is where Tisra, the seat of the future, destined to manifest at the end of the Kali Age, is located. But although it comes after the others, it is the First Seat and their cause. In the sacred reality of myth where reversals freely take place, the cause to which we return comes after the effect. Impelled by successive 'descents' of the Command, we rise through the phases of creation to return to their source. There we find Tūṣṇīśa, the Silent Lord, immersed in contemplation.[1] This, the fifth, transcendental seat pervades in both time and space containing the other seats in the expanse of the Eternal Void of the Śāmbhava state.

In Oḍḍiyāna the Siddha is Mitra – the Friend. He is Bhairava whom the goddess instructs when she emerges from the Liṅga. In Jālandhara – the seat of Fire – the Siddha witnesses the goddess burning with the Fire of her essential nature as Mitra does in the version of the myth narrated in the KRU. There she is the Virgin Goddess who sits naked in the flames that burn with fire of the her austere continence (brahmacarya) preparing herself to penetrate the Liṅga to experience the bliss that is its fruit. This vision, which blessed Mitra with realisation in the KRU, prefigures the goddess's self-immolation in Dakṣa's sacrificial fire narrated in a later version of the myth.[2] Satisfied she moves through the seat of fullness – Pūrṇagiri – to enter the Void of the Yoni in Kāmarūpa as the energy of passion that generates the world and the transcendental state of Tisrapīṭha. Finally, in her 'eighth birth' she descends from the transcendent as Kuṇḍalinī, the Supreme Energy replete with all the energies into the Seat of the Moon the ideal form of Candrapura – the City of the Moon – which was the capital of Koṅkaṇa, the land in the human world where she came, to be most venerated. Similarly, Kālī, the goddess of the Seat of the Moon, is Kubjikā who is betrothed to Bhairava in the KMT.

---

[1] Cf. KuKh 3/1.
[2] KuKh 3/157cd-159.

Oṁkārapīṭha: The Lord Uḍu is in (the sacred seat of) Oṁkāra, in which (the goddess) called Vakrikā was established during the Kṛta Age. (She) sings the Ṛgveda (there) on the surface of the earth and is Kālikā who is called Raktā. (She is) the Command, the awakened consciousness (bodha) that is (powerful like) a forest fire. She who is the venerable Kukārākhyā,[1] called the abode of devotion, wanders in the dense forest of the teachings (mata) that is under the authority of the lord Mitra and the rest (of the Siddhas).[2]

Jālandhara: Once the Command of worldly enjoyment (bhukti) and liberation was given to him (he became) Kuṇḍalīśa, the lord appointed for the Tretā Age. (This happened) once he had seen the virgin (kumārī) Karālī (there) in that (sacred seat) intent on performing a sacrifice. (He saw her) therein, in the Doomsday Fire (vāḍava) in the sacred seat of fire (jvālapīṭha) which, like a blazing fire, is enflamed with waves of garlands of flames.[3]

Pūrṇagiri: The goddess of the god was satisfied and went to Śiva's world in the south, in the eastern mouth. She, the virgin (kumārī) Caṇḍavegā, very powerful and bestowing boons, is there in the seat (called) Pūrṇa singing the Sāmaveda composed by the most excellent of sages. I salute the master (svāmin), Viśvanātha (the lord of the universe) whose head is placed at the feet of (the goddess) Kubjī and all this in the Dvāpara Age.[4]

---

[1] The text reads: śrīkukākhyā. (śrī)kukārākhya is the correct intended form but does not fit the metre.

[2] *oṁkāre [k, kh, gh: -raṁ; ṅ: ukāraṁ] uḍu-m-īśaṁ [k, gh: ūbhramīśaṁ; kh: ūḍamīśaṁ; ṅ: udumīśa] kṛtayugasamaye [k, kh: kaliyugasa * ye; gh: kaliyugmaṁye; ṅ: kali- * maye] sthāpitā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: -pitaṁ] vakrikākhyā [ṅ: cakrikā-]*
*ṛgvedaṁ gīyamānā [k, kh: -vedodbhiyamānaṁ; gh: -vedodnipamānaṁ; ṅ: * dadohīyamānaṁ] api ca bhuvi tale kālikā raktanāmā [ṅ: rakṣanāmā]* | *ājñā dāvāgnibodhā bahuguṇanilayā [ṅ: -ye] yā tu [k, kh, gh, ṅ: yastu] bhaktyālayākhyā [ṅ: bhaktyā * * ]
mitrādīśādhikāre [sarve: -raṁ] matavanagahane [ṅ: matavahagamate] sātate [k: yāntare; kh, ṅ: yoṁtare; gh: yāṁtate] śrīkukākhyā [k, ṅ: śrīkukākhye] || YKh (1) 15/73.

[3] dṛṣṭā [sarve: dṛṣṭvā] tasmin kumārī makhayajanaratā bhuktimuktiṁ [ṅ: -mukti] karālī ājñāṁ [all: ājñā] tasyaiva [ṅ: tasyava] datvā triyuga-m-adhikṛtaṁ [k, kh: -kṛṁta; ṅ: triṣu?gama-] svāminaṁ kuṇḍalīśam |
vāḍave [k, kh: nādāhe; gh: nādohe; ṅ: vādāhe] jvālapīṭhe jvaladanalanibhe [all MSs: -bhaṁ] jvālamālolidīpte [k, gh: -mālāli-; ṅ: -dīptāṁ] * || YKh (1) 15/74. It appears that a line of the text is missing here.

[4] *tuṣṭā [ṅ: tuprā] sā [gh: mā; ṅ: sa] devadevī [ṅ: * * devī] gataśivabhuvane [ṅ: gataśiva * * ne] dakṣiṇe pūrvavaktre*

Kāmarūpa: In the beginning of the dark lunar fortnight (kṛṣṇapakṣādikāle) during the Age of Strife, there in the beginning was Kāmarūpa, the principle of the Yoni whose nature is the Void. That divine (place), endowed with the energy of passion (madanakalā), is attended (by many beings). The Atharvaveda is loudly sung (prodgīta) (there) composed with the best of musical sounds. I salute that Lord (of this seat).[1]

Ādyapīṭha (Tisrapīṭha): I praise the First Seat (Ādyapīṭha), to which all people bow, which is the fifth (sacred seat). Devoid of phenomena (niṣprapañca), it bestows enjoyment, destroys the fear of phenomenal existence on the Siddha Path of the Siddhas. It pervades everything: the creator of the three worlds, Ūḍa, Jāla, and Saṁpūrṇa, (as well as) Kāmākhya, the sacred seat of passion, the fourth one along with them, that brings about persistence and destruction.

Tūṣṇī is there in (that) descent as supreme stability (sthiti) in the tranquil Tisrapīṭha. For a thousand divine years the sages with (the attendant) host have bowed (to him) and he has been served by the congregations of Siddhas, having bowed to that Kulīśa, Śiva, the supreme teacher in the fifth descent of the Command with many kinds of sentiment (bhāva), hymns, salutations, and prostrations.[2]

---

*tatrasthā caṇḍavegā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: caṁḍanenā] varadamahatarā [ṅ: vadamahatarā] pūrṇapīṭhe [k, kh, gh: kūrmapīṭhe; ṅ: kū * pāṭhe] kumārī [gh: kumāri; ṅ: kuśārī]*
gāyantī sāmavedaṁ munivararacitaṁ svāminaṁ viśvanātham |
vande 'haṁ kubjipādam abhinihataśiraṁ [k, kh, gh: -pādāmabhinihatasiraṁ; ṅ: kuvjikāyādamatinihataṁśiraṁ] dvāparedaṁ [ṅ: dvāparettat] samastaṁ || YKh (1) 15/75.

[1] *kṛṣṇapakṣādikāle [k, kh, gh, ṅ: kṛṣṇāvṛkṣādi-] kaliyugasamaye yonitattvaṁ kharūpam tatrādau [k, kh, gh: tatrāśai] kāmarūpaṁ madanakalayutaṁ sevyate [k, kh, gh: sevya *] divyam [k, kh, gh: * * m] etat* |
* *
*prodgītātharvavedaṁ [k, kh: prāṅgītārthaiśva veddaiḥ; gh: prāṅgītārthe ca veddaiḥ; ṅ: prāṅgītārthaiśca vedaiḥ] svaravararacitaṁ [k, kh, gh: svaravaranamidaṁ; ṅ: susvaranamitaṁ + kāmitaṁ] svāminaṁ [k, kh, gh: kāminaṁ; ṅ: kāmi ] taṁ namāmi || YKh (1) 15/76.

[2] yena vyāptaṁ samastaṁ [ṅ: samasta] tribhuvanajananaṁ ūḍajālaṁ [ṅ: uḍa-] saṁpūrṇaṁ [gh: saṁpūrṇa; ṅ: sapūrṇaṁ]
*kāmākhyaṁ kāmapīṭhaṁ sthitilayajanakaṁ [k, kh, gh: -naṁ; ṅ: -ja * naṁ] tadgataṁ [k, kh, gh: taṁ gataṁ] tac caturtham [kh: taccaturtha]* | siddhānāṁ siddhamārge [ṅ: -mārga] bhavabhayadalanaṁ bhuktidaṁ [k, kh, gh: -daṁḥ] niṣprapañcaṁ [k, gh: niḥprapaṁca; kh: niḥ-; ṅ: niḥprapannaṁ] *vande 'haṁ cādyapīṭhaṁ [ṅ: vādya-] sakalajananutaṁ [ṅ: -jana * ta] pañcamaṁ [k, kh, gh: paṁcarya] yat svarūpam* || tūṣṇī tatrāvatāre sthitiparamatayā tisrapīṭhe [k, kh, gh: tiśra-; ṅ: tiśri-] tu śānte divyaṁ varṣasahasraṁ [ṅ: varṣā-] munisagaṇanamitaṁ [k: munisagana-; ṅ: muṇiṁgaṇa-] sevitaṁ siddhasaṅghaiḥ [k, kh, gh: -saṁghai; ṅ: -saṁghair] |

Candrapīṭha: Kālī, the mistress of the gods, whose form is crooked, is the supreme manifest energy consisting of eight groups of eight (energies).[1] (She resides) in the divine sacred seat called Candra which, endowed with Śiva's energy (śivakalā), is the descent of Siddhanātha (into the world) (avatāra). She who descended into Dakṣa's sacrifice (was reborn) in the family of the Himalayas in the eighth birth of accomplishment. There the Command is very well known; it removes the abyss of phenomenal existence and is Khañjinī, the wealth of liberation (mokṣalakṣmī).[2]

Conclusion

To conclude, we notice – as the reader can see for himself by glancing through the tables presented in this chapter – that no two schemes exactly coincide. Indeed, some of them diverge quite significantly from one another. Although changes can in a good number of cases be explained, the variables are never, it seems, in any fixed relation to one another. In each case we observe some differences. One wonders at all these discrepancies, which are so 'regular' in their seemingly random inconsistency that we feel reluctant to refer to them as irregularities. One of the reasons for this is that the text was probably compiled over a period of time by a number of people, possibly in different places. Inspired by their own vision, they cared little to labour to ensure that their contribution was consistent with what had already been revealed. Moreover, despite the injunctions in the very scriptures that were developing through them to maintain their independence from other schools, they not infrequently drew from the Tantras of others in order to enrich their own, thus adding at times to these inconsistencies. Sanderson has demonstrated by means of a variety of examples drawn from a wide range of Sanskrit Tantric texts – Śaiva, Vaiṣṇava and Buddhist – that borrowing of source material is a basic common feature of the compilation of nānābhāvair anekaiḥ [all MSs: -kai] stutinutivividhair daṇḍapātair anekaiḥ [k, kh, gh: -vividhai daṁḍa-; ṅ: stutinutavividhair daṇḍapālairanekaiḥ]

---

ājñāpañcāvatāre [k, kh, gh: ajñā-] śivaparamaguruṁ taṁ praṇamya [k, kh, gh: praṇamyai] kulīśam || YKh (1) 15/77-78.

[1] This is an allusion to the sixty-four Yoginīs who embody these energies.

[2] *candrākhye divyapīṭhe [k, gh: divyā-] śivakalasahite [k, kh, gh: -sihite] siddhanāthāvatāre devеśī vakrarūpā [ṅ: ca-] uditaparakalā [ṅ: -lāt] aṣṭakāṣṭā [k, kh: metakāṣṭā; gh: meṣṭakāṣṭā; ṅ: manaka ] ca kālī |
dakṣayajñāvatīrṇā [k, kh, gh, ṅ: dakṣe-] tuhinagirikule aṣṭame siddhajanme [ṅ: -janma] tatrājñā suprasiddhā bhavagahanaharā [k, kh: -gahataharā] khañjinī [k, kh, gh, ṅ: khyaṁjinī] mokṣalakṣmī [k, kh: myokṣya-; gh: bhyokṣya-] || YKh (1) 15/79.

Tantric texts. Moreover, it can serve textual scholars as a marker to assist them in understanding their evolution and relative chronology.[1]

The text we receive is the one that is finally 'released' by the tradition, which can take place at various stages of its refinement. The YKh of the MBT, for example, has been subject to less ordering and revision than our text, the KuKh, and so is more fragmented. But while our text has been subject to more revision, the older more fragmented condition of the text is still clearly apparent in many places. It seems that in the initial phases of redaction attention is focused, as one would expect, on individual units – a rite, a projection, a yogic practice and the like – not on the whole system, which is built up of such units just as the texts themselves are compilations (saṁhitā). Sometimes we find that the units are relatively well knit together to form complete microsystems. An example that has been studied is that of the Five Cakras described in chapters 14 to 16 of the KMT. In such cases also, we notice that the single parts (one of the Five Cakras) are themselves formed from smaller units. Indeed, one of the literary qualities of the KMT and other sophisticated Tantric texts is the multiple frames in which parallel practices with their own symbolic structures are manipulated. These are examples of refined, well-planned integration of the individual units to form multilayered self-referencing microsystems ordered into compact wholes. The KuKh is less advanced in this respect. Composite units are less extensive, but they have the advantage of being more immediately applicable. More compact and, by the same token, more variable, they can each have their own individual application which not only does not require consistency but, on the contrary, is more powerful to the degree in which it is specific and unique.

In this perspective, it would be a mistake to have two schemes exactly the same. The concern here is praxis not the desire to establish a uniformity that mirrors a single, common reality. Questions such as "are the sacred seats and Wheels in the body real?" are not asked. Buddhist traditions do not have this problem. For them all 'objective' reality, whether 'physical' or 'mental,' is equally ideal and hence ultimately illusory. From the perspective of the implicit metaphysics of the Kubjikā Tantras, they are all emanations of the energy of the goddess – the primordial cosmogenic will. We have seen that this is identified with the First Seat from which the others are derived. In this way the tradition accounts for variety and accepts inconsistencies. Just as the process of emanation generates our common daily experience, which is constantly varied, in the same way it constantly gives rise to new 'inner' configurations – each one a means to a wide variety of attainments (siddhi), including liberation.

[1] See Sanderson 2001.

Later Developments

By the 9th or 10th century when the Kubjikā cult probably began its independent development, the sacred geography of the cults that preceded it and were its closest relatives had assumed the form of the regular and recurrent pattern of an ideal scheme – indeed, it may well have been one right from the start. The worship of Yoginīs, which characterizes the cults of the Bhairava Tantras of the Vidyāpīṭha, begins in the earliest sources available to us, that is, the SYM and the BY, without a clearly defined sacred geography. The protagonist of the cult of the BY was the avadhūta – the renouncer who had 'shaken off' (avadhūta) worldly ties. In succeeding centuries he came to portrayed as the acme of the liberated soul who had realised the nondual Absolute beyond all dualities, including 'pure' and 'impure' or 'good' and 'evil'.[1] The BY has him carrying a skull and bearing the insignias of a Kāpālika. He is engaged in the observance of vows (vrata) for which he repeats his mantras and performs rituals, sometimes involving sex, in cremation grounds and other such places. Although he is defined as a Bhairavācārya and does worship Bhairava as his main deity, he is more concerned with the Yoginīs who emanate from Bhairava's body and attend on him.

It is impossible to prove a date for the BY or indeed any of the early Śaiva scriptural sources. However, the BY and the SYM are certainly amongst the earliest in the chain of development of the Bhairava Tantras of this sort. The Bhairavācārya and the Kāpālika is a popular figure in Sanskrit literature right from the beginning of the seventh century, which may be considered to be the lower limit for a possible date of these Tantras and with them the emergent sacred geography they herald. Perhaps a century later, by the time we reach the TS which, like the SYM it holds in high regard, is a Trika Tantra, the Yoginīs are given places to live in towns and cities around India. However, this sacred geography may well be, right from its incipience, more ideal than real. The transfer of passages in which sacred sites are listed from Tantras of one school to another, even across the Śaiva and Buddhist divide, strengthens this impression. Moreover, the ascetic's observance is now the internalised Vow of Knowledge, which can also be honoured by the householder in the purely ideal world of pious rite, inner and outer projections and visualization. We may thus characterize this period, between the time reflected in the idealized worlds of the BY and that of the TS, as one of transition from the dominance of the vagrant life of the solitary ascetic to that of the householder and sedentary monk.

But even though, without external reference, we cannot break free of the idealized representations of the Word, one may well suppose, as the texts themselves encourage us to do, that there also existed outer functional circuits that ascetics, and those householders who occasionally took up the ascetic's way of life, could tread. Assuming the texts do reflect in some way this outer reality, amongst the earliest of those we find in the textual sources is that of the Eight Mothers. The Mothers, to whom the origin of all the Yoginīs is attributed or, at least are uniformly considered to be the most important leaders (nāyikā) amongst them, are figures of primary importance for all the early Yoginī cults. Their circuit extends from central northern India out to the east up to Assam and down to Orissa.[1] Although there is sufficient evidence from literary sources attesting to the presence in the Deccan and South India of Kāpālikas and Bhairavācāryas in the seventh century the development of the sacred geographies of the Tantras that 'instituitionalized' their practices suggests a north Indian origin. Thus, there appears to be an expansion southwards from the older to the subsequent texts. The twenty-four sites mentioned in the KMT largely coincide with a set of twenty-four found in the TS, which preceded it and one found in the JY that probably came after. In every case Gokarṇa is the furthest place south, but it is a considerable distance below the main band of sacred sites of which the southernmost part is marked by the seaport town of Sopāra, which was just north of the location of modern Mumbai. Gokarṇa is missing in the (probably earlier) Niśisaṁcāratantra, as is Sopāra. To make up for that absence, as it were, the Niśisaṁcāratantra supplies us with a number of sites in the Himalayan belt, where we would expect them to be. Several sites can be plotted in the area covered by the greater Kashmir of the 8th century onwards. It even refers to the land of the 'mlecchas', which in this case we may take to mean the regions further west.

[1] This is the constant and tirelessly repeated theme of the Avadhūtagītā, attributed to Dattātreya. See bibliography.

The development of the ideal sacred geographies of the early period (that is, prior to the disruption of the Āgamic traditions in the North at the time of the inception of Muslim domination at the end of the 12th century) is encapsulated, as it were, in that of the goddess's Triangle elaborated in the Kubjikā Tantras. This was initially marked with the four major seats and was subsequently filled out with another forty-six sacred sites to make the full symbolic compliment of fifty corresponding to the sonic energies of Speech represented by the letters of the

[1] The reader is referred to an earlier publication (i.e. Dyczkowski 2004: 93ff.) for maps of this and the other layouts to which we refer in this chapter. The maps have been produced on the basis of lists of sacred sites available in Tantras of several Śaiva and Kaula schools and also one drawn from Buddhist Tantras. Although, we must, of course, treat what we find in the texts with due caution, the fact that the sacred sites do in many cases coincide and are not, anyway, unlikely, induces us to take note of them. In chapter fourteen of our text we shall have occasion to discuss the locations of the places plotted on these maps and a few of their salient historical and geographical features in the context of an exposition of the sixty-four sites lauded there in the Pīṭhastava.

alphabet.[1] Although the KMT has already advanced beyond the scheme of four seats – which, we have seen, is in all probability its own creation – it remains in many respects the basic one to which both the Kubjikā Tantras and those of later traditions repeatedly return.[2] Indeed, it was this fourfold scheme that survived the obscurity into which the Kubjikā Tantras fell, despite the loss of two of the sites, namely, Oḍḍiyāna and Pūrṇagiri. Transferred with Kubjikā's Triangle into the centre of Śrīcakra of the Śrīvidyā tradition, it remains well known to this day.

Below is a table of the units and their correspondences integrated into the Triangle described in the Yoginīhṛdaya, a major Śrīvidyā Tantra. The association of the seats with Liṅgas is also known to the Kubjikā sources. The Liṅga in Oḍḍiyāna, which is identified with the one into which the goddesses enters, is probably the primary model for this. Liṅgas are also associated with the seats in the Kubjikā sources.[3] In one scheme the six seats are coupled to six Liṅgas, that are collectively called the sixfold Meru Liṅga.[4] The association made in the YHṛ not found in the Kubjikā sources is that between the four levels of Speech and the seats. A topic that is hardly developed in the preceding scriptural sources, it is highly probable that this association is the result of the influence of the Kashmiri Śaiva Pratyabhijñā on the redactors of the Yoginīhṛdaya. At any rate, now we have examined a good number of symbolic associations with the sacred seats made in the Kubjikā Tantras the following table, drawn up from data in the YHṛ, will seem quite familiar.

30. The Triangle of sacred seats according to the Yoginīhṛdaya[5]

Sacred seats	Kāmarūpa	Pūrṇagiri	Jālandhara	Oḍyāṇa
Goddesses	Ambikā	Vāmā	Jyeṣṭhā	Raudrī
Levels of Speech	Parā	Paśyantī	Madhyamā	Vaikharī
Energies	Supreme	Will	Knowledge	Action
Cosmic States	Views radiance of Self. Withdrawal – Drop[1]	Intent on manifestation – goad-shape	Persistence - straight line	Completion – Triangle

[1] See KuKh 6/212cd-219ab. The locations of these places are plotted on map 1 in Dyczkowski 2004: 158.

[2] For two more examples in our text, see KuKh 64/36 ff. and 65/28cd ff. – both are drawn from YKh (1).

[3] According to KuKh 60/25-26 Jālandhara has a Liṅga made of fire and Pūrṇagiri one that is 'complete' or 'full' – pūrṇa – of all the energies. The Śavarī who resides in the latter is the goddess of the Siddha Liṅga on the supreme plane of existence (KuKh 64/43). According to another account (KuKh 65/37cd-38ab), there is also a Liṅga, representing the Point (bindu), in Kāmarūpa.

[4] KuKh 58/59-60ab; see KuKh 58/43cd ff.

[5] The data for this table is drawn from YHṛ 1/36 ff.

Yogic States	Kanda (= Piṇḍa = Kuṇḍalinī)[2]	Pada (= haṁsa)	Rūpa (= bindu)	Rūpātīta (cinmaya or nirañjana)
Locations in the body of the states	Foundation	Heart	Between the eyebrows	Cavity of Brahmā
Gross elements	Earth	Air	Water	Fire
Shapes	Square	Round with six points	Half Moon	Triangle
Colours	Yellow	Grey ('smoky')	White	Red
Liṅgas	Svayambhu	Itara	Bāṇa	Para
Colour of Liṅgas	Yellow	White	Red	Colourless
Shape of Liṅgas	Three-peaked (trikūṭa)	Spherical like a Kadamba bud	Triangle	Drop
Letters of Liṅgas	Vowels	Tha to Śa	Ka to Ta	A to KṢa
Mental Organs[3]	Mind (manas)	Intellect	Ego	Citta

Later Kaula traditions maintained the worship of sacred sites as central features of their liturgies. The same four seats continued to be the main ones in many, if not most, of the sacred geographies that continued to be elaborated, largely for liturgical purposes, in the later Kaula schools. The Kulārṇavatantra is probably one of the earliest of the kind of Kaula Tantras that developed after the break-up of the early Kaula schools in the wake of the upheavals in North India in the twelfth century. It has been very influential throughout the later development of Kaulism and continues to be important. The main maṇḍala of the Kulārṇavatantra is constructed out of the four main sacred seats that, as before, serve as the receptacles of all creation. It is described as follows:

> The maṇḍala that is always auspicious (śiva) has the form of an unbroken circle (akhaṇḍamaṇḍala) and, having pervaded the universe, is well arranged, and the triple world is adorned (maṇḍita)

---

[1] Amṛtānanda writes: When withdrawal of the universe that has been emitted and has persisted takes place, Ambikā abides in the form of the Point (bindu). She is tranquil (śāntā) and her nature is the oneness (sāmarasya) of the Point in the centre (of the triangle). Once she has come forth and brought about emanation and persistence and is intent on withdrawing that, she once again enters the Point. YHṛ p. 56.

[2] Amṛtānanda explains that: the Root (kanda) is the root of suṣumṇā. The word 'kanda' denotes Kuṇḍalī, (otherwise) called Piṇḍa, which is located there. YHṛ p. 58.

[3] According to Amṛtānanda.

> with it. Uḍḍiyāna is a square and Kāmarūpa is round. Jālandhara is a semicircle (candrārdha) and Pūrṇagiri is a triangle.[1]

These geometric shapes correspond to those of four gross elements. The square represents Earth, the circle Water, the triangle Fire and the semicircle Space.[2] So here, as in the Kubjikā sources,[3] the seats are equated with the gross elements. Unfortunately, the description of the maṇḍala is short and not very clear. We are not even told how the figures representing the seats are arranged within it. Moreover, if they do represent the gross elements, it is not clear why they are not presented in the normal serial order. One could, perhaps, understand the omission of Air (represented by a hexagram) to be required by the fourfold scheme. Anyway, it is quite clear that this Kaula maṇḍala is based on the four main sacred seats.

The later Kaula Tantras continued to preach the value of worshipping in the sacred seats and combined, (as in the earlier traditions) the literal outer pilgrimage with their projection into the body and idealisation in such a way that they continued to exist in a tenuous intermediate reality somewhere between the ideal and the actual. Even so, the sites are clearly places of pilgrimage. The Rudrayāmala[4] teaches that 'he who visits ('has darśana of') the Mahāvidyā in each seat (pīṭha) receives the grace of attainment (siddhi). The mantra (of the seat) should live in the seat (by being recited there)'.[5] Pilgrimage to the sacred seats without cultivating of deep

---

[1] KT 6/24-25.
[2] See diagram in Johari 1987: 72.
[3] See e.g. KuKh 21/31ab-47.
[4] This text should not confused with another much earlier Tantra with the same name which is as yet unrecovered. It is clear that this Rudrayāmala is a much later text because of the reference here and elsewhere in it to the ritual use of cannabis. The widespread use of this intoxicant probably began in India after the establishment of Muslim rule and may well have been introduced into the subcontinent by the invading Afghans. By the time we reach Sarvānanda who lived in the 15th century we find that the Kaula texts from which he draws to compile his anthology – the Sarvollāsatantra – are very well acquainted with cannabis. This, they tirelessly repeat, should be consumed with the sacrificial wine, an association, no doubt, that permitted its insertion into those parts of the older rituals which knew nothing of the new intoxicant. For example, the Samayācāratantra, quoted in the Sarvollāsatantra (1953: 148) declares that:

> Wine (kāraṇa) (should be drunk) after having taken hemp (saṁvidā). It has been decided (by the scripture that) the (instigating) cause (kāraṇa) (of drinking) wine (kāraṇa) is hemp.

This use of vijayā – the modern North Indian preparation made from macerated cannabis leaves called bhaṁga – ultimately came to be ingested as the leftover offering to the deity (prasāda) independently and the offering of cannabis was extolled as superior to that of wine (saṁvidāsavayor madhye saṁvid eva garīyasī).
[5] RY 71/195-196.

spiritual feelings (bhāva) is useless.[1] Written closer to our times, we recognise some of them, such as Jvālāmukhī in the Kangra valley and Kaṅkāla, which is now part of Haridvāra. At the same time, just as the early sources do, the RY admonishes that the adept must contemplate the sacred seats in the body, which, although numerous, it takes care to name one by one.[2] Kāmarūpa is not just the outer place; it is the 'flawless triangular foundation'[3] of the yogi's subtle body. Combining the two, inner and outer, as did its predecessors, the Rudrayāmala teaches that inner practice must accompany the outer journey:

> By faith, supreme devotion, and self-control, the yogi who is continent and truthful gets Vāyavī, the supreme energy (of the vital breath) ... by (his) devotion to the guru, (deity) and the rest, she becomes gracious. The inner soul of the great soul practices contemplation of the breath (vāyudhāraṇa) in this way and the breath becomes gracious (anilakṛpā). This yogi wanders about visting this and that sacred seat (pīṭha). He eats little and, healthy, is joyous with the bliss of cannabis (vijayānandanadita).[4]

---

[1] RY 1/219-220.
[2] For a list of sacred seats see, for example, RY 17/49-51.
[3] kāmarūpaṁ mahāpīṭhaṁ trikoṇādhāram āmayam | RY 71/213.
[4] RY 17/40.

Appendix I

31. Contents of the Five Main Sacred Seats according to the Kubjikāmata and its explanatory Tantras

Sacred Seats	Goddesses (KMT, ŚM)[1]	Goddesses (ṢSS)	Lords (KMT, ŚM)	Lords (ṢSS)[2]	Faculties	Elements/ Qualities	Cosmic Ages	seed-syllables
Oḍḍiyāna (O)	(Olambikā >) Raktā-cāmuṇḍa / Oḍīśī	Devī	Mitrānanda / Oḍanātha	Ādhārīśa / Śivānanda	Desire to hear	Earth / Firmness	Satya	ṢĀṀ
Jālandhara (JĀ)	Karālī / Karālavadanā	Karālinī	Siddha-kauṇḍalin / Kuṇḍaleśvara[3]	Kuṇḍalīśa / Āṇava	Desire to speak	Fire / Heat	Tretā	ŚEṀ
Pūrṇagiri (PŪ)	Caṇḍākṣī	Caṇḍākṣiṇī	Cakrānanda	Kuraṅgīśa / Vyāpārīśa	Nourish-ment	Water / Fluidity	Dvāpara[4]	SŪṀ
Kāmarūpa (KĀ)	Ucchuṣmā > Kāmeśvarī	Kāmeśvarī	Candrānanda	Cakrā-nanda/ Cañcala	Desire to see	Air / Motion	Kali	VĪṀ
Mātaṅga	Māṅgalyā	Kuṇḍalinī	- – -	Mātaṅga / Antyaja	- – -	Space/ Aperture	- – -	- – -

---

[1] Entries in italics in this column and that of the corresponding lords of the goddesses of the seats listed here are the names according to the ŚM in the cases where they differ.
[2] The entries in italics in this column are names of the Siddhas in the four sacred seats according to ṢSS 1/53 ff.
[3] Also spelt Kuṇḍalīśvara.
[4] KMT: end of Dvāpara Age.

A fifth name is mentioned which is that of a goddess and may correspond to the fifth seat. They are also given 'inner' equivalents. These may all be tabulated as follows.

32. Inner Equivalents of the Seats and Secret Names of the Siddhas

Pīṭhas	Siddhas (public names)	Siddhas (secret names)	Inner Equivalents
Oḍḍiyāna	Oḍḍīśanātha	Śivānanda	Śiva
Jālandhara	Caryānātha	Āṇavānanda	Mantra
Pūrṇagiri	Ṣaṣṭhanātha	Vyāparīśānanda	Ātman
Kāmarūpa	Mitranātha	Cañcalānanda	Manas
Mātaṅga	Mātaṅganātha	Kulāmbikā	Śakti

33. Daughters, Sons and Guardians in each of the Five Sacred Seats

Seats	Daughters	Sons	Guardians
Oḍḍiyāna	8	8	6
Jālandhara	10	10	6
Pūrṇagiri	12	12	6
Kāmarūpa	13	13	7
Mātaṅga	9	9	5
Total	52	52	30[1]

[1] All together the daughters, sons and guardians make one hundred and thirty-four. Concerning this figure, see above, p. 88 ff.

Appendix II

The Sacred Seats according to the Śrīmatottara and Ṣaṭsāhasrasaṁhitā

The Kālīkrama, like the Śrīkrama of the Kubjikā Tantras, teaches that the body is full of sacred places. Their projection into the body arouses Kuṇḍalinī who, in the form of Kālakarṣiṇī moves in the breath, impelling it and, with it, time. The later, more refined Kashmiri Kālīkrama concentrated on this mysterious activity within the body, the epitome of all the sacred sites. The body (piṇḍa), filled with all the principles of existence, and the universe (aṇḍa) are one. It is the temple of the deity, worshipped there surrounded by the goddesses, the sacred forms of the mind and senses. As Maheśvarānanda says:

> The goddesses of the senses pulse radiantly in the sacred seat (pīṭha) that is one's own body consisting of the universe. And in their midst shines Supreme Śiva, the treasure of consciousness.[1]

The psychophysical energies that radiate from the deity enthroned in the centre are essentially those of Speech that, in the form of letters, accompany the projections taught in the Kashmiri Kālīkrama, as they do in those of the Kubjikā Tantras. The Kashmiri Kālīkrama, operating at a higher level of essentialization than its original scriptural counterparts, abandons the outer ritual. Accordingly, the sonic aspects of the Krama barely serve a token function with respect to the psychophysical energies they permeate. Kubjikā's Krama, on the other hand, still grounded in outer ritual action, maintains the original emphasis on the sonic projections. Moreover, the Kubjikā tradition did not focus its teachings on the activity of consciousness in the same way. Nonetheless, it also formulates similar parallel representations that we witness in the hermeneutical development of the teachings of the KMT in its expansions, particularly the ṢSS. There the seats are the receptacles of the powers of the senses – sight, hearing and the like. Indeed, according to the ṢSS, all the components of the psychophysical organism are distributed in them, represented symbolically by the disciples of the goddess and other beings who reside in the seats. The projection of the letters into the parts of the body is that of the Mālinī order of the alphabet. These sonic energies are attached to the sons of the goddess in each seat as their consorts. The daughters and guardians are projected into other places not occupied by the energies of Mālinī. These places are not just parts of the body;[2] they also include

[1] MM verse 34, p. 80.

[2] Notice, by the way, that one of these places, occupied by the fourth daughter in Oḍḍiyāna, is the beard. Clearly, the body of the daughters is a male one. However, as the energies of Mālinī are part physiological functions like digestion and the activities of the body like 'running' and 'belching'.

The lists of sons, daughters and guardians of each sacred seat presented in the KMT, ṢSS and ŚM are compared in the following chart. As the list in the ṢSS is the most extensive, this has been used as the base. Variants of this list in the other two texts are in the notes. In both the KMT and the ṢSS the daughters precede the sons. In the ŚM it is the other way around.

Schoterman has already published much of the following chart. Here it is supplemented with the variants and additions found in other sources.[1] The ṢSS supplements the KMT by supplying, amongst other things, the mantras not presented in the KMT. The ŚM supplements it by adding iconographic details. These include descriptions of the Yantras of the sacred seats and the visualized forms of their residents.

I. Oḍḍiyāna

The inhabitants of Oḍḍiyāna

> They, (the sons, daughters and guardians, have) four arms and three eyes. Their hands, fearsome with noose and staff, they hold a javelin and sword and, divine, they are adorned with diadems and earrings. They have many forms and all are adorned with many ornaments. They are beautiful in all (their) limbs and marked with all the characteristics. They are accompanied by Oḍanātha, and Oḍīśī is the mistress of the Wheel.[2] of the goddess's body, it is a female one. Accordingly, the breasts, milk and ovarian fluid are places onto which they are projected.

---

[1] See Schoterman 1986: 222-225.

[2] caturbhujās trinetrāś [g: -jā trinetrā] ca pāśadaṇḍograpāṇayaḥ || śaktikhaḍgadharā [g: -raṁ] divyā [g: divyaṁ] mukuṭakuṇḍalabhūṣitāḥ [g: makūṭaiḥ – -taṁ] |
nānārūpadharāḥ [g: -rā] sarve nānālaṅkāramaṇḍitāḥ [g: -tāṁ] ||
sarvāvayavaśobhāḍhyā [g: -ḍhyāṁ] sarvalakṣaṇalakṣitāḥ [g: -tāṁ] |
oḍanāthasamopetā [g: -nāthaṁ samopetāṁ] oḍīśī cakranāyikā [g: -kāṁ] || ŚM 3/27cd-29.

In this case only the attendant offspring and guardians are described. Normally the ŚM describes the deities and says that the other residents look the same. We may assume, therefore, that the goddess and Siddha of this seat also look like their spiritual offspring.

Diagram 8. The Yantra of Oḍḍiyāna
O fair lady, this is the sacred seat of Earth, which is (brilliant) like heated gold. Divine, it is as if yellow and red. It is square and beautiful. O dear one, in the middle (there is) a triangle the shape of a water chestnut made of divine energy (tejas). (The outside) is round (maṇḍalākāra) and is adorned with a sixteen (-petalled) lotus. O beloved, it has four (main) doors and two secondary ones.[1]

[1] pṛthvīpīṭham idaṁ bhadre taptakāñcanasannibham |
pītāruṇanibhaṁ divyaṁ caturasraṁ manoharam ||
madhye [g: madhya] śṛṅgāṭakākāraṁ [g: -kākāro] divyatejomayaṁ [g: -teja-] priye |
tirasraṁ [kh g: tisra] maṇḍalākāraṁ dvirasṭapaṅkajaśobhitam [g: -paṁjaśobhitāḥ] ||
caturdvāropasaṁyuktam [kh: catudvāropasaṁyuktā] upadvāradvayaṁ priye [g: prīye] |
ŚM 3/21-23cd.

Unfortunately, the ŚM does not tell us how the deities are deployed in the yantras of the sacred seats. The sons, daughters and guardians are said to form an 'enclosure' (parigraha) around the two main deities of each seat. As there are eight sons and eight daughters in this seat, perhaps they should be worshipped on the sixteen petals of the lotus with the six guardians placed at the doors.

Daughters	Locations (pura)
1. Rudrāṇī[1]	skin
2. Rudraśākī[2]	hair of the head
3. Govaktrā[3]	hands and feet
4. Sumukhī	beard
5. Vānarī	teeth
6. Kekarā[4]	bones
7. Kālarātri[5]	sinews
8. Bhaṭṭikā[6]	'firmness'

Sons	Śaktis[7]	Locations (siṁhāsana)	Letters
1. Vāmana	Nādinyā	above the Cavity of Brahmā[8]	Na
2. Harṣaṇa	Nivṛtti		Ṛ
3. Siṁhavaktra	Pratiṣṭhikā	headband	Ṝ
4. Mahābala[9]	Vidyā		ḷ
5. Mahākāla	Śānti		Ḷ
6. Ekavaktra[10]	Grasanī	head	Tha
7. Bhairava	Priyadarśanī	eyes	Dha
8. Pracaṇḍa	Guhyaśakti	nose	Ī

[1] These daughters are called the Group of Eight Śākinīs. The eight sons are 'the kings of eight thrones' (aṣṭasiṁhādhipa) (KMT 2/42cd).
[2] ŚM (3/19a) reads: Rudraśakti.
[3] KMT (2/43b) and ŚM (3/19b) read: Gomukhī.
[4] KMT (2/43c) and ŚM (3/19c) read: Kekarī.
[5] KMT (2/43d) and ŚM (3/19d) read: Kālarātrī. The spelling of this word in the ṢSS is correct. But note that the spelling 'kālarātrī' commonly replaces the regular 'kālarātriḥ' in the Kubjikā texts and those of other schools. For example, see KRU 3/93a and 4/82c and YKh (1) 1/42c.
[6] ŚM (3/19d) reads: Bhadrikā.
[7] Not found in the KMT.
